

max. 12. 8
8

THE IMPERIAL HISTORIE:

OR THE LIVES OF THE EMPEROVS. FROM IVLIVS CESAR, THE FIRST FOVN-DER OF THE ROMAN MONARCHY, VNTO THIS PRESENT YEERE:

Public Library, JUN 11 1891
DETROIT, MICH.

Containing their Liues and Actions,

with the Rising and Declining of that Empire; the Originall and Successe, of all those barbarous Nations that haue inuaded it, and ruined it by peece-meale: With an ample Relation of all the memorable Accidents that haue happened during these last Centuries.

First written in Spanish by PEDRO MEXIA: And since continued by some others, to the death of MAXIMILIAN the Second; Translated into English by W. T. And now Corrected, amplified and continued to these times by EDWARD GRIMSTON Sergeant at Carms.

Ex libris / pr. H. L. 12. 8 22

LONDON, Printed by H. L. for MATHEW LOVNES, dwelling at the signe of the Bishoppes head in PAVLES Churchyard. 1623.

A q

But

But in these degenerate yeeres of ours; As many other excellent and ornamentall Merits; so these, especially, are left utterly prayselesse and excolete. For since men cease to doe praise-worthy deeds; To be praysed, likewise they thinke thriftlesse and idle. Notwithstanding, what Presents more precious can possibly bee giuen to Men, then Prayse, Glorie, and Eternitie? All which I intentionally and effectually present and ascribe with all Worthinesse to your Lordshippe, in entitling them to you, in these supremest Personages. For, Who soeuer protects and maintaines Vertue and Nobilitie, must necessarily be himselfe both Vertuous and Noble. To the Protection therefore of all the Vertue and Nobility herein made sacred to Eternitie, I only select and inuoke your Honour, in these my humble Dedications; Abiding euër

Your good Lordshippes most humbly vowed, in all true Duty and Seruice,

Ed. GRIMSTON.

A Table of the Names of all the ROMAN EMPERORS.

A
 Adrian.	115
Albert the First.	349
Albert the Second.	602
Adulph.	546
Alexander Seuerus.	161
Antoninus Pius.	121
Anastatius the First.	302
Anastatius the Second.	363
Arcadius and Honorius.	261
Arnolphus.	405
Aurelianus.	199
Augustus Octavianus Caesar.	20
B
Balsianus Caracalla.	147
C
Caligula.	48
Carus, Carinus and Numerianus.	213
Charles the Great.	383
Charles the Second.	399
Charles the Third.	403
Charles the Fourth.	571
Charles the Fifth.	634
Claudius the First.	53
Claudius the Second.	195
Clodius Balbinus, and Maximus Pupienus.	173
Commodus Antonius.	129
Constantius Clorus.	222
Constantine the Great.	225
Constantinus, Constantius and Constance, the sons of Constantine the Great.	235
Constantine the Third.	346
Constance the Second.	347
Constantine the Fourth.	351
Constantine the Fifth.	369
Constantine the Sixth.	377
Conrade the First.	411
Con-

THE TABLE.

Conrade the Second.	439
Conrade the Third.	472
Conrade the Fourth.	532
D
Decius.	180
Didius Iulianus.	137
Domitianus.	100
Dioclesian.	216
E
Emilianus.	183
F
Ferdinand the First.	660
Ferdinand the Second.	755
Florianus.	208
Frederick Barbarossa.	479
Frederick the Second.	516
Frederick the Third.	605
G
GAlba.	76
Gallus.	182
Galicus.	187
Gordianus.	175
Gratianus.	252
H
Heligabalus.	156
Henry the First.	414
Henry the Second.	435
Henry the Third.	441
Henry the Fourth.	448
Henry the Fifth.	461
Henry the Sixth.	500
Henry the Seventh.	553
Heracius.	339
I
Iulius Caesar.	9
Iulianus Apostata.	241
Ionianus.	245
Iustinus the First.	305
Iustinus the Second.	322
Iustinian the First.	308
Iustinian the Second.	355
L
Leo the First.	292
Leo the Second.	297
Leo the Third.	366
Leo the Fourth.	376
Lewes

THE TABLE.

Lewes the First, called Ludonicus Pius.	387
Lewes the Second.	397
Lewes the Third.	401
Lewes the Fourth.	408
Lewes the Fifth.	595
Lotharius the First.	323
Lotharius the Second.	498
M
Macrinus.	151
Marcus Aurelius.	125
Martianus.	290
Mathias.	737
Mauritius.	323
Maximianus.	167
Maximilian the First.	620
Maximilian the Second.	686
N
Nero.	62
Nerva.	105
O
Otho the First.	81
Otho the Second.	419
Otho the Third.	428
Otho the Fourth.	431
Otho the Fifth.	511
P
Pertinax.	133
Philip the First.	178
Philip the Second.	505
Philippicus.	362
Phocas.	336
Probus.	207
Q
QVintilius.	198
R
Robert.	583
Rodolph the First.	540
Rodolph the Second.	696
S
SEnerus.	141
Sigismund.	590
T
TAcitus.	205
Theodosius the First.	256
Theodosius the Second.	274
Theodosius the Third.	365
Tibe

THE TABLE.

Tiberius the First.	32
Tiberius the Second.	326
Titus.	97
Traianus.	108
V
Valentinianus the First.	247
Valentinianus the Second.	283
Valerianus.	185
Vespasianus.	91
Vicellius.	85
W
Wenceslavs.	576
Z
Zeno.	297

THE LIFE OF IVLIVS CAESAR. FOVNDER OF THE EMPIRE AND MONARCHIE OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

VLIVS Caesar was of a Noble Family, and, returning to Rome from the Pretorship in Spain with great renown, entered into friendship with Marcus Crassus & Gnaeus Pompey, who were the mightiest Citizens in Rome: And, pacifying the controversy between them, he obtained the Consulship: which he executed with such gravity and reputation, that his fellow-Consul would not endure to be with him, but retired. Afterwards giving his daughter Iulia in marriage to Pompey, he went into France; which he subdued, and overcame the Germans. He went afterwards also into Britannie, and by force subdued it to the Roman Empire. Iulia afterwards dying, and Marcus Crassus being slain by the Parthians, mutual discord grew between Caesar and Pompey: the occasion whereof was, for that the second five years of Caesars government of France being expired, it was propounded by Pompeys faction, that a successor should be sent him: and Caesar desired, that his command in the French Wars might be prolonged, and that in his absence he might demand the Consulship: which being denied him, he made another proposition, that he would give over his army in France, upon condition that Pompey should do the like by his in Spain. Which being also denied, and being enjoined to leave his army, he passed the River Rubicon (limit assigned him which he was not to pass) and, taking the city of Ariminum, he went with such fury directly to Rome, as Pompey abandoned Italie, and he, following him, in the end overthrew him in Pharsalia. Whereupon Pompey, for refuge repairing to Ptoleme King of Egypt, was in a small Bark, by that Kings direction, slain by the hands of Septimius and Achilla: whose head being (by Ptolemy's command) presented to Caesar, he wept. Afterwards, bending his force against Ptolemy, and overcoming him, he passed into Egypt, and tamed the pride of the Egyptians. Thence he went into Africa, pursuing the remainder of Pompeys faction, and which he overcame: and Cato being in Utica, committing to fall into Caesars hands, slew himself. Caesar, returning to Rome, triumphed: and afterwards going into Spain (after a most cruel battell, wherein he was in danger to have been lost) he overthrew Sextus Pompeius, eldest son of the great Pompey: and, returning to Rome, he took upon him the Dictatorship. Where, finally, Decius, Marcus Brutus, Gaius Cassius, Gaius Calpa, Atilius Cimber, Quintus Ligarius, Marcus Spurius, Cornelius Cinna, with many other principall Romans, conspiring against him, he was slain in the Senat, being of the age of 55 years, upon the fiftenth day of March, with 23 wounds; many prodigious signes of his death appearing both before and afterwards: which hindered his passage against the Parthians, and many other high designs, which he resolved to have undertaken.

Being to write the lives of the Roman Emperours, which held the Monarchie of the world; or, to speak more properly, to reduce them into a brief Compendium (a work in truth of waight and troublesome, requiring an active spirit, and a more eloquent pen than mine) I should it no small difficulty to begin with IVLIVS CAESAR, of whom I am first to treat. Who although he were but Dictator, and not stiled Emperour, in that sense of Lord and Sovereign, as his Successors afterwards held it; yet he was the fore-runner, and made the way to this Monarchie: and all succeeding Emperours have held it a glory to be called CAESARS after his name. His exploits were such and so many, and Histories are so fraught with them, that I should it as great a difficulty to relate them briefly, as to write them confusedly. Wherefore, out of so large and copious a field, I will only collect that which I shall hold fittest

All Emperours took the surname of Caesar.

fitteft for the Subject of this Work; yet handling it with convenient breuity: notwithstanding (he being the huff and foundation of this ftately Building) it will be needfull I fhould extend my felf much more in this, than in the reft which fhall follow. As for his other braue achievements, I will refer the Reader to thofe many books which make honourable mention of C Æ S A R, and to the content which is generally conceiv'd of his virtues and worthy endeavours.

Among all the glorious actions of I V L I V S C Æ S A R, the greateft in my opinion, and which breeds moft admiration, is, how he durft project, then put it in practice, and laftly bring it to effect, to make himfelf Lord of the Roman State (the which was Lady and Miftrefle of the greateft and moft habitable part of the world) and of all that thee had lubdu'd during the fpace of 700 years: for, fo long it was from the firft foundation of Rome, vntill that I V L I V S C Æ S A R feiz'd vpon the government of the Common-weal: whereof there were 240 years vnder the abfolute command of Kings, and the reft vnder the government of Confuls, who were choſen by the people, except ſome few years, in which the Tribunes and Decemviri bare the ſway. Doubtleffe, a ſhort time to raiſe and get ſo great an Empire as the Romans had obtained; when as C Æ S A R, of a ſingle State, made it ſubject to the command of One; whoſe Empire without doubt exceeded all others both for continuance, extent and power: the which is confirmed by many approved Writers. Wherefore, omitting all other Kingdoms and Common-weals, which are not to be parallel'd with this, I will make mention only of the greateft and moſt famous which at the firſt were call'd Monarchies; namely, the Aſſyrians, Perſians and Macedonians: all which the Roman Empire did far exceed. As for the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, which is the moſt antient of all Monarchies, during the ſpace of 1240 years (for, ſo long it continued, according to the computation of Saint A V O Y S T I N E) it never extended it ſelf out of the bounds of Aſia, nor had any footing in Affrick or Europe. Neither were the Medes more powerfull: of which Kingdome A R B A T Y S was the firſt Founder; by the ruine and death of S A R D A N A P A L Y S King of the Aſſyrians, overthrowing the firſt Monarchie. Then the Perſians extinguish'd the Medes by the powerfull hand of C Y R U S; and this ſhall be accounted the ſecond Monarchie: who although they made ſome incuſion into Europe (as that of X E R X E S and others) and in Aſia grew more powerfull than thoſe which had gone before, yet it continued not above 200 and odd years; and they were ruin'd, with D A R I U S their King, by A L E X A N D E R, the Great, King of Macedon. We cannot deny, but that his Empire was of a greater extent than any of the above-named: for, he had vnder his obedience a great part of Europe, and he ſubdu'd in a manner all Aſia; and this is held for the third Monarchie; but it was like a flaſh of lightning, burning all it encounters, and is ſoon extinct: for, with the death of A L E X A N D E R, his power decay'd. Then grew factions, and diuerſe Kingdoms were erected; ſo as it is apparant, that the Roman Empire exceeded them all both in time, greatnes and power.

In time, being not much leſſe than 1300 years ſince Rome was built, and yet the name of the Roman Empire continueth vnto this day. For the ſpace of 1300 years it ſtill increas'd, and hath ever ſince been held the moſt predominant power of all others. In extent of dominions & power; for, it is moſt certain, that, uniting whatſoever the others held, it will ſcarce equall the one half of the Roman Empire. For, laying aſide whatſoever the Emperours did adde vnto it, before that I V L I V S C Æ S A R did ſeize vpon the State, they had ſubdu'd the beſt part of the world.

In Europe they were Maſters of all Italie, and Gallia Ciſalpina or Lombardie, Auſtria and Illyricum, now call'd Sclauonia; and they extended themſelves as farre as the riuer of Danubius: they had ſubdu'd all Greece (ſome yeelding voluntarily; others, by force) the States of Athens, Lacedæmon, Thebes, Corinth, and all Peloponeſus, now call'd Morea, with their Territories; the Kingdoms of Macedon, & Epirus now Albania, and in like manner Thracia. They held the Ilands of Sicilie, Sardaynia, Crete or Candie, Cypres, Rhodes, Eubœa, now Negropont, with many other Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea. They alſo ſubdu'd Spain (but with more difficulty and oppoſition than any of the reſt) and in like manner all France, with that part of Germanie which lies on this ſide the Rhine, call'd the Lower; or Gallia Belgica, which was the work of C Æ S A R himſelf; and in like manner that of Britannie, vnder which are comprehended England and Scotland. They were Maſters of all Affrick (which is the third part of the world) that is to ſay, of the fruitfulleft and moſt habitable parts, having ruin'd proud Carthage. In Aſia they had ſubdu'd the greateſt and beſt Prouinces, and made them their Subjects and Tributaries: among the which were Syria call'd Soria, Phœnicia, Paleſtina, Iudea, Phrygia, Caria, Cilicia, and Bitinia by the laſt will and teſtament of King N I C O M E D E S. The Kings of Egypt and Cappadocia were their Friends and confederates; and they had a commanding power in Armenia, Colechis, and other Prouinces. Albania, Iberia, and ſome other Countries, did them homage, and paid them tribute: which Countries had been vanquiſhed by them, and many Kings and valiant Captains ſlain. Finally, they were Lords of ſo many Cities and Prouinces, as it were an endleſſe labour to ſet them down in particular; and their power was ſo great, as no forces but their owne were able to annoy them. But afterwards, diſcord and ambition creeping into this State which was ſo free and powerfull, what former force could not effect, they wrought with their owne Arms, and triumphed over themſelves. The cauſe of all this grew through the diſcord between P O M P E Y and I V L I V S C Æ S A R, which two were at that time the moſt eminent and powerfull men in Rome; and yet at the ſame Inſtant there were other Citizens of great eſteem. But, the root of this hatred grew from a further cauſe, that is, from the factions and ciuill war between S C I L L A and M A R I V S: in which, M A R I V S being ſlain, S C I L L A made himſelf Dictator, and ſeiz'd vpon Rome; yet before his death hee gaue it ouer, and left the City at liberty. P O M P E Y had followed S C I L L A's faction, and done braue exploits for him: but C Æ S A R had ſided with M A R I V S, being his kinfman, and at that time very young. This was the ſeed from whence ſprung the ciuill war between them. But, it ſhall be needfull to relate ſome former matters, for the better vnderſtanding of the occaſions which went before, and the ſucceſſes which followed; the which wee will deſcribe briefly after this manner: The warre and power of S C I L L A being ended, G N E Y S P O M P E Y S and M A R C V S C R A S S V S (who had alſo followed that partie) remaining in great reputation, the one ſought to ſupplant the other, ſo as there grew ſome jars between them, which began during the life of S C I L L A. C R A S S V S grew very powerfull: for, beſides his Wildome, Nobility and Eloquence, he was very rich beyond all the other Citizens of his time. P O M P E Y alſo became famous and much eſteemed, beſides the ſucceſſion he had by S C I L L A, for his great victories and valiant exploits in Arms performed in S C I L L A's time and ſince, both by ſea and land, in Affrick, Spain and Aſia, the which are ſo many and ſo great, as I dare not relate them. The deeds of theſe two eminent Perſons being growne to this height, and their quarrels increaſing daily as the heads of factions (and yet at the ſame time there were others of great note within the City, as C A T O, C I C E R O, L E N T V L V S, and others) during theſe alterations, I V L I V S C Æ S A R returned to Rome from his Pretorſhip in Spain with great reputation, yet his ambitious thoughts aimed at greater matters, both in regard of the greatnes of his houſe (for, by the fathers ſide, hee was of a Noble and very antient Family; and by the mother hee deſcended from the Kings of Rome, who were extract'd from Æ N E A S of Troy) and for his many allies and friends; being alſo very witty and eloquent. He had alſo purchas'd great credit and authority in the managing of thoſe charges which had been committed vnto him. He had bin Queſtor in Spain, Tribune of the ſouldiers, Adile, high-prieſt and Pretor; having gotten victories in Spain againſt the Inhabitants of Gallia and Portugal; adding to all this, his merits and vertues, being bountifull, wife and learned in all good Arts, moſt active in the managing of Arms both on foot and horſe-back; very valiant and ſtrong, whereof he made great proofs before hee had any command in the wars of Aſia, vnder the Pretor M A R C V S T E R M O, and S E R V I L I V S the Proconſul; where hee obtained a Ciuicall Crowne. He was, moreover, of a good conſtitution of body, tall of ſtature, fair, ſtrong of his members, and very patient of labour. For all which conſiderations and many others, hee was in great eſteem; but neither by his authority nor place able to equall M A R C V S C R A S S V S or P O M P E Y, for that the roots of their greatnes had been of long continuance.

C Æ S A R being com to Rome, with a ſecret intent to make himſelf greater than either of them; C R A S S V S and P O M P E Y affected his friendſhip, by whoſe help they might ſupplant one another. But C Æ S A R, being diſcreet and wife, would not follow any party, nor tie himſelf to defend their actions; but, carrying himſelf indifferently, he labour'd to reconcile them, having a conceit, that, if he carried himſelf as a Neuter, they would both yeeld vnto his will: and this his cunning practice (as P L Y T A R C H reports) was onely diſcover'd by M. C A T O. In the end, by his endeavours a peace was concluded between them, being both bound vnto him: yet, being ſtill jealous one of another, and fearing to loſe C Æ S A R, they both ſought to gratifie him: and in this ſort he made himſelf equal to either of them; and that power which Pompey two had formerly vſurp'd, was now diuided between three; and in the end wee ſhall ſee who got the ſole command. This league and atonement being made, C Æ S A R demanded the Conſulſhip, which is the greateſt ordinary dignity. He carried himſelf in this charge with ſuch reputation, as his fellow Conſul B I B V L V S neuer accompani'd him, but kept himſelf retired during his Conſulſhip. C Æ S A R, the better to maintain the credit and authority which he had got, conceit by le. ruiſe Pompey and Crallus. the reaſons of their greatnes.

The Romans vanquiſhed themſelves.

Cæſars familie and vertues.

Alcæus brother Cæſar, Crallus and Pompey.

Cæſar made conſul.

Cæsar and Pompey's marriage.

Cæsar goes with an army into France.

Cæsar's conquests.

He holds the policy of Cæsar.

Pompey grows jealous of Cæsar.

Heir forces in the civil war.

He causes of the civil war.

and to attain to the greatness whereunto he aspired, he himself took to wife CALPURNIA, the daughter of LVEIVS PRISO, who was to succeed him in the Consulate; and hee gave IVLIA his daughter in marriage to POMPEY, rejecting her former spouse SERVILIUS CÆPIO, by whose help he had a little before crost his Colleague BIBVLVS. CÆSARS consullship being ended, these three Confederates being equally greedy of honour, they easily made a march to invade the Common-weal. CÆSAR made choise of Gaul or France for his Prouince; CRASSVS, of Asia; and POMPEY, of Spain: whither they went with three puissant Armies. And thus the whole world was to be held by three Princes in partnership. The exploits of CÆSAR in his Prouince, what battels he fought, what victories he won, what cities and people he subdued, what stratagems, policy and valour he used (this warre continuing little lesse than ten yeeres) I cannot relate, my meaning being to obseure breuitie. He left excellent Commentaries of his owne deeds, and full of truth: the which were approved by his very enemies, and much commended by CICERO. Yet ASINIVS POLLIO (enuying CÆSARS vertues) doth in some things tax him. They are also written by PLVTARCH, SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, ALEXANDRINVS, LVCAN, PAVLVS OROSIVS, LVCIVS FLORVS, EYTRIOVS, and many other: to whom I refer the Reader. CÆSAR got such reputation in this war, as he was held the greatest Captain of his time, yea, or of those that were in former Ages. He subdued all France, from the Pyrene Mountains vnto the Alps, and all the remainder vnto the riuer of Rhine. Hee first vanquished the Suiffers and Tigurins, who (as PLVTARCH affirms) were 300000 men, whereof 190000 were well trained vp in Arms. He conquered the Germaines, with ARIOVISTVS their Leader, who had invaded France, from whence he expelled them. He subdued the Belgii, the Ambiani and Nervi, with other warlike people of France, and he spilt more blood than euer was in any wars in the world. Then, passing the Rhine vpon a bridge of wood which he built, he subdued the Germaines to the Roman Empire; and, finding no more opposition there, hee past with his Army into Brittanie, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation, not till that time knowne by any traffick or commerce: these hee forced to subject themselves to the Roman State. During the continuance of these warres, in which CÆSAR got great spoils and wealth, he neuer left to purchase to himself friends, both in Rome and in all other places, both by letters and gifts, and in like manner with the Kings and Cities of Asia, Greece, and other Countries; sending them aids of men, without any leaue or authority from the Senate: the which he might lawfully do, as long as the league continued betwixt him, POMPEY and CRASSVS. He won men vnto him, and was much beloued of his souldiers, giuing these double pay, and bestowing honours vpon others: by which means (POMPEY not foreseeing it) he grew to such power and reputation, as he began to fear him when he was not able to suppress him. But now that strict league of friendship, which had been betwixt these two, began to dissolve, for that the pawn which maintained it was taken away; so as there grew a mutual fear & ialousie betwixt them, first, by the death of IVLIA, CÆSARS daughter, who marrying to POMPEY entertained concord between the son and the father-in-law, by the league of nuptiall loue; secondly, by the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, the third man in this company, who was slain by the Parthians in Asia, whither he went to make war (as some write) more to heap vp riches, than to win honour; whose reputation notwithstanding was a support to their good agreement. So as the chief causes, wherupon their friendship was grounded, being taken away, their emulation presently brake forth. POMPEY was ialous of CÆSARS greatness; and CÆSAR hardly endured POMPEY'S supereminency: the one brook no equal, the other, no superiour. Whereupon they fell to warre, which was the greatest and most generall that euer was: for, in it there were engaged the Senate, all the Roman Legions, all their friends and subjects, Kings and Cities, for the one or the other partie. On the one side were eleuen Legions, on the other eighteen; all Roman and Italian souldiers, with all the forces of Rome, besides the aids of their confederates. This war was managed in Italy, France, Spain, Epirus, Thessalie, Egypt, Asia and Affrick, by themselves or their Lieutenants; and in the end, after five yeeres, it died in Spain. Some Authors set down the causes of this ciuill war, although they vary in some points: but the truth is, the chief reasons were enuy, ambition, and desire of command, wherewith they were both infected: and the one ialous of the others greatness (as if the Roman Empire had not been sufficient for them two) the one sought to ruine the other. That POMPEY had any intent to vsurp the State, and become a Tyrant, it doth not appear: but it is apparant, he would not haue CÆSAR attain to that dignity wherein he was. Of CÆSAR some write, that being forced through fear he came to Arms, lest he should see himself called in question, and condemned: for, CATO had threatned to accuse him whensoever hee should giue-over his Prouince. Others object, that he had alwaies a desire to vsurp the State; and therefore, balancing his power with POMPEY'S, he thought it behoouefull to entertain friendship and contract an alliance with him. CICERO saith, that he had alwaies in his mouth that verse of EVRIPIDES, that If it were lawful to infringe the lawes, it was for a Kingdome; and that CÆSAR, being greedy of command, could not endure to be without an Army: but, in my opinion, the reasons were such as haue been related; and these, the occasions.

que-

This being the last of the second five yeers of CÆSARS government in France, LENTYLVS and MARCELLVS being Consuls, and of POMPEY'S faction; it was propounded in the Senate, to send a Successor to CÆSAR, and that hee should giue-over his government and the Army; and if he would (as he had written) demand the Consullship, he should com to Rome in person. CÆSAR demanded, that his command in the war might be prolonged, and the government which he had, and that he might demand the Consulate being absent, before he giue-over his Army; which honor ten Tribunes had formerly granted him, with POMPEY'S good liking. But now POMPEY would not yeeld vnto it, as being against the lawes, which did not allow any man to demand the Consullship but present; forgetting, that he had been made Consul before he came to lawfull age, and had attained to other dignities, contrary to the ordinarie course of law. But it is the common condition of men, To blame that in another which they allow in themselves.

This being denied to CÆSAR, he made another proposition, that hee would leaue his Army, and come to Rome as a priuate man, so as POMPEY would giue-over his which he held in Spain. This was put to the question, and did cause a great distraction in the Senate. CICERO interposed himself, labouring to reconcile them, and to conclude their jars with peace. POMPEY would haue been tractable, had not those of his faction, being of the prime men of Rome, stood proudly vpon tearms; who (notwithstanding any iust and reasonable conditions propounded by CÆSAR) were inflexible. It was therefore decreed in Senate, that CÆSAR, by a certain time prefixed, should leaue his Army, and that hee should not passe it ouer the riuer of Rubicon, which did bound-in his Prouince; declaring him an enemy to the Roman State if he did otherwise. LVCIVS ANTONIVS and QVINTVS CVRIO, Tribunes of the people, fauouring CÆSAR, opposed themselves to this decree: but they were disgraced, ill-treated, and thrust out of the Senate. Whereupon, they fled out of Rome, and went to CÆSAR: the which was a great help to him to win the hearts of his souldiers, for that the office of the Tribunes was held sacred and inuolable.

CÆSAR hearing how matters had past, seeing himself deprived of all future hope of peace, he marcht speedily from Ranenna, onely with 5000 foot, and 300 horse, commanding his Legions to follow presently after, and to ioyne with him. Comming afterwards to Rubicon (which if he should passe, there would be no hope of peace remaining) some say that he said thence a good space; considering with himself, of what importance this passage was, and what miseries would ensue. PLVTARCH writes, that he discomfited thereof with ASINIVS POLLIO, and other his friends which did accompany him. APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS reports, that hee vfed these words, Doubleste, if I forbear to passe this riuer, it will be the beginning of my ruine; if I passe it, the ruine will be generall. And SVETONIVS writes, that turning towards the riuer, he said, It is yet in our power to turn back; but, passing theriuer, wee must make our way with our weapons. He writes, moreover, that CÆSAR standing thus doubtfull and irresolute, he was animated by the apparition of a man of an extraordinary stature & shape, sitting neer vnto his Army, piping vpon a reed. Besides the shepheards and herdsmen, many souldiers left their guards, and went down to hear him, and with them some Trumpeters; so as hee caught hold of one of their trumpets, and leapt forth to the riuer, beginning with a mighty blast to sound the battell, and so went on his paste to the bank on the other side. Then, with a furious resolution, CÆSAR cried out, Let vs go whither the gods, and the injurious dealings of our enemies, do call vs: The dice are cast. I haue set vp my Rest, come what will of it. After which words, he set spurs to his horse, and past the riuer, the whole Army following him. In this manner he resolved: which was the beginning of the ciuill wars, and of Romes seruitude, and the first step to a Monarchy and the soueraigne command of one, as I will briefly set it down.

Who desires to haue a full view of this History, let him read APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS, SVETONIVS, PLVTARCH in the liues of CÆSAR, CATO, and CICERO; Saint AVGVSTINE lib. 3. de ciuit. Dei, IULIUS CÆSAR himself in his Commentaries, LVCIVS

B 3.

Flo.

Letters for des manding the consullship.

Cicero seeks to reconcile Cæsar & Pompey.

A decree of the Senate against Cæsar.

Cæsar's words when he past Rubicon.

FLORVS, lib. 4. TITVS LIVIUS his Abbreviators, PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, 6. lib. 1. LYCAN, PLINIE de viris illustribus, VALERIUS MAXIMVS, with diuerse others.

CÆSAR hauing past the riuer, and drawne his whole Army together, where (as SVETONIUS writes) the Tribunes of the Commons came vnto him, in bale and dishonourable garments, with the which they had fledde from Rome, there hee made an excellent Oration to his souldiers, shedding some tears, and tearing his garment down the brest, laying before them the equity of his cause, and crauing their helps and assistance. To whom hauing with a generall applause and consent made answer, that they were ready to obey his will, he parted presently, and the next day came to Ariminum, whereon he seized: the like hee did to all the Towns and Castles where he past. DOMITIUS, who in a factious tumult had been nominated his Successour in Gaul, held Corfinium with a garrison of 30 Cohorts: which being taken, he pardoned the souldiers and inhabitants, and intreated DOMITIUS kindly, giuing him leaue to depart (who went presently to POMPEY) which was an act of a Noble and generous minde: the which, CÆSAR obserued in all his victories during the ciuill war; by which clemency he purchased to himself as great honour, as by his victories.

CÆSARS resolution being knowne at Rome, it troubled POMPEY, amazed the Senat, and terrified the common people; and it would be tedious to relate what prouisions they made. POMPEY was much deceived, for that hee could not beleue that CÆSAR would thrust himself into so great a danger, or that hee should be able to raise sufficient forces to resist him: but the success proued otherwise. For, notwithstanding that he had authority from the Consuls and Senate to leaue souldiers, to call home the legions, and to send Captains for the defence of diuerse cities of Italie whereas CÆSAR should passe, yet all this was not sufficient to resist CÆSARS fury, and the power he brought with him. The fame of his coming increasing daily, POMPEY with the whole Senat abandoned Rome, going to Capua, and from thence to Brundisium, a sea-town vpon the confines of Italie, seated at the mouth of the gulf of Venice: where he gaue order, the Consuls should passe to Durrachium, now called Durrazzo, a sea-town of Macedonie (whereof a great part is now called Albania) to write all their forces; being out of hope to be able to resist CÆSAR in Italie, who had already taken Corfinium, as I haue formerly said: where, hauing drawne DOMITIUS Cohorts to serue him, hee marcht on; and, hearing that POMPEY and the Consuls were together at Brundisium, he went towards them with his Legions with all the speed hee could. But POMPEY had fortified himself sufficiently to make defence; yet vpon CÆSARS approach, beginning to inuest the Town, he imbarke himself in the night time, and so past ouer to Durrachium, where the Consuls attended him. And thus CÆSAR remained in Italie without resistance; being very doubtfull what to resolve: for, although he would gladly haue followed POMPEY, yet he had no prouision of ships: and, by reason that it was winter, shipping could not come so soon as was requisite; and considering withall, how much it importet, not to leaue any enemy behinde him, which might cause any alteration in France or Italie by his absence, he resolved to deferre the pursuit of POMPEY, and to take his way towards Spain, which held for POMPEY: where he had his best legions, and two captains, PETREIUS and AFRANIUS. SVETONIUS TRANQVILLVS saith, that when hee had thus resolved, he said to his friends, Let vs first go against an Army which is without a Captain; and afterwards let vs return against the Captain that hath neuer an Army: for, the souldiers that POMPEY had in Spain were valiant, and had been long trained vp in Arms; but their Commanders, PETREIUS and AFRANIUS, were not held for politick or expert in the wars. And, on the contrary, POMPEY was most wise, and a very valiant Captain: but the souldiers which he had with him were newly leaied, and of small experience.

Returning from Brundisium, in sixty daies, without bloudshed or battell, CÆSAR became Lord of all Italie; and coming to Rome, they were in very great fear, remembering the cruelties committed in the time of SYLLA: But CÆSAR, vsing his accustomed clemency, did hurt no man of any degree, high or low; but called to the Senate those Senators which remained, and which came with him, comforting euery one with milde and good words, and laying the whole fault vpon POMPEY, in accusing him of all things which had hapned, and of this discord. He fought by all means to iustifie his owne cause, and declared how much hee did then and euer had desired peace, and therewith requested that Embassadors might be sent to POMPEY to procure the same; and, causing himself to be presently chosen Consul, he opened the Roman Treasury, notwithstanding that METELLVS, one of the Tribunes of the people, was desirous and went about to hinder the same. The treasure which he took from thence he diuided among his his souldiers: which, as PLINIE in his three and thirtieth Book reports, was very great; the which LVCAN also affirmeth. These things being ended, and CÆSAR desirous to go from Rome into Spain (like a wife and discreet Captain) first took order aswell for the ciuill government, as for the wars; and, making choice of the legions which were to go with him, hee left part of his troops in Brundisium and Ostia, and in other strong places vpon the Sea side, to keep POMPEY from landing if he fought to return into Italie. He also nominated HORTENSIVS and DOLABELLA for his Captains, to make prouision of shipping to be brought to the port of Brundisium, there to bee in a readinesse against his return from his journey. QVINTVS VALERIUS hee sent with a legion to Sardinia against MARCVS COTTA, which held the same for POMPEY. To Sicilia hee sent CVRIVS against MARCVS CATO, with direction, that hauing taken the same, hee should passe ouer into Africa. LEPIDVS hee left in Rome, as Prefect thereof; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, for Governor of all Italie: and, determining to leaue LICINIUS CRASSVS in France, with his accustomed celerity he went on his journey, and found no resistance, neither in Italie, nor in France, but only at Marselles, which held for POMPEY: who (in my opinion) more like bould and aduenturous friends, than wise men, would not receiue nor lodge him in their city, but put themselves in Arms against him for their defence. CÆSAR coming thither besieged the City; and, to auoid losse of time, left DECIVS BRVTVS and CAIVS TREBONIUS with sufficient forces, who continued the siege, and endured much: he himself followed his way into Spain, where his coming was already knowne; and AFRANIUS and PETREIUS attended him, with the aid of their friends, and foure Roman legions; between which and CÆSAR the warres continued many daies, and chiefly neer the city of Lerida. In the beginning, CÆSAR was in great danger and much distressed, aswell through want of victuals, as by reason of the winter being come, which annoyed him with the swelling of riuers: before and after which, there passed many great skirmishes and conflicts between the two Armies, and other accidents and aduentures too long to bee recounted. Finally, CÆSAR knew how to make war in such sort, as, without giuing them opportunity to come to a battell, he brought his aduersaries to such extremity and distresse, as perishing with hunger they came to a composition; which was, that to the legions (who now were able neither to offend nor defend) should be granted liberty to depart & to go whither they would: which was performed accordingly; and PETREIUS and AFRANIUS went to POMPEY: and part of the legions, which would not abide with CÆSAR, had leaue to do as they listed; CÆSAR still perseuering in his clemency and mildnes.

This war being ended, and the spring come (not to leaue any thing in Spain to be subdued) hee passed forwards, and came into the prouince of Betice, now called Andalusia, with part of his forces, leauing commandement with the Armie to march whither hee had appointed, and there to stay for him, because that MARCVS VARRO, being POMPEY'S Lieutenant in that prouince, held it for him, with one legion of good souldiers: but not daring to oppose himself against CÆSAR, he peaceably yeelded vp vnto him both the country and the legion; and so all was pacified, and at his command. Thence hee went to Cordona, where hee called a parliament, and an assembly of all the estates of that prouince: wherein, among other things which there were treated of, hee highly commending the Cordoueses and Scuellians which had taken his part (as himself writeth) marched forwards, and visiting the prouince he came to the Isle and city of Cales; and, prouiding there certain necessaries, hee took the shippes and gallies which MARCVS VARRO had there in a readinesse, and such other as hee could get, and imbarke himself. And, leauing QVINTVS CASSIVS with foure legions in that prouince, he took his passage by sea to Turagona, sending commandement by land to his legions to march thither: where hauing in few daies taken order for that prouince, hee departed with his Army towards Narbona, and from thence to Marselles: which yeelded vnto him, hauing in the siege and assaults endured many calamities. CÆSAR, nothing respecting the small regard and ingratitude of that city, but the antiquity and fame thereof, would not permit any violence to be offered to the citizens & inhabitants; but, leauing a sufficient garrison to guard the same, he commanded his legions by appointed iournies to march towards Italie: himself, with a necessary guard for his person, and others in his company, took passage for Rome; all things succeeding prosperously with him, although that some of his Captains had ill successe. For, CAIVS ANTONIVS, whom (we said) he left with DOLABELLA for Captain of his Naue, was ouertrowne and taken prisoner in the gulf of Venice by OCTAVIVS, POMPEY'S Lieutenant. At this ouertrowe there was an Act don worthy to be recommended with honour to posterity. ANTHON

The beginning of the ciuill war.

Pompey's error, presuming too much of him self.

Cæsar going into Spain against Petreius and Afranius.

Cæsar subdued all Spain.

Cæsar seized on Rome and all Italie.

The taking of Marselles, and Cæsar's return to Rome.

Cæsar, Consul by force.

was constrained to ship his souldiers in long boats for want of serviceable ships; the which were taken by a stratagem as in a toill, by the Pompeians, who tied ropes vnder the water. One of them, which carried almost a thousand Optergins, young men and valiant, was intangled in this snare, and was assaulted by the power of the whole Armie, they making resistance from morning vntill night: but, in the end being oppressed by the multitudes of their enemies, and seeing no means to elcape by their valour, by the encouragement of VLTIVS their Colonel they slue one another. And DOLABELLA was likewise overcome neer to the Ile of Cosus, now called Corsica; and CVRIVS, who (according to CAESARS commandment) went into Africa with two legions, having in the beginning good successe, was afterwards overthrowen; and the most part of his people slain by POMPEY'S friend, IVBA King of Mauritania, which is now the Kingdom of Fez: hee might have fled away, but shame perswaded him to dy with that Armie which his rashnes had cast away.

CAESAR being com to Rome, and made Dictator (as PLVTARCH and APPIANVS testify) new Consuls were chosen; and he, being one of them, deposed himself from his Dictatorship, and so, changing and providing Pretors for the provinces at his pleasure, sending MARCVS LEPIDVS into Spain, and AVLVS ABRINVS into Sicilia, SEXTVS PEDVCIVS into Sardinia, and DECIVS BRVTVS into France, and taking such further order as he thought good; he departed from Rome in the month of December towards Brundisium: whither hee commanded all his Forces to march, there to take passage for Macedonia, the greatest part whereof (as I said) is now called Albania; where he knew that POMPEY staid with his Armie. Who, all one whole yeer, which CAESAR spent in his journey into Spain, busied himself in providing a Nauike to return into Italy, and in gathering treasure, and in leuying souldiers for that purpose, and had made ready a wonderfull great prouision of all things. For, there came vnto him ships, mony and men, from many kingdoms, provinces and cities of Asia and Gracia, from Syria, Pontus, Bithymia, Cilicia, Phanicia, Cappadocia, Pamphilia, Armenia the lesse, Egypt, Gracia, Theffalia, Boetia, Adolbia, Epire, Athens, Lacedemonia, and the Iles of Creta, Rhodes, and many other parts and countries: there came also to his aid, in person, the Kings, DROTARVS and ARTOBARZANES. Of which people, and of those which he brought with him from Italy, POMPEY had drawne together a great Armie by land, and an exceeding great number of ships and gallies by sea; which I do not set down, by reason of the diuersity of opinions between Authors touching the number of his souldiers and of CAESARS: for certain, they were very mighty Armies, but the greatest number were of POMPEY'S side. Who imagining (because that it was in the hart of winter) that CAESAR should not be able, nor haue time, commodiously to passe the seas; and hauing (as indeed he had) aduertisement that CAESAR was in Rome, he diuided and lodged his people in Macedonia and Theffalia, retiring himself from the sea, commanding and charging his Captains by sea (of which, MARCVS BIBVLVS was chiefe) that they should guard and defend the coast. But CAESAR knowing, that in the speedy execution consisted the principall point of his victory, and that occasion once let slip is seldom recovered; being departed from Rome, and arrived at Brundisium (as we haue before said) notwithstanding that all his legions were not yet come, yet he embarked aboard those ships which hee had there in readinesse, so many as they could contain, which were seuen legions of his choise men (as he himself recordeth) and sent commandment to those which were conning, to make haste, to the end they should join with the rest which there remained, whom he would speedily send for. And so hee departed from Brundisium, now called Brindes, in the beginning of Ianuarie: and, crossing the seas with prosperous weather, the third day after, he arrived vpon the coast of Macedonia, before that POMPEY had any intelligence of his embarking; and, setting his people on shore in the despite of POMPEY'S Captains, hee commanded the ships and gallies presently to returne to Brundisium to fetch the rest of his Armie which hee had there left and commanded to come. And the wars beginning, hee presently seized vpon the cities of Apollonia, which is now called Bellona, and Erioe, driving from thence LVCIVS TORQVATVS and LVCIVS STABRIVS, which held the same for POMPEY: who as soon as he was aduertised of CAESARS landing, with the greatest speed possible sending for his troops (such as were neere at hand) hee marched towards Dyrrachium, where lay all his victuall, munition, and prouision for the warres, doubting that CAESAR would come to surpris the same, as in truth he did; but in vain: for, the situation thereof made it inexpugnable.

POMPEY being come, their Camps were lodged within few forlongs one of the other, a runner running between them: there passed many aduentures, skirmishes, and also some treaties of peace, peace which CAESAR offered; the which were not accepted by POMPEY, so much he assured himself of his power: and CAESAR daily expecting the coming of his other legions, who staid longer than he thought they ought to haue done, without the which he thought it no wisdom to come to a battell, being much grieued, and very carefull for the same, hee resolved in person, with three confident seruants onely, secretly to embark himself in a Brigandine, and to passe that freight of the sea to fetch them, thinking to be able to perform the same without the knowledge of any. And, putting it in execution accordingly, hee passed down the river to the sea, which hee found so troubled and tempestuous, as the Master of the Brigandine (not knowing whom he carried) nor daring to passe any further, would haue returned. Then CAESAR, discovering his face, as it is reported, said, Be not affraid, Friend: for, thou carriest with thee CAESAR and all his fortune. The Master, heerewith encouraged, chrued to hould on his voyage: but, at length, the force of the tempest was so great, and the winde so contrary, that (notwithstanding CAESAR'S courageous words) they were constrained to return, vnable to passe anie further forwards. Which being vnderstood in his Armie, they much wondred, grieued, and murmured thereat; praising him more for a valiant Knight, than a wise Captain: and so VALERIVS MAXIMVS recounts it for a rash aduenture, which, in my opinion, was the occasion why IVLIVS CESAR records it not in his Commentaries.

This being past, within fewe daies after, ANTONIVS arrived with foure of those legions which were left behinde in Italy, presently returning the ships back again for the rest: and (after some aduentures which hapned) joyning with CAESAR'S Armie, and all things set in good order (and the like being done on POMPEY'S side) there passed some things between them, which for breuiety I omit, vntill that neer to the city of Dyrrachium (whither CAESAR went, with a determination to haue surpris the same, and POMPEY to relieue it) the two Armies lodged themselves the one so neer the other, as there were daily skirmishes and slaughters of men of either partie; and that one day the skirmish waxing hot, and rescues coming from either Armie, I came to a battell: wherein the successe was such, that CAESAR'S troops began to flee, and could not be made to stand by any intreaties or threats, till they came to their camp which they had fortified; and yet some abandoned the same, and durst not defend it. But POMPEY, either for that (as some think) hee imagined their flight to bee faigned, and that there was some deceit or ambush, or that he supposed there was no more to be done, and that CAESAR had beene overthrowen with small toill, so as he should be no more able to recover himself, did not prosecute the victorie, neither followed the charge, but rather caused a retreat to bee sounded, without affailing his enemies camp. Whither when CAESAR came, he took such order as was most conuenient, being no lesse courageous and politick in time of aduersity, than of prosperity: and it is reported that he said to his friends, Truly, this day had ended our warres, if our enemies had a Caprain which had knowne how to haue overcome. This day, IVLIVS CAESAR lost a great number of his souldiers, amongst which were foure hundred Romane Knights, ten Tribunes, and two and thirty Centurions; and his enemies took from him two and thirty Ensignes. This battell ended, POMPEY sent the newes thereof to diuerse parts of the world, houlding himself for absolutely victorious: And IVLIVS CAESAR hauing blamed some of his Captains and Ensigne-bearers (notwithstanding that his whole Armie grieued, and were ashamed of their late loss) again desired the battell; yet he would not then fight, his Armie being timorous, against those which were in heart & victorious, but rather took a new course: and, sending his sick and hurt men to the city of Apollonia, hee departed by night, with the greatest silence that could be, from the place where he was, and took his way towards Theffalia, with intent to refresh and encourage his Armie, and to draw his enemy further from the sea-coast, where his chief force lay, and where his camp was fortified and victualled; or, at the least, to go to meet and overthrowe SCIPIO, who (as hee was aduertised) came to join with POMPEY.

POMPEY, seeing CAESAR'S departure, after that hee had followed him some fewe daies, took counsell, and (as APPIANVS testifieth) was determined (leaving so sufficient a Nauike at sea, as CAESAR should not be able to make any benefit thereof) to passe into Italy, and to recover the same, with France and Spain, and then afterwards to return again CAESAR: but, being importuned and over-ruled by the Roman Lords which came with him, he altered his determination, and presently departed to pursue CAESAR, who made a stay in the fields of Pharsalia, which are in Theffalia (making his retreat with such discretion and in so good order, as in all occasions that were offered he had euer the better) vntill that at length, seeing his men full of resolution, force and courage, he resolved no longer to forbear the Fight; and therefore cared not any any more to refuse the battell, but rather daily presented the same to POMPEY. Who knowing (as indeed it was true) that CAESAR began to want victuals, and that his Armie began to weaken and diminish, he deferred the same, and would not fight; and, as a wife and well-experienced Captain, would have prolonged the war, defeating his enemy without putting his own Armie in hazard: and although that POMPEY had thus resolved, yet the opinions, murmurings, and importunity of those which were with him prevailed so much (as LYCAN, PLVTARCH, and CAESAR himself, report) that they made him yeeld to giue battell, euē contrary to his owne opinion and will: wherein joined, of the one side and the other, all the flower and force of Rome. And although that CAESAR'S Forces were fewer in number (for, all Writers affirm, that POMPEY'S Armie was twice as great) yet his men were more active, and better trained. How many there were of the one side and the other, I cannot certify, the Authors doo so much differ among themselves therein. APPIANVS setteth down the diuers opinions which are held thereof. Some raise the number to three hundred thousand men, whereof LYCVS FLORVS was one; others, to three score and ten thousand: and some set down somewhat lesse, among which is PLVTARCH; who saith, that POMPEY brought to this battell 45000 men, whereof 7000 were on horseback; and IVLIVS CAESAR, two & twenty thousand Foot, and of horse few more than one thousand. But APPIANVS vnderstandeth, that this lesser number of these Armies was to be vnderstood of Romans onely, who were the force and hope of both these Generals: for, it is not likely, that of all nations there should be so small a number in a war so long prepared, and of such importance: and, in my opinion, this is most likely to be true. But, howsoever it was, this battell was between the best captains and best soldiers, as well for experience, as for force and valour, that euer were in the world; and yet being so, it was not much fought, neither did it long continue. So strange and variable are the adventures which happen in wars and battells: for, where there seemeth to be the greatest force and assurance, oftentimes is found the greatest weakness; and that which is least feared, doth sometimes annoy most. Before the battell there were many signes of an eminent downfall: The running away of beaſts appointed for the sacrifice, swarms of Bees, the sky darkened in the day time, POMPEY'S fearful dream ouer night of mourning in his Theatre at Rome; and in the morning early he was seen in the head of his main battell in a black Robe.

Either of these two great Commanders, having resolved to giue battell, ordered his battalions and squadrons as to him seemed most expedient, making speeches and orations to animate their soldiers; and, the accustomed signe being giuen, the battell presently beganne on either side: In the beginning whereof, POMPEY'S horse-men (wherein he reposed his greatest hope) who were all of the Roman Nobility, and of the Order of Knighthood, and who alwaies had the better; began to come where CAESAR'S Caualery was, and forced them to forsake the Field. Which, CAESAR perceiving (losing nothing by oversight) he made a signe to a battalio, which for that purpose he had left a-part from the other squadrons, to charge POMPEY'S Caualery: who charged them with such fury, wounding them (according to CAESAR'S direction) no where but in the face, that POMPEY'S horse-men either vnable or vnwilling to endure it, began to retire, in such sort, as from that part whence POMPEY thought to haue obtained the victory, from thence sprang the beginning of his ouerthrow. For, notwithstanding that they had broken the first squadron, and were euē into the second, and the other battalions continued still fighting, and that they maintained the same with great resolution; yet, seeing that POMPEY'S Caualery fled, and that CAESAR'S came to charge them afresh, they all did the like, in such manner, as in short space the victory plainly appeared for CAESAR: and POMPEY, having lost all hope to preuaile, fled to his camp, leaving the field and victory to his enemy. Happy had POMPEY been in this miserie, if he had runne the same fortune with his slaughter'd Armie: but he out-liued his owne glory, that with dishonour he might see life through the Thesalie, he chased from Larissa, and vpon a forlorn rock of Cilicia studie whether to flee; to Parthia, Affrick, or Egypt: Finally, that vpon the Pelusian shoar, by the command of a most vnworthy treacherous King, by the counsell of gelded men, he should be murdered by the sword of SEPTIMIUS his Fugitiue, in the view of his sorrowfull wife and children. CAESAR, letting slip no occasion, seeing that hee found no resistance in the field, assembled his Forces to assaile POMPEY'S camp, which with small difficulty hee entered: which POMPEY perceiving, leaving his ensignes and robes of General, and putting on other apparrell, vpon the first horse that he could get, with foure on horse-back onely that accompanied him, which (as VELLEIVS PATARCVIVS saith) were his son SEXTVS POMPEIVS, and the two LENTIVS, and ominous figures before the battell

Pompey fought contrary to his owne opinion.

The battell of Pompey's horse-men in Pompey was overcome by Caesar.

FAVONIUS of the Pretorian order: he fled so fast as he could, as you haue heard; and neuer staied vntill he came to the citie of Larissa; where ioyning with some thirte other horse, which had fled, without any stay he continued his flight, vntill he came vnto the shore-side of the Egean sea; where, finding a certaine Merchants ship of Rome, he embarked himself therein, and sailed to the Ile of Lesbos, which is in that sea which now is called Archipelagos, to the citie of Mytilene in that Iland: For, in that citie were his wife and familie, which he tooke with him: and, gathering together such ships and men as he was able, he departed from thence very doubtfull, and notable to resolve whither to go. Some counselled him to sail into Affrica, for that King IVBA was his friend, and very mighty. Others were of opinion, that hee should retire himself to the Parthians. Finally, he resolved to go into Egypt, for the friendship which hee held with King PROZOMY, father of that PROZOMY then reigning, and did so. Having first touched in the prouince of Cilicia in Asia, and in the Ile of Cyprus, sailing into Egypt, and arriving at the city of Alexandria, he had such an end as we will presently declare.

IVLIVS CAESAR having obtained so great a victory, vsed therein his accustomed clemency, not suffering any Romane to be either slaine or hurt after the battaile was ended, and pardoning all those which were taken therein, or found in the Campe, among which was MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO. And although that in the battaile were slaine of POMPEIES side fifteen thousand men, and of the Conquerors lesse then two thousand; as CAESAR himselfe writeth: yet vnderstanding which way POMPEY fled, to the end to giue him no place or meanes to returne and repaire himselfe; without losing any time, he pursued him with the lightest and swiftest of his Army. And coming to the Sea-side, bringing to his obedience in his way all the Cities whereby he passed, and gathering together such Ships and Gallies as hee then could, together with those which CASSIVS had, who was at this time received to his grace and seruice, he therein shipped such troups as he was able, and passed into Asia the lesse, where being aduertised that POMPEY had been in Cyprus, he presumed that he tooke his way towards Egypt. For which cause he tooke the same course, taking with him two whole legions of old soldiers onely, and arriving in safety at Alexandria in Egypt (where we said that POMPEY had lately taken port) he vnderstood that POMPEY was arrived there: who presuming of the benefits and good entertainment which this King PROZOMIS father had received in his house, he sent to request PROZOMY to harbour and assist him. But as with men which are fallen from a high fortune, few men hold faith and friendship; and in their aduersities, the benefits and good turnes received are commonly forgotten: so this King sent him his promise to perform what he required: and comming vpon safe conduct, in a small boat towards the shore, hee was murdered before he came to land by the Kings commandement, by the hands of one called SEPTIMIUS, and another ACHEILA; thinking by meanes hereof to winne CAESAR'S friendship. This was done by the perswasion and counsell of FOTINVS an Eunuch, vho was of great authority in the Court, and by whom the King was much ruled. He vnderstood also that CORNELIA, POMPEIES wife, and his sonne SEXTVS POMPEIVS were fled from that port in the same ship, wherein they came. CAESAR being landed and received into the City, they presently brought him for a present, the great POMPEIES head; which hee would not see: and his ring and seale of Armes being presented vnto him, he vsed for pity, considering the end and successe of the great adventures and prosperities of POMPEY, vho with such honour and fame had three times triumphed, and bin so many times Consul in Rome, and had gouerned the same, and had been the most eminent man there for so many yeers, and had in like sort obtained many victories and dignities.

When IVLIVS CAESAR landed in Egypt, he found the country infested with ciuill wars, and great discord between yong King PROZOMY and his sister, the fair CLEOPATRA, about the diuision and inheritance of that Kingdome: wherein IVLIVS CAESAR (as a Roman Consul) took vpon him to intermeddle. For which cause (as CAESAR himselfe writeth) or because that their guilty conscience, for the treacherous murder of POMPEY, made them to fear, as PLVTARCH affirmes; the before-named FOTINVS which had been the praefter of this murder, and ACHEILA who had been the actor thereof (both which were in great authority in Court and with the King) imagining that CAESAR inclined to fauour CLEOPATRA'S faction, sent for the Armie which the King had near the city, consisting of 20000 good men, purposing to do by IVLIVS CAESAR as they had done by POMPEY: and so within few daies there beganne between CAESAR and the small forces which he brought with him, both within the city and in the harbour, between the ships and gallies, the most cruell war and

The clemency of Caesar.

Caesar pursued Pompey.

The death of Pompey.

Caesar wept for the death of Pompey.

Caesar war with Cleopatra.

incounters that he ever had; which I cannot distinctly set down, for the many adventures that passed. But let this suffice, that I V L I V S C A E S A R fought therein many times in his owne person, both within the city (whereof his enemies held the greatest part) and also in the harbour with his ships; and was sometimes in such perill and danger, as he was driven to leap out of the boat wherein hee was, into the water, and by swimming to flee into one of his galleies: and, as S V E T O N I V S writes, he carried his Commentaries in the one hand out of the water, lest they should bee wet; and his Robe in his teeth, to the end it should not fall into his enemies hands. But at length his forces and aid being come from Asia and other parts, he at the end of nine moneths (for, so long lasted these wars) remained victorious, as in all others hee had been; and the young King P T O L O M Y was slain in Fight. In this warre C A E S A R did such exploits, and shewed such valour and wildome, that for the same onely hee did well deserve the fame and renown of a most excellent Captain.

C A E S A R having tamed the pride of the Egyptians, and put to death the murderers of P O M P E Y, and established C L E O P A T R A for Queen and Gouvernesse in that Kingdome, whom during his staie there he entertained for his friend, and she conceived and had a sonne by him, called C A E S A R I O; all things being quietly settled, he departed from Egypt towards Asia, travelling through Syria, now Siria, by reason that he was given to understand, that while he was buied in the warres of Egypt, King P H A R N A C E S, sonne of the mighty King M I T H R I D A T E S, thought it now a fit time (seeing the civill discord between the Romans) to recover that which his father had lost: and having overthrowne D O M I T I V S, whom C A E S A R had sent to govern those parts, and also having taken by force of Arms the provinces of Bithymia and Cappadocia, expelling thence King A R I O B A R Z A N E S, a friend and subiect to Rome, and beginning to do the like in Armenia the lesse, which King D R I O T A R V S had made subiect to the Romans: I V L I V S C A E S A R coming with his Armie sooner than King P H A R N A C E S imagined, although hee had expected him, and had intelligence of his approach; within few daies they came to a battell: in which (without any great resistance) the King was overthrowne and put to flight, with great slaughter of his people, from which hee escaped by flight. Great was the joy C A E S A R conceived of this victory, for the desire he had to returne to Rome, where he knew that many scandalls and insolencies were committed by reason of his absence: he knew also, that P O M P E Y S eldest son had seized on a great part of Spain, and had raised great forces of those which M. V A R R O had there left, and of his fathers troops. Hee also understood, that in Africa many principall Romans, which had escaped from the battell at Pharsalia, were gathered together, wherof M. C A T O (called V T I C E N S I S, because that in Vtica hee slew himself) was the chief, and S C I P I O, P O M P E Y S father-in-law; and that these went thither with a great part of the galleies and ships of P O M P E Y S Naue, and with the greatest power they were able to levie; joyning with I V B A King of Mauritania, they had subdued all that country, and had a great Armie in readinesse against C A E S A R, having chosen S C I P I O for their Generall, because that C A T O would not take that charge vpon him, and for that the name of S C I P I O was very fortunate in Africa. C A E S A R, having intelligence of all these things, within few daies, with great celerity and diligence, recovered all that which P H A R N A C E S had vsurped: and, chasing him out of Pontus, he recovered all those countries: and leaving C E L I V S M I N V C I V S for Generall, with two legions to guard that province, pacifying the contentions and controuersies in the rest, rewarding the Kings & Tetrarchs which had continued firm in league and amity with Rome, without any longer aboad he departed from Asia, and in short space passing into Italie, came to Rome: within little more than a year after that, he departed from thence, ashort time in truth, for the performance of so great matters and so long a journey.

Within few daies after his coming to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen the third time Consul, and reforming (the best that he could in so short a time) all disorders in Rome, being grieved and not able to endure that his enemies should possesse Africa, with great expedition he prepared all things necessary, and from *Rome*ooke his way thitherward, commanding his forces to follow him. First he went into Sicilia, and there shipped himselfe, and thence passed into Africa: and notwithstanding that neither his Naue nor Armie arrived with him; trusting in the valour and goodnesse of his souldiers, and his owne good fortune, he tooke land with those small forces which he brought with him, neere vnto the citie of Adumentum in Africa; and from thence marched to another citie called Lepis, where he was received: and after some conflicts which passed, his legions being come, and certaine troopes both on foote and horseback; he began the warre, which lasted foure moneths, viz. from the beginning of Ianuarie till till the end of Aprill; beginning first against P E T R I V S and L A B I E N V S: afterwards it was continued against S C I P I O and King I V B A, which assailed the contrary faction with 8000. men, the one halfe whereof were horsemen, whereof the prouince of Africa did then, and to this day doth abound; among all which were leued against C A E S A R eight legions of footmen and 20000. horse: In this warre were many encounters, skirmishes and battailes, which H Y R C I V S in his Commentaries, P E Y T A R C H, L I V C A N, L V C I V S F L O R V S & others write of at large, in which C A E S A R was in great danger: but at the last with his force and good fortune, hee ouercame them all in a great battaile, wherewith the enemies, were slaine 10000. men, and C A E S A R remained master of the field, and in few daies after of all the Countrie. S e r . 1 . 1 1 0 and all the principall Captaines which were his aduersaries, died sundrie deaths within few daies; and king I V B A by flight escaping from the battaile, and finding no place of refuge, in despaire, he and A F R A N I V S determined to die fighting; the one against the other, till they were both slain, in which combat King I V B A being of greater strength then A F R A N I V S, slew him; and afterwards commanded a slaue of his own, to kill himself, and so he died desperately.

The good M A R C V S C A T O who was in the citie of Vtica, knowing that C A E S A R marched thitherwards, and although he knew that he would not put him to death, but had rather a desire to pardon him, and to doe him honor; yet to the end that he would receive neither life nor honor from his enemy, hee slew himselfe: in whose death passed many notable accidents recorded by many authors both christian and heathen. C I C E R O did write in commendation of the death of C A T O, against the which C A E S A R did write another discourse: both which are lost. And F L O R V S writes his death after this manner: Hearing of the decease of his partners, hee dallyed not at all, but (as it became a wise man) did ioyfully hasten his owne death: for after he had embraced his sonne and friends and bid them good night, he rested a while vpon his bed, having perused P L A T O S booke of the immortallitie of the Soule; then about the first relieving of the watch, he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe into the bodie: After which the Physicians sought to wrong this resolute man, by applying some salues, the which he endured vnill they were out of the roome; but then he pulled them away: and the blood following abundantly, he left his dying hand in the very wound. S C I P I O, who had been Generall in this warre, escaped from the battaile by flight, and shipping himselfe in certaine galleies, wherewith he fled, was met withall by C A E S A R S naue; who, to the end hee would not be taken, giving himselfe some wounds, cast himselfe into the sea, and so was drowned. C A E S A R, having obtained so great and absolute a victory, spending some few daies in ordering the provinces of Africa, reducing the kingdome of king I V B A into a province, hee came to the citie of Vtica, where he embarked himselfe the third of Iune, and came to the Ile of Sardinia, wherewith he stayed some few daies, and arrived at Rome the five and twentieth day of Iuly. At his coming (as S V E T O N I V S, A P P I A N V S, and P L Y T A R C H record) there were granted vnto him foure triumphs. The first triumph was for his conquest and victories in France, where were set the portraictures of the riuers of Radanus and the Rhine, wrought in gold: and in the second triumph of Egypt, and of King P T O L O M E Y, were set the riuers of Nilus and the Pharus of Alexandria burning. The third triumph was of the province of Pontus and of King P H A R N A C E S, wherewith for the speede wherewith he prosecuted the victorie, was placed a briefe writing which signified as much; which was, veni, vidi, vici, which is to say, I came, I saw, I ouercame. The fourth triumph was of the province of Africa, wherewith was placed King I V B A his sonne, as a captaine: and in this triumph (as S V E T O N I V S writeth) were given Jewels and armies to O C T A V I V S, C A E S A R S Nephew, who afterwards was Emperor, as we will declare, notwithstanding that he was not present in those warres by reason of his young age: for he was not then fully sixteen years old. As for the battaile which C A E S A R wanne against P O M P E Y, he would not triumph for it, because it was against Citizens of Rome.

These triumphs being ended, giving great rewards to his souldiers, and entreynayning the Romane people, with feasts, gifts and other great bountie, hee caused himselfe to be chosen the fourth time Consul, and to the end that there should be no place in the world wherein he would not be obeyed, he resolved to goe into Spain, where he understood that G N E V S P O M P E Y S (P O M P E Y S sonne) with the remainder of the armie which had escaped out of Africa, was gone to ioyne with his brother S E X T V S P O M P E Y S, who already was there, as I haue said, and was in possession of a great part of Spain, with the cities of Senill and Cordona, and many others in that coast, and many Spaniards were come to their ayde. C A E S A R, departing, carried with him his most experienced and chosen souldiers, and made so good speede, as within few Hyrcius lib. 3.

Appian lib. 2.
Lucan lib. 3.
Lucius Florus lib. 4.

Titus Livius lib. 114.
Plutarch in his lives.
The strange death of King Iuba and Afranius.

Cato Vitecentis
slew himselfe.
S. Aug. in his booke de ciuit.
dei. 1.
Scipio flew and drowned himselfe.
Lactantius Eternitatis.
Aulus Gellius
in his twelfth booke.
Cicero in the 3.
of his offices.
Valerius Maximus cap. 3.
Celsus tri-umphis.

Veni, vidi, vici.

Celsus would not triumph for his victory against Pompey.

dayes he arrived in Spain, and in this journey (as Svetonius and Velleius Paterculus record) his Nephew Octavius followed him.

Cæsar, being entred Spain, came into the province of Betice, which is Andaluzia, where Sextus Pompeius and his brother Gnaeus Pompeius were with such legions and souldiers as they had gathered together, and for there began betwene them a cruell and bloodie warre. The end whereof was, that neere to the cite of Munda, Cæsar and Gnaeus Pompeius (for Sextus Pompeius was in Cordova) joyned battaile; which was one of the most obstinate and cruell, that ever was in the world. For Cæsar being the most excellent Captaine, and the souldiers which he brought with him, the most valiant and accustomed to overcome, the resolution and courage of Pompey and his men was such, and they fought in such manner; as *Cæsar*s squadrons began to give ground and were ready to forsake the field; and at the very point to have been wholly overthrowne: And the matter came to this issue, that (as Svetonius and Eutropius do write) Cæsar was about to have killed himselfe, because he would not see himselfe overcome; and that he took target from one of his souldiers and rushed in among his enemies, saying with a loud voice (as Plutarch reporteth) If you be not ashamed, leave me and delivier me into the hands of these boyes: for this shall be the last day of my life and of your honour. With which words, and his example, his souldiers took heart in such manner, that, recovering the ground which they had lost, the battell became equal, which (as Appianus affirmeth) lasted the most part of one whole day, without any signe of victory; sometimes seeming to incline to one partie, and sometimes to the other, untill that at length Cæsar and his men did so great exploits, as the evening being come his enemies became faint, and began to flee, and the victory was apparently *Cæsar*s. There died of his enemies about 30000 men in this fight; and of *Cæsar*s part, were slaine a thousand men of account, besides many other of lesser note. Cæsar esteemed this victorie so much, and so gloried in the danger wherein he had been, that after the victorie he vied to say, that only that day he fought for his life, and in all other battailes ever for honor and victorie. He then remaying master of the field, his adversarie Pompey, who in nothing had failed of the office of a valiant and good captaine (after that he saw no other hope) escaped by flight, and wandering through many places was afterwards taken and slaine by *Cæsar*s friends, whose head was brought vnto him; the like hapned vnto Labienus. His second brother Sextus Pompeius fled from Cordova, & in the end forsook Spain: hereafter more mention shall be made of him. I. Cæsar recovered the cities of Senilla and Cordova, & all the rest; and disposing of all things in Spain at his pleasure, returned to Rome, & entred in triumph for the warres in Spain, which was his fifth and last triumph: in this place L. Florus and Paterculus speak of all his triumphs.

Cæsar came to be the most mightie, the most redoubted, and most highly esteemed man that ever had been in the world, having subdued and conquered the greatest part thereof, with an Armie and by force, in as little time, as it might seeme that another man might be able to traual those countries by reasonable iourneys. All which being in subiection vnto him, he made himselfe perpetuall Dictator of Rome; and so without contradiction he finished the making of himselfe foueraigne Lord and Monarch of the Romane Empire, within little lesse then five yeeres after that he began the same. And this was the originall and beginning of the Romane Emperours: for Iulius Cæsar would not be called King (for the name of King was odious to the Romans about all things, ever since the Kings were chased from Rome) but contented himselfe to be called perpetuall Dictator and also Emperour; although not with a name of such power and dignitie as his successors have done since; but as by a name which signified he had been a conqueror in the warres, which in this sense was given to the Romane Captaines, when they had obtained any notable victorie: but after Iulius Cæsar, all his successors took that name, glorying to be called Emperours, which was held for the highest title and dignitie in the world.

Iulius Cæsar having attained to that absolute power which he so much desired, he shewed in all things great clemencie and magnanimitie, honouring and rewarding his friends, and easily forgiving, and very cherefully pardoning all those which had been his adversaries; and so he not only pardoned Brutus and Cassius, Cicero, Marcellus, and many others: but also some of them he admitted to his companie and private familiaritie, and to offices and dignities. It is certaine that among all the many vertues wherewith Cæsar was endued, his clemencie and liberalitie were most glorious. But this sufficed not to quench the desire of their lost libertie, neither to assuage the hatred and malice conceived against him by his adversaries, as in time did appere.

And

And notwithstanding that many were grieved: yet for the love which they bare him; others for feare and dissimulation; the Senate and people of Rome, and finally all, gaue him names, preheminences and titles of honour, such as neuer had been given to any other; neither ought he to have accepted the same, as Plutarch, Appian and others doe report: But *Cæsar*s minde and ambition was such, and his thoughts so elevated and so high; as he held nothing so great, but he was worthe thereof and had deserved the same: and so he not only accepted that which they offered him, but many more were offered, because they knew that he desired the same. Whereupon they gaue him the name of Emperour, Father, restorer and preserver of his country: He was created perpetuall Dictator, and Consul for ten yeeres, and perpetuall Censor of their customes. His statue and image was erected among the Kings of Rome, and a chayre and throne of Iuorie in the Temples and Senate, and a high pulpit and throne in the Theatre, and in the place where the Senators did vfe to sit, his pictures and statues were set vp in all the Temples and publike places. I passe ouer some titles which they gaue him, and he accepted, which only, to those whom they held for God, ought to have been attributed. The moneth which they called Quintil, they called Iulius after his name, as March of their god Mars, and Iune after the goddesse Iuno: they did also consecrate and build Temples vnto him, as vnto Iupiter, and their other gods: and gaue him certaine honours which they held particularly for their gods, which they call Thensas: and so they did many other things to his honour, which exceeded all measure.

Iulius Cæsar enjoying such honour and power, so as he had no equall or second in the world with whom he might contend; it seemeth that he would contend with himselfe, and attempt something wherein he might excell himselfe: for he was not contented with all the victories which he had obtained, neither (as Plinius, Solinus and other report) to have fought in fiftie severall battailes (in all which he overcame) fauing in that one at Dyrachium against Pompey; where, as we haue already said, he was not wholly overthrowne, neither (according to the same authors) to haue slaine in the warres and battailes which hee fought, a million, ninetie and odd thousand men; and yet they say that they reckon not those which died in the ciuill warres: but that as he was of a most haughtie minde, he sought to doe greater matters, if greater might be. For, first he resolved to passe into the East, thence to conquer and subdue the fiercer nation of the Parthians, and to reuenge the death of Marcius Crassus, and to passe through Thracia and other countries, untill he should come to the Caspian sea, and so through all the provinces of Sybia Asia; and passing the riuier Tanis, to returne through Syria in Europe, and in this retire to come into Germany, and other provinces bordering thereupon, conquering and subduing them all to the Romane Empire; for the which conquest hee presently caused to be lured in sundrie places, ten thousand horsemen, and sixtene legions of chosen footmen, and appointing the time wherein he thought to depart, he commanded them to march towards their Rendezvous. And besides all this, he sought not only to subdue all the nations of the world, but to correct and reforme nature it selfe: for he purposed to haue made an Iland of Peloponnesus, which now is called Morea, by cutting the neck of the land which is betwene the Egean and the Ionian Seas.

Of the Riuier Tiber and the Riuier Anien (as Plutarch saith) he purposed to haue altered the courses, and to haue opened new channells, through which they should run into the Sea, making them to leaue their naturall course, and capable to bear great ships. He commanded, and already began to dig down and make plain many hills and high mountains in Italie, and to dry vp and dreine some of the great lakes and marshes which are therein: and, in this manner, hee thought to haue done other things more than a man, which seemed to be possible to none but to God alone. He corrected (as many Authors affirm) the computation of the yeer, conforming it with the course of the Sun, and brought it to that rule which is yet held: for, before that time it was much out of order. He did the like in the course of the Moon, and the conjunctions and oppositions of her and the Sun: and this was attributed to him for tyrannie, by those which did hate him. For, one day, in a discourse in the presence of Cicero, it was said, that the next day there should be an Eclipse of the Sun; yea, quoth he, it is so: for, Cæsar hath so commanded. Many other things Cæsar began, which were very great, in reforming the lawes, customes and offices, which for breuitie I omit: among which, the reedifying of the ruined city of Carthage by Scipio (as all the world knoweth) was one, and he sent thither Colonies and Roman citizens to inhabit: the like hee did by Corinth. But all these works and these so high conceits and resolutions were abridged by death, which within fewe daies ensued: and this man

C 2

The names and high titles which were giuen to Cæsar.

The high thoughts and purposes of Cæsar.

Cæsar corrected the computation of the yeere, Suetonius, Plutarch, Censorinus.

Carthage reposed by Cæsar.

Cæsar going into Spain against *Pompey*s Joanes, Betice, Andaluzia.

*Cæsar*s cruell battaile and victorie against *Pompey*s sons.

*Cæsar*s triumph for his victories in Spain.

The beginning of the Romane Empire.

The originall of the name of Emperour.

The clemencie and liberality of Cæsar.

man, whom no force could resist, a few men (yea, and those disarmed) were of power to be-reave of life, as heerafter we will declare. Five months onely hee lived a soveraign Lord in peace (as VELLIVS PATERCVLVVS hath noted) when those, in whom he reposed greatest trust, conspired his death.

The causes of the conspiracies against Cæsar.

Some write, that CÆSAR was counsell'd to have had a guard alwaies about him: where-to he answered, that he would have none; for, he would rather dy once, than live continually in jealousie and fear. Many set down the causes wherefore they desired to kill him. Some say, that it was for the hatred they had long born him: some others say, that it was for the desire of liberty, holding him for a tyrant. But the most part are of opinion, that it was for suspicion that hee would have made himself King of Rome; a thing in the highest degree hatefull to the Romans: whereof he gaue many signes and causes to suspect; which PLYTARCH and others do write at large. Heerunto was added, that he began to haue men in contempt, and all other things:
whereby he became hatefull to many. For, he veld to say, that the Common-wealth was but a voice and a name without a body or substance; and that it well appeared, that CORNELIVS SYLLA had no learning, seeing that hee refused the perpetual Dictatorship. All the whole Senate, coming one day into the Temple of Venus wherein he was, he attended their coming, sitting still, and rose not as he was wont to doo, notwithstanding (as some say) that CORNE-LIVS BALBUS counsell'd him to rise: which was a thing much noted, and odious to the Common-wealth. His friends and fauourites began also to fay and to publish, that in the books of the Sibyls (which in Rome were held in great veneration, and for a true prophecy) it was written, that the Parthians could neuer bee overcome but by a man which should haue the title of king; and they practis'd that CÆSAR should take this name, for that conquest, whither he had determined to goe: and although that he made shew to be much moued thereat, yet they suspected the contrary. Which suspicion encreased (besides that which is already said) for that the Tribunes of the people commanded a man to be apprehended, which had set a Diadem (which is the ensigne of a King) vpon the head of one of CÆSARS statues: Whereat CÆSAR was so highly offended with the Tribunes, that he depoted them from their offices, making shew that he did it, because they gaue him cause of offence, in this, that they would make the world beleue that there was cause of suspicion, that he would make himself a Tyrant-king. The like in a manner passed, when MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was a great fauourite of his, and (that yeere) his fellow and companion in the Consulship, being at certaine publicke games, came to CÆSAR and put a Diadem vpon his head: and although that he cast it downe, yet they all imagined, that MARCVS ANTONIVS would not haue presumed to haue done it without his consent or liking, and that he did this to proue what liking the people had thereto, and how they would take it: so as these, and such other like things as passed, gaue them occasion to desire and to procure his death: as some of them did. This did also encourage them, and made them attempt to do it; for that in sundry publick places certain Writings were set vp, which did incite and animate them to conspire against him: as, vpon the statue of BRVTVS, who in antient time chased the Kings out of Rome, were written these words; Would to God thou wert now living, BRUTUS: And vpon the image of MARCVS BRVTVS, who then was Pictor, and descended from the other BRVTVS, these words; Thou sleepest long, Brutus: truly thou art not Brutus. And, as APPIAN recounteth, at other times they set vp others, which imported, Thou art dead, Brutus: would to God thou wert living: thou art unworthy of the succession from the Brut: surely thou art not descended from that good Brutus. And other such like things were set vpon these statues, and in other places: So as for all these reasons, and for other added heerunto, there were leuenty of the most eminent men in Rome which conspired to murder him, one alluring another, vntill they grew to that number: of which, the principall Heads were DECIVS, MARCVS BRVTVS, CAIVS CASSIVS; yet MARCVS BRVTVS was held for CÆSARS son: for, his mother was suspected by him, and had receiued from him great honours and good entertainments.
With these were CAIVS CASCA, ATTILIVS CIMBER, SERVIVS GALBA, QVIN-TVS LIGARIVS, MARCVS SPVRIVS, and many other men of account: which, after som consultations, concluded to kill him vpon the Ides of March, which is the fifteenth day of that Month, in the Temple where the Senators wereto sit that day: which was agreed vpon, and kept so secret, that (notwithstanding their great number) there was not any one found that did discover the same. But there were so many signes and prodigies, and to himselfe there hapned so many auguries and forewarnings, that, without knowing any cause, all men were of opinion, that CÆSARS death was neer at hand. The which, among many other which recite the same,

OVID

OVID doth most excellently set down in his Metamorphosis, which for breuitie I omit: but chiefly SPVRINA, who was his diuiner or soothsayer, forwarned him, that he should look to himselfe vntill the Ides of March were past: for, his life was in great danger: and CÆSAR saw his owne wife entreated him vpon her knees, that hee would not that day go forth to the Senate;
for, she had dreamt, that he lay dead in her lap. Finally, CÆSAR was so many waies forewarned, and put in such fear of some great danger, as he was about to send to MARCVS ANTO-NIVS to make his excuse, and to deferre the Senat vntill another day. But (as it was Gods will he should dy so) MARCVS BRVTVS, being in place when this matter was in question twise, as we haue already said, was one of the conspirators counsell'd CÆSAR, that in no case hee should make shewe of any such fear: whereupon hee resolved to go.

Some (as SVETONIVS and PLYTARCH) write, that CÆSAR made small account of death, and that he suspected he should dy in this manner: for he said, that hee did not so much esteem his owne life, as the danger wherinto the Common-wealth would fall by losing him:
For, as for him, he had wonne power, fame and glory enough for himselfe; and that hee in no time could dy with greater honour. It gaue also cause of this suspicion, that some discoursing in his presence, the night before his death, what kinde of death was best: euen, quoth hee, the sudden, and that which is not preperced. Whether this be true or no, I knowe not: but, the fifteenth of March, he went from his house in a Litter towards the Senate; and, passing along the street, there was a petition deliuered vnto him, which (some say) ARTEMIDORVS, his Master in the Greek Tongue, gaue him: others say, that it was given him by another, and that AR-TEMIDORVS could not come so neer to him as to aduise him: but, whosoever hee were that gaue it, therein was given him (in writing) all that which was concluded in this conspiracie, and he which gaue it desired him to reade it presently; which he began to doo: but there came so many to speak to him, that he could but begin to reade it; for, it was found in his hand when he was dead. And, passing so along the street, hee also met with SPVRINA, who had given him warning to look to himselfe vntill the Ides of March were past: and as CÆSAR saw him, very pleasant and jesting he said, Dost thou not knowe, SPVRINA, that the Ides of March are come? Yea, answered SPVRINA, and I knowe that they are not yet past. Being come to the Temple where the Senate was to sit that day, he came down from his Litter, and entred therein; and, having first done sacrifice (as then was the custome) which all, according to their superstitious ceremonies of that time, prefiged to be fatal and unfortunate, he fate down in the Senate in his chair: and BRVTVS ALBINVS, entertaining MARCVS ANTONIVS at the door of the Temple, or (after some others) TREBONIVS, as it was decreed, one of the conspirators (whose name was CILBA) came to CÆSAR vnder colour to intreat him to be pleased to release a brother of his from banishment, and presently all the rest of the conspirators drew neer to his chair. Which when CÆSAR perceived, thinking that they had all come for the same purpose, it is written that he said vnto them, *What force is this? And at that Instant one of them, whose name was CASCIA, beginning, they all drew their poiniards and swords, which they had brought in secret for that purpose vnder their gowns, and began to wound him. The first blowe hee receiued, they say, CASCIA gaue him in the throat: at which wound CÆSAR spake aloud, saying, What dost thou, Traitor CASCIA? and, wrestling the poiniard out of his hands, he arose and stabbed CASCIA through the arm: and beeing about to strike him the second time, he was prevented by the other wounds which they gaue him; with great force and courage leaping from one side to the other to defend himselfe. But, when hee saw MARCVS BRVTVS (whose authority and reputation was great) with his sword drawn in his hand, wherwith he had already wounded him in the thigh, they write, that hee was much amazed thereat, and said in the Greek Tongue (which the Romans did then vnderstand and vsually speak) Why how now, sonne BRVTVS? and thou also? And hauing said so, and seeing so many weapons bent against him, and that no body came to his rescue (for, there was so great a tumult in the Senate, as they all thought to haue died; and, being in despair, none durst attempt to defend him) he remembered to keep the honour of his person, and with his right hand couered his head with part of his robe, and with his left hand hee hit himselfe, and settled his clothes about him; and, being so couered, he fell dead to the ground, wounded with three and twenty wounds: and his fortune was to fall at the foot of the seat or base wherupon POMPEY'S statue stood; which was noted for the judgement and permission of God. And so in this manner died the most high-ty, the most worthy, valiant, wise, and fortunate Prince and Captain, that without all doubt before him hath been in the world; and I knowe not if after him in valor and humane power there hath*

A petition given Cæsar.

Cæsar was slain in the Senate, & and at Pom-pey's feet.

The excellency of Iul. Cæsar.

C 3

hath been the like. For, his excellencies, graces and abilities; his invincible minde, his incomparable force and courage; the battailes and victories which he obtained; the provinces, Kings and nations, which he overcame and subdued; his counsells, stratagems, policies, and bold attempts; his magnanimitie, clemencie and bountie to the conquered and conquerors; the great designs he had propounded when he was slaine, being all well weighed and considered: it will plainly appeare, that in none of these things aforesaid, neither in many other more which may be said of him, there hath beene any King or Capitaine that hath excelled him, but that he in the most hath excelled all others, and had fewer imperfections and vices then any other. For, setting apart his ambition and desire to raigne (which he held for no vice, and might alledge that he was compelled thereto) he was only noted and blamed, as too much given to women; as for the rest, wherewith he was charged, it doth rather appeare to be the murmuring and slandering of his adversaries, than any truth.

CÆSAR was slaine in the six and fiftieth yeere of his age, foure yeeres and a little more (according to P L Y T A R C H S computation) after the death of P O M P E Y; in the seven hundred and tenth yeere (according to O R O S I U S) after the foundation of Rome; and according to the Hebrew truth, in the three thousand and tenth yeere from the creation of the world; and according to the greater account of the severitie interpreters, five thousand, one hundred, fiftie and seven yeeres; in the hundred, eightie and fourth Olympiad; and fortie and two yeeres before the birth of Christ our Redeemer: But I would have the reader to understand, that in this account of yeeres, there sometimes happeneth difference betweene the authors.

CÆSAR had neither sonne nor daughter legitimate, at the time of his death; for notwithstanding that he was married foure severall times, yet he had but one only daughter, named I V L I A, which (as I have said) was married to P O M P E Y, and died: Wherefore he adopted for sonne by his last will, and made him his heire in the Dodrant, which are nine parts of the twelue of his goods, his Nephew O C T A V I U S C Æ S A R, which afterwards was called O C T A V I A N U S A V G V S T U S, who was nephew to his sister I V L I A and of A C I U S B A L B U S, and sonne of A C I A his neece, and of O C T A V I U S P r e t o r in Macedonia, who died suddenly. O C T A V I U S was at this time by the commandement of his vncle, in the cite of Apollonia in the province of Epirus, where he gaue himselfe to studie; staying for him there, thence to goe with him to the warres of the Parthians, being then of the age of seventeen yeeres.

CÆSAR being dead in the manner as I have said (as it happeneth in great accidents) the newes presently ranne over all the citie, and the tumult and alteration therein was so great, as no man knew what to doe or say: all offices ceased, the temples were shut vp, there was no man but was amazed: CÆSAR S friends were afraid of those which slew him; and they, of his friends. It would be a long discourse to recite what succeeded, but I will briefly set down that which shall be most to my purpose. B R U T U S and C A S S I U S and all the conspirators, and others which were willing to ioyn with them, having murdered him, seeing the great tumult among the people (and as P L Y T A R C H writes) for feare of M A R C U S A N T O N I U S and L E P I D U S, whereof the one was Consul, and the other Master of the horsemen, durst not goe to their houses, neither doe such other things as they had pretended; but presently from thence went to seize vpon the Capitoll, and cryed by the way as they went, Libertie, libertie, imploring the assistance and fauour of the people. The rest of that day and all the next night, M A R C U S A N T O N I U S & L E P I D U S who took CÆSAR S part, were in arms, and there passed treaties & messages from the one to the other; wherein it was agreed the Senat should sit, whither B R U T U S & C A S S I U S came, M A N T O N I U S S o n s (by the perswasion of C I C E R O, a great lover of the libertie) remaining hostages for them; where they treated of peace & concord, and all that was past should be buried in perpetuall silence and obliuion. Wherunto M A N T O N I U S (who was Consul) and all the whole Senate agreed: and all the provinces being diuided, there was a great likelihood of peace; for the Senate approved and commended the fact, and the people dissembled it: for on the one part, the authoritie of B R U T U S and C A S S I U S, and the name of libertie, seemed to giue them some contentment; and of the other side, the greatnes of the fact, and loue which they bare vnto CÆSAR, did moue and incite them to hate the murderers, and so it rested indeterminate. But M A R C U S A N T O N I U S, as one who also thought to become a tyrant, ever sought meanes to incense the people against them; and matters passed in such sort, that among other things which were done, CÆSAR S testament was opened; wherein (besides the adopting of his Nephew O C T A V I U S for his son, and appointing him for his chiefe heire, among other bequests which he made) he bequeathed to the people of Rome ccr-

certaine gardens and heritages neere the river of Tiber, and to every citizen of Rome a certaine sum of money; to be diuided among them; which being knowne, did much renew their olde loue, and made his death farre more pittifull. And hauing agreed vpon his funerall, which was, with great solemnity to burne his body in the field of Mars, putting it in effect, M A R C U S A N T O N I U S, who that day made a funerall oration in his praise, and with the intent aforesaid, took the robe wherein CÆSAR was slaine, which being all bloody, he shewed to the people, vsing some speeches which prouoked them both to wrath and pittie. So as before the solemnity of the funerall was throughly ended, they all departed in great furie, with the brands of the same fire which was made for CÆSAR S bodie in their hands, and went to burne the houses of B R U T U S and C A S S I U S, running vp and downe the streetes of Rome seeking them and the rest of the conspirators to haue slaine them; and in that furie they vnadvisedly slew E L I U S C I N N A, by mistaking him to haue been C O R N E L I U S C I N N A, who was one of the conspirators. This tumult put B R U T U S and C A S S I U S and their confederats, in such feare, as they all fled from Rome to sundry other parts; and M A R C U S A N T O N I U S not obseruing what was decreed, thinking to inherit CÆSAR S power and authoritie, sought their destruction in all that he might: And notwithstanding that the Senate (having appealed the tumult of the people) would haue inflicted punishment vpon some of the seditious, and some were already imprisoned, yet B R U T U S and C A S S I U S durst not returne to Rome, but after a while went into Greece to gouerne those provinces, which CÆSAR (whom they had slaine) had assigned vnto them; which were Macedonia to B R U T U S, and Syria to C A S S I U S, and so all the rest of the conspirators abiented themselves. Surely it was a wonderfull thing that within the space of three yeeres, they all died, and not one of them a naturall death.

At this time C A T U S O C T A V I U S, who (as is aforesaid) was afterwards called O C T A V I A N U S A V G V S T U S, came to Rome from Apollonia, being aduertised of CÆSAR S death, and sent for by his mother and other his kindred, all continuing in the confusion aforesaid.

For M A R C U S A N T O N I U S was now very mightie: for his brother L V C I U S

A N T O N I U S was Tribune of the people, and other his friends and kinsmen were in offices and dignities, many of which he procured for them, saying; that I V L I U S CÆSAR had so ordained it in his Commentaries: and in this season came O C T A V I U S to Rome, whose storie we will now begin.

C 4

THE

The time wherein Cæsar died.

The murderers of Cæsar fled from Rome.

The death of those which conspired against Cæsar.

After the death of Cæsar, Marcus Antonius became the mightiest man in Rome.

The determination of the Senate.

Cæsar's will and testament.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR AUGUSTVS CÆSAR.

THE ARGUMENT.

OCTAVIANVS, or Octavius, the adopted sonne of Caius Iulius Cæsar, after the death of Cæsar, applied himselfe, together with Marcus Antonius, to revenge Brutus and Cassius with their complices, and overcoming them he returned to Rome: where plotting the Treason, he fled to much blood, and did such wickedness, as there was not any brother in Rome; but was polluted with civil blood. He fought with Lucius Antonius, brother to Marcus Antonius, for that it should seeme that Octavius made small account of his brother; and besieging him in Perugia, he constrained him (through famine) to come in person to sue for peace and life; whom he gently pardoned, together with all those which were his partakers in that warre. He also overcame Sextus Pompeius, after they had married together many yeeres. And falling at variance with Marcus Antonius by means of his wife Octavia, sister to Octavius, for that Antonius was besieged with the loue of Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt: Finally after many changes of fortune, he overcame him: whose victorie constrained Marcus Antonius (in a manner) in despair to kill himselfe, and Cleopatra to poison her selfe; but Marcus Antonius slew himselfe, more for that he believed that Cleopatra had already killed her selfe, than that he accounted himselfe overcome by Octavius. After this victorie, Marcus Antonius being dead, and Lepidus reduced to a most base estate, Octavius obtained the Monarchie and sole government of the Empire. In which time, subduing many barbarous Nations, he several times made Ians temple to be flut, and was called Monarch in which Monarchie he lived in such manner, as with his greatness, he was digressed from vertue by reason of his high estate; and was no less vertuous then a fauourer of leaured and vertuous men. He was unfortunate in honest wines, and chaff and content daughters; and most unhappy in loves, having nine women by nature worthy of the Empire. He ruled the world fixe and fiftie yeeres; foure and fortie alone, and twelue in companie with Marcus Antonius. In his time our Saviour Iesus Christ was borne. And being little more then threescore and fixe yeeres old he died, to the great griefe and sorrow of the whole world, which through his goodnesse had been so long time maintayned in peace.

Octavius shew to Cæsar and his friends by adoption.

The Linage of Octavianus.

In the Historie and life of IULIUS CÆSAR it behooued me to be briefe in the relation thereof; I haue now no lesse neede to do the like in the Historie of his Nephew OCTAVIUS CÆSAR, which afterwards was called OCTAVIANVS A VGVS TVS, his sonne by adoption, as by that which is before written may appeare: as well for the great accidents which happened in his time, as for the multitude thereof, which cannot be repeated but by a long discourse. But we will doe herein what we shall be able, notwithstanding that his raigne was long (for it was fiftie and odde yeeres) that in reason we may spend somewhat more time, then in the actions of those which were of lesse continuance. The father and grandfather of OCTAVIUS, I haue already said, who they were. His linage and familie of his fathers side, was of the OCTAVI, and was of great antiquitie in Rome, from the time of TARQVIN their king, and in the beginning they were Patricij (as SVETONIUS recordeth in his life) although that afterwards the order altrid, reducing it to the people by adoption, or some other cause: and in proceesse of time many of the OCTAVI, obtaining offices and Magistracies, continued in the order of Knighthood, which was in the middle degree between the Patricij and the Plebeians, vntill the time of OCTAVIUS the father of OCTAVIANVS; who was a Senator, and a Pretor in Macedonia.

OF

Of his mothers side (as it was said of IULIUS CÆSAR) hee descended from the Kings of Rome. And yet notwithstanding all this, as OCTAVIANVS had many enemies and emulators, it was said to his reproach, that his grand-father (the father of his father) had been a money-changer, and that his great grand-father was a Libertine, which is as much as to say, a man that had been a slave. But it seems to me vnelikely, that the son of such parents should haue been admitted into the Senat, and made Pretor; and that IULIUS CÆSAR, whose place & thoughts were so high, would haue married him to his Niece. And so SVETONIUS treats thereof, as a matter which he should for vturuc.

OCTAVIUS then vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle IULIUS CÆSAR, being aduertised and sent for by his mother (as I haue said) departed from Apollonia, and with the best speed he could make came to Rome, accompanied with some of CÆSAR's friends and some men of warre, of those which in Egipt and Macedonia attended the enterprize and wars of Asia, as it was decreed: and, arriving at Brundisium, he found there certain legions, which by CÆSAR'S commandment were comen thither to haue been embarked for the warre pretended; by whom he was receiued with the greatest loue and affection that could be. And (as saith APPIANVS) he was there called and took vpon him the name of CÆSAR, by the adoption of his vncle; and, leaving off to be called OCTAVIUS the son of OCTAVIUS, was called CAIUS CÆSAR, son of CAIUS CÆSAR; and commonly he was called CÆSAR OCTAVIANVS; wherein he preferred the memory of his naturall father, with the name of his adoptiue father: like as PAVLVS EMILIVS son of PAVLVS EMILIVS, being adopted by SCIPIO, the son of SCIPIO the Great, was called SCIPIO EMILIANVS; SCIPIO by his adoptiue father, and EMILIANVS by his naturall father; a matter vsuall among the Romans. So was OCTAVIUS called CÆSAR OCTAVIANVS: and so from thenceforth we will call him.

OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR departed from Brundisium towards Rome, accompanied with theould souldiers: and by the way many more joined with him, with many of his vncle and father CÆSAR'S friends, and of his faction, and entered into the city with great shew & pomp. But, as MARCVS ANTONIUS was of great power, and therewith very proud, and took in ill part that OCTAVIANVS was preferred before him, as PLVTARCH recordeth, hee went not to receiue him: which was much noted, and was the first signe of the discord which afterwards ensued between them. OCTAVIANVS had a resolution and great desire to reuenge the death of IULIUS CÆSAR. But, by his mother, and PHILIP his father-in-law, with whom she was married, he was counselled to dissemble his purpose for a season: for, on the one side, they saw that the Senate had approued the death of IULIUS CÆSAR; and, on the other, MARCVS ANTONIUS, who was to bee their principall fauourer therein, did not shewe himselfe a friend to OCTAVIANVS. Wherefore he, following their wife counsell, aduisedly concealed his thoughts for a time: and, to iustifie himselfe, and to hould correspondence, and temporize with ANTONIUS, he went presently to his house to visit him. And, vnderstanding that ANTONIUS had in his custodie all the treasure which IULIUS CÆSAR had left, after discourse of some other matters, he desired him to command it to bee deliuered vnto him, therewith to satisfie his debts, and to distribute it as CÆSAR had ordained by his Will. To this, and all the rest which OCTAVIANVS required, hee was answered by MARCVS ANTONIUS with greater haughtinesse and grauity than the minde and thoughts of OCTAVIANVS were able to bear, denying to him what he required, yea, and reprobuing him for his demands. Whereupon presently contentions and discord arose between them; OCTAVIANVS aiding himselfe with the counsell of MARCVS TVLLIUS CICERO, a great enemy to ANTONIUS: whose authority at that time, by reason of his wisdom and eloquence, was very great. The hatred encreasing, although that friends of either side passed between them to bring them to some conformity, and to haue reconciled them, yet in the end it brake out. And OCTAVIANVS his power encreasing, principally (as I said) through the fauour and assistance of CICERO, MARCVS ANTONIUS left Rome, and began to raise forces in Italie, and so leuied foure legions ofould souldiers against him. And because that DECIVS BRVTVS, who commanded Gallia Cisalpina (which is now called Lombardie) was opposite vnto him, procured thereto by CICERO his counsell and letters, MARCVS ANTONIUS went to besiege him in the city of Mutina, now called Modena. This being knowne in Rome, CICERO his credit and authority in the Senate was such, as, after much contention, MARCVS ANTONIUS was declared an enemy to the State: and the new Consuls HIRCIUS and PANSA were to be sent against him, and with them OCTAVIANVS, with ensignes of Consul and title of Propre-

Octavianus took upon him the name of Cæsar.

Octavianus took upon him the name of Cæsar.

Octavianus and Marcus Antonius were at variance.

M. Antonius declared an enemy to the State.

tor,

tor, with part of the Armie, hauing been first receiued into the Senate (notwithstanding that he was not yet eighteen yeers old) by the procurement of CICERO, although that afterwards he did ill requite it.

There were also assigned vnto MARCVS BRVTVS the prouinces of Illyricum or Sclauonia, and Macedonia, with the Armies therein; and to CASSIVS, the prouince of Syria in Asia, and with the Armie also. This and other things being granted by the Senate, OCTAVIANVS and the Consuls with their Armies drew nere to MARCVS ANTONIVS, MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO remaining for chief in all matters in Rome. After some skirmishes and encounters, which passed between the two Armies, they came to battell, or (as some record) battels, which were decided in sundry manners; but in effect they all agree: and the truth is, that the Consuls and CÆSAR had the victory, and one of the Consuls (which was HIRCVS) was slain in the battell, and PANSÆ the other Consul came wounded from it, and died shortly after: and so OCTAVIANVS remaining with the whole Armie, DECIVS BRVTVS was freed from the siege; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, with part of his people, escaped by flight. In this seruice, OCTAVIANVS made marvellous proof of himself (as SVETONIVS reporteth) not only as a Caprain, but also as a private souldier: and, among other things which hee did, one was, that seeing him which bare the standard to bee sore wounded and ready to fall, with the Eagle, the ensigne of his legion, which were the Armes of Rome; OCTAVIANVS took the same, and bare it a great while, vntill that he put it in safety: yet for all this, some of his enemies forbore not to defame him; saying, that, being in the battell, he himselfe slue the Consul HIRCVS; and that afterwards he caused poison to be put into the medicines applied to the Consul PANSÆ, and that thereof he died.

MARCVS ANTONIVS, being escaped from the battell, gathering together the remainder of his Armie, passed the Alps and went into France, soliciting the friendship of LEPIDVS, who remained there with an Armie since the death of IVLVIS CÆSAR: with whom, after some treaties and matters which succeeded, he concluded to be his friend. And OCTAVIANVS, after the battell and victory obtained, seeing himself at liberty from the authority of the Consuls, began to put in effect the high designs which he did inherit with the goods and name of CÆSAR, and presently sent to the Senate to require triumph for the victory; and also the Consulship for the rest of the time which remained to the dead Consuls, with succession in their charge, and command of the souldiers succeeding them in dignity. But his demands were not so pleasing to the Senate as he desired: for, the kinsmen and friends of the conspirators which slue CÆSAR, began to stand in fear of him, and they grieved to see him so powerfull. Wherefore (as APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS and VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS distinctly set down) they vsed a mean to protract and delay that which he required; and in the end they refused to assigne the Armie vnto DECIVS BRVTVS: and temporizing with OCTAVIANVS, they granted him the triumph, without admitting him to the Consulship. Whereat he shewed himself much discontented, and took occasion thereby to attempt that which peradventure he had before projected: which was this; He had secret treaties & practices of friendship with MARCVS ANTONIVS, and hauing drawne vnto him the hearts and good will of the Armie, imitating IVLVIS CÆSAR, accompanied therewith, he took his way to Rome: and approaching nere vnto the city, in despite of the Senate hee made himself to bee chosen Consul, being then not fully twenty yeers old. Wherein hee presently entered; and, discouering his desire and resolution, he made accusations to be exhibited against BRVTVS and CASSIVS, and the rest of the conspirators, which was declared against them all: and as there were none to defend their cause, and they absent, not daring to appear, they were condemned. This being done, he again departed from the city; and, with the Armie which he brought, returned to draw nere to the camps of LEPIDVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, who were already entered Italy.

DECIVS BRVTVS, being aduertised of the treaties and league betwixt OCTAVIANVS, LEPIDVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, not daring to stay in that country, departed with his people: by which, seeing himself abandoned, part whereof going to CÆSAR, and part to MARCVS ANTONIVS, hee fled into sundry parts; and in the end was taken and brought to MARCVS ANTONIVS, and put to death by his commandement, and (his head being brought vnto him, hee caused him presently to be buried. The Armies of these Captains approaching nere together, with which ASINIVS POLLIO and PLANCVS, with the legions which they commanded, were joined; the league was made, and friendship concluded between

The battell against Marcus Antonius, wherein Octavianus and the consuls had the victory.

Octavianus made himself to be chosen consul, that which murdered Cæsar, captured & condemned.

tweene these three, to wit, OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, MARCVS ANTONIVS, and LEPIDVS, all three meeting to that effect three daies together, at an appointed place in the fields betweene Bologna and Perugia, as APPIANVS recordeth, which was an Island, which the River Lacumum which passeth thereby, maketh; where they concluded their accursed peace. And either of these firebrands of fedition entered into that accursed Triumvirat, with a several designe & intent. LEPIDVS was covetous of riches, the hope whereof consisted in troubling the State. A NATHANIEL by nature an enemy to peace, and trouble some to the common weale, desirous to be revenged of such as had declared him an enemy to the State. And OCTAVIVS, for the death of his adopted father, upon BRVTVS and CASSIVS, whose lives were offensive to his unreuenged ghost. After which, OCTAVIANVS, putting away SERVELIVS daughter, to whom hee was married, contracted himselfe to CLAVDIA, ANTONIVS daughter in law, daughter to his wife FVLVIA, which was then a childe, from whom hee was also divorced afterwards, without touching her, by reason of the discord which arose, as shall bee declared. In this proscription and league which they made, besides the dividing of the Emperre and Provinces, as hereafter shall bee declared, they concluded each of them to kill his enemies, and the one delivered them into the others hands, having more respect and care to bee revenged of an enemy, then to the saving of a friend; and so was made the most cruell and inhumane proscription and butchery that euer was scene or heard of, giving and exchanging friends and kinsmen, for enemies and adversaries. For MARCVS ANTONIVS gave his fathers brother; and LEPIDVS, LVCIVS PAVLVS, his owne brother; and OCTAVIANVS, MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO, whom hee called father, and by whom hee had bene intreated and honoured as a sonne. Besides these, they proscribed and condemned to dye, three hundred other principal men of Rome, as PLYTARCH setteth downe in their lives, although LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS doe but briefly set downe the number of the Senators: of which one faith, there were put to death 130, and the other 140. But if wee shall beleue APPIANVS, a most diligent and grave Author, there died of the Senators in a manner 300 (therin agreeing with PLYTARCH) and nere 2000 Romans of the order of Knighthood: so great power had ambition & hatred in the hearts of these three Citizens.

Hauing made their agreement, and resolved what they would doe, they all three (newly reconciled) went to Rome, where they tooke upon them the government of the Common-wealth, by the name of a Triumvirat, for that they were three, the time being appointed for five yeares, although they never meant to leave the same. And presently those which by them were condemned and proscribed, were by their commandement put to death, being sought out in all parts and places, ransacking their houses and confisking their goods: In the execution whereof there was so great confusion, sorrow and heaviness in the citie of Rome, and almost in all Italy, as the like was never scene nor heard of by man. And although APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS very eloquently recounteth the cruell death of many, it shall be sufficient for us to describe the murdering of CICERO onely: who understanding that his name was in the catalogue of those which were proscribed, onely for that he had bene a lover of the Romane libertie, fled towards the Sea, where imbarcking himselfe, hee had so cruell fortune, as hee was forced to returne to the shore: and coming to certaine his possessions nere to Capua, not far from the Sea, sleeping, hee was awakened by Crows, which with their bills plucked the clothes from his backe. His servants moved with this evill presage, tooke him and put him in his Litter, and againe carried him towards the Sea; but hee was overtaken by the executioners, which smote off his head, and right hand, wherewith hee had written the orations against MARCVS ANTONIVS called PHILIPPICKS, imitating those which DEMOSTHENES made against PHILIP, father to ALEXANDER the great: and so CICERO was slaine by one whom hee had defended and delivered from death. And his hand being joyfull beheld by MARCVS ANTONIVS, was by his order nayled up in the place where hee was wont to plead, whither repaired all the Romane people to behold so miserable and sorrowfull a spectacle: whereof there was not anie one but was heartily sorrie for the death of so greata personage, and so fervent a lover of the Common-wealth.

These Princes having done their wils in Rome, and knowing that BRVTVS and CASSIVS had a great and mightie Armie in Grazia, able both to defend, and offend, & called themselves deliverers of their Country, and gave it out publicly, that they would goe to set Rome at libertie from oppression: CASSIVS having before overthrowne and slaine DOLABELLA in Syria, who was made Consul in the place of IVLVIS CÆSAR when hee was slaine; and in the time that that Cicerobare away, was adjudged for an enemy to his Countrey: and being certified that they had (with the assistance of the Kings and provinces of Asia, and such peoples they could levie) drawn together 18 legions: This (I say) being knowne, MARCVS ANTONIVS and OCTAVIANVS resolved to goe against them with the greatest Armie they were able to levie, which they had of expert and old soldiers, and that LEPIDVS should remaine behinde to guard Rome. Being departed from thence, and arrived in Gracia, dividing their Armie, for the more commodious marching thereof, they drew neere to the place where BRVTVS and CASSIVS were encamped, which was in Macedonia, in the fields called Philippicks, for that they were nere the City Philippis. Before the Armies came to joyne, there were apparent signes of an inevitable overthrow; for those birds which used to gorge themselves with Carion, hovered about BRVTVS Campe, as if it had beene their owne alreadie: as they marcht out to battell, a blacke Moore met them, which was an eminent signe of ominous successe: and BRVTVS himselfe being alone in his tent at night in meditation, a man sad and gaffly appeared unto him; and being demanded by him, what he was? he answered, I am thy evill spirit, and so vanished out of his sight. In Cæsar Campe, all presages were as good as the others bad, birds and beasts promising all fayre fortune. These contrarie Armies being so neere together, after some encounters and skirmishes, they came to a battaile, where the victorie was divided after a strange manner: for either partie having ranged their Armie into two squadrons, or battailes, the right wing of BRVTVS his Armie, joyned with the left wing which OCTAVIANVS commanded, and the right, whereof MARCVS ANTONIVS was leader, with the left which CASSIVS governed: where wounding and cruelly slaying one another, BRVTVS his Battalion was of such power, as that it brake and put to rout OCTAVIVS CÆSAR Battalion: who, as APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS, PLUTARCH, and LVCIVS FLORVS report, was not in the battaile, for that hee was then very sicke; neither durst he abide in his Tent in the Campe, for a certaine augurie or dreame of one who was his Phisition, who (they say) adviced him, that he should not abide in his Tent in the Campe; for if hee did, hee would be slaine by his enemies. Yet SVEYONIVS, VALLIVS PATRACVLVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS affirme that he was there, & that being overcome, he retired to ANTONIVS battaile. And although that this be diversly reported (as it usually happeneth in great exploits and adventures) the truth wherein all agree, is, that his people being overthrowne, and his Campe entred by his enemies, imagining that he had bene in his bed, there were many thrusts and stabs given thorough the curtains, and into the bed, and it was published abroad that hee was dead. And while as BRVTVS followed this victorie, his companion CASSIVS was overthrowne by MARCVS ANTONIVS, notwithstanding that hee performed all that was possible for him to defend his people; so as there was victorie on either side, whereof the cloudes and dust of that day were a great occasion, for the one could not see nor understand the other: and CASSIVS seeing his people overthrowne and scattered, retired himselfe to a high ground, where hee had pitched his Tent, whereinto he could not come, for that the enemy had alreadie possessed it: And so standing and looking about, hee saw BRVTVS troopes come to his ayde, and to relieve him: but hee imagining they came flying, or that they were his enemies, as he had before resolved (so great was his griefe and sorow) so commanded hee a slave of his, whom hee had made free (named PINDARVS) to kill him, who performed it presently, and so he died foolishly, yet bound by necessitie, believing that which was not.

The Triumvirat and league betwixt Octavianus, Marcus Antonius, and Lepidus.

The cruell proscription made by Octavianus and Marcus Antonius, Cicero delivered to his executioners.

OCTAVIANVS his people escaped by flight, & retired to MARCVS ANTONIVS campe, whose forces returned to him with victorie: although their General MARCVS ANTONIVS, as some write, did not that day discharge the part of a good Captaine: but rather affirme, that the battaile being begunne, hee left it, and went into a lake which was thereby, where he remained until that hee certainly understood, that the victorie remained on his side: which truly is hardly to be beleevied in so valiant a man, and of such experience as he was; so as there was a great broile and a confusion. But PLUTARCH affirmeth, that if BRVTVS his people had not that day busied themselves in ransacking and pillaging of OCTAVIANVS his Campe & Tents, his partie had obtained an entire victorie: for they might in sufficient time have rescued CASSIVS, and both being joyned together, might easilie have broken MARCVS ANTONIVS his battaile. But the victorie divided in such manner as I have told you, the Captaines of either partie gathered together their forces, where of BRVTVS part were slaine 8000 men, and of his adversaries a far greater number: and BRVTVS did his best to comfort the soldiers and gentlemen which followed CASSIVS. And although the next day there were some shew between the two Armies of a desire to fight, and that they were neere the one to the other, yet they came to no battaile: but within few daies after (during the which) there past some skirmishes of small importance: it was tided betweene them; whereto BRVTVS was forced by his soldiers. For he would willingly have delayed and prolonged the warre: being advertised that his enemies wanted victuals, and many necessities, and also for that hee reported that hee was in CASSIVS forces; for he found that they were growne fearefull, by means of that which was past, and were ill to command: but being come to the encounter, hee thoroughly discharge all the offices which to a good Captaine and valiant knight did becom. But in the end, his men unable to endure the force of OCTAVIANVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, were by them broken and overcome: And BRVTVS, after that hee had done all that which was possible to gather his troopes together, being out of hope to be able to make any resistance, the night being come, he was counsell'd by some which joynd themselves with him, to flie, to whom hee answered, that he was resolved to doe so; not with his secreet, but with his hands: and having spoken these words, hee tooke a sword from a servant of his, named STRATVS, and slew himselfe. Some affirme, that this STRATVS killed him by his commandement. And so DRVSIVS, LVIVS and QVINTIVS VARRO and some others of the conspiracie flew themselves, besides many others which died fighting in the battaile. And in this manner were OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR and MARCVS ANTONIVS Lords and Masters of the field, and all things succeeded unto CÆSAR according to his desire: for whom alone, God in his secret judgment, had reserved the sole Monarchie, which then was divided and shared between three.

the

This exploit being achieved, and BRVTVS and CASSIVS legions being reduced to their obedience (saving those which flying sundrie waies went to SUBTVS POMPEIVS, sonne of the great POMPEY, who in these troubles and confusions seized on the Ile of Sicilia, and was very mightie by Sea) OCTAVIANVS, and MARCVS ANTONIVS agreed together, that ANTONIVS should remaine in the Provinces of Gracia and Asia, LEPIDVS should goe into Africa, and OCTAVIANVS should returne to Rome, whither with some difficultie he came, through want of his health; and MARCVS ANTONIVS went into Asia, & afterwards gave himselfe to sensuality, delights and pleasures in Egypt, with Queene CLEOPATRA, of whom wee have spoken in the life of CÆSAR.

Within few daies after that OCTAVIANVS came to Rome, there arose new waies and troubles: for although that hee were in peace with LEPIDVS, to whom was given the Province of Africa, OCTAVIANVS remaining with the rest of Spaine, France, and part of Germany, Illyria and Syllyricum: LVCIVS ANTONIVS, who at that time was Consul, incited thereto by his Sister in law FVLVIA, wife to MARCVS ANTONIVS, began to oppose himselfe against LEPIDVS and OCTAVIANVS, attempting to defeat the Triumvir, and the league and government of three; which began about the division of the fields, which OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR had made to the men of warre which had served him. APPIANVS writeth, that FVLVIA did this with an intent to disturb Italy; and so to procure her husband MARCVS ANTONIVS to come unto her, for that she was jealous, hearing of his familiaritie and companie keeping with CLEOPATRA, the Queene of Egypt. This discord in Rome grew to that height, as they came to Armes: and LVCIVS ANTONIVS departed from thence, and levied an Armie against OCTAVIANVS, who marched towards him with his power: but LVCIVS durst not joyne battaile with him, but rather suffered himselfe to be shut up in the Citie of Perugia, where CÆSAR besieged him, and at that time divorced himselfe from CLAUDIA, the daughter of FVLVIA, to whom he was contracted (as is aforesaid) without ever touching her; and was married the third time with SEMPRONIA, by whom hee had one daughter, Perugia was so stridly besiedged (OCTAVIVS being then 23 years old) that LVCIVS ANTONIVS, and the rest which were besieged with him, endured so great hunger, as it grew to a proverb, to say, The Perugia hunger, wherewith LVCIVS ANTONIVS oppressed and forced yielded himselfe to OCTAVIANVS, who pardoned him, & used him well, & those which were with him; and so this warre was ended without shedding of blood, and he came victorious to Rome, & was ever after Lord thereof. Wherefore many account the beginning of his Empire from this time, which might be about some 4 years after the death of his uncle CÆSAR: & the account which is commonly called CÆSAR s computation, agreeth with this time: four years (as I said) after the death of CÆSAR, and thirte and eight years before the birth of Christ.

CÆSAR being in this quietnes (the which cannot long continue in the course of this life) presently

The Battaille of Philippi.

Brutus flew himselfe.

Marcus Antonius fell in love with Cleopatra Queene of Egypt.

Lucius Antonius opposeth himself against Octavius.

Lucius besieged Perugia.

the beginning of Octavius his Empire.

presently without any delay, FVLVIA with letters and false persuasions, fought by all means to get MARCVS ANTONIVS and OCTAVIANVS at variance, seeing that LVCIVS ANTONIVS his attempts took no better effect: and with this resolution she went out of Italia, by OCTAVIANVS permission, and took her way towards her husband, in hope to persuade him to come into Italia against OCTAVIANVS, as he did. When she parted from Italia, MARCVS ANTONIVS parted from Alexandria in Egypt: and coming to the Ile of Rhodes, he was informed of all that happened to his brother; and arriving in Græcia at the city of Athens, he found his wife FVLVIA there sicke, but found and constant in her determination against OCTAVIANVS: whom hee there leaving by her owne good will and consent, hee came with two hundred Gallies into Italia; and landing neere unto Brundisium, now Brindisi, the warres began between him and OCTAVIANVS his forces, who then was in Rome. SEXTVS POMPEIVS (as I said) held Sicilia, and was in such fort Lord of the Sea, as hee caused a great scarcity and want of come in Italia. But as this warre was not through OCTAVIANVS his fault, or by his will, so MARCVS ANTONIVS, by the relation of sundrie persons, understood it to be so; and therefore there were some friends which interposed themselves to reconcile them and make them friends: and it was agreed there should be arbitrators which should compound the differences between them: whereto were nominated OCTAVIANVS side, his great and private friend MÆCENAS, chanted by VIRGIL, HORACE, and other Poets; and for MARCVS ANTONIVS, was ASINIVS POLLIO. And in this time, newes came that FVLVIA the wife of MARCVS ANTONIVS was dead: whereby a great obstacle to the peace was taken away. MÆCENAS then, and ASINIVS POLLIO, set downe the agreement betweene them; the principal points whereof were, to renew the league and Triumvirat for other five yeeres, and to share the Romane Empryre betweene them, as they before had done. To MARCVS ANTONIVS was assigned all the East from Italy, from the beginning of the Ionian Sea, which is the entrie into the gulf of Venice, unto the River Euphrates in Asia, wherein were included all the Provinces of Græcia and Asia, and the Ilands contained betweene these two limits. To OCTAVIANVS was assigned from the said Ionian Sea to the westerne Sea (which we call the Spanish Sea) Italia, France, the provinces of Spain, Germanie, Britannie, with their Ilands and boundes. And to LEPIDVS was confirmed Africa wherein hee then was, and all the provinces therein contained, subject to the Empire. And for the better corroborating of this league of friendship, it was agreed that MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was a widower, should marrie with OCTAVIA, who was sister to OCTAVIANVS by his fathers side, and lately the widow of MARCVS MARCELLVS, with whom shee had bin married, and had by him one sonne called MARCELLVS, whom hee much loved, and OCTAVIANVS adopted him for his sonne, of whom VIRGIL maketh much mention. This marriage was made by dispensation of the Senate, because that in Rome it was not permitted for widowers to marrie, until they had lived ten months in widowhood.

This being concluded, OCTAVIANVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS went to Rome: where the wedding was solemnized, and they returned againe good friends. But this peace was greatly disquieted, by meanes of the ill neighbourhood of SEXTVS POMPEIVS: for hee commanded the Sea from Sicilia where hee lived, and with his ships and Pirats (for hee had many in his service) hee disquieted CÆSARS part (relying on the friendship of MARCVS ANTONIVS) and OCTAVIANVS had determined to make warre and to ruine him: but at the entreatie of the Senate, and of MARCVS ANTONIVS, hee gave care to a peace, and by the mediation of some which were friends to them both, it tooke effect in this manner: That all matters past being forgotten, they should become good neighbours and friends, and that SEXTVS POMPEIVS should enjoy Sicilia, Sardinia, and Corfica, which hee had in possession; and that he should cleere the seas from danger, for Merchants and passengers; and that hee should furnish Rome yeerely with a certaine quantitie of come. This being concluded, they agreed upon a meeting betweene them three, ANTONIVS, OCTAVIANVS, and POMPEIVS, upon the Sea side, in the freight of Messina, in a Fortresse built for that purpose, which reached into the water, whither SEXTVS POMPEIVS might come with his gallies, and might be in safety on all parts: which was performed with great joy and solemnitie, and afterwards POMPEIVS feasted them in his gallies, and they him like wife by land: and from thence he returned to Sicilia, and OCTAVIANVS and ANTONIVS to Rome, wherethey remained certaine daies in very friendly manner. And MARCVS ANTONIVS, making preparation for his journey into the East, sent

sent VENTIDIVS away before with a great Armie against the Parthians, against whom he had resolved to make war, as hee did. VENTIDIVS had so good successe in his journey, as hee overcame and defeated PACORVS, the Kings sonne of the Parthians, and slew of them twenty thousand men: so as hee sufficiently revenged the death of MARCVS CRASSVS: for the which, after his returne to Rome, hee triumphed.

MARCVS ANTONIVS departed Rome towards the East with his new wife, with whom he wintered in Græcia in the Citie of Athens, & from thence he continued his journey. Within a while after, as OCTAVIANVS (remaining in Rome) grew mightie, and in great estimation; so likewise hee became penfive: and as the companie and neighbourhood of SEXTVS POMPEIVS in Sicilia was displeasing unto him, so he attended an occasion to warre against him: which having resolved, he prepared a great fleet for that purpose, under pretext that POMPEIVS with his gallies and ships hindered the coming of prouision of come into Italia. These warres of Sicilia were long (resting sometimes) and continued certaine yeeres. In the beginning whereof OCTAVIANVS had ill successe, more through tempests and foule weather at Sea, then the force of his enemies, although there were some fights betweene the ships of either partie: but by tempest and shipwrack OCTAVIANVS lost sundry shippes. And if SEXTVS POMPEIVS had beene as able to offend and conquer as he was to defend himselfe, and overthrow his enemies; and as he was valiant, if he had beene wise and politique, most authors affirme, that he might have greatly distressed OCTAVIAN in all matters concerning Italia. But the matter was so handled, that in this warre MARCVS ANTONIVS came twice out of Græcia into Italia, whither hee came from the East at OCTAVIANVS request: in one of which journeyes hee came to Brundisium: and not finding him there according to his appointment, and as he had sent him word, he returned without seeing him, upon some suspitions and jealousies which greive betweene them. Wherefore OCTAVIANVS having lost the most and best part of his Navie in a storme, he sent MÆCENAS his private friend unto him; at whose intreatie, MARCVS ANTONIVS returned againe into Italia with three hundred sayle of ships and gallies, giving it out; that hee came to CÆSARS ayde: And notwithstanding that there were some differences & jealousies betweene them, yet in the end OCTAVIA, who came thither (being wife to the one; and sister to the other) prevailed so much as she reconciled them; so as they met together in the mouth of a River neere to Tarentum, where MARCVS ANTONIVS gave to OCTAVIAN one hundred and twentie gallies for the warres: and OCTAVIAN gave to him certaine troupes of Italian trained souldiers; and they renewed their Triumvirat for other five yeeres then begun: MARCVS ANTONIVS returned towards the East, to the warre which he had begun against the Parthians (which concerne not mee to write) his wife OCTAVIA and her children remaining in Rome.

ANTONIVS being gone, OCTAVIANVS, who was resolved to prosecute the warres with all his forces against SEXTVS POMPEIVS (whom hee feared fortune and the winds did favour) was not contented with the arming of two navies (A GRIPPA being Captaine of the one, and himselfe of the other) but he earnestly intreated LEPIDVS, a Triumvir & his companion, to come from Africa to his aide: who came with such power, as APPIANVS affirmeth, that he brought with him a thousand ships little and great, and fourescore gallies, wherein he transported five thousand horse, and twelve legions of foote. SEXTVS POMPEIVS, whose power by Sea was very strong, seeing so great preparations made against him, did marvellously fortifie all places upon the Sea side in Sicilia, and on the frontiers of Africa, neere unto Lilybæum; he placed a very good Capitaine called PLINIVS, with good troupes of souldiers: his whole fleet by Sea (whereof he was abundantly provided) he drew together in the port at Messina, where he purposed to follow the warres with his shippes and gallies, for by land he was neither of such experience nor power; and in this order hee stood ready to prosecute it, which APPIANVS, TITVS LIVIVS, and LVCIVS PIORVS write at large. The summe whereof is, that LEPIDVS parting with his whole fleet from Africa, was overtaken with a tempest, wherein with great losse of his Shippes, hee landed at Lilybæum; and having taken certaine places in those parts, he might have done much hurt: but being of small judgement and little experience in the wars, hee managed it with greater cost and outward shew, then to any effect or profit.

And the very same day that he was in that tempest, OCTAVIANVS also was at sea, & lost thirty gallies, besides Poits & Brigandines, & with much difficulty returned into Italia: and TAVRVS, who

D 2

Ventidius triumphed of the Parthians.

The first warre betweene Octavian & Sextus Pompeius.

Octavianus and Antonius parte and agree by the means of Octavia.

Ottobianus is found to have withdrewn Pompeius.

Sextus Pom-
peius in Sicilia.

The death of Fulvia wife of Marcus Anto-
nius.

Marcus Anto-
nius married Octavia sister to Octavianus.

had the command of the gallies, which MARCVS ANTONIVS left with him, the same day tooke land at Tarentum, with great Iolfe and danger: so as it seemed that the winds and weather tooke part with POMPEY. Wherewith OCTAVIANVS was so much grieved, as he was in doubt to have given over the warre for that yeere: but altering his determination, he repaired his Navies and Armies, and commanded AGRIPPA with a great flecte to passe into Sicilia, and there to make warre by Sea and Land: and hee with all the rest afterwards did the like.

In this time, or a little before (as it seemeth by SVETONIUS), OCTAVIANVS divorced himselfe from SCRIBONIA, notwithstanding that hee had by her one daughter, called LIVIA, and married LIVIA DRYSELLA, norwithstanding that hee had by her one daughter, called LIVIA, to whom she was married, and by him had a sonne called TIBERIUS, as his father, was driven to leave her, which hee unwillingly did, to please OCTAVIANVS, the being with child of a son. This LIVIA he much loved, and continued with her til his death. But returning to our history of the warre, I say, that AGRIPPA assaulted & tooke certain places upon the coast of Sicilia: which when POMPEY understood, hee departed from Messina, to relieve them; at which time hee had of his owne, and of Pirats which served him, one hundred seventy and five Gallies.

It is a wonderfull thing to consider the great Fleets that were put to sea in those dayes. AGRIPPA being advertised of his coming, put his Gallies, being almost equall in number, in a readinesse to encounter him, & so they joynd battaile: wherein, although at first the victory was doubtful, yet in a short space it plainly appeared, that AGRIPPA had the better: which POMPEY perceiving, fled, before he would be wholly overthrowne, and his gallies and foysls withdrew themselves to some places and Rivers, as Agro at hand. But AGRIPPA, for that his Gallies were greater, could not follow the chafe, nor come so neere the shore as he would: but yet notwithstanding, POMPEY lost thirtie of his Gallies. AGRIPPA the next day went to a citie called Tindaris, which he thought to get by reason of certain secret intelligence he had with those of the Citie: and POMPEY, in the darke of the night, giving secret advice to his whole fleet, tooke his course toward Messina. And OCTAVIAN, to Iolfe on occasion, embarked aboard his ships and gallies a great part of his armie, and passing over into Sicilia, set them on shore, appointing CORNIFICIVS for their Commander, little thinking that POMPEY had bene so neere, of whom he was in great danger, if hee had bene so daively charged by him: so as if POMPEY had then given him battaile, hee had defeated him. But hee losing that opportunity, OCTAVIAN embarked himselfe againe, with intent to determine the quarrell by a battaile at Sea, leaving CORNIFICIVS with his land souldiers fortified on land: and POMPEY, with the same desire, after some accidents which happened, sailed out of Messina with all his whole fleet: and neither partie refusing it, they came to fight; in which conflict (although the histories recite it with some difference) OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR was overcome, and all his great Fleet scattered and lost, and hee driven to flee into Italy in a Brigandine, where hee escaped many dangers; and in the end arrived where his Armie was, whereof MARSALLA was General: & being nothing discouraged with this losse, he presently tooke order for all that was needefull. To Rome he sent in hast his familiar friend MÆCENAS, to foresee that these newes should breed no alteration: and by a Brigandine he presently sent direction to AGRIPPA, who (as is said) was Admiral of his other fleet, that with the greatest speed that might be, hee should goe to succour CORNIFICIVS, who remained in Sicilia with his Armie by land: and to LEPIDVS he sent word, that (all matters set aside) hee should make his present repaire to the Isle of Lipari, which is between Sicilia and Calabria, whither hee should come so soone as hee might possibly.

With these provisions, and the diligence and good order which hee tooke, hee so much prevailed, as within a short time, being holpen with the wars which LEPIDVS and AGRIPPA made (in despite of POMPEY) hee passed over all his forces into Sicilia. And joyning himself with LEPIDVS, he encamped neer to the citie of Messina, where the war began to be most cruell both by sea and land: which truly was admirable, to consider the power and sufficiency of POMPEY, to know how to defend himselfe against so great enemies. Who seeing himselfe oppressed, (notwithstanding that hee had well fortified the land, and wanted no forces for his defence by sea) he sent a challenge to OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, with this message, that to avoid the effusion of blood, and to make an end of the warre; although hee

were

were well provided and furnished with singular good Gallies, and well trayned souldiers; yet that hee would come to a battaile by Sea, so manie against so manie Shippes and Gallies; whereunto were made many answers and delays, but in the end they agreed to doe so. And appointing the number, which were three hundred Ships and Gallies of either side; and the time and place set downe, cyther of these Commanders prepared himselfe as strongly as hee could for the battaile: and OCTAVIANVS, leaving LEPIDVS with his Armie by land, embarked himselfe in his Fleet; and POMPEY doing the like, they joynd battaile: a Battell by which, without doubt was one of the most cruell that ever was, considering the Commanders and power of either part: wherein, after that POMPEY had done all that which to a good and valiant Capaine did appertaine, and after the death of much people of either side, he was overcome by OCTAVIANVS, and all his Fleet was taken, burnt, or sunke, saving xviij Sayles which escaped by flight, and hee in one of them; and so hee entered into the haven at Messina: The which though it were sufficiently fortified, & that he knew, PLINYVS, a Capaine of his (as is aforesaid) came to his rescue: yet, acknowledging that all sufficed not to defend him from such powerfull enemies, in a darke night he embarked himselfe in a Galley, and with the other xvj which escaped, abandoning Sicilia, he fled towards the East, and sayled to MARCVS ANTONIVS, in hope to have found some reliefe with him; but it happened contrary to his expectation: for being arrived, after some great toyle and accidents that happened (which for brevity I omit) hee was slaine at the command of MARCVS ANTONIVS, by the hands of one named TICIUS. And so ended the power of SEXTVS POMPEIUS (which truly was very great) and in him the house and memorie of his father the Great POMPEY.

It is a great example, and a fayre document of the inconstancie of all things in this life, to see and read the changes in the Historie which wee are now to relate. For when it seemeth that matters succede in such sort as quietnesse and peace may ensue, then begin new alterations, and greater troubles, as wee have seene hitherto, and shall see hereafter in the proceffe of this discouerie.

SVETONIUS writes, that at the very instant of this naval Battaille, OCTAVIANVS was in such a sound sleepe, as his friends were faine to waken him, and to rouse him from his bed to give the signal; wherewith ANTONIVS did afterwards reproach him, that hee could not with his eyes see his battaile arranged, but lay like a stulleffe corps on his backe, looking up unto the skie, and that hee never came in sight of his souldiers, untill that M. AGRIPPA had put twelve of his enemies shippes to flight.

Hee escaped many dangers in this warre. For having transported part of his Armie into Sicilia, and sayling backe againe to conduct the rest from the firme Land, hee was at unawares surprized by DEMOCHARIS, and ATOLAPHANES, Lieutenants and Admirals to POMPEY: from whom, with great difficultie hee escaped with one onely Barke. In like sort, travelling by land to Rhegium, neere to Locris, seeing a farre off, certaine of POMPEY'S Gallies neere the shore, and supposing them to bee his owne, hee went downe, and was in danger to have bene taken by them: And even then seeking to escape away by unknowne passages, a Bond-slave of ÆMILIUS PAVLVS, his familiar friend; grieving that his masters Father PAVLVS had in times past bene proscribed by him: he embraced this opportunitee of revenge, and attempted to kill him.

OCTAVIANVS, having obtained so great a victorie (although not without great losse) going to land with his Shippes, and the Armie, hee comanded AGRIPPA presently to joyne with LEPIDVS and goe to Messina, whither PLINYVS POMPEIUS Capaine had retired himselfe (after POMPEY'S flight) with all his troups: who, for that he would not stand upon his defence, yielded himselfe to LEPIDVS, with all his Legions: whereof LEPIDVS grew so proud, that coveting to have all Sicilia for himselfe, hee presumed to contend with OCTAVIAN: And entering into the citie of Messina (notwithstanding that AGRIPPA requested him to stay for OCTAVIANVS) hee placed a Garrison therein to his owne use, and did the like in many other places in that Island. And OCTAVIAN being come, hee sent the next day to speake with him, greatly complaining of his proceedings.

But as in rule and command, equalitie is intolerable, so either of them coveting the Ile of Sicilia particularly for himselfe, they fell at variance, and OCTAVIANVS made his Navie to draw neere the shore: both Armies beganne to stand upon their guard, the one against against the other, and many messages and complaints passed between them: in the end although they met and spake together, yet they could not agree. But as OCTAVIAN was much more beloved and better esteemed by the men of warre for his many vertues and nobilitie, and for the names sake and remembrance of IULIUS CÆSAR, this diffension did much grieve them all, and both the one part and the other laid all the fault on LEPIDVS. Which when OCTAVIAN understood, before that they would fall so farre out as to take armes, he practised secretly with IULIUS CÆSAR, and with gifts and promises drew them to his will: so as having well effected this device, hee one day with a great troope of horsemen rode neere to LEPIDVS: his Campe: and singling himselfe from his companie, hee began to parley with his souldiers, complaining of him, and laying the fault of all that was like to ensue, upon LEPIDVS: which being heard by them, many of them began to come over to his side. LEPIDVS, advertised hereof, commanded the alarme to be given, and to fall out against him: so as they skirmished, where in the beginning, OCTAVIAN was in some danger, but in continuall not long: for the most part of LEPIDVS troupes passed over to OCTAVIAN, whom LEPIDVS could not containe; but, seeing himselfe in danger to be abandoned by his whole armie, for his last refuge, he yielded himselfe into CÆSARS power; and putting off his robe of General, went out of his Tent, and submitted himselfe unto OCTAVIANVS, humbly intreating him to pardon him: whom OCTAVIAN received, as if he had never offended him, very courteously and honourably, but he restored him neither to his estate nor power, but sent him to Rome well accompanied, and entertained, but without Magistracy or office, with the dignity of highest Priest onely, which he had ever held from the death of IULIUS CÆSAR, whose it was: and so this quarrell was ended without battaile or bloodshed, which some feared, would have brought both danger and ruine.

Differed between Lepidus and Octavianus.

OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR remained Lord of Sicilia: and, depriving LEPIDVS of the Triumvirat, hee appropriated to himselfe the province of Africa, and remained General of the three Armies, viz. that which was LEPIDVS armie, POMPEIUS, and his owne, wherein APPIANVS affirmeth, were 45 Legions of footmen, and 25000 horse, well armed, besides many other light horsemen and Numidians: which seemeth not incredible to him that considereth how great a part of the world they commanded which levied the same. Hee affirmeth also, that there were then at sea, and upon the coast 600 Gallies, and a greater number of Ships, Boats, & Brigandines: And although that OCTAVIANVS had these great forces, yet would hee not pursue or send after POMPEY, who (as we have said) fled, which he did (as some did suspect) supposing that MARCVS ANTONIVS would have harboured and succoured him, being glad that occasion might be offered to quarrell with him, for that now there was no other man living that was an eye-fore unto him: or else he did it, as he himselfe said afterwards, for that POMPEY was none of those which conspired CÆSARS death. And purposing now to disperse his forces, and to returne to Rome, he paid his souldiers, giving Coronets, and other honours and armes to those which had performed any notable exploits in the warres: and having given many gifts, and made many fayre promises to his legions, pardoning the Captaines and souldiers which had followed POMPEY, and in the best manner that he could, paying and contenting LEPIDVS his companies, he sent them home to their houses; notwithstanding that there were some fowle and mutinies: but he pacified and brought all in good order. Leaving in Sicilia: and sending into Africa, Pretors & Governors, he tooke his way towards Rome, where he was received with ovation (which was little lesse then a triumph) with incredible joy and honour, and began to be so beloved and esteemed, as in many places they erected Temples and Altars unto him, as to their gods; and hee reformed all things which by reason of the wars and troubles were corrupted and out of order. It would be a long discourse to relate the particulars of all things which he did in Rome and in the provinces, as well concerning the government & justice, as the decency and beautifying thereof.

At this time, MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was in the East; although that in the Parthian warre hee had no prosperous successe: yet nevertheless he was full of great power, very rich, and greatly obeyed in all the provinces of Grecia, Asia, Egypt, and in all the rest of his governments. But he was so much blinded and besotted with the love and companie of CLEOPATRA Queene of Egypt, as he thought of nothing but how to satisfie her humor, being unable to leave her, or to have any regard or remembrance of his wife OCTAVIA, sister to OCTAVIANVS, who in beautie and wisdom was nothing inferior to her, and in vertue and goodnesse did farre excell her.

And

And so the Monarchie of the world was divided betweene the two, the one in the East, and the other in the West: and as the desire and greedines to raigne is endlesse, and the thirst with continuance encreaseth, as though that each of them had not had enough to his share, both of them be thought themselves how they might be able to obtaine the whole. Principally OCTAVIAN seeing that ANTONY cared not for his sister, neither sent for her after that hee had left her in Rome, he therefore continually advised and urged her to goe to her husband, to have (as I conceive) occasion to fall out with him (as PLYTARCH observeth in the life of ANTONY) if she were not well entertained. And she not understanding this device, with an intent to prevent all controversies that might arise betweene her husband and her brother, departed from Rome, bearing with her many jewels and presents, which she had gathered together to present them to MARCVS ANTONIVS, as VELLEIVS PATERCVLVVS reporteth. But he who had fixed his heart upon CLEOPATRA wrote to her upon the way, that shee should stay in Grecia in the citie of Athens, untill he should returne from the journey which he intended against the Parthians, the which he never performed, CLEOPATRA hindring the same. Finally, to be brieve (for otherwise there were much to say) OCTAVIA sent all those things which shee brought with her, to her husband, and this nothing availing, shee returned to Rome sorrowfull, and forsaken. Whereupon OCTAVIAN began openly to complaine of MARCVS ANTONIVS, and to shew himselfe his enemy: and MARCVS ANTONIVS (who had the same desire) entred into league and amity with the King of the Medes in Asia, causing CLEOPATRA (besides the title of Egypt) to be called Queene of Syria, Lybia, and Cyprus; and joyned with her a sonne of hers named CÆSARION, of whom (as we have already said) IULIUS CÆSAR left her with child when he was in Egypt; and to two sonnes which he had by her, the one named PTOLOMY, and the other ALXANDER, he gave titles of kings: to ALXANDER, of Armenia and Parthia, which he meant to conquer; and to PTOLOMY, of Cilicia and Phœnicia: for which and many other causes which were offered, the hatred betweene him and OCTAVIAN was apparent; but the warre was yet deferred, for that OCTAVIAN was hindered by the wars in Illyria & Dalmatia, now called Sclavonia. The people of which countries, seeing the civil warres of the Romans, rebelled, with other nations which conspired with them, and did assault them, although not subjects as they were, to wit, the two Pannonia: the upper, which is now Austria; and the lower, which is Hungary and Noricum, which is now part of Bavaria, with other their borderers and neighbours. Which war OCTAVIAN undertooke of purpose, and followed it in his owne person, the which was very cruell and dangerous: wherein hee was twice wounded, and made marvellous proofe of his person, both for valour and wisdom: wherein there passed great and famous actions, which require a large field to relate. APPIANVS, in his first booke which he calleth Illyricum, writeth thereof at large: and also VELLEIVS PATERCVLVVS, although more briefly LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS abbreviated by him and some others. The end thereof was, that OCTAVIAN not onely subdued and tamed Illyricum, and sundrie Nations contained under that name, but also the Pannonia's, and the rest which had conspired with those of Illyricum, partly by himselfe in person, and partly by his Captaines.

These victories being obtained, OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR came victorious to Rome: and notwithstanding that the triumph was granted unto him, yet he would not triumph as then; so great was the desire hee had to make war against MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was no better affected unto him: but hee levied souldiers, procured friends and armes against him, and promised his friend CLEOPATRA, to bring her triumphing into Rome. LVCIVS FLORVS, writeth, that she requested of him the rule and Emperre of Rome, and he promised it her: as though the Romans had bene more easie to subdue then the Parthians. And matters standing on these termes, MARCVS ANTONIVS sent to his Wife OCTAVIA, sister to OCTAVIANVS, a divorcement and renunciation of his marriage; in such manner as then was accustomed, commanding her to goe out of his house, wherein she dwelt in Rome: All which, with many other indignities OCTAVIAN imparted to the Senate, complaining against him; and in his orations and speeches to the people, accusing him; that the second five years of his Triumvirat & league being expired, without coming to Rome, or respecting the authority of the Senate, hee exercised the same, and held the possession of Grecia and the provinces of the East; and so used many speeches against MARCVS ANTONIVS to incense the people against him.

MARCVS ANTONIVS on the other side, complained by messengers and letters, alleging that OCTAVIAN had often broken the peace, and had cast SEXTVS POMPEIVS out of Sicilia, retayning

D 4

retayning

Lepidus deprived of his province of Africa

An exceeding great assembly of men of war.

Cæsarion the sonne of Iulius Cæsar.

The wars which Octavianus made in Illyria.

Octavianus refused to triumph after his victory.

Octavianus complains of Antonius.

Antonius capitated by Cleopatra.

Antonie rom.
plaines of Octavius.

The causes of the warre between Octavianus and Marcus An-tonius, and the beginning thereof.

Samos an Ile in the Ionian Sea over against Baphesus.
The people and preparation of Marcus Anto-
nius.

retaining those provinces and others which he held; and that therein he had no respect of him, neither had he given him any part thereof; and that hee detained the galleys which hee lent him for that Warre: and besides this, that he had praesided meane to deprive LEPIDVS, and so held all the provinces of Africa, and all the Legions which were his, without imparting any thing thereof vnto him; and that he had given the lands of all Italy to his Souldiers, not contributing any part thereof vnto his. And in this manner the one accused the other, and either of them made shew, that he was vrged and enforced to vnder take this warre. But the truth is, that both desired to be Lords of the whole: and in my opinion, vainglorie, ambition, couetousnesse, and enuie, moued them thereto, each of them putting his determination in effect, & calling diuers Nations to their aydes; so as the vvhole vvorlde in a manner, either of the one side or other, was in armes: those of the West in the behalfe of OCTAVIAN, and those of the East in fauour of MARCVS ANTONIVS; at the least, the best and most choise men of all, although not so many as they might haue leuiued: For the Romanes neuer vied to make warres with such huge multitudes and excessive armies as they should not be well able to maintaine; and eple, as the Persians and other barbarous nations did.

ANTONY was first in field, and came with great troups to the famous citie of Ephesus, which was in Ionia a province in Asia the lesse, whither he had sent for his ships and Nauiue, to passe into Europe, and had there in readinesse 800. galleys and ships of burthen; 200 whereof CLEOPATRA gaue to him with all the munition and victuals necessarie for the fleet, and her selfe he caried with him, contrarie to the opinion of all those which were of his counsell: And herewith sayled to the Ile of Samos, whither he had appointed to come by a prefixed day, all the Kings, Terrarchs and people of those citie which serued him in this warre, and from thence he went to Athens. PLYTARCH sets downe the Kings which came with him, and those which sent forces to his aide, part whereof were friends and allies to the Empire, and others vassals and subiects, to which were giuen the title and gouernment of prouinces: of which he names TARCONDEVS of the vpper Cilicia, and ARCHELAYS of Cappadocia, PHILADELPHVS of Paphlagonia, and MITHRIDATES of Comagena, with others; besides those which lent their forces, as HERODS king of Iudea, AMYNAS of Lycania, and the king of Arabia, the king of the Medes, and PALEMON king of Ponrus, with some others: wherein (it was said) he brought 100000 good and well trained footmen, and 22000 horse: and according to the same PLYTARCH, besides this armie by land, his Nauiue by Sea consisted of six hundred galleys, besides the ships of burthen which carried the munition and victuals.

Although that in the number of Ships and Gallies Authors doe varie, yet it should not diminish the credit of the History; since that in actions which passe now adies the vvhich wee see vvvith our eyes, we can hardly know the certaine number of Ships and Armies. MARCVS ANTONIVS came with such power, as Historiographers affirme, that if he had presently taken his passage for Italy, he had put OCTAVIAN to his shifis, and in great hazard: for he had not then sufficient forces leuiued to haue fought with him, neither had he necessary prouision for the vyarres. And so MARCVS ANTONIVS delaying the time, he was taxed with want of discretion, knowledge and foresight of the good fortune which was offered him. For he spent for much time in Athens, that OCTAVIAN had leasure to prouide all things wanting, from Italy, France, Spaine, and other prouinces vnder his subiection: and leuiued 80000. choise and vvell trained Souldiers, and about 20000. horse, seeing that ANTONIVS stayed so long, he sent him word, that for as much as he had Ships & prouision fit, he should draw neere to Italy, where he staid in field to giue him bataille, promising to giue him free Ports and Hauens, where he might safely take landing without any interruption, to the end that he might the more commodiously order and prouide all things thereto necessarie. Whereto ANTONIVS answered, that it would be more honourable, if he would determine this quarrell in person against him bodie to bodie, vvhich he vvould willingly accept: notwithstanding that he vvvas now old and crazed, and the other young and lusty: and if he liked not herof, he vvould lay for him vvith his Army in the fields of Pharsalia, in the same place where his father IVLIVS CÆSAR fought vvith GNERVS POMPEIUS.

These Embassies and messages passing betweene them, vvithout effect; ANTONIVS drew his Army by land, and his Nauiue by Sea, towards the coast of Italy, and OCTAVIAN; drawing his Ships to Brundisium, embarked his legions, and crossing the Sea came to a place called Tormia, in the prouince of Epire, vvvhich is now called Romania. After certaine notable exploits vvvhich passed, the two Armies drew neere, and the like did the Nauiues by Sea. OCTAVIANVS Nauiue vic (as PLYTARCH affirmeth) consisted of 250. galleys, but better appointed and swifter, then MARCVS ANTONIVS his galleys were, which were more in number, although (as I haue said) Authors, in this matter, agree not: but the most common opinion is, as I haue said. But howeuer it were, MARCVS ANTONIVS, perswaded by CLEOPATRA (who euen in this also was the cause of his ruine) vvould needs trie his fortune in a bataille at Sea, notwithstanding that in his armie by land hee had the aduantage. CLEOPATRA did this (as some write, and as it after appeared) thereby to haue the better meane to flie if the bataille should be lost. ANTONIVS chusing 22000. men out of his armie, put them aboard his fleet, vvvhich was neere at hand: and OCTAVIAN, who refused not to fight at sea, made his prouision also for the bataille; and shipping himselfe aboard the galleys, committed the charge of his armie by land, to TAVRVS: and ANTONIVS doing the like left his forces vvith CANIDIUS; in fight of both vvvhich, these two most powerfull Captaines vvith the best troupes and Nauiues of the vvorld, rooke the Seas, where they fought for no lesse then the Empire and Monarchie of the vvorld: The vvvhich was deferred for three daies space in despite of both parties, the Seas swelling so high as they could not gouernetheir vessels. The fourth day they came to encounter at a Cape called Actium, vvvhich is in Epire, not far from whence were their armies by land. The bataille was one of the most cruell that hath bene vvritten of: for it lasted thre hours before that OCTAVIAN, vvho was the victor, did vvholly obtaine the vvictorie, although that ANTONIVS staid not so long in the fight: for as CLEOPATRA knew better how to mollifie and soften mens hearts, then to encourage them; in the hottest and greatest furie of the bataille, vvith a feminine hart vvnable to endure the sight of so furious a spectacle, she fled away in her galley, vvvhich 70. of her other galleys followed; vvvhich is not to be vvounded at, but how she durst stay so long. But the vvunfortunate MARCVS ANTONIVS, vvho all his lifetime had been a valiant and vvorthie Captaine, that day metamorphosed into CLEOPATRA, seeing her galley flie, vvhereon hee had fixed his heart & eyes, vvvent out of his (for that it seemed too heavy) and embarking himselfe in another more swift (desiring rather to flie vvith CLEOPATRA) then to conquer vvithout her) followed her, vvithout respect of his Armies by land or sea: and, ouertaking her, he vvvent aboard the same galley vvherein she was, vvherein hee failed three daies vvithout seeing or speaking to her, for shame (as it is most likely) for the great vvweaknes which hee had shewed. And after some vvandering, hee arrived in the Port at Alexandria in Egypt, vvhere hee afterwards ended his life, as vvve will declare.

His Armie vvvhich hee left fighting, although vvithout a captaine, made resistance as I haue said, vvwhereof there were flaine about six thousand men: but in the end it vvvas vvholly ouerthrowne, more vvthrough vvwant of a captaine, then vvthrough any force of the enemie: although some vvwrite, that the lightnes and swiftnes of OCTAVIANVS galleys vvvas a great help vvnto him, and so he remained conqueror, and graunted life and pardon to the conquered, and had in his power three hundred of their galleys. In the armie by land there vvanted neither constancie, nor faith to their generall ANTONIVS, although abandoned by him; vvwho continued seven daies in their campe readie to giue bataille, vvwithout accepting any composition or offer, made vvnto them by OCTAVIAN (vvvhich vvvas a shew that they vvould yet haue stayed longer) if CANIDIUS, vvvhom ANTONIVS left in his place, had not abused his charge, as he vvwho had giuen him that charge had done. For it happened after seven daies that he fled secretly in the night from the campe to seeke ANTONIVS, and abandoned the armie: vvvhich being forsaken, vvyeelded to the enemie; and OCTAVIAN vvved his vvictorie vvith great clemencie: vvvhich being obtained, he either thought it not good, or could not at that time pursue ANTONIVS, but tooke his vvway vvowards the citie of Athens, vvwhere taking order for all matters in Graecia; by reason of some mutinies of his souldiers in Italy (as SVETONIUS vvrites) he returned thither, vvwhere he stayed vv somewhat longer then he vvould haue done, as vvell by reason of the former lets, as the cuill vvweather to faile in, vvvhich followed.

After all this, OCTAVIANVS hauiug for all things necessarie in a readinesse, hee failed vvith great forces into Egypt, vvwith a resolution to make an end vvith MARCVS ANTONIVS (as vvwe haue indeede hee did) and arrived neere to the citie of Alexandria: vvwhere ANTONIVS (recoouering courage, and Queene CLEOPATRA making great preparation for the warres, in the time of OCTAVIANVS his stay) had leuiued great forces, both of foote and horse for their defence. They had also a great nauiue by sea, as vvell of CLEOPATRA'S, as of those vvvhich came from other places: and MARCVS ANTONIVS vvith his old courage, vvvhich now too late and to no purpose hee recovered, tooke the field and entertaining a skirmish vvith CÆSAR'S horfmen, vvvhich

The bataille at Sea betwene Octavius and Marcus Antonius.

The flight of Marcus Antonius.

Octavius
his vvictorie.

Octavius vvith
his vvictorie Anto-
nius.

Antonie's vvictorie an armie

Egyptus.

which were then landed and strongly entrenched, he vsed such skill, and charged them with such dexterity, as he made them flie to their strength: and being returned to the citie, he againe sent to challenge OCTAVIANVS to fight with him body to body. Whereto CÆSAR answered, that MARCVS ANTONIVS had other waies and meanes enough in a readines to die, without dying by his hands.

ANTONIE receiving this answer, determined to die fighting, although it happened otherwise. The next day in the morning he againe sallied forth with an intent to fight; and standing vpon a high ground, looking towards the sea, hee sawe that his nauie and gallies moued, and made towards OCTAVIAN his fleet, which he thought they had done, with a resolution to fight: and staying a little to see the sequell, within a while, he saw them ioine together in company, by means of a secret practice past betwene them. Which when hee saw, and fearing the like in those which he brought with him to field, he returned to the citie, suspecting and affirming that CLEOPATRA had betrayed him, although that in truth she was blameless therein: and the being aduertised of what ANTONIE had said, stoode in feare of him; and withdrew his selfe into a strong temple or sepulcher: and commanding the doores thereof to be shut and fortified, he sent some faintly to tell him that she had slain her selfe with her owne hands. Which MARCVS ANTONIVS beleued as firmly as though he had seene it, and refusing to liue any longer, without stay to die fighting, after he had vttered certaine speeches, he stabbed his point into his owne brest, and so (deadly wounded) he fell downe vpon a bed in a swoone. And within a while coming againe to himselfe, being aduertised that CLEOPATRA was yet liuing, he made himselfe to be carried thither where she was: who received him with so many teares and such pittifull complaints, as he being so neere death, began to comfort her, saying, that the ought not lament for him, neither to hold him for vnfortunate, sith hee accounted not himselfe so, for he had been a great captaine and very powerfull, and in the end died overcome by the Romans. He counselled her to yeeld to the mercie of OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, and speaking these words (his strength failing within a little while after) he dyed: and so ended the power and life of MARCVS ANTONIVS. Who in truth for matters of war was very famous: and if his excellent wit and courageous mind had not been captiuated with the loue of CLEOPATRA, after IULIVS CÆSAR he was in election to haue obtained the monarchie of the world: but it appeared plainly that the stars and the diuine powers were inclined to fauour OCTAVIVS.

OCTAVIANVS hauing intelligence hereof, and of the bad order and guard of the city, marched thither with his forces and entred the same, sending to comfort CLEOPATRA, and to make great offers vnto her, to the end she should not kill her selfe; and going to see her in person, he did the like: but all his care little auailed. For she being aduertised, that he would send her to Rome, and would carrie her and her sonnes in his triumph, chose rather to dye, then that he should triumph over her: and some say, that she tooke poison which shee had prouided for that purpose, wherewith she killed her selfe. Others (and this is the most common) that she put an Aspicque to her arme (which is a certaine kinde of Serpent or venomous Adder) to the end that it should sting her, which was brought to her in a basket of flowers, so as shee was found dead without any signe of blow or wound, but as if she had bin asleep. Whereto OCTAVIAN was much grieued (not without great admiration at the resolution and courage of that woman) and he commanded her to be buried in the same Sepulchre wherein she had entombed her selfe, together with MARCVS ANTONIVS, with whom she had liued and raigned 14. yeares, she being 39. yeares old when she dyed, and MARCVS ANTONIVS 56, or (after some) 53. He commaunded the tombe which they had begun, to be finished.

OCTAVIANVS easily pardoned all those which had serued or sent succours to MARCVS ANTONIVS, and also his children, which were seauen, by three women, FVLVIA, OCTAVIA sister to OCTAVIANVS, and CLEOPATRA; sauing the eldest, which he commanded to be slain, and the like he did by CÆSARION CLEOPATRAS sonne by IULIVS CÆSAR, of whom we haue already made mention: the eldest (they say) hee slue vpon particular displeasure which he conceived against him; and CÆSARION, by the counsell of ARRIVS a Philosopher, who told him that it would not do well to haue many CÆSARS; an vsual thing among Princes to secure their estates.

This busines touching MARCVS ANTONIVS being ended, and the kingdome of Egypt made a tributarie province, that it might bee fit to yeeld corne and victuals for the Citie of Rome; he viewed the tombe with the bodie of ALEXANDER the great, taken newly out of the Antonie shall lengthen OCTAVIAN and his answer.

Antonie kills
himselfe.

The death of Cleopatra.

The Clemencie of OCTAVIAN to Antonies children.

the vault or secret Chappell where it had bene layd; hee set a coronet of gold vpon it, and strewing flowers thereon worshipped it; and being demanded if he would looke vpon the PROTOPTES, he answered that his desire was to see a King, and not the dead.

Afterwards passing through Syria and Asia the lesse, leaving all quiet and in peace, he passed into Græcia, and there doing the like, he came into Italy: where hauing ended all ciuill warres; and the whole Empire being subiect to himselfe alone; he entred into Rome in triumph, with the greatest feasts and solemnities of the Senat and the people of all Italy; that could be deuised or imagined. It was granted unto him to triumph three times; to wit, for the victorie in Illyricum, and for the victorie in his battaile by Sea, and the overthrow of MARCVS ANTONIVS, the conquest of the Kingdome of Egypt, and QUEENE CLEOPATRA, whose statue was placed in his triumph, with the Aspicques set to the veins of her armes.

And so OCTAVIANVS finished the building, and erected the Monarchie which his Vncle IULIVS CÆSAR had begun and founded: which (as it seemeth by PAVLVVS OROSIVS his computation) was sixteene yeeres after the death of IULIVS CÆSAR. And although that hee obtained it by meanes hardly iustificable, yet truly, he afterwards governed it most iustly and wisely, and was one of the best Princes that ever was in the world; gentle, mercifull, liberal, iust, valiant, indued with many vertues and excellencies, most happie and fortunate in all his affairs, and beloved above measure of all men.

As there was no man to contend with OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, and he so beloved of all men (as is aforesaid) the people & Senate of Rome gave him a new name, which before that time was never heard of, AVGVSTVS; & so he was afterwards called CÆSAR AVGVSTVS; a name which they held for holy, venerable, of great majestie, and which appertained to the Gods and their temples; as we finde it used by CICERO, VIRGIL, OVID, and other authors; although that some derive it from the Verbe augere, in Latine, to increase, because that OCTAVIANVS enlarged and increased the Empire: and some others give it other derivations; but whether- soever be the most certaine, it was given him for the most honourable name of al others: they also called him father of his Countrey, & gave him all the other titles & names they could devise.

CÆSAR AVGVSTVS (for this name henceforth we sometimes give him) seeing himselfe now in such quiet, & without war with any person or nation in the world; commanded the temple of IANVS to be shut, which they religiously observed that during the warres it should stand open; and never had benee shut but twice from the foundation of Rome, according to TITVS LIVIVS, LVCIVS FLOVVS, and PLVTARCH, and other Authors: once in the time of NUMA PROMPTILIVS, second King thereof; and the other after the end of the second Punick warres, which they waged with Carthage, whenas TITVS MANLIVS was Consul. I know that some Authors set this shutting up of IANVS temple by OCTAVIAN to be a great while after, at the time of the birth of Christ our Saviour. But in this place I follow the authority of PAVLVVS OROSIVS, a Christian Author, who used great diligence and truth, and is of 1200 yeeres antiquitie; who reckoneth, that CÆSAR AVGVSTVS shut this temple three times; whereof this was the first; and I hold his opinion for certaine: for hee is assisted by the authority of TITVS LIVIVS, who in his first booke affirmeth, that AVGVSTVS did shut this temple after the warres with ANTONY; and LVCIVS FLOVVS, and other Authors set downe; that this temple was shut after that. And hereby it appeareth, that OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR did shut the temple of IANVS more then once, and every one sheweth his time when; and PAVLVVS OROSIVS all, which was thrise, setting downe the time to every one of them, as he noteth; which is also drawne out of SVRTONIVS TRANQVILLVS, following the letter, as PHILIPPVS BEROALDVVS followeth. I have a desire to set this downe here (although it little importeth) to the end that the varietie and difference which the Reader shall finde among Authors shall not offend him; and that hee may know that I have an approved Author whom I follow, though I name him not, if he shall finde ought written by me contrary to that which he hath read. OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, living in this peace and tranquillitie, omitted no part of his care for the government of the Romane Common-wealth, and Provinces thereof; sending thither Pretors, Proconsuls, and other Governours, which were excellent men, to rule and governe; and himselfe gave direction, and was very diligent in all things touching iustice, customes, religion, and publicke buildings: so as in all things his raigne was most happie, peaceable, and quiet; and so it continued during his life.

VLLIVS PATRVCIVS, speaking like a Gentle, doth so extoll his raigne, that he saith, that his men could not desire or aske any thing of the gods, neither thinke nor imagine ought; neither could

OCTAVIANVS excellent Prince

Ther given OCTAVIANVS

How many times the temple of IANVS was shut.

State the saying of this Author.

Patere commendation of OCTAVIANVS

could the gods give that to men which OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR AVGVSTVS after his victories and retaine to Rome, did bring and give to the Romane people, and the whole Empire. Notwithstanding that this was common to them all (as great minds naturally affect libertie) yet in that so prosperous a time, some people and nations were so presumptuous as to shake off the Romane yoke, and to molest and disquiet the Empire, as the Spaniards, the nations of Illyricum and the Pannonians. In Spain the Cantabrians, which are the Alaves and Biskains, the Asturians, and part of Gallia were not only unwilling to obey, but passing their limits, began to make warre against the subjects of the Empire. OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR knowing this, holding it to be a doubtfull warre, and of importance, commanded (as PAVLVS OROSIVS writes) the temple of Idus to be opened, and determined to goe thither in person, and to send other Captaines to follow the other warres. The time of these warres, which were first or last, the Authors doe handle very confusedly, so as I cannot bring it to light: whereof it might bee that divers of these things did concur at one time. But OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS tooke his journey into Spain, and began the warre with three armies against the people before named, which rebelled; which warre was very doubtfull and desperate, and lasted five yeeres. During this time passed many conflicts: and although that AVGVSTVS did suppress the Cantabrians and Asturians, and drave them to the rocks and mountains; yet they did defend themselves, as it behooved him before hee could subdue them, to raise a great Navy on the coast of France, to invade the sea coast of Cantabria, Asturia, and Gallia: at which time he drave the people of those countries to such extremities by land, as he compelled them to yeelde and submit themselves to his obedience. His great favorite AGRIPPA, serving him well and faithfully in this warre (as in all the rest) whom hee married to his daughter IVLIA, who then was the widow of his nephew MARCELLVS, sonne to his sister OCTAVIA, with whom she had bene married. And so AVGVSTVS finished the full subjection of all Spain, above two hundred yeeres after that the Romans began to make their first warre there: so as no province cost the Romans more blood, more toyle, and more time, then Spain. And this long and doubtfull conquest being finished, PAVLVS OROSIVS saith, that OCTAVIAN esteemed the same so much, as having established peace in Spain, in signe thereof, he againe commanded the doores of IANVS Temple to be shut, and came to Rome in great triumph. But this Temple continued not long shut, for some Nations of the Germanes rebelled (although at divers times) so as it was againe opened to make warre against them which were the Inhabitants of Noricum, which is now Bavaria, and the Pannonies, which are Austrich and Hungary, as is aforesaid, and the two Misias, which are Bulgaria and Servia, and also Illyricum, which is Slavonia, although at another time named by him; and the Province of Dacia, which now is Transylvania & Wallachia, and some others also. Against all these Nations this most fortunate Emperor CÆSAR AVGVSTVS sent his Captaines and armies: among which were his sonnes in law, the sonnes of his wife LIVIA, TIBERIVS NERO, who succeeded him in the Emperre, and his brother DRVSVS NERO, of whom LIVIA was with childe when OCTAVIAN married her: these two brothers (although the warre lasted somewhat long) vanquished those Nations, and obtained great victories in Germanie, and the confines thereof, especially TIBERIVS (as SVETONIUS writeth in his life, and PAVLVS OROSIVS in his histories) who in three yeeres space subdued the Pannonies, Illyricum, and Dalmatia: for which victories he afterwards entred into Rome in ovation triumph, with great honour and pompe. And another Captaine, whose name was MARCVS CRASSVS (as LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS report) overcame and put the Misians to flight in their owne Countrey, a nation which had never seene the Romans; which (as LVCIVS FLORVS recordeth) being readied to give battaile, in manner of justification, said to the Roman Army: Tell us who you are that seeke to molest us? Whereunto they were answered: Wee are Romans, the Lords of Nations. Whereupon they replied: It shall be so if wee bee overcome. And so they were afterwards, both they, and those also which conspired with them. But OCTAVIAN had not these victories without some crosses: for in this warre died his sonne in law DRVSVS, who was highly extolled and esteemed for his great acts and victories, for whom hee and the Emperesse LIVIA his mother were very forlorn. But that was farre greater without comparison, which hee conceived for the mishap which befell to QVINTILIVS VARRO, who was Captaine of three legions in Germanie, and being carelesse, was surprisid by the Almanes, and himselfe and all his legions, and the Auxiliaries flaine, and two Standards with the Imperiall Eagles taken: wherewith hee was wonderfully grieved, as they write, that hee cryed out very unadvisedly, and knocked his head against Augustus goes into Spain to make war.

Warre in Ger-manie by Mar-civs.

Augustus for-row for the losse
of his Legions.

the wallies, saying: QVINTILIVS VARRO, give mee my legions againe. For certaine months together hee suffered the haire of his head and beard to grow carelesly: And the very day of this unfortunate accident hee did every yeare observe mournfully, with sorrow and lamentation.

Of his sonne in law DRVSVS, there remained two sonnes; called GERMANICVS and CLAVDIVS, which he had by ANTONIA, OCTAVIANVS NECE, & daughter of his sister OCTAVIA and of MARCVS ANTONIVS: of which, CLAVDIVS was Emperour: and this GERMANICVS which married with AGRIPPINA, the daughter of IVLIA which was OCTAVIANVS daughter, was father to CAIVS CALIGVLA, who afterwards was also Emperour. But these losses confirmed the victories which his sonne in law TIBERIVS obtained: Wherefore OCTAVIAN married him to his daughter IVLIA; who was a widow by the death of AGRIPPA, causing him to put away AGRIPPINA the daughter of the same AGRIPPA, by his first marriage, by whom he had one sonne named DRVSVS: so as after many notable victories, and subduing sometime one nation, and sometime another, which were compelled to sue for peace, OCTAVIAN againe commaunded the Temple of IANVS to be shut, and from thenceforth all things succeeded vnto him most prosperously.

He was careful to have martiall discipline observed: hee dismissed all the tenth legion with ignominie upon a mutinie and ynwillingnes to obey. Whole bands and Cohors, if they gaue ground and recoyled before the enemy, hee decimated, and to the rest hee allowed barley in steed of wheat to feed on. A Romane Knight, having cutt off the thombes of two young men his Sonnes to auoide the militarie oth and service of warre, hee set him and all his goods to open sale: but seeing the Publicans bidde freely for him, hee deliuered him to his owne freed man; that being confined and sent awaie vnto his liuing in the Countrie, hee might suffer him to liue free.

The subjects of the Empire were very obedient vnto him, and all others sett him ambassades seeking his fauour and friendship, offering him their seruice: the Indians (a people of the remotest part of the East) and also the Scythians which inhabit in the North, and the Parthians (a people most fierce and vntamed) sent their Ambassadors to him, giuing securitie to keepe the peace, and deliuered the Standards and Eagles taken in battaile, when MARCVS CRASSVS was flaine. There came also Kings, friends and subjects to the Empire, to Rome, to doe him honour, as his familiar friends, laying aside their Ensignes and royall Robes; and many of them built cities to his name, for his honour, calling them Cæsarens in remembrance of him: so did HERODE in Palestina, IVBA in Mauritania, and others.

The world continued in this quietnes and general peace, fortie and two yeeres being fullie expired since that OCTAVIAN, after the death of IVLVIVS CÆSAR, came to Rome, from which time is commonly accounted his Empire. In this general peace was borne IESVS CHRIST our Lord and Sauour in Bethlem, of the holie womb of the blessed Ladie the Virginit MARY (HERODE being King of Ierusalem, placed there by the Romans, hee who slew the innocent children) comming to the world in humane forme and nature, to saue and redeeme mankind with his blessed death and passion: whose most holie life, mysteries and infinite miracles ought not to be mixed with prophane Histories, and therefore I will not intermeddle to treat thereof. But returning to my purpose, I say, that OCTAVIAN enioying so great prosperitie and good fortune, was not altered in his naturall condition, as in other Princes it hath happened, but rather became more milde, iust, and affable, more courteous, more liberrall and more temperate. Hee established wonderfull good orders and lawes, for the reformation of abuses and euill customs: hee erected in Rome and without it, great and sumptuous edifices, and bestowed great gifts and fauours vpon all sorts of people: hee delighted the people with feasts and playes in diuers manners, going himselfe in person, to honour them, and sent Colonies and inhabitants to fundie parts and provinces: hee made an excellent good order for the government and gouernours of the whole Empire. The like hee did for the warre and martiall discipline; hee shewed himselfe louing and sociable to his familiars and friends, and honoured and loued them much. Some conspiracies which were discovered against him, hee punished without rigour, giuing more pardon then punishment and correction. Of murmurings and defamatorie libels hee neuer sought nor desired to know the authors, but with great grauitie answered, giuing satisfaction, and purging himselfe of those things which were imputed vnto him. He was much giuen and affected to letters and learning, and was very learned and eloquent, and compiled booke and notable workes: Hee did much honour and reward the wise and learned men of

Augustus for-
row for the losse
of his Legions.

The greatness
of the Romane
Emperors.

The vertues and qualities of O. Cæsars.

his time, wherein were many very learned in all Arts. But for all these vertues and professions, and other which for brevities I write not, yet he escaped not to be noted of some vices, growing through humane weaknes and great liberty, especially to be much given to women, although that in eating, drinking, in his apparell and ornaments, he was very modest and temperate: he gave himselfe also excessively to play at dice, and other games then accustomed. But SVEYONIVS sayth, that the most part thereof was upon ceremonious and festiuall dayes; which ought well to be noted for a shame and example to our time, wherein Christianity is professed. For that is accounted by many for brauery and valour, which to OCTAVIAN being an Heathen and vnbeleeuing Prince, was imputed for vice. Wherefore, to conclude and make an end of his History, as is reason, I say, that although that in many things hee was happy and fortunate, yet besides all his troubles and dangers, he was ynhappy and vnfortunate in his children and succession: for by foure wiues, with which he was married, onely by SCRIBONIA, which was his third wife, he had one daughter named IVLIA; and yet this one scarcely proued honest of her body: so as for want of sonnes to succeed him, he first adopted his Nephew MARCELLVS; his sister OCTAVIAS son aforesaid, to whom he first married his daughter IVLIA; and MARCELLVS dying without issue, he married her to his favourite AGRIPPA, who also left her a widow, as is above sayd: but he left by her, three sonnes and two daughters, the daughters prouing no honestier then their mother, and two of his sonnes dyed in OCTAVIANs time, hauing bin first by him adopted. Wherefore, desiring to ouercome the crosses which he had herein, he adopted the third, who was called AGRIPPA as his father was, the which adoption he afterward reuoked for some displeasure conceiued against him: and taking this care for his succession, he adopted and made his sonne in law TIBERIVS NERO, his sonne, whom, as is aforesaid, he married to his daughter IVLIA, who, as I said, was AGRIPPA his widow. But hee commaunded TIBERIVS when he adopted him, that he (notwithstanding that he had a son called DRVSVS) should adopt his Nephew GERMANICVS, sonne to his brother DRVSVS, who died in Germany, for that he had married his neece AGRIPPINA the daughter of IVLIA: and by this meanes came TIBERIVS to be OCTAVIANVS successor, more through the diligence of his mother, then any good liking that his father in law had to him, who rather was, and seemed to be very forrie, that he should succede him.

All things standing in this state, OCTAVIAN being now seauentie and fixe yeeres old and odde dayes, hauing reigned about fiftie and fixe yecares, and being the best beloued and most obeyed Prince, that euer was in the world, death ouertooke him: the cause thereof was a flux which held him for certaine dayes, whereof in the end he died in the citie of Nola (whither he came sick from Naples) a quiet and peacefull death, in the fifteenth yeere after the birth of Christ our Redemcer.

TACITVS writes, that it was suspected his death was hastned by the lewd practises of his wife, for that it had been bruited abroad, that AVGVSTVS accompanied only with FABIVS MAXIMVS had been in the Iland of PLANATIA to visit his Nephew AGRIPPA, both weeping when they met, where vpon there was some hope that the young man should be recalled to his Grandfathers house. This secret FABIVS disclosed to his wife, by whose means it came to LIVIA and to TIBERIVS: which made them to practise all the means they could to prevent this reconciliation.

His death was generally lamented, and there was a vniuersall sorrow and heauines over the whole Empire for him: for he did wisely and vprightly gouerne that, which by force and cunning he had gotten. OCTAVIAN was of a meane stature, and of a very good shape and proportion of his body, exceeding faire of face mixed with modellie and grauitie, his eyes were exceeding cleere and bright, he was very aduised, and loued to speake quicke and briefe. His last will and testament was written a yeare and foure months before he died, and left in the custodie of the Vestall Virgins. It was then produced, & in open Senate read: the contents whereof you maie read in SVEYONIVS.

THE

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR

TIBERIVS

THE ARGUMENT

After the good Augustus, succeeded his sonne in law wicked Tiberius Nero, who was most subtil, and knew how to dissemble and fause to loose those wch whom he hated, and to keate those which he loved. He made shew to be vnwilling to accept of the Empire, & to differre with his friend and his enemy: and whereas before this dignitie, he was very orderly and discrete, he became after wards for riotous and such a drunkard, that he was called in some Biberius. In his time died Iesus Christ and Iohn Baptist in Ierusalem: he caused Germanicus a great Commander to be slain, although he made them to Agrippa to be very iorie for it. He subdued many provinces which rebelled against the Romane Empire, and was no lesse cruell then libidinous: and of these three vices (to wit) cruellie, incontinencie, and gluttonie, it is hard to say, which was least. He ruled the Empire, foure and twentie yeares, and was no great enemy to Christians: he propounded in the Senate whether Christ should be accepted for a God or no, whereto the Senate consented not. Finally, he died through the treason of Caligula, whom he had nominated his successor, being fouentie and eight yeares old: which he did, as was thought, to the end that Caligula his vices should make his seme lesse, who was so wicked and cruell, as he wished that the world might end at his death.

After the good and valiant Emperor OCTAVIAN, succeeded his sonne in law, and adopted son, the wicked and cruell TIBERIVS NERO, vnworthy of his succession and of the Empire: for he was one of the most cruell and wicked men that euer was: yet in OCTAVIAN his time, both in Germanie and in other parts he did many great and notable feats in armes. In the beginning of his Empire he made shew of a good prince, and did many good deedes, but afterwards (as this was but counterfeite) he discovered his malice, and gouerned cruellly, couetously, and dishonestly. This TIBERIVS (as I haue said) was the sonne of TIBERIVS NERO and LIVIA, whom OCTAVIAN afterwards tooke to wife, of both sides descended of the auncient family of the CLAUDII: whose grandfather by his fathers side was TIBERIVS CLAVDIVS NERO; and by his mothers side he descended from APPIVS CLAVDIVS PYLCHER, and by adoption he likewise descended from the LIVII, a worthie family (although but Plebeian) for Consulships, censures, and triumphs. He was of a tall and strong body, and had a large brest and broad shoulders, whereto all parts of his body were answerable: he had a faire face, and great eyes, and so cleere, as they affirme a strange thing of him, which is, that awaking in the night, for a good space he cleerely saw the place wherein he lay, and all things therein as well as if he had had a light. He was a man of great strength, and had the vse of both his hands alike; whereas commonly euery man vseth the right hand with greater dexteritie then the left, and he had so great strength in his fingers, that with a fillip he would (as often as he list) breake a pages or a young mans head, as SVEYONIVS reporteth. He was very learned both in Greeke and Latin, delighted chiefly in poeie, and made many verses in both tongues, which truly was ill employed in him, seeing he so little profited thereby. When OCTAVIVS AVGVSTVS fell sicke, TIBERIVS was gone towards the province of Illyricum or Slaunonia: and his mother LIVIA seeing that his sickness encreased, sent in great haste for him, and he happily arrived at the citie of Nola, CÆSAR AVGVSTVS being euen nere his end, but yet in such case as he could speake, and (as SVEYONIVS reporteth) he conferred with him a great while in secret: Although CORNELIVS TACITVS

The Image and corporate continuation of T.
Nero.

Tiberius by learning.

The death of Othavianus Cæsar Augustus.

Othavian his proporcion of body.

faith, that it is not certainly knowne whether he found him aliue at his coming or no, for his mother the Emperesse had set so many gards as the death of OCTAVIAN was not knowne, untill that all had consented that TIBERIVS should rule, and succcede him. At that time was Posthumus AGRIPPA Nephew to OCTAVIAN, and sonne of his daughter IVLIA by AGRIPPA her second husband, slaine by the hand of a Tribune of soldiers who had him in keeping (as it was thought) by the commandement of his father in law TIBERIVS, and by the counsell of his mother IVLIA, to the end that hee should bee assured of the succession.

But yet he gaue it out that it was done by AVGVSTVS commandement, who (as he said) had giuen charge to the Tribune or Centurion which had him in gards, to make him awaie as soone as he should haue notice of his death: but it is not credible, that to assure the state to his wiues sonne, he would seeke the bloud of his owne Nephew. The Centurion bringing word that he had fulfilled his commandement, he answered presently that he had commanded him no such thing, and that he should answer it before the Senat. CRISPVS SALVSTIVS who was acquainted with Tiberius greatest secrets hearing hereof, hauing sent the Centurion letters to proceede in the business, fearing his owne danger aduised IVLIA not to divulge the secrets of her house, the counsell of friends, nor the seruices of soldiers; that TIBERIVS should haue a care not to weaken his power of soueraigntie, by referring all to the Senate, and so this business was past ouer in silence.

In Rome libertie now was so forgotten, and the Monarchie so settled by thy custome of many yeeres continuance, vnder the raigne of OCTAVIANVS, that notwithstanding that there were Consuls, Pretors, Tribunes, and other names of dignitie and magistracie; yet ther was in a manner no man in Rome that did remember and vnderstand the manner of the old government, which was before that IVLIUS CÆSAR suppressed the Common-wealth; and the death of OCTAVIAN being knowne, there was no man that durst name or speake of libertie, but when as TIBERIVS came to Rome, they presently gaue the government and administration of the Common-wealth vnto him. And he was the first Emperour that did quietly and peaceably inherit the Empire, so as he was not forced to make a conquest thereof, as IVLIUS CÆSAR and OCTAVIAN had done. And notwithstanding that before he would accept thereof he caused himselfe to be much intreated, and made great shew to haue no desire to the Empire; yet afterwards it appeared plainly that he did but counterfet, to the end he might discover euery mans affection towards him: For to all those which yielded to accept of his excuses, and did not importune him; he bare a perpetuall hatred; for although that one way he excused himselfe, yet in many other things he began to vse the authoritie of an Emperour, taking a garde, and mustering the armies, as Emperour.

Hauing accepted the Empire, there were some accidents which put him in great feare: the first was, that the armies in Pannonia or Hungarie, mutined, and reuolted from IVLIUS BLESVS their Commander, a captaine called PERCENIVS being principall of this mutinie, and they sent to require many excuse things: against whome TIBERIVS sent his son DRVSVS, whom he had by AGRIPPINA, with whom he was married before he espoused IVLIA. The which was pacified with much danger and difficultie; PERCENIVS and VI-BV-LENSVS, with some other ringleaders of this mutinie being put to death.

It happened also that the legions which were by the riuer of Rhine, as the custome was, did the like, through the absence of GERMANICVS their General being named, adopted sonne and Nephew to TIBERIVS: And those of Pannonia were not only discontented with the paces and exemptions which they required, but they presumed to chuse a new Emperour against TIBERIVS, nominating their generall GERMANICVS, who (as is before said) was TIBERIVS Nephew and adopted sonne, and preferred before his naturall sonne, by the commandement of OCTAVIAN. But GERMANICVS was so loyall, that when these newes were brought vnto him, he not only refused their offer, but with great danger and hazard of his life, and with much trouble, pacified those alterations.

TIBERIVS was another way disquieted, being aduertised that LVCIVS SCRIBONIVS an eminent man, and one which bare great sway in the common-wealth, had some secret practices against him: but he freed himselfe from all these troubles, and they were pacified, though not without great difficultie. For his son DRVSVS on the one side (after some treaties) reduced the legions of Pannonia to his obedience, and did iustice on PERCENIVS. And GERMANICVS (as I said) after some great difficultie (which CORNELIVS TACITVS relateth at large) made those of Germania to obey: and not therewith content, he passed the riuer of

Rhine

Rhine (which commonly was the bounds of the Romane Empire on that part) and made war within the countrie of Germanie, with good successe. While these matters were a-doing, & for some space after, TIBERIVS did cloake and conceale his wicked inclination and vices; and (as I sayd in the beginning) performed many parts of a good, discreet and mild Prince; where- what good Tiberius did in the beginning. though he deceived the people, especially those which did not inwardly know him; whereof (although they be recited before their time) it shall not be amisse to set downe some, to the end that (as of a venomous Beast) that which is profitable and medicinall, may be taken. First, many of the names and titles of Honor which were offered him by the Senate, and other Honors and Ceremonies, he refused, and would not consent that they should erect or build any Temples vnto him; and forbad them to set vp his Statues and Images without his expresse commandement: and if sometime he did permit it, it was vpon condition that they should not place them among the Images of the gods.

He seemed also to grieve to heare himselfe praised, crossing and interrupting them in speeches which did it. One in a discourse called him Lord, whom hee commanded to vse that word no more: but insolence and presumption since that time hath so encreased, as that which in those dayes seemed pride in an Emperour, there is not any now (bee hee neuer so base) but presumeth he deserveth the same. The like discretion did TIBERIVS shew in other words, which were also proper to the gods, & the things to them appertaining. He faired also patience and meeknesse: for although that in the Senate there passed some matters contrary to his will & opinion, and that in other affaires they gainesaid him, yet he seemed not any way to be displeased or offended therewith: And understanding that some spake ill of him, and murmuring, used reproachfull speeches against him, hee shewed no discontentment or alteration therat: but said, that in a free Citie mens tongues ought to bee free, and men might lawfully speake freely. And whereas the Senate would haue exhibited an information, and haue proceeded against those which had written defamatorie libells against him, he would not consent thereto; saying, that he had not so little employment as to lose time about such matters: affirming that hee would do nothing against them which spake ill of him, but trouble them with keeping account of what hee said and did; and if that were not sufficient, it should satisfie him, to love them as little as they loved him.

At first, TIBERIVS shewed great respect to the Senate, & gavethem so great authority in all things, as he did nothing without their counsell, willing that all should bee done by their advice and consent. In execution of iustice and government hee made many good beginnings, taking care and order that there should be no theeves nor robbers by the high wayes side in all Italie, but that men might travell in safetie; and that iustice should bee executed in Townes and Villages. The Ensigns, and pretorian Cohorts, which in Rome were the Emperours guard (to the pretorian cohorts were the Emperours guard the famous veterans of Tiberius. the speeches of a good pastor, and the minds of a Wolfe. in. notice of means how to encrease his rents and revenues, hee answered, that a good shepherd ought to heare his flocke, but not slay them: & so he abated some tributes; and shewed favours to certain particular persons. His loose life he sought to cover, by ordaining a publicke informer against dishonest and adulterous Matrons of Rome, which he did (as it afterwards appeared) to the end there should be no other adulterer but himselfe. He did other things (which for brevity I omit) which seemed to spring from a good roote and intent: but it failed in the end; for he fauned, to bide, and drew backe, to charge againe with the greater force: As wee will hereafter declare in part, for the whole cannot bee related as it was, nor mentioned for the filthinesse thereof, which is the occasion why that order and stile cannot be observed which is fitting, for certainly, disordered and obscure lives cannot bee clearly and orderly written. And besides this, he used his wife IVLIA cruelly and disgracefully, forgetting that by her as for her dowrie, he enjoyed the Romane Empire: for hee never lived nor kept company with her after the death of OCTAVIAN.

One of the first signes hee shewed of an evill Prince and governour, was: that notwithstanding here came great complaints against the Proconsuls, Pretors, and Prefects, sent into Provinces
E 3

vinets; yet he would not remove them: which was contrary to the order and custome of Rome, and his predecessor OCTAVIAN: which some attributed to his carelesse, others held it to proceed of malice and an ill disposition, to the end that many men should not enjoy the honor and profit which grew in such charges. After this he began to envie and malice GERMANICVS, for that he was preferred before his sonne DRVVS, and it grieved him to see his good successe in the warres of Germanie. Wherefore to finde occasion to remove him from that charge, hee dissemblingly caused the Triumph to be granted unto him, for the victories which he had obtained, and wrote to him many times to come to triumph: but GERMANICVS understanding his evil intent, deferred his coming. It happened within a while after, that the King of the Parthians tooke armes and made warre against the Romane Empire, breaking the peace confirmed in the time of OCTAVIAN, entering into the Province of Armenia, the King whereof was inuested there by the Romanes: wherewith TIBERIVS was nothing displeased, supposing thereby to haue the better occasion to draw GERMANICVS from his charge and gouernment of Germanie, vnder colour to send him to the Parthian Warres, as he did: And so GERMANICVS being sent for, came for this purpose, hauing few daies before wonne a great battaile, & slaine tenne thousand of his enemies, & so he entred into Rome in a solempne triumph, and (as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth) hee brought thither with him the ensignes which QVINTILIVS VARRO had lost, and presently began to prepare for the warre against the Parthians.

A little before GERMANICVS his triumph, there arose a man in Italie, called CLEMENS, a bondsclaue to AGRIPPA, who named himself AGRIPPA, nephew to OCTAVIAN (whom we haue said to be slaine by TIBERIVS his order) which action seemed of some importance: for much loose and seditious people ioynd with him, which caused a great tumult in Italie, this man pretending that he ought of right to be Emperor, and not TIBERIVS: But as hee had a weake foundation, so was hee soone overbrowne, taken prisoner, brought to TIBERIVS, and finally executed although secretly. And about the same time TIBERIVS committed a fowle and perfidious act of cruelty: for hauing with gracious and kind words allured ASCHELAVS King of Cappadocia to come to Rome (whow was a friend and vassall to the Romane Empire) for faired and viisited causes he made him to be accused and committed, where afterwards this miserable King died in prison, and his countrie was made a tributary province. In the like manner he dealt with many Princes and great men of Spain, France, Gracia, and other parts. The expedition which TIBERIVS had intended against the Parthians, was much hastned by reason of the death of ANTIOCHVS King of Comagena, and of PHILOPATER King of Cilicia in Asia, vassalls to the Empire: by means of whose deaths some alterations grew in those provinces; for some would haue a King, and others would be gouerned by the Empire.

GERMANICVS being prepared for his Easterne Iorney (as he was commanded) departed from Rome, carrying his wife AGRIPPINA and his children with him: betweene whom and LIVIA the mother of TIBERIVS was great emulation. There was also at this time great controuersie and parts-taking, both in words and affections in TIBERIVS his Court; some taking part with GERMANICVS, who (as we haue said) was his adopted sonne and nephew: others adhered to DRVVS, his sonne legitimate. TIBERIVS and his mother LIVIA euer fought to aduance the reputation of DRVVS, and in secret to disgrace GERMANICVS: for which occasion he gaue the charge of all the legions of Illyricum to his sonne DRVVS. And to the end, that GERMANICVS should not be too powerful in the East whither he went, he made GABVS PISO capitaine of the province and legions of Syria (who was an eminent man, greatly allied in Rome, and of a good house) for that he held with DRVVS; and disposed CRETICVS SYLVANVS of that charge, being a friend to GERMANICVS. This PISO was married to a Romane Matrone called PLANCINA, of the same condition, but of an haughtier spirit then her husband; to the which husband and wife the Emperor TIBERIVS and his mother LIVIA gaue in charge, to procure hatred and dislike against GERMANICVS; yea and his death also: as it after appeared. And with this resolution they departed from Rome towards the East: where PISO presently, with gifts and flatterie, began to draw to himselfe the loue and good liking of the armie against GERMANICVS, and to murmure and speake ill of him: who, while as PISO practised these things, tooke so good order in the warre and gouernment, as hee placed a King in the province of Armenia, who was a friend and subiect to the Romanes; and the kingdomes of Comagena and Cilicia being voided by the death of their Kings, he reduced into provinces, and placed in them Pretors and gouernours. In Comagena QVINCIVS SERVIS, and

Germanicus
first against the Parthians.

Cappadocia made a province.

Piso animated by Tiberius against Germanicus.

and in Cilicia QVINTVS VERANVS; moderating in them both the royall subsidies and tributes. And after this he tooke for good order, as he compelled the King of Parthia to sue for peace and friendship: which he granted and concluded, to the honour of the Empire. Being thus busied about these things, PISO and his wife neuer left to murmure against him, and to take him openly: the which he dissembled, knowing from whence it did proceed. And hauing made an end of the Parthian warre, hee departed from thence to visit the province of Egypt: and in his absence (although it were not long) his competitor PISO plotted such matters against him, as when he understood of his return, he departed out of that province. But as he had practised his death, he went not far off, but remained some daies in an Iland: during which time, GERMANICVS coming on his way, was poisoned by the practice of PISO, but by the direction and counsell of TIBERIVS (as it was thought) whereof he dyed suddenly, leauing behind him sonnes and daughters; among which was CAIVS CALIGVLA, who was afterwards Emperour. For which cause it hath been very expedient to make such mention of his father GERMANICVS, who if he had liued had been Emperour and succesor to TIBERIVS.

Before his death he complained much vnto his friends of the leud practices of PISO and PLANCINA his wife, by whose fraud he was brought to an vntimely death, intreating them to prosecute reuenge. And turning to his wife, he conuined her by all the bonds of nuptiall loue, to submit her courage to the frownes of fortune; least at her returne to the Citie, by emulation of greatnes she should purchase to herselfe two powerful enemies.

The wortheie and valiant Capraine GERMANICVS being dead in this manner, as is said, his wife AGRIPPINA came to Rome with her children, and brought with her the ashes of her deceased husband. The Emperour TIBERIVS made shew of great sorrow (though contrite) for the death of GERMANICVS (the like did LIVIA and her sonne DRVVS, who then was come to Rome) but in truth was very glad therof: for by the death of GERMANICVS he did assuredly hope to succede in the Empire. But true and vnfained was the sorrow which all the people of Rome conceiued for the death of GERMANICVS; and great were the fauours and loue which they shewed to AGRIPPINA and her children: and great was the hatred they bare against PISO, whom they openly charged to haue murdered him; who presuming on TIBERIVS his fauour (being altogether shamelesse) came to Rome: where, in the behalfe of AGRIPPINA and her friends, he was accused before the Senate for harred to GERMANICVS; that he had corrupted the common soldiery with licentiousnes and done wrong to the Confederates; that he was called father of the Legions by the leudest sort; that hee had bene cruell to all good men, and that he had poisoned GERMANICVS, and borne armes against the State. To most hee answered weakly, onely the poisoning could not bee well verified. Which, TIBERIVS dissembling, (as one who was not to loue him any better then the rest) he was driuen to such an extremitie in the accusation, as before that the cause was determined, hee was found dead in his bed (as it was thought) by his owne hands; although (as CORNELIVS TACITVS saith) it was neuer certainly knowne: but there were many opinions concerning the fame. Who also witeth that a powerful man named TACFARINVS rebelled in Africa in the province of Namidia, and leuying great forces, ouerthrew certaine Romane cohorts, thinking to haue been able to possesse the countrie: against whom went the Proconsul LVCIVS ASTRONICVS with an armie: and committing to a battaile he ouercame him and put him to flight, to his great losse. Which (as it seemeth) happened in the fourth yeere of the raigne of TIBERIVS; although afterwards the same TACFARINVS was againe ouerthrowne, by the Proconsul BLESVS, in a second rebellion.

The yeere following, the Emperour TIBERIVS made himselfe to be chosen Consul, and his sonne DRVVS his Companion, as at other times hee had done: and fauing that it behooued him for his health, hee went forth of Rome, to the end hee might settle and establish DRVVS in the gouernment of the Empire, for of his brother CLAVDIVS vntill then hee made small account: but God disposed of all in another manner. In the same yeere many cities in France rebelled, being vnable to endure the intolerable tributes and exactions which TIBERIVS imposed vpon them. The capraines and authors of this rebellion; were two hardy men, the one called FLORVS, and the other SACROBIS, which did so much trouble the countrie, as they put Rome it selfe in great feare; much more being there reported then was true. But this did nothing trouble TIBERIVS; so much had hee forgotten all vertue and goodnes, giuing himselfe wholly ouer to vice and sensuality in his old age. But CAIVS

Germanicus
poisoned by Piso.

his

E 4 SILIVS;

SILIVS, who was Captaine of those parts, did soone suppress the troubles of France, who with his legions came against those which rebelled, put them to flight in a battaile, and slew a great number of them: and so he pacified that country, and his sonne DRVSVS did principally employ himselfe in the government. TIBERIVS passing the most part of the time in Campania, betwene whom and his mother LIVIA began some secret (which grew to publike) quarrels and dislikes, he being very vnreuerent and vnderfull, and the much discontented with his manner of government, and chiefly for the priuate familiaritie betwene him and ELIVS SEIANVS, whom he fauoured so much as he made him captaine of the Pretorian cohorts, and gaue him many other dignities: and finally made him so great, as he presumed to contend with his sonne DRVSVS: and his presumption was such, as by wicked practices and deuices, he allured to his dishonest lust the wife of the said DRVSVS, daughter in law to TIBERIVS, whose name was LIVIA, the daughter of GERMANICVS. Committing this adulterie (with a conceit to succedd in the place of DRVSVS) he practised his death, and found means by an Eunuch his seruant, to poyson him: which tooke effect, and DRVSVS died thereof, and left one sonne named TIBERIVS, as his grandfather, but it was not then knowne who was the cause of his death. Whereof arose great murmuring in Rome, although it little grieved the greatest part: for they deemed that GERMANICVS his three sonnes should haue succeeded in his place, whom they much respected for their fathers sake: whose names were CLAVDIUS NERO, CAIVS CALIGVLA, and DRVSVS. This happened in the ninth yeere of the raigne of TIBERIVS, which was a beginning of his misfortunes: we may say the like of the Common-wealth; for from that time forwards, all his actions and resolutions had ill successe, his detestable vices discouered themselves, and the subjects endured infinite cruelties, robberies, outrages and oppressions: as also in this same yeere, TACAPARNAS rebelled againe in Africa, who in his last rebellion escaped by flight: and hauing leuied much people, in the end was the third time ouerthrowne in battaile, and wholly defaced by PVBLIVS DOLABELLA the Proconsul.

In Rome the wicked SEIANVS (TIBERIVS favorite) although that in the beginning he made shew publickly to fauour GERMANICVS sonnes, which (as hath been said, and it was thought) should haue been TIBERIVS successours: yet afterwards all his studie and practice was to disgrace and ruine them, and to that end, procured false accusations to be made against all such as tooke their, or AGRIPPA their mothers part. And to bring this and other his wicked deuices to effect, he procured TIBERIVS to depart from Rome whither he was come: who following the others counsell, as well for this, as the more freely to giue himselfe to his detestable vices, went into the Ile of Capra, which lieth vpon the coast of Naples, where he remained for a time; and being returned into Italie, making his progresse into diuers places, neuer came any more to Rome: neither in the rest of his life is there any more to be spoken, but of his vices and cruelties, whereof in summe we will make a briefe relation. Before which it is requisite that all men vnderstand, that during this peregrination of the Emperour TIBERIVS in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ true God and man suffered his death and passion, PONTIVS PILATE being president or gouernor of Ierusalem in the prouince of Iudaea. And to the end that it may be the better knowne and vnderstood how PILATE came to concur with one of the HERODES, and how many there were of the HERODES, of whom mention is made in the holy Scriptures, (which is a matter whereof some haue made a doubt) in few words I will here set downe: which was in this manner, as the Evangelist testifieth, and as out of Saint IEROME and IOSEPHVS it is gathered. HERODE the great, sonne of ANTIPATER, who was called HERODE ASCALONITA, was placed there by the Romanes: and hauing reigned many yeeres, was the same to whom the three Kings came from the East guided by a Starre, and he who murdered so many innocent children, and some of his owne children also, when Christ was borne; who within short space after died, and by his death, his sonne, whose name was ARCHELAUS, had the kingdome of Iudaea, and Idumea; and to his other two sonnes (for the other three died before their father) were giuen certaine Tetrarchies, whereof to this HERODE ANTIPTAS (which was one of them) was allotted the Tetrarchie of Galilee, and by this meanes he is called Tetrarch, & this was he which put Saint IOHN BAPTIST to death, and he, to whom PILATE sent Christ, who disdained him. And to PHILIP his other sonne was giuen the Tetrarchie of Thracenonia: and the other brother, who (as I said) had the title of a King, was accused to OCTAVIAN, and by him de- priued and banished into FRANCE, to the citie of Vienna, by meanes whereof PILATE was sent to gouerne

The Infidelities of SEIANVS.

The death of Drusus, Tiberius sonne.

The passion of Christ our redemer.
Iosephus in his antiquities in his 3. c. 17.
and 18. bookes,
and in his first and second of the warres of the Iewes Saint Ierome upon the second chapter of Matthew.
The Herodes how many they were.
Herodes Alicamonita.
Saint Matthew
the second chapter, 1.

gouerne that prouince; and by this meanes it happened that Christ died in the time of PILATE and of HERODE ANTIPTAS the Tetrarch, from whom the Tetrarchie afterwards was taken by CAIVS CALIGVLA, and he died banished in Lions in France, and his Nephew the sonne of his brother ARISTOBVLVS, who was one of the three which their father slew in his lifetime. HERODE AGRIPPA was he, to whom CAIVS CALIGVLA, restored the kingdome of Iudaea. And afterwards the Emperour CLAVDIUS gaue the Tetrarchie of Galile to his Vncle: and this was he, who put Saint IAMES to death, who beginning to persecute the Apostles, died stricken by an Angell, as Saint LUKES beareth record.

Christ being put to death by the sentence of PILATE, and he knowing afterwards that Christ was risen againe, by the report of those which he himselfe had set to watch his bodie, being also informed of the many miracles which he did in his life time (notwithstanding that he was an idolater and a wicked iudge, and had adiudged him to die) yet TERTVLIAN and EVSEBIUS in his ecclesiastical historie, and PAVLVS OROSIVS in his seventh booke, most ancient and true authors, doe reuerence, that by his letters, he aduertised the Emperour TIBERIVS thereof, to the end that he should aduise and determine, whether Christ should be held for a God or no; and TIBERIVS sent to the Senate to consult thereof, hegiuing his opinion that he ought to be so: but the Senators, as the diuels schollers, counsell'd TIBERIVS that he should not doe it. Which (as these authors affirme) was for that he had not first made the Senate acquainted therewith, which pretended by an ancient law which they had, to haue the superintendence in all matters of religion: yet TIBERIVS notwithstanding that the Senate consented not to his opinion, commanded that the christians should be free from persecution; but he neither embraced the faith of Christ as he ought, neither left his sinne and vices.

First he gaue himselfe to his old vice of excessive gluttonie and drunkenness, for which cause from his youth (in steede of TIBERIVS NERO) they called him BIBERIVS NERO; which signifieth a drinker of the beere: and euen in this his old age, he hath been often knowne to sit a whole night, & part of the day at a baker, giuing gifts & rewards to such as drank most, and in fauour thereof he instituted a new office and magistracie, as, matter of delights and sports. After this, his chiefeest time was spent in abominable luxury and incontinencie, which was such and so abominable as christian ears can hardly endure the hearing thereof, nor a christian hand write the same, wherefore I will passe most of the ouer in silence. Let this suffice, that it was horrible and detestable: and not contented to commit it himselfe, he induced and drew others thereto, and gaue iewels and rewards to those which inuented and committed most filthines.

For during his priuate abode in Caprea, (as SVETONIUS writes) he desired a room with seates in it of purpose for his secret wanton lusts. For the furnishing whereof he drew from all parts a number of young strumpets, and stale Catamites or baudes, and such also as inuented monstrous kindes of libidinous filthines, whom he rearm'd Spinnrie, who being in three ranks linked together, should pollute one anothers bodie before his face, that by the sight there of he might stirre vp his owne colde courage and fainting lust, with manie other such shamefull deuices, as are not to be mentioned, for the which men did vially tearme him CAPRINEVS, after the name of the Iland.

This wicked old Emperour, perseuering in his libidinous sinne, forgot not his crueltie and enuetounes, whereto he was no lesse addicted: for hee encreased his subsidies and tributes in such manner, that the prouinces became ruinate and desolate; and committed many other extortions of the like quality.

As for his crueltie, all the examples cannot be repeated, they did so exceede: for he condemned the principall and best men in Rome to death, and confiscated their goods, for very light causes, and most of them forged. One he put iustly to death; and with great reason caused him to be slaine, which was his great favorite SEIANVS, for many finnes which he had learned of him (as DION COCRIVS recordeth:) but for the rest, it is a matter ridiculous, and otherwise lamentable, for what causes they were accused and condemned. One he caused to be slaine, because that commending BRVTVS and CASSIVS, he said, they were the last Romanes: another he caused to be slaine, because that in a tragedie which he had compiled, he spake ill of AGRIPPINON: another Romane Knight he commanded to be slaine, because that in a garden he had taken vp a Capon; and for other such like matters as these, he put to death sixteen, of twentie ancient noble men, whom he had chosen for his counsellors. And he forbore not to execute these cruelties vpon his allies and kinsfolkes: for besides that which is already related ptas.

Herodes Anti-
Saint Luke
chapter 2.
Herodes Agrippa.

The Acts of the Apostles chap.
12.

Pilate made re-lacion of the miracles which Christ wrought to the Emperour Tiberius.

related, he commaunded his Nephew GERMANICVS to be slaine, and afterwards the three sonnes which he left, seeing them to growe in estimation; the two eldest of them he caused to be accused by false witnesses, and he himselfe wrote such things to Rome against them, that in the end they were condemned to death: the one of them desperately killed himselfe, and he caused the other to pine to death with hunger, as SVETONIVS reporteth. It was a marvell that he had not done the like by the third, whose name was CAIVS CALIGVLA, and by their Vncle CLAVDVS: but it is likely he would have done it, if he had liued a while longer. These executions hee thus commaunded to be done, to the end that his crueltie might attaine to the highest degree, which were not ordinarie: for before their death, they suffered hunger, torments, and disgraces, to qualifie them. Finally, to conclude, they were so many and so fearefull, that many which were condemned, slew themselves, some with payson, and some with the sword, for feare; for TIBERIVS did execute his furie with such crueltie, as hee accounted it a deede of charitie, to put them to an ordinarie kinde of death: so as, for that one had killed himselfe before that he could execute his rage vpon him, he cryed out, Oh how hath CORNELIVS escaped me? for so was that mans name: and to another, which entreated him that he would not deferre his death, TIBERIVS answered, I am not so much thy friend, as to hasten it. And employing himselfe in these diuillish exercises, wherein he continued vntill his death; ARTABANVS King of Partia, breaking the peace and league which he had contracted with GERMANICVS, presumed to enter into Armenia, and the limits of the Empire, and also the Sarmates invaded the prouinces; for which TIBERIVS tooke no care, neither leuied any new armie; but they defended themselves with their ordinarie legions and armies the best they could.

Now, forasmuch as in many places of this historie, mention is made of legions and armies, which the Romanes ordinarily entertained in their prouinces, in time of peace & warre, I hold it fit to declare what they were, for the better understanding of what is already, and shall be said hereafter. Which is a great argument, to proue how great the wealth and power of the Romanes was: and although that some Authors do treat thereof, I will onely set downe what CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth in the fourth booke of his histories, an historiographer of great authority. He first saith, that in the two seas, of the one and other side of Italie, to wit, in the Adriatique sea, now the gulf of Venice, and in the Sicilian sea called Mediterranean, they maintained two great nauiques of gallies and shippes for their guard and securitie, and for the safe passage of Merchants, and such other necessaie occasions. Another great nauique they maintained vpon the coast of France, between Spain and Italie; besides those which they had in a readines and caused to be built when any occasion of warre was offered. Their armies by land were diuided in manner following: vpon the Rhines side on the frontiers of France, they maintained eight legions, to keepe those countries which they possessed in Germanie, and to resist the Germanes and other northerly nations, and these ordinarily were the most experienced and best souldiers. And although that the number of a legion did increase and diminish vpon diuers occasions, yet the ordinarie in the time of the Emperors was (after VERGILIUS and MODERVS) that euery legion should containe sixe thousand and one hundred fooremen, and seven hundred twentie and sixe horsemen. Of these they held, in Spain, three ordinarie legions; and in Africa, in the prouince of Carthage, two; and in Mauritania one; and two for the garde of the kingdome of Egypt, and in the prouinces of Mesopotamia and Syria (to wit) in the countries contained betweene the Syrian sea, the furthest end of the Leuant sea, and the riuer Euphrates, which were (for a long time) the bounds of the Roman Empire, they held foure legions. And heere in Europe (besides those which I haue already mentioned) they had other sixe legions, in this manner: in Austria and Hungarie they had two; in Servia and Bulgarie, as many; and other two in Slauonia; and neere vnto the citie of Rome, were alwayes lodged twelue Cohorts, nine of which were called Pretorian, and the other three Vibane, which by turne did garde the Emperors palace. Of all these Cohorts (according to the same authors) the first and chiefe of them contained one thousand, one hundred and five footmen, and one hundred thirtie two horse; and the others equally each of them five hundred and fiftie footmen, and threescore and six horse. Besides all which, they had in diuers cities and prouinces, companies of horsemen, which were friends and subiects to the Empire, and also other companies of footmen, which were called Auxiliaries, which were not trained after the Roman order and discipline: so as they continually entertained & paid five and twentie legions, besides those which were payed by their friends. And this was in time of peace, for the authoritie and garde of the Empire

Empire; for when there happened any warres (according as neede required) they reinforced their armies, and encreased the number of their legions.

With the force of these great garrisons the Roman Empire maintained & defended it selfe, notwithstanding the want of care and diligence in some Emperors, as in TIBERIVS, of whom we now discourse; who (as is said) spent the rest of his life vntill his death, in wicked practices: which being much wished for by all the world, ouertooke him in a house of pleasure neere to Naples, having reigned twentie and three yeeres Emperor, in the seuentie and eight yeere of his age, and thirtie, and nine yeeres after the birth of Christ. In what manner he died, authors agree not, for some say that hee was paysoned, by his Nephew and successor CAIVS CALIGVLA: others write that being sicke (as it was thought) mortally, and seeing that he made some shew of recouerie, for feare that hee should mend, CALIGVLA smothered him with a pillow, or with the couering of the bed, he hauing ordained him for his successor. Notwithstanding that by reason of a certaine prophecie which hee held, he had resolved to make his Nephew TIBERIVS the sonne of Drausus his heire, whom Dion Cocceius in his histories saith, he would not name, because he was not assured that he was his sonnes sonne, for the suspicion which he held of his mother; and also because that the Mathematicians and Astrologians, to whom he was much affected and gaue credit, had told him, that he should liue but a little while, and that CALIGVLA should kill him: and so vpon a time being very much offended, he said to CALIGVLA, thou wilt kill me, and another shall kill thee. It is also imagined, that TIBERIVS chose CALIGVLA for his successor, for that he knew his euill and wicked inclination, hoping that with his vices, he would deface and blot his wickednes out of remembrance; and also for that he beleued, that he would extinguish the Roman nobilitie; for he was so wicked and cruell as he desired that all the world might end with his life, and so he was sometimes wont to say, that hee wished, that when hee should die, then the heaven and earth might be dissolved: but he deferred not to see the heavens; and all the earth reioycied and was glad when he died; as all Authors write: and this was the end of TIBERIVS. SVETONIUS writes, that the people reioycied much at his death: and some running up and downe, at the newes thereof cryed out Fling TIBERIVS into Tiber. Others be sought the mother Earth, and the infernal gods to vouchsafe him no place but among impious wretches. And some threatened to drag his liuelesse carcase into the Gemonie.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS CALIGVLA, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRTH ROMAN EMPEROV.

THE ARGVMENT.

Caligula, before he was made Emperor, was so pleasing, and in such grace with the people and Senate of Rome, as when he was advanced, it is unknowne whether was the greater, the sorrow which was in Rome for the death of Octavian, or the joy which it conceived for the succession of Caligula. But being made Emperor, as if with his dignitie hee had changed his natural inclination, hee became so wicked and infamous, as I cannot set downe his vicious life without offending the chaste eares of him that shall read the same; nor without a burden to his modestie that shall write it. Hee made the Bridge at Bani, a worke of no lesse folly then great expence. Hee destroyed three of his owne sisters; and of his Palace (with reverence be it spoken) he made a brothel of Roman Matrons. Hee was so covetous, as he rayed a tax vpon the Woores, and had a share of their gettings. He used to walke up and downe vpon Cremers and was so prodigall, that sometimes hee caused most precious iewels to be dissolved with vinegar and put into his meat: hee was finally in all his actions so contrary to himselfe, that no man knew how to beleue himselfe to will

Stories and fictions maintained by the Ro-manes, in fundamental places and prouinces.

A Legion, of how many horse and foot is consi'd.

Pretorian and Urban Cohorts.

Auxiliary forces.

wards him. He would be called and reputed for a God, which name he stained with such abominable cruelties, that he was worse then the diuill: he shed so much blood, and made the wilde beasts which he kept, to deuour men, and to drinke their bloods, so as these which were condemned to be slaine by them, rather chose to kill themselves, then to endure the torments which he deuised in his cruell disposition. He died of thirrie wounds given him by certaine which conspired against him, having reigned almost twue yeeres: whose death was so acceptable to the people, as it is hard to say whether was the greater ioy, that which was conceiued when he was made Emperour, or that when he left the Empire, together with his most painefulle life.

Caligula in the highest degree abominable.

In Caligula was violence that was good.

CALIGVLA the sonne of GERMANICVS succeeded TIBERIVS in the Empire, who during the time of his raigne, was in the highest degree of all kinde of wickednes most abominable: and his words and deedes were so odious and detestable, as in truth it is a shameful & unworthie thing, hauing written the liues of so worthe men, as were IVLIUS, and OCTAVIANVS CÆSARS, & their heroficall acts: now to descend to the sinke of the villanie, crueltie, and ribauldrie of CALIGVLA. For although there wanted not in TIBERIVS cause to be abhorred & blamed, yet some part of his raigne was good, and he in former times had been an excellent Capitaine, and had enlarged the dominions of the Empire, for which cause his euill cōditions might be somewhat the better tolerated: but this wanting in CAIVS CALIGVLA, who was a man of no such valour (although in the beginning he deceived the world with an apparence of some good deedes) yet it maketh the remembrance of him the more detestable, and his hand that shall write the same, the more heauie. But because I am not to make choise of Emperours, of whom I am to treat at my pleasure, but to continue the course of my historie, wherein my chiefe foundation is, to obserue the truth, and cleauing thereto, to continue my troublefome journey: Let him which shall reade it consider how detestable and odious his actions were, and how small time his Empire indured (which attained not to four yeeres complete) and the end which he made, to the end that he may sic and abhorre them, & may do the like by some others which followed, like to him, or worse.

After the death of TIBERIVS CÆSAR (as I said) the ioy which the Senate and people of Rome conceiued was incredible, and therewith they accepted and approoued the Empire of CAIVS CALIGVLA (whom before his death TIBERIVS had adopted and nominated for his successour) for the loue and goodwill which they bare to his father GERMANICVS, and for the pittie and commiseration which they conceiued for his death, and the affliction and wrong done to his house. For these causes was he accepted by all the Prouinces, and prouinciall armies: for his father being Generall in Germanie, and in the East, he was bred vp among them, and this name of CALIGVLA was given him for a certaine kinde of horse, called Caliga, vled among men of warre, which hee did vse to ware. Coming from the place whiche TIBERIVS died, to Rome, a great number of the principall men of all estates went forth to entertaine him vpon the way, with exceeding ioy, notwithstanding that he came mourning with the dead bodie of TIBERIVS, which the souldiers brought to be burnt at Rome, according to the manner of that time. And comming with great solemnity to Rome, he was obeyed with vnspokeable gladnes and ioy, they giuing him new names and Epithetes, shewing great reuerence and loue.

CALIGVLA was a man tall of stature, great boned and corpulent; but his necke and legges were very small and slender, deformed and vnfitable to the rest of his bodie: his countenance was horrible and vgly: being Emperour, he tooke pleasure to terrifie people with his looks; and to this effect it is written, that beholding himselfe in a glasse, he would studie what countenance to set, to seeme more fierce and terrible. His eyes were very hollow, his forehead broad, his complexion yellow, his head very bald, and in those parts of his head where he had any haire, it was very thinn, all the rest of his bodie being maruiculously hairy. He was very vnfound and vnhealthy, and in his youth was troubled with falling sicknes and other diseases, and afterwards (as we will presently shew) he was ill disposed both in bodie and minde, changing his conditions with the Empire: for before that time, he was cuer held for good. Wherefore it is said of him, that he had been the best seruant, and was the worst and most wicked Lord in the world. The first thing he did after he came to be Prince, was to dissuall & make void the testament of TIBERIVS, which he had made two yeeres before, wherein he made him & his nephew TI-

BERRIVS

BERRIVS his coheirs: whereto the Senate did willingly agree, & euerie man deuised & plotted how to gratifie him and doe him seruice, with such loue as within few daies after he was confirmed in the Empire. Going forth of Rome to recreate himselfe vpon the Sea at the Ile of Caprea, and in other Ilands vpon that coast, they made vows and sacrifices for his health and returne: and writers affirme, that there were slaine 170000. beasts, according to the rites and ceremonies then vsed: And then making shew of a man, and not of a beast (as his deedes did afterwards make manifest) he presently commaunded the ashes of his mother and brethren to be brought to Rome, and there to be sumptuously buried. He then tooke for his companion in the Consulship, which hee would execute, his vnkle CLAYDIVS, brother to GERMANICVS, who in the time of TIBERIVS liued priuate and in disgrace; and young TIBERIVS, (which was nephew to TIBERIVS the Emperour) raising to loue, and affect him: to doe him honour, he made him capitaine and prince of all the Romane youthe. Seeking by counterfeit goodnes and bountie, to draw to himselfe the goodwill of the people; he did twice giue vnto euery bodie (excepting none) a certaine donatiue of money, which they called Congiarius; and to all the Senate, and to all those of the order of Knighthood (which was a degree betwene the communalltie and the Nobilitie) he made a most solemne banquet. And fasting also, that he meant to gouerne with iustice, he commaunded OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR his Institutions to be sought out, which TIBERIVS interrupted and brought out of vse. He commaunded also great playes and feasts to be made in Rome of Sword-playes, who were men which to shew pleasure to the beholders, fought and killed one another; and certaine men on horseback which they called Trians. He also appointed certaine huntings, wherein were slaine a great number of Lions, Panthers, Boares, Beares, and other wilde beasts; and besides this, Comedies and other shewes which were made in the Theater, & other kinds of sports and pleasures to delight the people, whole loue and grace he then affected. And besides that which is already laid (as SYNTONIVS reciteth) principally in the beginning of his Empire, ARTABANVS King of Parthia, who rebelled and was an enemy, came to a conference with the Generall of the Romanes which commaunded the legions in Syria, and fearing the new Emperour whom he knew not, made a peace with him; and passing the riuier Euphrates, which was the bound of the Romane Empire, came in person to adore and to doe reuerence to the Emperours statue, and to the Imperiall standard and Eagle: so as the little, vntill this time, may be reported of CALIGVLA, as of a wife and discrete prince; and the remainder seemeth to be of a senselesse man and a brute and sauage beast. The beginning whereof was one of the greatest fooleries or vanities that euer was seene, which was to make such a feast as was neuer heard of, to shew his greatnes and vanitie, and to be able to walke and treade on the Sea as well as vpon the land: Or (as others say) because he would imitate King XERXES, who passed his armie out of Asia into Europe ouer the streight of Hellespont vpon a wooden bridge, he commaunded to be brought together, and to be new built all the ships he could get, which were infinite; & in a bay or a creeke, which the Sea maketh neere to the haue of Baias in Campania, from one point of the land to the other side of the Bay, which is about three miles distant, hee commaunded a bridge to be made vpon the said ships, set in two ranks, fastned and moored together with anchors, chaines and cables, which made them to stand fix and firme: hee commaunded this bridge to be made of boords, so strong and eenen, and to lay so much earth vpon the same, as it seemed to be firme ground, and one of the streets of Rome. And bringing for this worke a great number of Artificers and labourers, with an infinite charge; he also caused houses and lodgings to be built vpon the bridge, as writeth DION, who relateth this worke more at large then all the rest.

This being finished, and hee with all the Court going thither, with an infinite number of people which from all parts came to see this worke; hee proudly attired in robes of gold and pearle, with a crowne of Oaken boughes vpon his head (which was called Cinica) on horsebacke, accompanied with men of warre, and all the Nobles and gentlemen of Rome, entered at the one end of the bridge and road to the other; and lying one night vpon it, the next day hee returned, riding in a Chair or drawne by most excellent faire horses, in manner of a triumph. DION writeth, that the night when he lay vpon the bridge, he caused such an infinite number of Torches, Lant-hornes, and other lights to be lighted and set vp, as the cleerenes thereof did exceed the darknes of the night, of all that side of the mountaine neere adioyning, CALIGVLA boasting that he had made of the night, day; and of the Sea, land. And spending herein two whole daies (in all which time the Sea happened to be still and calme) he said; that Neptune (whom they held for the god of the Seas) did it for feare, and to do him reuerence. The fruite

Peace with the King of Parthia.

A wonderfull bridge, made by Caligula.

F

which

Caligula his gesture and disposition of bodie.

which ensued of this strange follie, was great famine and scarcitie of corne, and other necessities, for that the ships were staied about this bridge, to make the which there were employed an incredible number. Such like benefits as this, did euer follow the actions of CALIGVLA. Wherefore before I speake of the rest, to say the truth, it is to be understood, that many were of opinion, that to this man was giuen a certaine drinke by his wife, whose name was CESONIA, wherewith the made him mad and distract of his wits; shee giuing it him, to the end he should loue her: for hauing been at other times married he had put away his wives; so as his cruelty and riots were by som attributed to his foolishnes & want of wit. Of this opinion is Iosephus in the 18. booke of his Antiquities, and the Poet IUVENAL with SYRTONIVS; and they say that after he had taken this drinke, CALIGVLA slept not by day nor night about three houres; and rising sometimes affrighted, it seemed to him that he saw apparitions and visions: adding this to his peruerse condition and nature, hee suffered himselfe to be led by her, and committed outrages without number or measure, which I know not how to set downe in any order: among which hee shewed himselfe so haughtie and vainglorious, as he despised all men.

In the end (besides that hee was the first of the Emperours which caused himselfe to be called Lord) he purposed to be honoured as a God, or to say better, a Diuell, and made himselfe to be adored, taking first vpon him names neuer thought nor heard of, calling himselfe father of Armes, Optimus & maximus, with other epithetes, which they gaue to their god IVPITER only. And certaine Kings in his presence which came to visit him, and to doe him honour, being at contention among themselves about the antiquitie and nobilitie of their houses and linages, he interrupted, repeating a verse out of HOMER in the person of VLYSSES, which saith, That neither is, nor ought to be, but one King and Lord; and had then taken a Crowne and Diademe of a King, but that he was giuen to vnderstand, that his owne was a more high estate and dignitie. Neuertheless, he determined with his pride and clation to vsurpe the dignitie which he held for diuine, and caused to be caried before him the statue of IVPITER, & some others, which (as PLINIVS recounteth) the Romanes vsed to haue with heads to be taken off and on, to the end they might serue for diuers gods; and taking away those heads which they had, he caused other heads to be set on, to his owne likenes: but in my opinion it had beene better they had cut off his head and set it thereon. Besides this, he caused a temple to be built, and robe dedicated to his name and honor, and made his statue at Life to be set vp therein, which they called Iconium, and he instituted Priests to serue him: and this his image to be every day clothed in such attire, as himselfe did weare. Also he caused Peacocks, Peafants, and an infinite number of other princely birds to be sacrificed in this Temple, as in other Temples of the gods of the Gentiles was vsed; with whom he sought to make himselfe equall: which truly was no great matter: for they all were diuels, Impostures and deceits.

But considering the opinion and conceit which they then held, it was a presumption neuer heard nor thought of, which cameto bee accounted a ridiculous foolishnesse: for presuming much vpon his deitie, hee came forth one night by Moonelight (shee being then at the full) and wooed and made loue to her, as if shee had beene a faire Ladie. Sometimes hee would also goe to the Temple of IVPITER, and ioyning himselfe close to the Image, hee made shew as though hee had spoken in his care: and sometimes hee layd his care to the Image, as though it should speake to him: and sometimes hee made as though hee were very angry, chiding, and threatening to send it into Gracia: and afterwards hee would saue himselfe to be pacified, and that he was contented that they two should dwell together: and in this manner hee proceeded to a thousand idle fooleries, although they were diuellish. And on the other side, this man which presumed to displace the gods and to make himselfe one of them, shewed his enuie to men; grieuing to see their statues and memories honored, commanding many of them to be ouerthrowne, and defaced. He practised and was desirous to disgrace the poems of HOMER and of VIRGIL, and in like manner the histories of the excellent historiographer TITVS LIVIVS, and commanded his image to be taken out of the Libraries in Rome, where they vsed to keepe the Images and pictures of great and excellent learned men. Of VIRGIL he said, that he was a man without any wit, and lesse learning; and TITVS LIVIVS he reprooued for a man of many words, and negligent; of SENECA (who in that time was much esteemed, and with great reason) he sayd that hee was faine without labour, and a vvorke made without mixture: and so did he taxe the most sublime and excellent wittes. Besides vvhich, hee tooke from many Patricij and Noblemen of Rome the Armes and Ornaments which they bare of their Linages and Families: and his enuy yet descended descended to lighter and meaner matters then these, so as there was no man (were he neuer so base) whom hee enuied not for any prosperity or good success that might happen vnto him; as to make men to be haunen, if he saw they had yellow or faire coloured haire.

Now for matters of lasciuiousnesse and dishonestie, truly there is so much to be sayd, as a man may not; neither ought to make the whole relation thereof; to the end that his filthynesse doe not soyle and corrupt our Historie: for it is certaine that he was as filthy and abominable, as his predecessor, TIBERIVS, if not more. Hee was so shamelesse in his incontinencie and lust as he respected neither persons nor place. He abused all his Sisters; of which (it is thought) hee deslowed DRYANILLA being a Virgine, himselfe but a very boy. Shee being afterwards married to LYCIVS CAISIVS LONGINVS, a man of singular degree, hee tooke her from him and kept her openly, as if shee had been his lawful wife, and being sicke he made her heire of all his goods, and his successor in the Empire; but she dying hee sorrowed with impatience. His other Sisters LYTIA and AGRIPPINA, hee neither loued nor respected, but would of ten prostitute them to his owne stale: Caramitis. And in the end hee comprehended them to exile with EMILIUS LEPIDVS, as Adultresses, and priuy toyeasons against his person. Neither was any Roman Maron (how honorable or virtuous soeuer) free from his pollution. He would vsually inuite them with their husbands to supper: and if any one liked him, he would rise from the table, and call her to him into another roome, and there abuse her, and then presently returne againe and bragge of his fowle fact.

In other vices hee was beyond all measure passionate, being extreme in extremities, the one against the other: for he was greedie and couetous in extreme manner; and of the other side, prodigall and a spender aboue all measure. To glut his greedy couetousnes hee invented meanes to gather wealth, and to rob the land and the people: so as there was no kinde of tribute or imposition to be deuised which he put not in practice, even amongst common & dishonest women; and of all suites in law, hee had the fourth part of any sum that was recovered; and if the parties agreed before sentence giuen, he had a certaine portion: and so in all matters wherein any thing was to be gotten, hee tooke a share, even of those which were porters and got money by carrying of burthens vpon their shoulders. And hauing amass'd together an infinite sum, by direct and indirect meanes, hee would lie downe and tumble vpon it, recreating himselfe in his couetousnes: wherein he shewed great simplicitie, seeing how little hee did otherwaies esteeme it, and his lawlesse expences, as the most prodigall man that euer was, which a man may easily iudge by these few examples following. Into the bathes wherein they did vse to bathe, hee caused most precious and sweete smelling oynments to be cast which were of exceeding great price, that they might bathe in them, hot and cold; as in other water. In the leafs and baskets which he made, hee commanded most precious pearles and iewels to be dissolved in most strong vinegar, and to be put into their meate, because the cost should be inestimable: and hee commanded that all the seruices in steede of meat, bread, flesh, fish, and fruires, should be of fine golde for his guests. Besides this, hee sometimes cast among the people great summes of money: whereby it seemeth they had reason, which attribute the doings of this man to foolishnesse, as well as to his ill disposition. There was so great varietie in his actions, affections and desires, as may be gathered by that which is already said, and the rest which we will declare; as on the one side hee contemned the gods, and presumed himselfe to be one of them, and yet he was so afraid of a thunder clap that hee ranne and hid himselfe vnder a bed. Sometimes hee was very familiar, and called men to conuerse with him, seeming to be much delighted with their companie and conuersation: at other times hee shunned them, and retired himselfe to his wokes. He sometimes dispatched matters with such expedition and diligence, as he seemed to be the most quicke and active man in the world, and at other times, with such slacknes and leisure, as he seemed not to be the man which he was before. Many which committed heinous crimes, he punished not: and others hee commanded to be slaine, which had done no offence. He would this day praise one thing: and the next day, he would peraduenture cause him to be slaine which spake well thereof. Finally, he was so variable that (as DRIDON reporteth) men knew not what to doe, nor say, his conditions were so doubtfull. The like hee did in his apparel, in his exercises, and in all his other actions: for procuring one thing, hee would doe cleane contrarie; as we said in robbing and heaping treasure together, hee would spend so prodigally that those treasures should not suffice for his expences. Besides what is already said, authors affirme that hee commanded certaine ships to be built, which were the greatest and most costly that euer were seene, of which all the timber was of Cedar, and the poups and sternes of Iurie set with gold and precious stones, and all the sailes and tackling were of silke of diuers colours : they were so great, as they had in them halles and gardens, wherein were many trees and flowers : in one of these shippes, he sailed along the coast of Zeples one whole day, to disport himselfe. He also began certaine buildings and workes against all reason and humane discretion, and such as seemed impossible. For in the sea he commanded huge pillars and towers to be built, and by land he raised certaine valleyes, & made them equall with the mountaines, heaping vp rocks and earth in them, vntill they were euen therewith. And in other places, he began to digge downe mountaines to make them leuell with the meadowes, presuming to correct the workes of nature.

As CAIUS CALIGVLA was fowariable and inconstant, as we have said, so in crueltie only he was constant, vsing it indifferently to all without respect of parentage or friendship : in the like manner he vsed his grandmother ANTONIA daughter to GERMANICVS, so as the being in despair, tooke poison whereof he died. And the yong TIBERIUS Nephew to the Emperor TIBERIUS, and sonne to DRVSVS (as I haue said) he making shew to loue him, liuing secure and without feare, he sent to kill him by the hands of a Tribune, for no other cause, but for that he vsed a certaine kinde of confection of sweete sauours for his delight: CALIGVLA saying, that he did it, for feare to be poisoned. And SILVANVS, (who had bene his father in law,) he forced to kill himselfe, only for that he went not one day to sea, with him. Which SILVANVS did forbear, because the sea made him sicke. And PTOLOMIUS the sonne of IVDA King of Mauritania, to whom he was neere allied, and MARC which had holpen him to get the Empire, and others with whom he was in great league and friendship, in requitall of their services he caused them to be cruelly put to death. To all men generally, both in word & deede he vsed such crueltie, as it would seeme incredible, had not so many and such authors written the same : for he commanded wild beasts which hee kept for feasts and triumphs, to be fatted with the bodies of liuing men, condemned to death. And sometimes causing some to be executed, he commanded their parents and kinned to be present at their execution, and then invited them to eate with him, and compelled them to discourse of pleasant matters. He also qualified his cruelties, with sundrie kindes of deaths which he inflicted, prolonging it, to the end that the torment should be the greater: So as they stood in so great feare of this man, that many (if they had oportunitie) slew themselves rather then they would stay for his sentence : among which the accursed PONTIVS PILATE, who condemned to death the giuer of life IHSVS CHRIST our Redeemer, was one, who being accused and banished, slew himselfe with his owne hands.

This wretched CALIGVLA was so nussed in blood, as he much desired and wished that all the Romane people had had but one head, to the end that he might cut off that heade at one blowe. He also held the time of his raigne unfortunate, & complained of the infelicities thereof, for that in his daies there was no pestilence, famine, earthquakes, deluges, spoiles by fire or other misfortunes.

There came by chance one day into his presence, a man who had been banished by the Emperor TIBERIUS, of whom hee asked what life hee led in his exile: the other to flatter him, answered, that he spent his time in praying for the death of TIBERIUS, to the end he should be Emperor : which when CALIGVLA heard (as he had banished a great number of men) he beleued that they all made the like prayer for him, & therefore commanded to many of them as could be found, to be fought out and slaine. Vsing these cruelties and such like, or greater, he made himselfe within few dayes so hatefull, as his death was generally desired, and practised by some : but the conspiracies against him being discovered, it deferred his death, although but for a small time, which was as he deferred, as we will presently declare. But first we will speake of the wars & conquests which he made, wherein he shewed no lesse vanitie then in all the rest. For vpon a sodaine at the end of the third yeere of his raigne, he caused a great number of men of warre to be leuiued, wherewith he departed from Rome, giuing it out that he went to make warre in Germanie whether he tooke his iourney : whereto he added the ordinarie legions, which were in those parts, and with a shew and apparance to doe some great exploit with his armie, he passed the riuer of Rhine: and he began to make warre at such time as it seemed to all men (considering his great number of men, and the resolution wherewith he came) that he would haue overrunne the world, and haue made some great conquest: but he contented himselfe with this, that the Kings son of Batania (which is now called Holland) being in disgrace with his father, came to his seruice, and herewith hauing done some small harme in that countrie, he returned, and passed the riuer: And after he had giuen some alarmes, he tooke his way with his armie towards the

the sea; and in memorie of his victorie, he there commanded a tower to be built, and all his souldiers to gather abundance of cockle shelles, as the spoyles of his enemies : and then calling his armie together, in such manner as captaines vse to doe after some notable victorie, he made a long oration vnto them, and commended them all, and afterwards he commanded a great some of money to be distributed amongst them, ouer and aboue their pay.

Returning to Rome, he sent before, to command that there should be prepared a most solemn triumph; carrying with him to that effect, certaine Barbarians his enemies, such as he could get; but afterwards he altered his determinatio, deferring the triumph vntill another time, and entred into Rome in ouacian triumph, and there began againe to execute some of his accustomed cruelties, purposing to haue done greater. Which the world being vnable to endure, many conspired against him : he which did most therein, and the first that began to practise, was a Tribune of the Pretorian Cohorts, whose name was CHEREA : he died of thirtie wounds which they gaue him, in a vault or secret gallerie, wherein he vsed to passe vsene, from his palace to certaine bathes, hauing most vnworthily raigued three yeeres and ten months, in the nine and twentieth yeere of his age.

The manner of his death, besides SVETONIUS, DION and others, is written by the true Historiographer IOSEPHVS : to whom I referre the curious reader to make an end of so brutish a monster, as was CAIUS CALIGVLA.

This happened in the three and fortieth yeere of CHRIST our Lord. After that he was dead, there died the same day CRONIA his wife, and one only daughter which he had : and notwithstanding that the Almaines which were of his garde fell to armes, & would haue slaine the conspirators, and did kill some of them, yet in the end all was pacified, and his death was generally approved, as of a Tyrant and most cruel Prince, in like maner as the death of such Kings and Princes is vsually approved & pleasing, whose liues haue been detestable and odious. It is certainly knowne, that when CALIGVLA was slaine, he had purposed to haue put many to death : for in his closet or priuy chamber, were found two bookes; whereof the one was called the poiniard, and the other the sword, wherein were written the names of a great number of Senators and Knights of Rome whom he had condemned to death.

There was also found a chest full of diuers kindes of poysons, such were the relikes and jewels of this wicked man. In this short time wherein CAIUS CALIGVLA raigued, the name and faith of CHRIST was published and preached in a great part of the world, the holy Apostles Saint PETER and Saint PAUL preaching the same; and particularly in Iudea Saint MATTHEW, who first of all wrote the Gospell.

THE LIFE OF CLAVDIVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FIFT ROMANE EMPEVOVR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

Claudius the sonne of Drusus, and Uncle to Caligula, obtained the Empire more through the temeritie of the souldiers, then for any worthe acts done for his country: for Caligula being dead the Senate resolved to extirpate the race of the Caesars, and to restore Rome to her ancient liberties, and a wish many armed men had seized upon the Capitoll. Whereupon he standing in great feare seeing so great a tumult (as commonly it happeneth vpon inuasion in States) and being by nature fearefull, and a coward, he hid himselfe in a secret place of the palace, where being found by a souldier which by chance came to seeke for pillage, he was by him reserued, and hailed Emperor. This souldier being seconded by others who together with the people desired a prince, in the end maugre the Senate they made him Emperour in which dignitie he carried himselfe in the beginning with such modestie and Caligula more cruel, and in what manner.

Grand buildings.

The crueltie of Caligula.

The conquests and vaine war of Caligula.

Batania, Holland.

and humanitie, as all men began to assure themselves of an excellent government: but he continued not long in that good disposition: for through his little care, the naturall vices of his minde encreasing, he despayned the world of the hope conceived of him, and in short space became both luxurious, cruel, a drunkard, and a glutton. He had many wives, but above all the rest Messalina was so incontinent and so infamous, as her filthines cannot be written without vnderstand and immodest words. This Emperor was so forgetfull, as he remembered not in the evening what he had done in the morning by reason whereof he did oftentimes cause those to be called to eat, or play with him, whom he had commannded to be slain: and amongst others, he asked wherefore his wife Messalina came not to dinner: having but a little before caused her to be put to death. He caused with excessive charge the lake Fucinus to be dried up, wherein before that it was drained, he made an infinite number of men (condemned to die) to fight a manle hatt-ail. He subdued Mauritania which rebelled against him: and in his old age tooke his wife Agrippina the mother of Nero: who perceiving that he was not greatly affected to her sonne, as a woman desirous to make him to succede in the Empire, poisoned him in certaine Musburups which he loved to eat, alleging that they were meate for the gods, for that they grew of their own accord, whose death was conceded by Agrippina, whilst she had confirmed her sonne for his successor in the Empire. He lived sixtie and foure yeeres, and reigned fourteene; his death was not greatly lamented, for that his life was not much beloved.

By the death of Caius Caligula, his Vncle CLAVDIVS, and brother to his father the good GERMANICVS sonne of DRYVS and sonne in law to OCTAVIANVS, had the Empire. But the manner how hee attained thereto was very strange, and therefore worthie to be related. The sodaine death of CALIGULA caused great alteration and confusion in the citie of Rome, as soone as it was published. Some would not beleue it, seeing it was done in a secret place, imagining that it was a matter fained by him; thereby to discouer every mans affection towards him. The conspirators, as they did not practice his death to the end that any of them should aspire to the Empire, neither for any other man, but onely to free the common-wealth from so cruell a Tyrant, had more care for their owne safeties then to make chioise of a new Emperor. The Consuls as soone as they were certified of his death, assembled the Senate; and being terrified with the miseries past, resolved to reduce the citie of Rome to her ancient libertie, and to extinguish the name of CÆSARS and the Monarchie, and persevering in this determination, they feiled on the Capitoll, with opinion of the Cohorts of the citie, which had the garde of the palace, who were also of their opinion. But herein were diuers opinions in the citie: for the common people would haue a head and an Emperor, for the hatred which they euer bare to the Senate, and for that the least part of the euils and cruelties committed by the Emperors, fell vpon them; and also for that they enjoyed and tasted of the feasts and larges which the Emperors vfed to make. The men of war of the pretorian Cohorts which were lodged hard by Rome, desired there should be an Emperor; because they were in hope to make choyse of him at their pleasure, and in regard of the rewards and priuileges which they inioyed from the Emperors. But the matter remaining in this confusion, neither the one nor the other knew who to nominate.

It happened that CALIGULA being dead, CLAVDIVS was in so great feare of his life, as he dared not goe forth of the Imperiall palace, neither openly to shew himselfe. But being amazed and in this feare, he went to hide himselfe in the most secret place he could finde, but certaine souldiers running vp and downe to take what they could finde, it chaunced that one of them found him, seeing his feetes: who to the end hee might know who he was, vncouered him, and knew him. And CLAVDIVS imagining himselfe to bee fought for to bee slaine, cast himselfe at the souldiers feetes, desiring him to saue his life: whereof the souldier assured him, & presently resolved to name him Emperor: who gathering together those which came with him, they all did the like: and taking him vpon their shoulders, they carried him in a litter to their Campe; where (trembling in great feare) he knew not to what issue this would come. But he was well intreated in the Campe, & the souldiers agreed to make him Emperor. The Consuls and Senate hearing he was carried to the Campe, in such manner as aforesaid, sent him requiring him by a tribune of the people, to come to the Senate, and there to treat of such matters as should bee for the common good. Whereunto he answered, that hee was there detained by force and could not come. It chaunced that at this time, HERODE AGRIPPA King of Iudea, was in Rome: whom (as is aboue said) CAIUS CALIGULA had restored to the Kingdom, which in right had belonged to his vncle ARCHELAVS, & to his grandfather HERODE, which slew the Innocents.

This

This HERODE shewing himselfe a newter, began to mediate an agreement betwene CLAVDIVS and the Senate, although that secretly he fauored CLAVDIVS, counselling him to be resolute, and not to submit himselfe to the Senate. One whole day and a night was spent without any resolution, during which time CLAVDIVS wauered betwene hope and feare: the next day the people began openly to demande an Emperor, and many abashed the Senate and Consuls; so as there followed much trouble (which IOSEPHVS noteth.) But at length, seeing that the succession in the Empire more rightly appertained to CLAVDIVS, then to any other, they all agreed to make him Emperour: and the Senate went vnto him, and the Cohorts tooke the oath, and did their accustomed homage, hee making many large promises; and so the Senate accepted and confirmed him. And thus he obtained the Empire of the world, who but a day before knew not where to find a place to hide himselfe, for the safety of his life.

When CLAVDIVS attained to the Empire, he was fiftie yeeres old, hauing euer liued poorly and little esteemed, notwithstanding that hee was neer of kinne to the Emperours, and had passed great daungers and perils, without any office or dignitie; hauing some few moneths the Consulship, wherein by CAIUS CALIGULA he was admitted for his companion. He was a man of a tall stature, neither fat nor lean, of a faire and pleasing countenance; and whether he ate or stood, he euer shewed a greatnes, representing maiestie: whereto his faire gray haire was a great ornament. He had so little strength in his knees as he went weakly, and as though he were carelesse. And when he was angry, he was so much alured therewith, as the teares would fall from his eyes, and he stammered in his speech, besides all which, his head did euer shake. He was a sickly man: but being once Emperor, he was cured of his infirmities, except the paine of the stomacke, which sometimes troubled him very much. He was learned both in the Greeke and Latin tongues, and wrote bookes and histories. He also tooke vpon him to adde three letters to the Latin Alphabet: but as a matter superfluous they continued nor.

CLAVDIVS is numbred among the bad Emperours, for his vices and the great cruelties which he committed, suffering himselfe to be gouerned by certaine enfranchised men which were his fauorites: yet he did many things befitting a wortheie Prince, which were profitable, as PAVLVS OROSIVS in some sort seemeth to defend his actions.

Beginning to take the gouernment vpon him, notwithstanding that there were diuers opinions, & many both attempted and spake much against him; The first thing he did, was to giue a generall pardon, and to commaund all things past to be buried in perpetuall silence and oblivion: yet for example, and to feare others to attempt the like, he commaunded iustice to be done on CHERBA the captaine of the conspirators & vpon some of the rest, who suffered death with great courage, and resolution, making mention of BRVVS and CASSIVS, who slew IVLIVS CÆSAR; CHERBA desiring that he might be slaine with the same sword wherewith he had slaine CALIGULA. CLAVDIVS shewed himselfe mercifull to all which had offended him, and were opposites in his election: and disannulled all the cruel edicts made by CALIGULA. He also commaunded to be deliuered out of prison, & to be released from banishment, all those which vniuilly, or for small causes did endure the same: among which he released from banishment CALIGULA'S sisters and neeces. And to HERODE AGRIPPA King of Iudea (in requital of the manes he vsed to aduance him to the Empire) he gaue the Tetrarchie of Galile, which CAIUS CALIGULA had taken from his vncle HERODE ANTIPAS, who had put S. Iohn Baptist to death, and was an actor in the death of our Saviour. This HERODE AGRIPPA was of great state, and honoured in Ierusalem: where putting S. IAMES to death, and persecuting the Apostles and Primitive Church, he was stricken by the Angell of God, and died as S. LUKES reciteth in the Acts of the Apostles. And of these three HERODES died an euill death. Of this AGRIPPA, & his vncle HERODE Tetrarcha, called ANTIPAS (who put Saint Iohn to death, and in whose time our Saviour died; and the other HERODE the great, who slew the Innocents, in whose time CHRIST was borne) I haue twice made mention, because the HERODES commonly breed a confusion in reading of the Scriptures, not distinguishing the one from the other.

Returning to the Emperor CLAVDIVS (I say) that touching the ceremonies, names and titles, which for honour the Romanes were wont to giue to their Emperours, he shewed himselfe very discreet and temperate, & would not accept of many of them: and forbod vpon great penalties, that none should do sacrifice to him, as they had done to CAIUS CALIGULA: and so in the beginning of his Empire, he did these and such like as a good Prince. Among which, one was, that he had an especial care that Rome should be continually well provided of wheat

F 4.

Clavdivs offeth by Herode de Agrippa.

Lib. 19. c. 30j

Clavdivs his gillure and sodity disposition.

Clavdivs was learned in the Greeke and Latintongue.

Cherba did courageously.

Herode Antipas which put
S. Iohn Baptist to death, died miserably in exile at Lo-m in France.
Herode Agrippa a great persecutor of the Gospell, was stricken by the Angell of God.
Chap. i. c. 1.
Three Herodes.
Herode Alcalontra was he which murdered the Innocents, & died of death naturall.

The Senate
sought to reduce the citie
to her ancient liberty.

The common people and men of warre would haue an Emperor.

The wonderfull buildings of Claudius.

Plin. lib. 36.
cap. 15.

wheat and graine, warranting the Merchants against all dangers and pirats by Sea : and herein (although afterwards he committed many errors) he was ever diligent and carefull during his life. CLAVDIVS was also a great lover of sumptuous buildings : among which there were three so proud and stately, that it seemeth they excelled the most of all that ever were in the world ; and for such, PLINVS, SVETONIVS, and most authors doe account them. The one was a marvellous Conduit or Aqueduct of water, which after his name was called Claudia, with which none of the Conduits in Rome could compare, either for abundance of water, or for cost and excellencie of the workmanship : for it was brought fortie miles from Rome, by mines and passages thorough mountains ; and in low valleys, by erecting most high Arches of a wonderful charge ; and so was it caried & mounted to the top of the highest hills in Rome. The other worke was a Hauens of the Sea made by hand, in the citie of Osia, the which was capable of a great number of ships, made in the firm land ; and afterwards he let the Sea into it (as Dion reporteth) hauing first fortified and made firme the bottome thereof : in truth a marvellous worke, and such as his posteritie and those which succeeded him werenot able to maintaine.
His third worke (although lesse profitable, yet most costly of all the rest ;) was to drein and laie drie a great Lake called Fucinus, in the countrey of the Marsi, a people negre to Rome, which was the greatest Lake in all Italie : the which he did (as some say) to bring that water into the River of Tiber, to make it greater with the current thereof, and to driue vp and lay open the fields, which that water couered, to the end they might be tilled. Which to effect, among other difficulties and infinit toile, he mined through a very high mountaine of flint, three miles in length ; a worke which seemed impossible, being (as I said) a mine thorough a rock. Finally, how great and admirable this worke was, may appear by the time which it continued, and the labourers which wrought therein, which (as some authors affirme) were 30000 men, which laboured eleuen yeeres without ceasing ; a matter which seemeth incredible : so as besides the rest, if EVSEBIVS (a most Christian and true author) had not written it, I durst not report nor beleue it. What end this worke and labour had, shall be related in his place : for (as I sayd) although it began in the beginning of his reigne, it was ended eleuen yeeres after. I also forbear to speake of other his buildings, which although they were excellent, yet not comparable to the above named.

A wonderfull
worke.

Hauing begun and continued these workes, he was not carelesse for the reformation of euill customes and abuses within Rome, and abroad, and in some other matters : wherein if he had per-seuered, he had bin worthily held for an excellent Prince. But afterwards by reason of his great liberty, and wickednes of his favorites and such as were inward with him, (by whom he was much overruled) he became so dissolute, that it defaced and stained all his former actions, as hereafter shall be declared. Besides that which is already spoken, this made the beginning of his reigne the more famous, that in the first, second or third yeeres thereof (as EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, BEDA, and S. ISIDORE report) S. PETER the Apostle came to Rome, and there seated himselfe, after he had preached in diuers parts, but principally had remained in Antioch eleuen yeeres : and being come thither, remained there twentie five yeeres, vntill the end of the Emperour Nerva, as shall be specified : they also affirme, that with S. PETER came the Euangelist S. MARK, and being by him informed, and enspired with the holie Ghost, he wrote the Gospell, by whose direction he returned to preach CHRIST in Alexandria, of whom, and of the other holie Apostles and Disciples of CHRIST, of their miracles, martyrdomes, & what success they had, I make little mention, because (as I haue said) in a pro-phane historie, as this is, I hold it not fit to insert diuine and holy matters, although that in briefe there shall be mention made of that which shall be most conuenient for the light of this historie and the general good.

To returne to our discourse of CLAVDIVS, it passed in this manner, that in the fourth yeer of his reigne, notwithstanding that the Emperors power was then so great and so much re-doubted, as no Nation of the world durst beare armes against him : yet the inhabitants of the Iland of Britaine, which IULIVS CÆSAR had subdued, did boldly rise in armes, and denie their obedience and vassalage : which the Emperour CLAVDIVS tooke to ill, as he resolved in person to vnderake the enterprize to subdue and pacifie them. For which action (besides the ordinarie legions) he assembled a great Naue by Sea, and a great armie by land ; and purposing to goe by Sea, he embarked the same in the Port of Osia, notwithstanding that the passage was farre about : but in the beginning of his voyage he was so ouertaken with a tempest, as he was in daunger to haue been cast away. Wherefore he disembarked his forces in the citie of Marselles in

The Emperour Claudius his conquering into England.

The Brittaines rebelled against Claudius.

in France, and altering his determination, crossed through France, & shipping himself againe night ouer against England, he passed into the Iland with fo great a power, that he easily pacified all :
yet (as DION testifieth) he came to a battaile with the Brittaines, wherein he ouercame them. But the common opinion is as I say, and so doth GILLES, an ancient true English Historiographer of 960. yeeres continuance, record. The journey into Britannie being ended to his content, he sent his Nauy into the Ilands called Orades, which lie to the North of Scotland, & are now subiect to the King of great Britanny, which within few daies he subdued & made subiect to the Empire :
which vntill that time were vnknowne to the Romanes, as EVSEBIVS and OROSIVS record.
Hauing performed all these things in the space of fixe months, he returned towards Rome, where he entred triumphing with the greatest solemnitie that could be, & to him was giuen the name of BRITANNICVS, for subduing the Ile of Britanny. To the solemnity of this triumph, SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS reporteth, that he not only suffered the Governours & Prefects of prouin-ces to come to Rome, but also he releast many others who liued in exile, from their banishment.

For this victorie, he caused a crowne newall to be made, which was vfed to be giuen for victories by sea, which crowne was of gold wrought with the prowes of gallies and ships, and placed ouer the gate of the imperiall palace, hard by that which ordinarily did stand there made of oken boughs, called Cuius ; and for the same reason he commanded that a sonne of his, which hee had by his wife MESSALINA, whose name was GERMANICVS, should be called BRITANNICVS : And in this triumph he began to honor with armes & other fauours some of his libertines, which had been slaues and were enfranchised and set at libertie, and did them so great honor, as men began to murmur against him, and thereby he made himselfe ill beloued.
For they committed many insolencies and wrongs, by means of their great riches and autho-ritie : of which the chiefeft and most spoken of, were fixe or seauen, one named DIONONVS, to whom he gaue for his armes, the triumph afore said ; another, whose name was FELIX, he made gouernour and prefect of Iudea, Samarita, and Gallie, by means of the death of HERODVS AGRIPPA, before which FELIX we read in the acts of the Apostles that Saint PAUL was brought prisoner. Another called CALIXTVS, of whom PLINY, SENECA, and CONELIVS TACITVS make mention. Another was POLYBIVS, who was a learned man, whom CLAVDIVS himselfe held for his companion, and as it were maister of his studies, to whom SENECA wrote a consolatorie epistle for the death of his brother. Another named NARCISVS, whom hee made his Secretarie, whom SVETONIVS preferreth before all the rest. Another was PALANTE, a man also very famous : to all which he did such fauours and gaue so excessive gifts, as they attained to such riches, that CLAVDIVS vpon a time complaining that his treasure & exchequer was poore, he was answered, That it would be rich enough, if his freed men NARCISVS and PALANTE would accompany him, and share with him in their trade and stocke. Within short space he made himselfe so subiect, and was so much overruled by these Libertines, and his adulterous and dishonest wife MESSALINA, to whom he was now married (after other wiues which he had had) that by their directions and counsels he committed many disorders, follies and wrongs, more like their slaue and subiect, then their Prince and Soueraigne, and suffered others to commit the like ; pardoning such grievous offences and committing such cruelties, as it would be long and displeasing to right them all. But by that which he committed against his owne bloud, which I will declare, the rest may be con-iectured which I passe in silence. One of the first and most notable, was the death of APPIVS SILANVS a worthy noble Roman, who sometimes had been gouernour of Spain, and married with his owne mother in law, whose death was plotted by his wife MESSALINA, and his enfranchised NARCISVS. DION writeth, that hauing no cause whereof to accuse him, it sufficed to commaund him to be slaue, for that NARCISVS in a morning came into CLAV-DIVS chamber before he was vp, faining great haste and feare, perswading him to stand vpon his guard, and to take heed of APPIVS SILANVS : for he dreamt that night he was slaue ; and that SILANVS onely had killed him. The Emperour well pleased with the matter, went to the Senate, acquainting the Senators therewith ; much commending & extolling the loyal-tie of NARCISVS, that he euen sleeping had care of his life and health. After SILANVS, he also put to death his two sonnes in law, LVCIVS SILANVS and POMPEY, and two of his owne neeces called LIVIA, one of which was the daughter of DRVSVS, and the other of GERMANICVS ; no man knowing any cause wherefore he did it, nor admitting their defence.
And so were a great number of others put to death, all by the counsell and practice of MESSA-LINA and his freed men ; who bare such sway in the gouernment and counsell of estate, as they sold

A Crowne
newall.

The strange crueltie of Claudius.

fold offices, Captainships & dignities; and that which was worse, tooke money for absolutions, penalties, punishments and banishments: finally, all was to be sold for money. And the most part hereof was put in practice, (as some authors affirme) without the prudence of CLAVDIVS, or being acquainted therewith; so great was their power and authority. And in the like manner did hee put some to death, being abused, to please and content these his favorites; so subiect was he to be governed by them.

By means of the great disorders, murders, and grievances, which CLAVDIVS by the counsel and practice of his libertines and his wife MESSALINA committed, he made himselfe to be hated of many, and principally of the better sort; so as some practised his death, and conspired against him: although that for his other good deeds, before repeated, hee was beloved and much esteemed of others. But as those which hated him were more, and boulder in courage; so they feared not to practise his death which they wished him, chiefly two Romane Knights resolved to kill him, and STACIUS CORVINVS and GALLVS ASINIVS, two principal Romanes conspired against him. But the one and the other, being discovered, it was brought to light, and he prevented the danger by executing new cruelties upon the said parties; and upon such as had consented & participated with them: and seeing himselfe freed from this danger, he continued in his evill purposes and cruell courses. In like manner the hanged encasing against him, it happened that FVRIVS CAMILLVS SCRIBONIANVS, who was Lieutenant, and Governor of Dalmatia (incited by many principal men of Rome) openly rebelled against him: and the legions of that Province consenting with him, he called himselfe Emperour. This put CLAVDIVS into such a feare and amazement, as hee was much dejected and base minded: and as sinne and an evill conscience is one of the chiefest causes that maketh men cowardly and fearefull, hee was so daunted, that CAMILLVS (who rebelled) writing vnto him, and perswading him to leave the Empire and to live private, he remained doubtfull what to do, and caused certaine principal men to consult thereof: So as if the matter had gone forwards, it seemeth that he would haue had small courage to haue defended the Empire. But as CAMILLVS had no more right thereto; then he, & as his purpose was not to redresse the Empire and reforme the evils committed by CLAVDIVS, but to make himselfe lord & tyrant, and peradventure do as ill or worse, God would not suffer it to take effect according to his desire: for it happened that the same legions which had raised & chosen him, repenting of what they had done, the fifth day after flue him, some Authors, (among which are SVETONIVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS) report, that herein hapned a strange accident: for the Ensigne-bearers coming to giue their oath and obedience to the new Emperour by his commandement, were not able to remove the Ensignes with the Eagles from the place where they were set; so as moved by this prodigious spectacle, they all concluded to submit themselves to CLAVDIVS deuotion, and to stay CAMILLVS. And so was CLAVDIVS deliuered from this danger, but not from feare and jealousy, but liued ever after in continuall disquiet and feare; inasmuch as being one day in the temple offering his sacrifices (as then was the custome) and by chance finding a sword, which some man peradventure without any ill intent had brought thither, and there forgotten it, he as a man which knew that he had deserved death, fearing all men, thinking that it was brought thither to effect some treason against him, was in such a perplexitie and feare, as presently in great haste he commanded the Senate to be assembled; and with teares in his eyes, he complained vnto them, publishing himselfe to be a man of most miserable condition and unhappie, and that he was at no time nor in any place assured, but in danger; and so held himselfe many dayes retired, and came not abroad.

By means of these things which were attempted against CLAVDIVS, MESSALINA his wife and her favorites and confederates, tooke occasion to put many men to death, and to confiscate their goodes, using other cruelties to all manner of people, alledging that they were guilty of the conspiracies aforesayd, or of some of them; and this in a most wicked manner: for many vpon suspicion without any tryall or prooffe, were condemned and put to death; and to the contrary, others which were guiltie, by bribes and gifts were freed: wherein although that for the most part CLAVDIVS was abused by those he most trusted, yet the blame was layd vpon him, and the world hated him for it. For besides the remisse forgetfulness which he had of all things, and the trust which he reposed in such wicked people, he shewed himselfe cruell and bloodie; for oftentimes he would be present when torments were inflicted, and at the execution of these cruelties: a thing vnworthy of the state & dignitie which he held. He would sometimes also sodainly be in such a rage, as hee seemed to be out of his wits: and so SVETONIUS

Furius Camillus rebelled against Claudius.

Furius Camillus flayed by the Legions.

The wickedness of Messalina.

NIUS accounteth his furie for follie and madnes, notwithstanding that CORNELIUS TACITVS writeth of him, that he was naturallie inclined to pitie and clemencie: so as in truth it is a strange thing to consider of the contrarietie of this mans minde. After all this (as I OSEPHVS, EVSEBIUS, and SVETONIUS affirme) in the ninth year of his reigne, he commanded all the Iewes to be cast out of Rome, whereof Saint Luke maketh mention in the Acts of the Apostles; and PAVLVS OROSIUS writing the same, maketh a doubt whether they were cast out for their discord with the Christians, or whether the Christians were expelled in the like manner: for SVETONIUS saith, that they were cast out for that there was some tumult about the Christian religion. The next year following there was a most grievous famine in Rome, and almost generally in all the world; whereof besides other Authors, Saint Luke maketh mention in the Acts of the Apostles.

CLAVDIVS hauing now reigned nine or tenne yeares, & matters passing there in such manner, as I haue said; yet the state and greatnes of the Romane Empire was not empaiied in his dayes (for hereof it seemeth both he and those which gouerned were careful) but it defended, and in part enlarged it selfe: For besides the pacifying of the Ile of Britanny, Mauritania also in his time rebelling (which is a Prouince in Africa, where there reigned Kings, friends and confederates with the people of Rome), he made warres there by his Captaines SVETONIUS PAVLINVS, & GNEVS STIDIVS GETA, as DION witnesseth. Those countries were subdued and diuided into two tributary Prouinces: the one was called Mauritania Caesariensis, which for the most part is this day the kingdome of Fez, but it extended it selfe so farre as Argiers, Tunes, and Oran; and the other Mauritania Tingitana, which is much of that which we call Morocco, and Barbaria, and the coast of Zale and Azamor, euen vnto Arzil and Tanzar. At that time the Prouince of Numidia was infested by certaine barbarous Africans, which were overcome by the ordinarie legions. In like manner the Imperiall authoritie was vpheld in the Prouinces of the East, CLAVDIVS placing therein Kings & Tetrarches at his pleasure; as DION recordeth. But besides all this, in all parts (as well as in Rome) they indured great vexations and oppressions, and the disorders which his favorites and libertines committed, and commanded to be committed were very great: of the greatest part whereof his wife was the chiefe instrument, who was so incontinent and dishonest, as she was not only a common aduresser, but she also procured and brought many others to be so: and she her selfe would play, and euen enforce men, and was of such credit with her husband the Emperour, and had such power ouer him, as no man durst make it knowne, or giue him intelligence thereof.

The dishonestie of this woman mounted to so high a pitch, that iudging (as it seemed) open adulterie to be but a light sinne, she deuised a wickednes neuer heard nor thought of before in such manner as she did it, which was to be married with another, euen as she was to the Emperour; and putting it in effect, CLAVDIVS being gone forth of Rome to Osia to doe certaine sacrifices, she married in forme and with the solemnities accustomed, with a Romane, whose name was CALVS SILIUS; whom they affirme to haue been the fairest and properest young man of his time.

The loue which CLAVDIVS bare to MESSALINA was so great, and the power she had ouer him such, as she thought that this might also passe in silence, or that he should dissemble it as he had done many other great abuses. But it now pleased God that she should receive punishment for all her misdeedes, as he oftentimes permitteth wicked men after some great sinnes, to commit other greater, to the end at once to be punished for all. And it was so, that his great friend and favorite NARCISSVS, a libertine before named, discouered this infamous act of CLAVDIVS, with a multitude of other villanies committed by her: who awaking in some sort out of his drowsie slumber and forgetfulness, notwithstanding that this action had put him in great feare; yet after that he was well informed of the truth, he came to Rome, finding first before him LVCIUS GETA, who was captaine of the pretorian Cohorts, to confirme them in his seruice; and being arrived, he caused his wife MESSALINA to be apprehended, and many others which were guiltie of this action: and by the diligent industrie of NARCISSVS iustice was done both vpon her and them. And so they were put to death by his direction before that CLAVDIVS commanded the same, notwithstanding that he had so resolutely feared that she with her counterfeite flatterings would so mollifie the heart of CLAVDIVS, as she might obtaine pardon, or that of himselfe he would alter his resolution, whereof he made some shew, as CORNELIUS TACITVS reporteth. It is a marvellous thing to thinke of the neglect and forgetfulness of this CLAVDIVS: for although they came and told him that MESSA-

A general famine.

The two Mauritaniae made tributary Prouinces.

Mauritania Caesariensis, the kingdome of Fez; Mauritania Tingitana, the kingdome of Morocco.

Messalina married with Calpurnius Silius during the life of Claudius.

The death of Messalina.

Claudius marries his daughter Octavia.

LINA was dead, he neuer spake word, neither asked by whom, nor how she died; neither then nor after that time seemed he to rejoyce or to be sorrowfull for it; neither spake word good nor bad. SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS addeth another thing to this forgetfulness, which seemeth incredible (but he and others of great authority affirme the same) which is, that the next day after that MESSALINA was put to death, sitting downe at the table to eate, he asked how it chanced that MESSALINA came not to dinner? The like hapned at other times concerning those which he had condemned and commanded to be slain, that hauing put them to death one day, the next day he was so forgetfull, as he hath sent for them and called them to his counsell, and others to come to play with him, as they had vsed to doe.

The Emperor CLAVDIVS remaining a widower after the death of his wife MESSALINA, by whom he had one son called first GERMANICVS, & afterward BRITANNICVS, and one daughter whose name was OCTAVIA, hee resolved and gave it out that he would marry no more, for that hee had bene very unfortunate in his wives: and therefore now in his old age hee would not try any more hazards; wherein he spake the truth: for in his youth he had bene twice married, first with EMLIA LEPIDA, who was great grandchild to the Emperor OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS; and the second time, with LIVIA MEDVLLINA CAMILLA, of the ancient lineage of the CAMILLI: the first wife, before his marriage tooke effect, hee put away; and the second died of an infirmite the same day which was appointed for their wedding: and afterwards he married with PLETTINA HERCVLANA, whom, after that he had by her one sonne named DRVVS (who died a child) hee forsooke, as dishonest and an adulteresse: and married the fourth time with ELIA PETINA, of the familie of the TVBBRONES, from whom, for some causes and discontents he was also divorced, notwithstanding that he had by her one daughter called ANTONIA. All these marriages he had before hee was Emperour; and when hee tooke upon him the Empire, hee was married to MESSALINA, whose death wee now made an end to relate: and although (as I said) that hee remained a widower, and had protested that he would marry no more, adding thereto that if he did, he gave them leave to kill him: yet afterwards forgetting himselfe (as in former time, of other matters) by the counsell of his libertine and favourite PALANTE, hee lastly married with IVLIA AGRIPPINA, who was exceeding beautifull, being his Niece, and daughter to his brother GERMANICVS, who was the widow of DOMICIVS NERO ENOBARVS, by whom she had a sonne named DOMICIVS NERO, as his father. And for that the marriage with his Niece within this degree of consanguinitie was prohibited and detestable among the Romans, he procured that a law should be made whereby it should be lawfull: and his new wife tooke such order with her old husband and uncle, that within few daies after that she was married, he obtained of him that he should marrie his daughter OCTAVIA, with her sonne DOMICIVS NERO; and that he should adopt him and make him his sonne, preferring him before his owne sonne BRITANNICVS; and that in stead of DOMICIVS NERO he should be called CLAVDIVS NERO, which was performed accordingly. And not content therewith, she procured the death of certaine Romane Ladies, which had bene her rivals for her marriage with CLAVDIVS (notwithstanding that they were favoured by NARCISSVS and CALIGVS, his freed men) the better to maintaine her greatness.

Having in this time finished that great worke of undermining the mountaines, & making those great Caves and Mines to draw the water out of the lake FUCINVS, wherein (as I said) thirtie thousand men had wrought eleven yeares: the Emperor CLAVDIVS decreed, that in memorie thereof, there should be in the same Lake a Naval battaile before that the water should bee let out, which did so much resemble a battaile in earnest, as therein were 24 Gallies, which were built there hard by for that purpose (DION writes there were fifty) which is not very unlikely; considering, the number therein, which, as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth, were 19000 men; many of which were slaves, or men condemned to death or banishment; the Emperour promising those which should preuaile and vanquish, life and liberty, and so they were commanded to fight to the vttermost: and to that purpose the Gallies and men were diuided into equall battailions; and their apparell, ensignes, banners, flagges and streamers were of diuers colours: the one part of them were called Sicilians, and the other Rhodians, as though the warres had been between Sicillia and Rhodes. To see this spectacle, there came an infinite number of people from all parts of Italy, and from out of Italy, which covered all the hills and mountaines neere to the sayd Lake, and the banks thereof. CLAVDIVS with his wife AGRIPPINA, and NERO CLAVDIVS his adopted sonne and Nephew were most richly attired in in gold, stone and pearle: and so the battaile began, and was maintained betwene them most cruel and bloodie, the poore men endeavouring of either part to haue the victorie, thereby to win life, libertie and honour: and so it was obitainely fought & continued a great part of the day, the one killing and wounding the other; and most miserably vntill at last the one part ouercame the other; and so was ended that most cruell and horrible sport. Which being ended, presently the next day CLAVDIVS commanded the passage of the Lake to be opened: and the water beginning to issue out, it brake forth with so great force and vehemencie, as it seemed that the earth would haue sunk; & it was so violent, as it did much harme in all the borders thereabout, and in like manner great was the feare and amazement of CLAVDIVS and his wife AGRIPPINA, who were there by, notwithstanding that they were ypon sure ground & in safety. This was the end of this costly vanitie.

These things being past in such sort as we haue written, AGRIPPINA seeing herselfe much made of, & beloued by the Emperour CLAVDIVS, being growing proud of the power and fauour wherein she saw herselfe (which are two things which few men can enjoy and vse moderately) she became so proud, haughty & ambitious (following the footsteps of MESSALINA) as she would command alone and beare all the sway in euery thing: whereupon the presently grew to be hated and enuied by some of CLAVDIVS his fauourites, yea and by himselfe; so as he began to be sorrie that euer he married her, or that euer he adopted his sonne in law NERO. Which AGRIPPINA soone discovered, as well for that he began to make much of his young son BRITANNICVS, as for words which he spake to the same effect: for vpon a day he said, That it was true he had euer beene unfortunate in his wives; but none of them had escaped unpunished: with other speeches to the same effect. Whereat AGRIPPINA grew into such feare and suspicion, as to assure her owne life, and the succession to her sonne, she determined to procure her husbands death by poyson, and there wanted no ministers nor meanes to accomplish the same. For although that Historiographers agree not herein, yet they all concurre that poyson was giuen him, such as killed him: & the most part write, that it was in Conshump, which was a meate he vsed to eat with great appetite.

It was the iust iudgement of God that CLAVDIVS should die by eating: for he was so gluttonous and insatiable in eating and drinking (among his other vices) as hee thought no time nor place sufficient thereto, and did euer eate so immoderately, that most commonly surfeiting, he vsed vomits to discharge his stomacke, putting a feather into his throat, a remedy which some gluttonous men doe vse, eating vpon assurance thereof, and carrying themselves more filthily, then if they felt sicke. In which feather some authors affirme that the poyson was giuen him. He died in the sixth & fiftith yeer after the birth of CHRISY our Saviour, in the 14. yeere of his raigne, and the 74. of his age, the 13. day of October about the breake of day, and his wife AGRIPPINA concealed his death the most part of that day: and pretending that he mended, she caused certaine vowes to be made for his health, vntill she had confirmed the Empire to her sonne NERO, according to his adoption, which (seeing they then thought CLAVDIVS to be liuing) was no hard matter to be effected.

In the time of this Emperour CLAVDIVS the Christian faith was preached, and did much preuaile in the world, the Apostle S. PAVL then preaching in Rome from the beginning of his raigne, although with great contradiction and difficultie. There happened also in his time a thing which all authors affirme, and chiefly EYSEBIVS, to be very straunge and wonderfull, which was, that betwene the Ile Thersa and Thersia in the Aegean Sea, there was discovered a new Island of three hundred furlongs in length, where before was nothing but water of an ordinarie depth, and no signe of any Island.

A wonderfull
passime, his cruell.

The Emperour
Claudius poy-soned by his wife Agrippi-na.

A new Island
in the sea.

THE LIFE AND ACTS OF THE EMPEROUR NERO, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SIXTH ROMAN

EMPEROUR.

THE ARGUMENT.

Claudius being dead and his death published, the Senate and people of Rome were sensible to Nero: who by the practise and cunning of his mother Agrippina, was made Emperour. This man for the first five yeeres carried himselfe so well, as all men sayd that a God was sent from heauen to gouerne Rome, notwithstanding that his mother of much cruelty, who ruled the Empire a long time. Nero afterwards growing in yeeres, and beginning to bee disobedient to his mother, grew also in vices, and began to walke abroad by night alone, and to hurt such as he met, whereby he was in some danger, and escaped not un wounded. In his youth he dearly loved an enfranchised woman called Acta, and loved Poppea Sabina, wife to his great friend Otho, whom in the end he obtained and enjoyed. And for that his mother feared her lecherous contrarie to his humors, he became odious to her: but to recover his former fauour againe, he made great semblance to bee in loue with him, so as it was thought that he had bene vncle of her bodie: but she growing every day more odious, in the end (supposing certaine apparant signes of treason) he caused her to be slaine. After her death, he wholly let slip therein to all shame and intemperate, by which example the people of Rome were also corrupted, and openly practised the like disobedience. He overcame the Parthians, and subdued the Brittaines: after which victories, giving his minde to cruelty, amongst many others, he put his mother Seneca to death, having (besides his wife Octavia) married Poppea Sabina, which he before held for his wife: in the end he made the one to be slaine, and the other he killed himselfe. He caused a young youth named Sporus to be seduced, and publicly married him: And amongst his other infamous practices, in the end he set Rome on fire, and stood with great pleasure to behold it burne. He built so huge a Palace, as it contained a very great part of the citie of Rome, and toke upon him to alter the name of the citie, and called it Neroniana. He so cruelly persecuted the Christians, that besides S. Peter and S. Paul, he put an infinite number of others to death. Under this Emperour, began the warre against the Iewes. Finally growing intolerable, and odious to God & man, first he understood of the rebellion of many nations: & perceiving the enemy to draw neere, and the sentence of the Senate pronounced against him to be apprehended, he was in such feare, that flying secretly from Rome, he was constrained miserably to kill himselfe. He lived 32. yeeres, and was Emperour 14. of whose death so great griefe to his country, so Rome, and to the whole world, as they clad them selves in ioyfull garments in stead of mourning: and in him ended the line of the Caesars.

Such a successor had the Emperour CLAUDIUS, as hee deserved and made choise of; and this was NERO, the most famous man for cruelty that euer was: for although that otherwise he he was very wicked, yet in cruelty he exceeded all measure, as you shall neuer heare any man pronounce NERO, but you shall also heare an addition thereto of Cruell, notwithstanding that he had the most wise and vertuous Schoolmaster of his time, which was SENeca, of whom in his youth he learned the liberal Sciences, wanting no capacitie; whose counsell & precepts were of force, for a time, to suppress his bad inclination, and were the occasion that in the beginning of his reign, he performed many parts of a good Prince, in such sort as TRAIAN (as many write of him) afterwards said, that for the first five yeeres, NERO was peerelesse. But after that time, setting all shame aside, occasions

vvith

with his power and libertie encreasing, he did things which did so much staine and blemish his good deeds past, as there remained no signe or spark of any goodnes in him. Yet there wanted not some authors, who in part to excuse his actions affirme, that of enuie and malice writers made his vices and faults seeme so odious, among which was Iosephvs in his booke of Antiquities; after that he himselfe had laid open many of his cruelties and parricides. I will write what I shall finde written by most approved authors, & in the order and progreffe of things and time will follow CORNELIUS TACITVS, who in my opinion excelleth the rest. CLAUDIUS being dead, through the treason of his wife AGRIPPINA, as wee haue mentioned, after that she had by her authoritic and cunning gotten the peoples good will, and taken away all occasions that might hinder her sonne in attaining to the Empire, she published his death, which vntill then he had commaunded to be concealed. At which time NERO came forth of the Imperiall Palace, accompanied with BERRYS, the Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts, who was very priuate with AGRIPPINA, and also had the command of that Cohort which had the ordinarie guard of the Palace, and proclaiming him Emperour, they carried him to the Campe, where by all the Cohorts, he was ioyfully receiued: and hauing made a speech, and promising great donatiues to the fouldiers, he was by them presently carried backe to the Senat, where all the Senators, conforming themselves to the will of the men of warre, obeyed and receiued him for Emperour with the ordinarie and accustomed solemnities, giuing him names and titles of great maieltie: among which, he refused the name of Pater patriæ, because he was of opinion that that title agreed not with his yong yeeres, being then but seuentene yeeres old. And so NERO obtained the Empire, which he ought not to haue had; and there wanted not some which murmured, that an adopted son should be preferred before a legitimate and naturall son; and would haue had GERMANICVS called also BRITANNICVS, and not him: But these men were not of power to withstand him: for as he was obiect in Rome, so was he in like manner in all the provinces of the Empire. Hethen presently commanded the obliques of CLAUDIUS to be solemnized, (as the custome was) with great pompe; and according to the superstitions of that time, they canonized him among the gods.

Great was the ioy wherewith NERO began his reign, aswell for the discontentment of the government past, as for that change and innovations are euer pleasing, and deliue commonly bringeth good hopes, which were confirmed by his outward shew and apperances in the beginning. First he promised to gouerne according to the rules and institutions of ALEXANDER CÆSAR, and began both in word and deede to shew himselfe, or (to say better) to shew himselfe, to be liberal, pitifull, iust, milde, and tractable; doing fauours, and moderating the impositions and tributes of the prouinces, diuiding amongst the people of Rome, and the pretorian fouldiers, a huge sum of money and corne, bestowing other donatiues vpon them: and to the Senators which were poore, he assigned pensions out of his exchequer; vsing all men with such humanitie and courtesie, as it seemed there was no reason to feare any thing of that which afterwards ensued. He likewise shewed great clemencie & pitie, in the execution of iustice and punishments; so as one day, a warrant being brought to him to signe, for the putting of one to death; he making shew to beverie sorrie for it, said, I would to God that I could not write: which words as though they had proceeded from a pitifull inclination; his maister SENeca doth highly praise and exol. He entertained in like manner all men louingly and friendly, and in his disposals and exercises, he permitted any to be present: so as it seemed that God had sent them such a prince as they desired. And aboute all in the beginning of his reign, he honored & bare great respect to his mother, and gaue her greater power and command in the gouernment; then indeede he ought or was fit: for the truth is, she was a cruell woman, proude and haughtie: who through the counsell of PALANTE (one of CLAUDIUS enfranchised men before named) without the consent of NERO, she caused IONIVS SELANVS Proconsul in Asia, to be slaine, for the hatred he bare him; the like she did by NARCISVS another famous Libertine, whom she also greatly hated. And her cruelty had extended further, but that SENeca and the Prefect BERRYS, and another eminent man whose name was FRANTIVS (by whom NERO in the beginning of his reign was much ruled) did oppose & crosse AGRIPPINA in her wicked practices, as farre as in them lay: but she had such authoritie in all causes, and ouer them which had the managing thereof, as it could hardly be done, as long as she continued in good grace with her sonne.

The state standing in these rearmes, newes came to Rome, that VOTOORVS King of the Parthians leied forces to make war against the Empire, practising to make his brother King of 1410.

G 2

Armenia,

During the Reign of the Pretorian Cohorts.

Nero was Emperour at seuentene yeeres of age.

The countries first victims of Nero.

In his second booke of elements.

Agrippina caused Silanus and Narcissus to be slaine through the counsell of Palante.

Warres with the King of the Parthians.

Nero in his first five yeeres was a good Emperour.

Peace with the Parthians.

Calpurnia and Claudius Phre-nicus, Nero
his favourites.

The death of Britannicus.

Open contention between Nero and his mother Agrippina.

Armenia, in which province from the time of AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, the Romans had authority to place Kings at their pleasure: so as vpon this occasion the warres began in the second yeere of the reigne of the Emperor NERO; who sent VINIDIVS with new legions thither, beside the ordinarie legions which were in Asia, vnder the command of DOMITIVS CORBVLVS. But the war was then continued but a while; for a peace was concluded, VOLOGESVS desisting from his attempts & giuing certain principall men in pledge for the keeping thereof, which we commonly call hostages. About this time began NERO to shew himselfe somewhat alienated from his mother, and desirous to abate her great power and authority, beginning to shew her lesse obedience then formerly he had done: for he then fell in loue with a base enfranchised woman (but she was very faire) whose name was ACTA; notwithstanding that his wife OCTAVIA was verie faire and a vertuous ladie. And herein to haue his will, against the will and liking of his mother (who sought to crosse him in his loue, to the end that he should not be free from her power) he began to take into his fauor OTHO a Noble man, of whose family there had bin Consuls, and CLAVDIVS PHENICVS, the sonne of one of the most powerful enfranchised men in Rome; and these wrought means for him to obtaine his beloued ACTA, which opened a passage to many other accidents which followed, whereby he began to be disobedient to his mother, who had so great power ouer him and all others: And he commaunded the enfranchised PALANTIA, (who was a great fauorite of hers) to be depofed from all government in the Imperiall estate.

AGRIPPINA seeing this, she attempted by al means possible, to recouer the grace which she had lost with her son: sometimes by giuing him counsell; at other times by entreaties and flatteries, accompanied with threatnings and feares: among which one was to do great honor, and to bestow many fauours vpon BRITANNICVS, who was the Emperor CLAVDIVS his son, and then about 14. yeeres old: imagining that through feare and suspition of this man, NERO would returne to her obedience: but his wicked minde freed him not from that danger, by those means which she conceived, for he deliuered himselfe thereof, by giuing him poison, whereof the poore BRITANNICVS died. Whereat AGRIPPINA was much amazed: but being either vnable or unwilling to suppress her pride, she persseuered in this controuersie with her son, and presumed to contend with him (although vpon unequall termes). Whereupon NERO setting all shame and respect apart, commaunded her guard of Germanes to be taken from her, and she to be lodged out of the palace, doing her other open disgraces, forbidding certaine persons to haue recourse vnto her, or to visit her: and he himselfe went very seldom to see her, and that very coldly, and with little respect. And being thus out of fauour (as few keepe true friendship with such as are dejected and in disgrace) the most of her friends forsooke her: and one great Matrone whose name was LIVIA SILLANA, vpon a priuate grudge (producing false witness) wrongfully accused her to haue conspired against her son the Emperor, and that she practiced to haue made RVBELIVS PLEAVTVS, Emperor, who by his mother descended from the Emperor AVGVSTVS CÆSAR. And the matter was so handled, that AGRIPPINA was in some danger, vntill the accusation was found to be forged and the witnesses suborned, and this LIVIA the twister of this web, escaped with light punishment which was but banishment. This gaue encouragement to a wicked fellow called PETVS, to accuse PALANTIA also falsely (alibertine many times before named) and BRVVS the Prefect, who were seruants and fauorites to AGRIPPINA, alledging that they practiced to depose NERO, and to make CORNELIVS SYLLA Emperor: but this also was discovered to be forged and false, and for this offence PETVS and his false witnesses were only banished. All which passed in the third yeere of NERO his reigne, Saint PAVL the Apostle being then prisoner in Rome, who a little before was sent thither by the commaundement of FESTVS, gouernour of Indie; who succeeded FELIX aforesaid: In which imprisonment (although he went abroad at libertie) he was detained two yeeres.

As the Emperor NERO grew in yeeres, so began he to waxe more vaine and vicious, and to discouer his bad inclination: for by night he would goe disguised vp and downe the streets in Rome, and would hurt and abuse such as he met, comming out of their houses; wherein he committed many notable insolencies, and offended many: and he himselfe being vpon a time vnknowen, was in danger to haue been slaine, being sore wounded. And as the vices and defects of Princes, although that in their absence they are condemned and open murmur at them; yet in their presence they are most commonly excused, and sometimes applauded: So NERO his fauorites did not seeke to withdraw him from this dangerous vice and insolencie: but they ad-

uised

uised him to goe no more abroad without a guard: whereby they were the occasion of farre greater riots and disorders, then before: And some dissolute yong men (saining themselves to be the Emperor)ooke occasion to doe the like, so as there were infinite violences committed by him and them, by means whereof there was no small scandall and tumult in the citie, although that in the rest, vntill then there was indifferent good order in all things; and iustice was administered orderly in Rome and in the provinces; and the people did dissemble or had patience with the lightnes & insolencies of NERO, by reason of the distribution of money and other things, which he made generally to all; and for certaine taxes and impositions which he commaunded to be abolished.

The fift yeere of his reigne being come, which as it seemed would haue prooued prosperous and peaceable both in particular and generally, VOLOGESVS King of the Parthians began anew to arme against the Empire, for the same reason and cause concerning the kingdome of Armenia before spoken of. And CORBVLVS, who was Proconsul in Asia, sent to intreate the Emperor that the ordinarie armie which he had, might be reinforced and increased; for that by reason of the long peace, his legions were growne more slothfull & lesse seruicable then was needfull for so dangerous a warre; and were also diminished, some by death, and manyouldiers were waxen old: for which NERO tooke order, that new companies should be leuiod, and sent vnto him, and with them one of the legions of Germanie, which were euer held for the best and most experienced, as those which lay on the frontiers against the most fierce and valiant enemies. And so began the warres with the Parthians, wherein after some great encounters, and skirmishes which passed, fortune and victorie being variable, and winter being come, CORBVLVS sent a captaine whose name was PACTVS ORPHITVS, who with a good part of the armie had the garde of certaine straights and passages, whereby the enemy might enter the countrey, whom he commaunded that in any case he should not giue them battaile: and he lodged himselfe in the Plains with the rest of the armie. But ORPHITVS, quite contrarie to that which was commaunded him, by the enemies prouocation ioynd battaile with them, and was therein ouercome with great losse to the Romans: for which, CORNELIVS was exceeding sorrowfull, and it was no lesse grieved at in Rome. Whereupon CORBVLVS, reinforcing his legions, tooke the field before the ordinarie time, and very resolutely followed that warre: wherein passed many things which CORNELIVS TACITVS reciteth, and I for breuitie omit, to retume to NERO, of whom from henceforth there is no good to be spoken: I say then that while as his captaines made warre against the Parthians, he gaue himselfe ouer to sensualitie without contradiction in Rome, falling in loue with the wife of his great fauorite OTHO, who in time came to be Emperor, called POPPÆA SABINA, and by some POPPÆA, a most beautiful woman & of high parentage, endowed with many graces & good parts, but dishonest and incontinent; and to the end that NERO without any obstacle might haue her wholly to himselfe, giuing to her husband OTHO this reward in requitall of all his good seruices, he sent him into Spain to be gouernor of Lusitania now called Poringall, and he freely gaue himselfe ouer vnto this POPPÆA, forgetting and abhorring his owne wife OCTAVIA, and his other about named friend, ACTA a Libertine whom he had much loued. Wherewith this POPPÆA became so proude, that she taking leome to be his friend, very instantly entreated and desired the Emperor, that diuorcing himselfe from OCTAVIA, he should marrie her: and seeing that AGRIPPINA NERO's mother, who supported and defended OCTAVIA, was a great lee hereto, she endeoured all she might, to encrease the discord begun betweene the mother and the sonne. Against which, AGRIPPINA vfed all the means that she possibly could deuise to recouer the good will of her sonne, as to procure him to commit most detestable incest with her owne selfe, from which he was withdrawne by the means of SENECA, as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth: yet SENECA's faith, that the onely feare of his mothers power and presumptuous boldnes withheld him from it, although other authors doe not wholly cleere him from this sinne. Howsoever it was, by POPPÆA's great practices and his owne wickednes, he so much abhorred his mother, as he determined to kill her: but as it was a matter most odious, so he would haue it done covertly: and first he attempted & practiced it with poison thrise: which taking no effect and perceiving that she was defended by Antidotes and preseruaturs, he provided a bedchamber for her with such an arched roofoe, as being easily vntoynted, the frame might fall in peeces in the night vpon her being asleep. When this designe could not be kept close; but was revealed by some priuie thereunto: she then dauid a ship so artificially made as it should sodenly split in sunder, that either by the wracke or the fall of the fore-deck

Warres with the Parthians.

Poppea Sabina Nero's friend.

from might perish: This was contrived by the direction and counsell of one of his sea captains whose name was Nicostratus: and the plot was laid that three should be drowned in the sea on the coast of Calabria: whither Nero (saying an reconciliation with her) caused her to goe, and vnder color to doe certaine sacrifices, he himselfe went thither also. But this plot taking no effect, wherein certaine of her company were drowned, and she with great danger escaping, the seeing that secret practices availed not, he resolved to put her to death openly: and to that end (through the counsell of the said Nicostratus) he caused it to be bruted abroad that one by whom she had sent him word of the shipwrecke and danger wherein she had been at sea, would have killed him; & for this purpose there was a poiniard let fall at his feet, he which brought it faining, that by his mothers commandement he came to have slaine him. Vnder this false pretext onely, he commaunded certaine Tribunes, of which this Nicostratus was chiefe, to kill her: who being come where Agrippina was, she presently vnderstoode the cause of their comming: and seeing them vnneath their swords, authors write, that shewing them her belly, she said, strike me here first; for this part hath deserued it, seeing it conceiued and brought forth such a monster as Nero: and so she died of some of the many wounds which were giuen her. And Nero who was in a place there by, came to see his dead mother, and stood beholding her naked body as if it had been the body of a beast, praising and dispraising her parts and members. And thus did the wicked sonne murder his wicked mother, who cannot be excused, but that she for her wickednes deserued the death which she died: And it cannot be denied, but that herein Nero shewed most abominable crueltie, for nature doth abhor that a sonne should punish & be executioner to his owne mother, moued thereto by his owne wicked & cuill disposition.

Doublelesse, it is a strange thing to thinke of the loue vvch this woman bare to her sonne: for it is written of her, that before he vvas Emperour, it was foretold her by an Astrologer, that he should be Emperour, and that he should kill his owne mother: whereto she answered, Let him haue the Empire, and then kill her and spare not. So great was her pride and ambition, that to the end the might be mother to the Emperour, she would put it in hazard to be slaine by her owne sonne: and so both the one and the other were accomplished. Nowwithstanding that the Souldiers, Senate and people, applauded him for this foule and odious Matricide, yet was he euer after terrified with the sting of Conscience for so tole a fact, and as he often confessed, was haunted with the apparition of his Mothers Ghost, and tormented by the Furies. To this of his Mother, he added the murder of Domitia, his Aunt by the fathers side: who being an aged woman, and lying sicke of a colicuenesse, coming to visit her, and the vsing loosing speeches vnto him, he commaunded the Physicians to plic her fill with stronger purgatives: so he before she was fully dead, seized vpon her goods, and supprest her last will, that he might enioy the whole.

The Emperour Nero having performed so great an exploit as the murdering of his mother (so much are Princes blinded with flattery & adulation, that notwithstanding all the world did see and understand the matter, and how all had passed, yet most men in his presence approved and applauded the same: and there were many vowes and sacrifices made to their gods, for that he had escaped such a treason, and for the discovery thereof, making him belceve that they held it for truth) cloaking his wickednes under this colour, he came to Rome: where seeing himself at liberty, and free from the controulement of his mother (whose authority was ever great) he began to abandon all shame, giving the reins to his beastly appetite, and to all kinde of filthinesse and most abominable luxurie; which was such and so horrible, that, to keep such honest decorum in our History as is requisite, and not to offend the ears of chaste Readers, I purpose to passe it over in silence. Wherein he spending great part of the time, all the rest he employed in lasciuious Comedies and other libidinous exercises, and oftentimes in banquets and feasting, which lasted all the day and the night also. He was prodigall in all things, especially in his rich and sumptuous attire. The ornaments of his Palace, and his expenses and prodigalities were such, as the like had neuer been seen. In Comedies and publike Shewes (most of which were most vile and dishonest) hee acted a Part in Person: and would that the Noble young men of Rome, and some of the principall young Ladies, should be present to hear and see the same. And, above all, he was so inclined to Musick, and so much affected it, as, besides that hee was skilfull in that Art, he gloried so much in singing, as many times he refused to eat for hurting his voice; and to cleer it and make it better, he purged himself, and used other remedies and medicines. Some write of him, that to that effect he wore a plaister or sheet of lead upon his breast.

Finally,

Finally, Nero forgetting the dignitie and maiesty of his estate, gaue himselfe ouer to base and vile exercises and vices, the which for that they were so filthy, are not at all described, and which afterwards brought him to the sinke of all sinne and cruelty, as we will declare. And as the Subjects, for the most part, do imitate the fashions and behauiour of their Princes & Lords, so presently in Rome and out of it, they began to practise and follow their vices and follies, wherein the Emperour spent his time; and the Lawes, good customes, Arts and Sciences began to be corrupted and forgotten. Wherefore, he made himselfe an enemy, and odious to all good men, although then there were but few, as if it often happeneth.

While as hee busied himself in these base actions, the warres which his Generall Corbulo began to begin with the Parthians, about the Title of the Kingdome of Armenia, never ceased. In which, after sundry exploits of war, the Romans prevailing, the Parthians were wholly driven out of the Province of Armenia: and Nero nominated and sent thither for King thereof (as a Subject to the Empire) Tigranes, who was nephew to Archelaus sometime King of Cappadocia, having a long time continued in Rome in base and poor estate. This man was by some of the countrey received and entertained with good approbation; and others, which held for the King of Parthia, repined thereat, as commonly it useth to happen in such cases. Wherefore there was given unto him an ordinary guard of foot and horsemen, and some of the Roman Cohorts to aid him to defend that Kingdome. Corbulo being victorious came with his legions into Syria: which hapned in the seventh year of the Reign of Nero. About this time there was so great an Earthquake in many parts of the world, as many great Buildings fell; and the City of Laodicea was therewith wholly ruined and laid waste.

Within fewe daies after, the Ile of England and Scotland, then called Britannia, rebelled against the Roman Empire, being unable to endure the infolencies and oppressions of the Roman Legions lying there in garrison, Paulinus Syetonius being their Generall: for, from the diseases and vices of the Head, Rome did flowe disorder and corruption through all the Provinces which were members thereof. The cause of the insurrection in this Iland proceeded from hence: Paulinus being desirous to win honour, and envying the fame which Corbulo had gotten in the East, who was daily victorious in the war against the Parthians, hee wanting neither courage nor discretion to doo the like, but matter and occasion, and seeing, that in the Ile of Britannia there was neither time nor hope for his purpose, leaving such troops and garrisons there as hee thought sufficient, he went from thence with a great Fleet to make warre in an Iland neere to England, then called Mona, and now Man, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation. And notwithstanding that all succeeded well in that journey, yet, during his imploiment there, the Britains, chusing among themselves a Captain, a man of great account and reputation, called Pharasvatus or Prasvatus, with the Title of a King, as they ordinarily had in that Iland, although it were subject, they rebelled for their liberty, killing all the Roman souldiers they could finde, who had shut themselves up in a Temple: and, afterwards overthrowing a Legion which came to their aid, they slue the greatest part thereof, and compelled Pavus, who had the command in the absence of Paulinus Syetonius, to flee to their Camp: wherthey presently besieged him, and so were Masters of the Field, Calpurnius (who, for the Emperour, was then Governor of the Iland) seeing himself unable to defend the same, with the greatest speed that possibly he could fled into France, and abandoned the Iland. And the Britains took such order, and used such expedition in this warre against the Romans and their Adherents, as within fewe daies in diverse places there were slain 70000 men. Paulinus, being advertised of this great disaster, having effected that which hee had attempted of his own authority, with all speed possible returned into the Iland with his troops, where he assembled together those which had continued constant in the Emperors service; and the remainder of the Roman souldiers which were left, and, reprehending some, and encouraging others, without any longer delay hee went to seek his enemies, and their Captain Pharasvatus, who were now growne so hardy, as they came to seek him, and did so assure themselves of the victory, as they brought their wives in Wagons and Carts, to see the battell which they meant to fight. Which, Paulinus Syetonius refused not, but, like an expert captain, took such advantage of the ground, and marshalled his men in such fort, and in the battell fought so valiantly, as hee obtained the victory; yet was it one of the most fierce battels, and fought with the greatest obstinacy, that euer was seen: for, of the Conquerors there died a great number; but of the conquered (as Cornelius Tacitus reports) there were slain fewe lesse than fourescore thousand men. But Gildas, an ancient Historian born in the same

G 4

Niceus wrote upon him for charge to kill Agrippina.

Nero put his mother to death by the hand of Agrippina.

The horrible crueltie of the sonne, and disreputable ambition of the mother.

Wars with the Parthians.

Rebellion in Britain.

The Ile of Man.

The Romanes in power by the Britons.

A great battell.

Princes are euer abused by flatterers.

same Island, sets down a far lesse number; who, saith, that there were slain but thirty thousand. With this great victory, and with the new supply which NERO sent, the Romans prevailed in that Ile, so as from thenceforth it remained in peace.

While these things were in action, NERO daily increased in his vices and wickedness: and besides the above-named, he began to put in practice many new cruelties, commanding many to be slain upon light occasions, and some without any; notwithstanding that his School-master SENECA, and Burrus the Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts, did hinder and mitigate the same all they might. But in the ninth year of his Reign Burrus died; and SENECA, being brought into suspicion with NERO (besides that virtue is ever hateful to the wicked) began to withdraw himself from intermeddling with the affairs of the government: and as the Physician leaveth to apply medicines to the Patient, of whose recovery there is no hope; so did he forbear to converse with NERO, or give him any counsell, faining his old age and want of health to be the cause thereof. And in like manner (as saith CORNELIUS TACITUS) others, which had any spark of ancient Romans in them, withdrew themselves; being unable to endure the sight of what passed, and NERO committed. At this time NERO commanded PULVILLUS SALLA to be slain in France, who was one of the most famous men of his time; and another whose name was RABELLIUS PLAVTUS, a worthy and eminent man; in whom was found no other fault, or cause wherefore he should be slain, but that hee was veracious, and therefore beloved of all men; and, being such, upon a time when NERO was so sick as it was thought he would have died, the people of Rome fixt their eyes upon this man, naming him for NERO's Successor. Upon which occasion, NERO banished him from Rome, and then resolved to release him from banishment by causing him to be slain. And after this manner he slue in those daies a great number of other Romans, which these Authors doo name, and I leave out as a matter odious; putting them to death through cruelty and envy, without any other cause.

A little after this, growing impudent through his customarie sinning, he divorced himselfe from his wife OCTAVIA; and not content to put her away, he took another mans wife, & presently married POPPEA, whom (as we said) he held for his friend, having first taken her from OTTO who was her husband, and not contented to put away his good and virtuous wife, he caused her to be falsely accused of adulterie, having plotted with NICETUS, his Sea-captain (who murdered his mother AGRIPPINA, who as it should seeme was a man fit for such services) that he should confesse himselfe to be the man which had committed adulterie with her. And notwithstanding that this was plainly discovered to be a fiction, he for a colour banished NICETUS, and OCTAVIA was also banished, and afterwards slaine by his commandement: so as to the innocent was given an vniuersall punishment, and to the traitor a fained correction. At that time he also commanded the famous Libertine PALANT to be slaine, for the desire he had to his estate: for in the time of NERO it was more dangerous to be rich, then to commit offences; and many were slaine because they were rich, and few were punished for their euill deeds.

NERO committing these and many other such like enormities; VOLOGESVS King of Parthia, taking it in scorn that his Brother TYRIDATES should be dispossessed of the Kingdom of Armenia, and that it should by the Romans be giuento TIGRANES, beganne to leuie his Forces; and, determining to renew the warre, he sent his Brother to recover that Kingdom; the which he soon effected, and seized upon many countries and parts thereof. Against whom, CORBVLVS (who was Lieutenant in the East, and had made the last warre) with all expedition sent two Legions for a supply to King TIGRANES: and the warre beginning very hotly on either side, the Emperour, at the earnest request of CORBVLVS, sent new Troops to reinforce the Armie against the Parthians, and CASONIUS PLETVS for their Leader; who, with the greatest speed he could, with many companies and great preparation for the warres, departed NERO, and, following his journey, came where CORBVLVS attended his coming: who diuiding his Troops with CORBVLVS, each of them by himselfe followed the warre apart. In proceesse whereof, CORBVLVS governed so valiantly and with such discretion, as he not onely defended the limits of the Empire in that part which fell to his lot, but passed the River Euphrates, and surprized some holds in his enemies Country. And CASONIUS PLETVS with lesse judgement or experience, but more vain-glory, promising great matters of himselfe, began the warre. In the beginning whereof, with appearance of good successe, he entred Armenia; and, extending his power farther than he ought to have done, passed the Mountain Tannus, taking some townes without consideration whether he were able to hold the same or no; and sent of his troupes into diuers places with a desire to get and to doe more then he was able to accomplish, or was fit to be done: So that (as CORNELIUS TACITUS writeth) he gouerned himselfe so ill, that when as VOLOGESVS came against him, there fell to many disgraces vpon him, and he so vnadvisedly encamped himselfe, as he was besieged by VOLOGESVS in his camp; in such sort as being vnable to stay for the succours which came from CORBVLVS vnto him, wanting both courage and discretion to defend himselfe, hee came to a shamefull and dishonorable composition for the Roman reputation, with the King of Parthia: which was, That the King giuing him leaue to depart out of the countrie with his armie; he should abandon the province of Armenia; & deliuer vp all such holds as he had taken: all which was performed accordingly, and he very shamefully went out of Armenia, in great disgrace, and with no small losse of his Armie. The Emperour being aduertised hereof, sent for him to come to Rome, and to leaue his legions with CORBVLVS: and when hee was come, he insisted no other punishment, but in a word or two called him dastard and coward; adding, that he would speedily pardon him, least the feare of punishment should kill him.

CORBVLVS remaining Generall alone (notwithstanding that the Parthians were growne proud by reason of their late victorie) prosecuted the warre in such manner, as they motioned treaties of peace, and sent Ambassadors to Rome, where after sundrie Embassies and some truce taken, in the end a peace was concluded, profitable to the Parthians, although in shew and ceremonies honorable to the Romans: which was, That TYRIDATES should remaine in possession of Armenia, but should giue ouer the title and royall ensignes, vntill he had been at Rome, and there personally receiue the same at the hands of the Emperour NERO. To confirme this agreement, he came into the Romanes campe, and in presence of all the armie, humbled, and prostrated himselfe vpon the earth before NERO his image, and taking the crowne from his head, he set it at NEROS feet: and afterwards being solemnly entertained and feasted, appointing a time for his coming to Rome, he left a daughter which he had, for assurance thereof; and so departed to visit his brothers, VOLOGESVS King of the Parthians, and PACORVS King of the Medes, and to prepare all things necessary for his iourney. Which although it were not so soon performed as it was appointed, and that there passed some things in the meane season, as we will presently specifye, yet to the end that we leaue not this matter vnperfected, it shall be fit (although somewhat afore the time) to speak of TYRIDATES his coming to Rome, for it was a solemne matter and worthy to be remembered: which was thus.

As NERO was aman desirous of fame and vaine glory, so by Letters and great promises he invited TYRIDATES to come to Rome; which he performed, being greatly accompanied, and was most honorably entertained: NERO attended his coming with sumptuous provision made by the Senate and people, set vpon a high throne, with all the shew of maiestie and greatnes that could be deuised; at one end whereof, were all the Pretorian Cohorts and men of warre, armed with faire and rich armor. TYRIDATES coming to the place where the Emperour NERO was, being alighted from his horse, he mounted vp the staires to the scaffold where he sate, and coming neere him, fell at his feet; but NERO taking him by the right hand, raised him, and tooke from his head an ornament which he ware, and did put thereon a diadem or crown of a King, vsing herein other stately ceremonies. TYRIDATES being crowned with this solemnitie, after certaine feasts which were made in Rome, hauing remained there some dayes, departed towards his countrie, carrying with him, an incredible masse of money, which the Emperour gaue him for his Iourney. A peace with the Parthians being confirmed in this manner, NERO gaue himselfe more to his old vices then he did before, and to doe the same more freely, and to be at more liberty and farther off from the authority of the Senate, he departed from Rome, with the most solemne and magnificent court and attendance that euer was seene; although the greatest number were conformable to his conditions. The report of this iourney was, that he went into Gracia, to cut the necke of a land in Achidia, vvhich is a narrow passage betweene the Egean and Ionian Seas, vvhich makes Peloponnesus, now called MORIA to be as it were an Island. And in his iourney, in Naples and in other parts, without shame, he shewed himselfe on the Theaters and Stages, and acted a part in Comedies, as one of the Actors or Players, and sung Tragedies and Fables, and waite many prizes and crownes, which were rewards giuen in those controuerfies. Being come into Gracia, in this great action for which he came, he did no more but appoint a day to begin his vvork: and hauing made a speech to his people, he tooke a tooke in his hand vvherewith he began to digge the earth, and making parthians.

Peace with the

Tyridates crowned in Rome by the Emperour Nero, with great solemnity.

Nero his iour-ney into Gracia.

Nero put away his wife, and married another man.

New war with the Parthians.

this beginning, he suddenly (no man knowing any cause) left off what hee had begun, without order for doing any more; and presently returned to Rome. Wherein he entred in triumph; as if he had wonne some great battell, demanding it for the victory above-written: wherein hee came mounted upon the same chariot wherein OCTAVIUS AVGVSTVS had triumphed, compassed about with Musicians and Plaiers, such as represented fables and tragedies upon stages, being brought from all parts of the world for that purpose. And within fewe daies after this, he pretended another journey into the Kingdome of Egypt; and, all things beeing in a readinesse for that purpose, through a certain divination he gave over his journey. NERO, beeing come to the beginning of the eleventh yeer of his Raige, became so impudent, giving himself wholly over to sensuality, that he did any thing without blushing or changing colour, and gave leave to an infinite number of others to doo the like: and his wickednes mounted to so high a degree, that SVBTONIVS testifieth of him thus;

Super ingeniorum paragoia. Et naptiarum concubinas, vestali virgini Rubria nimis iniuit. Asten libertam panium abfuit, quia in isto matrimonio sibi coniungeret, summis suis consularibus viris, qui regio genere oriam peierarent. Pueri Sporti, ex seclis scilicet etiam in muliere naturam transfigurare conatus est, cum dote et flammis per seclum naptiarum celeberrimo officio deductum ad se, pro uxore habuit. Existit, cuiusdam non infelix iocum, bene agi potuisse cum verberis humanis, si Domitius Neronis pater talem habuisset uxorem. Hunc Sportum Angustarum ornamentis excoluit, lectisque vestibus, et circa convectus meraculique Gracia, ac max. Roma circa sigillaria comitatus est, identidem excoluit. Nam matris concubium appetisse, et ab obrectatoribus eius, ne ferax atque impotens mulier, et hoc gratia genere praevaleret, deervitum nemo dubitavit, utique postquam meretricem, quam semis erat Agrippina similitudinem, inter concubinas recepit. Olim etiam, quater lectica cum matre veheretur, libidinis in seclis ac maculis vestis prodium affertant. That is to say, Besides his unnatural abusing of boies free-born, and the keeping of mens wives as his concubines, he deflowred RYBRIA a Vestall Virgin. Hee would have married ACTE or AETIA, a freed woman; suborning some, who had been Consuls, to swear, that she was roially descended. There was a Boy called SPORTVS, whose genitories he cut off, trying to transforme him into the nature of woman. Him he caused to be brought unto him as a Bride, with a Downy and a yellow Vail, after the solemne manner of marriage, and a goodly Train attending on him; whom he maintained as his wife: whereupon one said pleasantly, that it had been happy for mankind if DOMITIUS his father had wedded such a wife. This SPORTVS, adorned with the ornaments of an Emperresse, hee accompanied in a Litter through all the Cities and Towns of Greece, and afterwards at Rome, up and down the streets; STIGILLARIA kissing him often. He had a desire to lie with his owne mother, but was terrified from it by some which hated her, lest that proud and insolent woman should by this favour growe too mighty, whereof no man ever made doubt; and the rather, for that afterwards he entertained a harlot among his concubines, very like (as it was reported) to AGRIPPINA. It is also said, that in former times, as often as he rode in a Litter with his Mother, he used her incestuously: the which did appear by the spots upon her garment.

Amongst all his dishonest and filthy pollutions, hee never forgot the fiercenes and cruelty of his minde, shedding blood, and killing an infinite number of men; and made boast and vaunted thereof, saying, that none of his Predecessors in the Empire, did ever knowe their owne power, but he. And when One in his presence said, as a by-word, When I am dead let the world be burned: Nay, quoth he, let it be before I die. Of so ill and envious an inclination was this man to all mankind: which did fully appear by that which he did within a little while after, which was, to set the City of Rome on fire; as SVBTONIVS, EVSEBIVS, EVTHROPIVS, PAVLVS OKOSIVS, and ISIDORA, affirm: yet CORNELIVS TACITVS maketh some doubt thereof, whether it were done by chance, or by his commandement; and yet himself saith, that no man durst quench the fire for fear of him: and all affirm, that it lasted six daies and seven nights, and that NERO went up to the top of a high Tower to behould this spectacle, which was very pleasing to his sight: where he stood singing certain verses of HOMER, which contained the burning of the City of Troy. And the fire did consume so much in the City of Rome, as TACITVS writeth, that of foureteen great quarters which were in the City, onely foure escaped free; and of the ten, three were wholly consumed and burnt to the ground; and in the seven there was never a house whereof the greatest part was not burnt, and many wholly consumed. Finally, they were innumerable, and not to be imagined, the houses, temples, riches, the spoils of victories, the clothes and merchandizes, and other things, which this fire

con-

consumed, and so that end that the Reader may the better understand it, he will consider that Rome was the greatest and most populous citie in the world; much frequented by strange Nations, and the most rich and beautiful that ever was, the which in that time did draw unto it and swallow up all the mony and riches of all the provinces subiect unto it; by taxes, tributes, impositions, bribes, and tyrannies; and by all other means, he in quoniam et vultu plom 1599. This lamentable desolation being ended; there was not left in it any street, but all in a hold him to be the author thereof, although they durst not say so; and that he desired to halle the ruines for the stones, pillars, and other things which escaped the fire, he would not suffer to be carried away by the owners, but took them for his building of his owne palace and houses, which some daies before he had built: and part thereof being burnt with this fire, he afterwards reedified and made without comparison fairer & greater than before; so as it seemeth an incredible matter, what PLEINY, SVARTIENS, and GORDIANVS write of the greatest thereof; to whom I refer the Reader for the particular description of that Palace; because it is a matter wondrous, and which only was sufficient to shew the riches of Rome. For it stretched from Mount Alatine to Mount Esquiline, which, as it seemeth, were distant a good deale more than a mile in breadth, it contained in it ponds of water so great, as they seemed to be gulfs of the Sea, compassed round about with buildings and lodgings; it had in it all; besides gardens, and orchards, excellent hills and woodds; wherein were all manner of wild beasts, Morceaux the halles and dining chambers; besides being built of Marble, Alabaster, Jasper, Topazes, and other excellent stones; the timber-works thereof and the scelings were inlaid with gold and Iuorie, and mother of Pearle; and some stones of price. And some of these high places and chambers were round, and made with such art, as the floor remaining firme & fixe, the rooke & vaults thereof went continually round like the skie; in such sort as some birds were made and some of these rooms were wrought with such art, as there were in them certaine ventalls and alimbiques of gold and Iuorie, which at certaine times did cast off sweete flowers, waters, and precious oyles. This house likewise had bathes of sundry waters hot and cold, and other ornaments and excellencies, such and so many as would be tedious to recite; wherein, and in other buildings which he made, he spent an inestimable treasure, and in other which he began, which were strange and marvellous, the which for brevity I omit. And although (as is sayd) he had commanded the Citie of Rome to be set on fire, yet being thus burnt, he void all diligence to reedifie it againe, in better forme then it was before, and had determined to alter the name thereof, and to call it Neroniana, after his owne name. But this his care sufficed not to cleere him of the infamy which he had purchased among the people, for commanding it to be set on fire.

After all this, the Emperour NERO by the instigation of the duell, in whose power remained his sinnes (the number of Christians in Rome then encreasing, through the preaching of the Apostles, S. PETER and S. PAUL, who then were there) heard his like being grieved with the holines and purenes of the Primitive Church, resolved to persecute the same; and putting it in execution a great number of Christians, both within and without it, were put to death by his commandement. And this was the first general persecution which the Church suffered. And although that after the death of CHRIST there wanted no persecutors (yet was it neuer persecuted by the Emperours publick edit vntill this time. Wherein, how great the constancie of the Martyrs was, & what sundrie kindes of martyrdomes they endured, CORNELIVS TACITVS an infidel Historiographer, and an enemy to Christians, yet true in his historie, besides other Christian authors, shall beare witness: who (like a Gentile murmuring at them) reciteth the persecution of the Emperour NERO: whereof SVBTONIVS also making mention, saith, that a verie great number of Christian men and women were put to death: And among other cruelties, burnings, crosses and other kindes of death, he reporteth that they were throwne to the dogges, to be torne in pieces: and to the end that dogges should be the more eager against them; they covered them with the skinned of Beares and other wild beasts. This persecution of the church SVBTONIVS and CORNELIVS TACITVS set downe in this place after the burning of Rome, in the eleventh yeere of the Emperour NEROES rainge: yet EVSEBIUS and other authors note it to bee in the last yeere of his Empire, wherein died the blessed Apostles S. PETER and S. PAUL by his commandement. But it may be; & so I beleue, that this persecution lasted till then, which was little more then three yeeres; or whether it were only at this time, it pleased God to preserve his holic Apostles vntill the time above said.

After that the Emperour NERO had executed this cruelty against the Christians, which was

A description of Nero's Palace.

The first persecution of the primitive Church.

Rome first by Nero.

was the greatest that he ever used; there followed in Rome, and in the marches thereof, one of the greatest plagues of pestilence that ever was in the world; by the permission of God was it to be believed, for he cruelly used against the Christians. But there was no amendment in him, neither any repentance of the injuries which he had done; but waxing worse, he again began his intolerable exactions in all the Provinces, which were such and so many, as they became unpeopled, and many places were wholly ruined and desolate. For the ordinary rents (though the summe were incredible) being insufficient to maintain his prodigalities and immense expenses, because they cannot be related at large, it shall suffice to make some brief mention thereof, the better to perceive the cause of the rest. Besides what, without measure, hee consumed in his Buildings and Vasan works; and in the curious workmanship of his famous house, which was a matter incredible, in all the rest, his disorder and excess was incredible. First, he appalled himself with most rich attire, and ordinarily consumed at dice and at other games great summs of money. When he went a-fishing (whereunto he was much affected) and for his pleasure went to the sea or any river, he commanded the nets to be made of gold-thread, and the cords of most excellent fine silk. In his progresses which he made out of Rome (which were many) besides an infinite number of people of his Court which followed him, he never had lesse than a thousand Wagons drawne with Mules for his Wardrobe, excellently wrought and garnished; and those which led and governed them were apparelled in rich attire, of gold; silver, cloth of gold and silk; even unto the Mules shoes, which were of silver. Then the games and plaies which hee presented were such and so many, as it cannot bee valued what they might cost; for, besides those which in Rome were ordinary, as, the Sword-plaies, combats, huntings of Lions, Elephants, Bears, Panthers, Tigers, and other beasts; the Comedies and Tragedies which in the Theaters and Amphitheatres were represented, and the sports on horseback, and with chariots of diverse forms, in the circuits and places of Rome, which were many and more frequent, and with greater magnificence than ever theretofore, he invented new sports with chariots drawn with Camels, and Elephants with Castles on their backs, with other new inventions & strange devices; which to bring to passe, it behoved a man to compass the world: as was his Naumachia, a fight with Gallies upon the water; making a Lake for that purpose by hand, which they also called Naumachia, drawing water from the Sea to fill the same; and therewith fishes to swim therein, because it should be more natural and at life. Then, in the donatives which hee threw to the people; for him which could first catch them (of money they call'd Misilia) he would not give such as were ordinary, as other Emperours did; of money, birds, and other things of small value; but therewith he commanded rich apparell, gold, silver, rich stones and pearls to be given; and, to increase this in all superfluity, of things which could not be throwne abroad in their kinde, he caused certain Tables to be cast, wherein was set down what hee should have into whose hands they came, in wheat, heards, or slaves; which extended so far as to give heritages, fields, houses, islands, and other matters of great price. By all that which hath bin said, he that will may see his prodigality, and may imagine what his expenses might amount to in other matters. So as this accursed man had no vice wherein hee would not bee extreme; and so would hee be in spending and wasting, as he was in robbing and spoiling the people: Which his prodigality as it was gratefull and pleasing to the vulgar sort, so I presume it was the cause why they so long endured his tyrannie and wicked disposition.

But, as these things were intolerable, after the eleventh year of his Raigh many of the prime Noble men of Rome conspired against him: the head and chief whereof was Caius Piso (the most Noble man by birth, parentage and vertue, which at that time was in Rome) and according to his name, this conspiracy was called Pisoniana. But it was discovered before it took effect; and, in stead of the remedy which was hoped for, it opened the way to the Emperours cruelty: for, upon this occasion he put to death so many, and of all sorts, noble and ignoble, as well those which were guilty, as those which he would hold for suspected, as they were without number: among whom, died the witty and excellent Poet Lycanus, and his Manker Senneca; albeit he had sworn to him very devoutly (when as he often made sute for leave to depart the Court, and yielded therewithall his goods into Nero's hands) that he had no cause to suspect him, and that he would rather lose his owne life, than do him any harm. And fear and flattery were of such power (which things commonly concur) that the Senate determined to doo sacrifice, and to give solemne thanks unto the gods, for the health and safety of Nero, and his delivery from this conspiracy; and they ordained feasts to be made therefore, and that the Month of April should lose his name, and be called Nero; and that there should be a new temple temple erected to the God of health, and other such like things. After this there was another conspiracie, the captaine whereof was a Romane Knight, whose name was Vindex or Vindex: but as the diuel would help and support his seruant Nero, so it was also discovered, & the confederats were by him brought to their death and many other vpon that occasion. The conspirators had their tryall, and pleaded bound in chaines; some freely confessed it; and others added that he was beholding vnto them for it, being impossible to cure him by any other means (infected as he was and dishonored with all kinde of impieties) but by death: The children of the condemned were expelled the Citie, and afterward poisoned or starved. After which he grew so fearefull, and therewith so cruel, as from thenceforth his greatest studie and practice was to put men to death, vpon any occasion whether forged or true, according to his phantasie. And so he slew a great number of noble men (as Sextonius, and more at large Cornelius Tacitus reports.) Being nulled in these cruelties, he forgot not his other vices and fewd exercises; among which one was to come personally into the Theater, and there to contend and strive for the prizes which were given to him that best could recite or sing verses and tragedies, and for other rewards of Musick which were giuen in that time, as if hee had been the poorest Musition or singing man in Rome. And coming one day very merry for a victorie which he had obtained in these Theatrical lulls and contentions, he took some displeasure against his beloved wife Poppaea: and as he was very proude and ill conditioned, he gaue her a spurne on the bellie, whereof being with child she fell so sicke as she died; and he, who was the cause of her death, was exceeding sorry for it. There was no kinde of Alliance or Coniunguntie, how neere soeuer, but it felt the waight of his bloudie hand. Antonia the daughter of Clavdys, refusing after the death of Poppaea to be his wife, hee slew, vnder colour that she went about to conspire against him; and to alter the state. Hee also murdered all others that were in any sort allied vnto him: Among the which, A. Plancius was one: whole bodie having by force filthily abused against kinde before his death. Let my mother now, said he, kisse my successours sweete lips; giuing it out that hee was her deere darling, and that she encouraged him to aspire to the Empire. His sonne in law Rufinus Crispinus, sonne of Poppaea, being yet very young; for that it was reported of him, that in game he would play for great places of commande and dukedomes; he gaue charge to drowne him in the Sea, when he should be there fishing. After all this, in the thirteenth yeere of his raigne, the prouinces being no longer able to endure his tyranny, and much lesse the armies which were in them; they began to mutine and to thinke vpon meanes how they might rebell against him; as within short space some of them did, which was in the 13. yeere of his raigne. Moued vpon the like occasion, the Iewes rebelled against the Empire, God permitting that they should be the first, and should continue in their rebellion, for a publicke and euident punishment which should be inflicted vpon them, for the putting of our Saviour Christ to death. For this warre which was begun against the Iewes, Vespasian was appointed General, a man very famous both in peace and warre, and who afterwards was made Emperour: he had for his lieutenant (which is the second place after the General) his sonne Titus, who in proceesse of time was also Emperour. Vespasian began this war very resolutely, and it was afterwards one of the most famous that euer was in the world; wherein as shall be declared, the citie of Ierusalem was wholly destroyed. This historie is excellently well written by Iosephus a Iewish historiographer, who serued in that warre, and was taken prisoner by Vespasian; and by Eusebius a Iew by birth, but a christian by profession; besides many other authors which treat and write thereof.

Vespasian having taken some Cities in Iudea; the enuie and hatred, daily increasing against Nero, with the causes which he gaue of the same, all Nations conspiring to rebell against him; the prouinces of France, and the legions which were there, began first chusing Iulius Vindex for their captain. The newes hereof came to Nero being then in the citie of Naples, whither he went for his vertuous recreations; such as he was accustomed to vie: whereat he seemed not to be much moued, and (as it was surmised) it offended him not, because that thereby he might haue occasion to rob and spoile all the prouinces of France. But the newes still encraving, he began to stand in some doubt, and came to Rome, where he was certified that a part of Spain called Tarragona, was also risen against him, with Sergius Galla, proclaiming himselfe Emperour; who was a man very famous for his noble linage, charges and dignities which hee had worthily executed. Which he did, as some write, being perswaded thereto by letters from Iulius Vindex who (as Inovius said) was in armes in France.

H

With

The excessive prodigality of Nero.

Gifts given by Nero.

Piso conspired against Nero.

The Senate did sacrifice for the health of Nero.

Nero killed his wife Poppaea.

The Iewes rebelled against Nero.

In short time as against Nero.

With these newes of Spain, the Emperor NERO was so much troubled, as after that hee had lien a good while (as though he had been dead) without speaking any one word, he rose vp as a man desperate, and tearing his clothes, he knocked his head against the walles, not demanding, nor receiuing counsell or comfort from those which would haue giuen it him. And this furie being past, he began to take order for the leuying of forces, and to require succors and aides: but he was so much hated of all the world, as no man came very willingly to his seruice, rather perswading one another to the contrary: Things standing in this state, as NERO busied himselfe about leuying an army, discouering in himselfe what cruelties and punishments hee might inflict, there came certaine newes vnto him, that the legions which lay vpon the frontiers of high Germanie whose captaine was RUFVS VIRGINIVS, were also in armes against him, as well as those of France and Spain. With this newes NERO lost all courage and hope to defend himselfe: and the Senate and people of Rome were therewith so much troubled, as without any leader, but only of their own meere motion by common consent, they determined to abandon NERO, and refuse to yeeld him any obedience: whereof ensued his death which was shamefull and vile, as he deserued, which was in this manner.

SEYTONIVS writeth, that when the newes came of the insurrection of the legions, NERO was at dinner; and that presently when he heard it, he threw the table to the ground, and in despair to defend himselfe, taking certaine poison in a boxe of gold, he withdrew himselfe to certain gardens which he had, where he deuised sundrie waies and meanes to escape this present calamitie; sometime thinking to flie out of Italy to the King of Parthia, with whom he was in a great league of friendship euer since the coronation of his brother TIRIDATES King of Armenia, otherwhiles he thought to yeeld himselfe to SERGIVS GALBA, and to craue mercy at his hands: but finding no helpe nor remedie in either (for few were they which repaid him, or came at his calling) he was of opinion to goe forth into the publike places of assembly in Rome, clad in mourning attire, and there to craue pardon for his ill forepassed life; and if they should not grant him to continue in the Empire, yet at the least that they would bestow vpon him the government of the kingdome of Egypt; and to this effect, were found certain orations already drawne in his closet; but he durst not put this deuice in practise, fearing to be slaine by the people; so great already was the tumult in the Citie. Passing that day and part of the night in these doubts and feares, he laid himselfe vpon his bed, although hee tooke little rest, determining with himselfe the next day to put in execution that counsell which should seeme most profitable. And hauing slept a little, he awoke about midnight, and was giuen to vnderstand that the Cohorts which had the guard of the palace were gone, and had forsaken him. Amazed at so great an alteration, he sent for certaine of his best and most confident friends to their houses: but as betwene wicked men there is no true friendship, neither was there any due to him, neither had he deserued any, so from none of them hee receiued any good answer: wherefore with some of his seruants, and those very few (protected by the darkenes of the night) he went forth of his palace, and in person went to many of their houses, at none of which they would open the doores, neither giue him any answer: so as hee who within few daies before was feared and adored of all the world; returned sorrowfull, despised, and in feare of all men. And returning to the lodging from whence he came, he found it ransackt and spoild euen to the very boxe of poison which he had refused for his last refuge. Which when he saw in despair of his life, and desiring to die, he began in great hast to call for a certain sword player which serued him, whose name was SPICELVVS MIRMILO, and commanded him to kill him. And as neither this man, neither any other would doe it, he cried out with a loud voice, saying, Now I perceiue that I haue neither friend nor enemy. And in this furie, he went with a determination to drowne himselfe in the Riuer Tiber: and making a stand, he asked of those which were with him, where he might hide himself, vntill that he had bethought him what to doe. Presently an enfranchised man of his, named FALCON, offered to keepe him secretly hidden in a farme which he had 4 miles from Rome. And so NERO taking this for his last refuge, mounting on horsback, being barefooted and in his shirt and wastecote, with an old sullied ouerworne cloake cast vpon him, and so holding a handkercheif before his face, in the darke of the night hee went out of Rome with foure men only, which did beare him company, in the most couert and disguised manner that possibly he could: And with great feare and trouble came to the village whither they carried him; and leaving his horse hidden among certaine trees, he went covertly through certaine Canes and Reedes, and before that hee came to the house whither hee was to goe, the same FALCON which brought him, counselled him to goe into a Caue

Nero despair of himselfe.

Nero brought into extreme miserie.

which was there, where they vsed to dig sand: whereto he answered, that hee would not burie himselfe aliuie; in the end he went into the house, creeping in on all foure at a hole which they made through the wall; and coming into a chamber, he cast himselfe vpon a poore bed which was there, and being both hungrie and thirstie, he desired to haue something to eat: but there was nothing to be had but a peece of browne bread and a little water; the bread he would not eate, but he dranke of the water with wonderfull feare and sorrow to see himselfe in that place.

As these things passed with NERO (as I haue said) as soone as it was day, his flight was presently discouered, and the Senate assembled, and by their common consent hee was adiudged an enemy vnto his countrie, and being condemned to die, was commanded to be fought for euerie where: to the execution whereof, the men of war of the Pretorian and Viban Cohorts, consented by perswasions and promises which were made vnto them. With which newes, the determination of the Senate being published, a seruant to the said FALCON which brought NERO to his farme, went out of Rome, to giue him to vnderstand thereof: for he knew the secret way. And being come where the Emperour was, hee found him making preparation to kill himselfe, through the perswasion of those which came with him, seeing that there was no other meanes for him to escape. He hearing the sorrowfull newes of his doome giuen by the Senate, To be an enemy to the State, and that he should be punished Mors Matorum, betwixen he demanded what kinde of punishment that Mors Matorum was? And when hee vnderstood that a man so condemned was to be stript naked, his head set fast in the stocks, and his bodie scourged with rods to death: He was so terrified therewith, as hee took the pointiards which he had brought thither, and feeling their points and edges, hee made shew to doe that which they had counselled him: but growing fearefull and a coward, hee put them againe into their sheaths, faining that his farrall houre was not yet come. And sometimes he prayed and increased some one of those which were with him, to kill himselfe, to the end that he might follow his example: At other times he would reprove himselfe for his base minde and want of courage, vntill at last hearing the noise of certain horsemen, which by the commandement of the Senate came to seeke him, he set a poinyard to his throat, wherewith, with the helpe of one of his seruants, he wounded himselfe, of which wound within a little while after, hee died; making such gestures and countenances, as made all those which were present amazed therat. And so ended the enemy of mankind, the venom and poison of the earth (for so PLINY calleth him) after that he had ruled the Empire foureteen yeeres, and being of the age of two and thirtie yeeres, in the seuenth yeere after the birth of IESVS CHRIST. This NERO was a man of a goodly constitution, neither high nor low, of a faire countenance though somewhat wanton; his eyes greenish, a round visage, reddish haire, with a thick and full neck, he had a great belly and little legges, and was of a sound complexion: for notwithstanding that he was giuen to all vice and excess, yet in foureteen yeeres that hee reigned, he was neuer but thirfe sick.

His death being known in Rome, the ioi which the Senate & people conceived, was incredible; and all came forth into the streetes to congratulate one with another, with bonnets vpon their heads, which was a signe of libertie; for so did slaues vs to weare when their masters made them free. But with all this (as NERO had been a great feaster, a spender, a giuer, and was subiect to other vices, vvhich many men loued more then other mens vertues) yet there were some vvhich for a long time honored his sepulchre and did ordinarily set flowers vpon it. And the King of Parthia sent his Ambassadors afterwards to Rome to confirme the peace and amitie: vvhich with great instance, earnestly desired that the remembrance of NERO might be held in honour and reuerence. And as vaine and idle people vs to loue false reports; many beleued that NERO was not dead, but that he lay hidden and should returne againe to the Empire, as though he had been enchanted. Saint AVGVSTINE also in his booke de ciuitate Dei saith, that some were of opinion that NERO was antichrist; vvhich vanity gaue occasion that twenty yeeres after there rose a man in Asia, naming himselfe NERO, vvhich caused great trouble and alteration, being assisted by the Parthians: although that in truth there remained no house of NERO, neither son nor daughter, adopted or naturall, and he was the last Emperour of the house and familie of the CAESARS, founders of the Empire; so in him ended his lineage, notwithstanding that the name continueth vnto this day.

SEYTONIVS writeth, that there were many signes fore-shewing the fall and end of CAESARS house in NERO, but among the rest there were two most euident: As LIUIA once

The Senate to seeke out Nero.

Nero flew him
selfe.

In Nero was ended and continued the lineage of the Caesars.

after her marriage with A V G V S T V S went to see a farnie house of hers, an Eagle soaring over her head, let fall a white Hen into her lap, holding in her bill a Laurel branch. And thinking it fit to haue both the fowle kept, and the Laurel set in the ground, behold, of the one there came many chickens all white which multiplied daily; so as the verie house was called Ad Gallinas: And of the other there sprang fo faire a row of Bay-trees, as all the CÆSARS when they did ride in triumph, gathered from thence their Garlands: and the manner was, when they had triumphed, presently to prick downe others in the same place; and it was obserued, that a little before the death of euerie one, the tree, by him planted, did also die. But in the last yeere of NERO both bay-trees withered at the roote, and all the Hens died. And soone after the Temple of the CÆSARS being strooken with lightning, the heads of all their statues fell downe at once, and A V G V S T V S scepter was shaken out of his hand.

THE LIFE OF SERGIUS GALBA, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND SEVENTH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

Sergius Galba succeeded Nero, and in his old age was advanced to the Empire. This man was of the Noble Family of the Sulpitij, very intemperate in his diet, and of no great good fame concerning Sodomie, and gouerned the Empire by the counsell of three of his familiars. Before his coming to the Empire he subdued many Provinces, and was very severe in the execution of martiall discipline. He was learned in the liberall sciences, but chiefly very expert in the lawes. He was unfortunate in his children: for those which he had dyed before him; and he whom he adopted, whose name was Piso Licinianus, was slaine a little after him. This old man dyed through the sedition of Orcho, who sent certaine Soldiers to cut off his head in the publick market place, whether he came armed to repress the tumults. His bodie was left to the mercede of the people; yet in the end was buried by one of his bondmen. Hee liued twenty and three yeeres, and gouerned the Empire sixteen moneths and fourteen dayes. His death seemed to be verie acceptable to the people, as to those which are euer desirous to see alterations.

NERO being dead in such manner as we haue declared, to the great ioy (and with a generall consent) of all men, SERGIUS GALBA was created Emperour: who in the time of NERO was nominated and proclaimed by the Armie which was in Spain; and hee was the first that receiued the Empire from the hands of the Armie, the Senate consenting thereto and approouing the same; hauing no Affinitie or Alliance with the House and Family of the CÆSARS, neither by Blood, nor yet by Adoption: For, alwaies vntill this time the Empire succeeded by inheritance and succession from one to another, being either kinsmen by Nature, or else by Adoption. Now to declare the life and fortunes of

S E R -

SERGIUS GALBA before he was Emperour, would require a large discourse; for he came to it at the age of 72 yeers, and enioyed it not one whole yeer: so as seeing that I write an Imperiall historie, I will not for so short a discourse (as was his raighe) make fo long a preamble. Let it suffice for him, and so much as shall appertaine to our historie, to know, that SERGIUS GALBA was of a most noble familie in Rome, descended from the S V L P I T I J, by surname G A L B A, and from other noble and ancient families; whereof, although men speake diuerfly, yet he was wont to boast, that by his father he was descended from I V P I T E R, and by his mother from P A S I P H A E, wife to M I N O S king of Creta; of whom is reported that notable fable of a Bull. And you shall also know that in his life time he had obtained many Magistracies and dignities in Rome and abroad, whereby he wonne great credit both in peace and warre: for being borne about the 46. yeer of the raighe of O C T A V I A N V S, A V G V S T V S, or within little more or lesse, he liued after in the times of T I B E R I V S, C A L I G V L A, C L A V D I V S and N E R O; and was well knowne and honoured by them all; which could not be, without great wisdome and valour, to support and increase his honour in times of such confusion; and vnder so tyrannous Princes, although imitating them, he eschued not some of their vices, for which hee was noted and defamed. So as speaking indifferently of this Emperour, we may say, that hee was betweene good and bad, and so it seemeth that C O R N E L I V S T A C I T V S noteth him; yet P L Y T A R C H, who writeth his life grauely and at large, amongst other defects in his raighe, saith the fault vpon the time, and the euill conditions of men in that age, and of G A L B A hee treateth as of a good Emperour. And he and others write, that he was learned in the liberall Sciences, and much inclined and giuen to learning and knowledge, particularly in the lawes and customes. He was but once married, and then with a Gentle-woman, whose name was L E P I D A: who being dead, and two sons which he had by her, he would neuer marrie any more. And this shall suffice for the notice of the person and qualities of G A L B A. Now let vs speake of his raighe, which although it were short, yet it was not so in the accidents which happened.

After that G A L B A had rebelled in Spain, in such manner as is said, and that the title of Emperour was giuen him, and by him accepted; in the meane space vntill N E R O died, and a little before he knew of his death, he was in great trouble and danger: for although that presently in the beginning all went well with him; and he tooke a house and held the state of an Emperour, taking a guard, and chusing for his counsell, with whom he might confesse and consult of matters of importance, certaine of the principall and wisest men of the legion whereof hee had the charge, and had giuen offices and dignities, and the inhabitants of the province made their repaire to him to doe him seruice: yet vpon a sodain all was in combustion; for part of the Cohorts began to repent them of what they had done; and were ready to haue abandoned him. And it also happened that a certaine seruant to one of N E R O's his custanlished men, hauing been procured thereto, resolved, and mist but a little to haue slaine him, in a passage as he was going to certaine bathes: And about all, the death of I V L I V S V I N D E X which then ensued, troubled him mo³; who, as we said, rebelled in France, and had induced him to make himselfe Emperour, which V I N D E X slew himself, for that his troups had fought with R V S V S V I R G I N I V S his forces, who was captain of the legions in Germany which also rebelled; which battaile was against the will of both the commanders, and I V L I V S V I N D E X his forces being overcome, and of them 22000 slaine, he therefore killed himselfe.

These newes, being added to the former, did fo trouble G A L B A, as he was in despair both of the Empire, and of his life. But about this time (for, it was in a manner all at one instant) newes came from Rome of the death of N E R O, with certain notice, that the Senate and Pretorian Cohorts had chosen and accepted of G A L B A for Emperour. Which newes one I C E L I V S a Libertine brought him; for which he afterwards did him many fauours: and messengers increasing, much people with these tidings repaireing to his seruice, he took his way toward Rome, accompanied with men of warre. And vpon the way V I R G I N I V S R V F V S, Captain of the Legions in Germany, sent to yeeld him his obedience; who until then had shewed himselfe neutrall, attending the will of the Senate, notwithstanding that he had declared himselfe against N E R O. This old (although new) Emperour, travelling towards Rome (as it commonly hapneth in things that are done with little consideration) his coming to Rome was nothing so pleasing as his election: for, before him there came certain newes, which gave occasion of discontentment, that he was not onely cruell, but also covetous; as Princes are much noted both in their doings and sayings. And it was also reported, that such Cities of Spain and France as had not in time repaired unto him to offer their seruice and obedience, hee had condemned

H 3

in

The image of Sergius Gal-ba.Galba, learned in the liberal Arts.Newes which put Galba into despaire.

in great summes of money, and had charged them with great tributes; and that of some of them hee had commanded the wals to bee throwne down, and the Governours to bee put to death. Which reports of his cruelty and covetousnes were confirmed and augmented at his first entrance into Rome: for, when he would have forced the mariners and sea-men (whom NERO had inrouled in a Legion, and made lawfull fouldiers) to return againe to their former estate and condition, and they (making refusal) called insolently for their Eagle, and other military Ensignes, hee not only sent a troop of horsemen among them, who trod them under their feet, but also executed every tenth man. In like manner the Cohort of the Germans, which in former times had been ordained for the guard of CÆSAR's person, and had been alwayes found very trusty and faithfull, he discharged, and sent them home into their Country, without any recompense for their service; pretending that they were better affected to CNÆIVS DOLOABELLA, than to him.

Being in Rome, with this secret discontentment, although with publike joy and solemnity, he began to take upon him the administration and government of the Empire, and did some things as a wife and worthy Prince, and took good order to assure himself against those which had rebelled: for, in Africa he caused CLODIVS MACER to be slain, because hee practised to make a combustion in that Country, by the means of TREBONIVS GRATIANVS; and for the same cause he commanded to be slain, in the Frontiers of Germanie, FONTEIVS a captain, whom VALENS FABIVS and CORNELIVS AQVINVS, Lieutenants to the Legions in Germanie, slue. And in Rome NERVIDVS SABINVS, a Prefect, was put to death: who, after NERO was dead, practised to make himself Emperour. Which executions although they were not to be blamed, yet they did discontent and grieve many. Also the common people, being affected to the feasts and dissolute sports of NERO, and being accustomed thereto, loved better those his vices, than the ancient virtues of GALBA.

The Pretorian and Virbane Cohorts, seeing that the Emperour GALBA did not performe the promises which were made vnto them, began likewise to murmur; yea and to repent them to haue yielded him their obedience. They were also much discontented, for that he had brought with him a legion of Spaniards, and lodged them certaine daies in the citie; where-with they held themselves wronged. But that which made him to be hated and abhorred of all men, were his favorites, which principally were three, in equall in conditions and behaviour, but equall in power and credit with him; the one of them was called TITVS IVNIVS, and had bin his Lieutenant in Spain, and then was Consul; the other was CORNELIVS LACVS, an infamous man and ill beloved, whom he made Pretorian Prefect, which was the greatest dignitie and authoritie next to the Emperours; the third was ICELIVS MARCIANVS, who had brought the newes into Spain of the death of NERO. By the counsell of these men he was governed, the short time that his raigne endured. And this was such, as without any constancie or resolute staiednes (as became a Prince) he did things many times one contrarie to the other, according to the will of some of them: so as sometimes he shewed himselfe severe and rigorous; and at other times slow, remisse and negligent, condemning some vnheard, and pardoning others without any reason, at the instance of those men. And as they for their desert were ill beloved; so commonly with the Prince which is governed, all those which haue not the like authoritie with him, are discontented; by this reason he made himselfe ill beloved. Whereof this was a helpe, that hee sought to moderate and diminish the excellent gifts and rewards which NERO was wont to give without measure or reason, seeking to apply it to his owne benefit, allowing but a tenth part out of it; and with this strict condition; That if any actors upon the stage, wrestlers or other Champions had sold any such donations formerly given vnto them, the same should be taken from the buiers, seeing that the parties who had sold the same, had spent the money, and were not able to repaie it. And to encrease the peoples hatred and discontent, when as they called on him for Iustice, and to haue HALOTVS and TALOTVS executed, the onely men of al NERO's Instruments who wrought most mischief, he saved them from danger, advancing HALOTVS to a Procuratorship, and rebuking the people for their cruelty against TIGELLIVS.

And besides what is already said, his ynwieldie old age began to be had in contempt, so as every man durst presume to murmur at him, and to doe any thing against his authoritie. Matters standing upon these tearmes in Rome, those abroad were in as little rest: for seeing that the Armie and province of Spain had made an Infection and chosen an Emperour either of envie or discontentment, there were in most parts mutinies, factions and desire of alteration; and princi-

principally in the Romane armie which was in high Germanie, the captaine whereof was RIVVS VIRGINIVS; before named: for these legions waxing proud, by reason of the victorie which they had obtained against the armie of IVLIVS VINDEVS, and making no account of ORDRONIVS FLACCVS, who was their Commaunder, and Lieutenant to VIRGINIVS; holding themselves for suspected, and in disgrace with the Emperour GALBA, because they were the last that came to his service, they determined to bee the first that should leave the same. And the first day of Ianuarie being come, wherein they did vse to sweare, and to doe homage of fidelitie to the Emperour, they refused to doe it to him, but to the Senate; and sent to the Pretorian Cohorts at Rome, to let them vnderstand, that they would not obey that Emperour who was created in Spain; & that the Senat should chuse such a one whom they thought fit; whereto they remitted them selves: Yet SVERONIVS faith, they referre this choise to the same Cohorts. The legions in Germanie standing upon these tearmes, those in low Germanie were as little obedient, whose captaine was VITELLIVS; who having founded the good wil of the fouldiers (notwithstanding that hee was sent thither by GALBA, & had received that charge from him) through a desire to raigne violating his faith (as VITELLIVS CÆSAR was wont to say, that for rule it was lawfull to breake any faith) he practised to get the Empire to himselfe. And for as much as he afterwards came to be Emperour, it shall not not be amisse to giue the reader to vnderstand what hee was. This VITELLIVS was a man of great reputation and authoritie; which hee had gotten in the offices and Magistracies which he had held in Rome, and abroad, in the time of the Emperours CAIVS CALIGVLA, CLAVDIVS and NERO, with all which he had been very priuate, more for his vices, and some abilities of his person, then for any virtues. With CALIGVLA he was in grace, for that he was a great Amiga; for so were they called which had the charge and rule of chariots and waggons: with CLAVDIVS, for that he was a great gamester: with NERO, for the same, and such like qualities. And besides this, as he was very subtil and cunning, so hee obtained in those times great dignities and offices, of Prefect, of priesthood, and also to be Viceconsul in Africa, which hee wisely executed: and in the end GALBA gaue him this command in Germanie, where hee succeeded that which we will declare. His principall descent was from the familie of the VITELLI; whereof because there are sundrie opinions, some making it very ancient, and others to be of later time, I will make no question thereof: the same happened to his fathers and ancestors, for some said that he was of meane degree. SVERONIVS in his life treateth thereof more at large, to whom I referre the curious reader: for, what is spoken, sufficeth for my purpose, thereby to vnderstand what shall be said hereafter.

The Emperour GALBA being aduertised of all that had passed in the armies of Germanie, and knowing that besides his age, he was not respected, for that he had neuer a sonne that might succeed him, hee resolved to put in execution what he sometimes before had proiected, which was to adopt and chuse for his sonne, some personage of such age & authoritie, as might be sufficient and capable of the Empire, & who in his life time might protect him, & after his decesse succcede him. His favorites, & such as were priuate with him, vnderstanding this his determination, each of them apart pretended to giue him a sonne of his chusing, so as there arose strife and contention amongst them vpon this occasion. OTHO gaped after it and thought to haue obtained this adoption (it was he, from whom we said, that NERO tooke his wife POPPEA and sent him into Spain) alleaging for his desert, that presently after GALBA's rebellion against NERO, he was the first that came to his service. A great part also of the Pretorian and Virban Cohorts fauoured him (which Historiographers indifferently call the Armie which lay neere to Rome) and most of all TITVS IVNIVS assisted him, who was one of GALBA's fauorites, and was Consul with him that yeere: so as OTHO did assure himselfe that no other should be adopted but hee. But GALBA being fully resolved to that which was most expedient for the good of the common-wealth, without any other respect, & likewise disliking the disposition of OTHO (which sented of NERO's conditions) he took no regard of what was said vnto him; but vpon a day when no man thought of any such matter, being in the Senate, hee tooke PISO LYCINIANVS by the hand, who was a man both wise and vertuous, and in whom did concur all the qualities and good conditions that might seeme fit and requisite for an Emperour; and calling him sonne he adopted him, after the manner then accustomed; and with a great traine, in great pompe, he went with him to the Campe, and made the Armie to sweare obedience vnto him, and to receive him for CÆSAR: which hee did without giuing any rewards to the fouldiers, or promising them ought, whereto they were accustomed; but only made a grave oration with great majesty, after the antient manner: and so it was coldly accepted among them, they performing more with silence, than with any signe of gladnes: either in countenance or in speeches; and with the like coldnes he was accepted by the Senate: for, now Kome was not capable of equity, or the antient integrity. GALBA, having made this adoption, conceived that it would have been the mean to haue preserved and protected his life: but it proved in effect to be the occasion of his confusion and utter ruine. For, OTHO, seeing himself deceived in his hope of adoption, and finding the souldiers well affected towards him, for the hatred they had conceived against GALBA, resolved to effect his purposes by force and treason: which hee presently practised by all means possible with the Pretorian souldiers, by great gifts, and greater promises which he made unto them. And he so cunningly handled the matter (for, so little faith and loyalty was used in those daies) that in lesse than eight daies hee had plotted his treason; and it was concluded, that they should rebell, and create him Emperour (as they did) with the death of poor old GALBA, which was performed in this manner:

The legions in Germanie yet refused to doe homage to Galb.

Galba resolved to adopt one to succcede him.

Piso adopted by Galba for his fame and justice.

GALBA being with certaine his priuate friends in his palace doing sacrifice; this OTHO being there with him, he stole secretly away from him to a place appointed, where a number of souldiers of the Pretorian Cohorts attended his coming; who took him vpon their shoulders, calling him Emperour, and drawing their swords (to give the greater terror to the people) went with him towards their campe. This being related vnto GALBA, who doubted not any such matter, it extremely perplexed him; and as his counsells were sudden, so were they inconstant & variable. For some were of opinion that his best course was to put himselfe in arms, and to go publickly abroad; for with his presence he might haue staid the tumult from proceeding any further; others, that it were best for him to fortifie himself in the Capitoll, and there to stay till he should see to what issue the matter would grow. The poor old man wavered, and was doubtful what resolution to take, the messages which were brought him were so diuerse: for, some made the matter nothing; and others, very dangerous. In the end, deceived by a false report which they brought him (that the Army had not only refused to receive OTHO for Emperour, but had slain him) he rode armed with his guard, and some others which repaired unto him, even unto the principall place in Rome, where all the people were assembled to see what would be the end of so great a combustion. At that Instant there entred on the other side a great troop of horsemen which OTHO had sent from the Camp (where he was chosen Emperour) against GALBA, to kill him: who although they came with that resolution and charge, yet coming within his sight, and knowing him, they stood amazed a pretty while, as doubting what they should doo. At this time was GALBA most perplexed, not knowing whereon to resolve; and the multitude and prease of people was so great about him, as they swaid him sometimes to one side, and sometime to the other: and, as it commonly hapneth in such accidents and tumults, that then the counsell is praised and approved when the time is past wherein it might have been put in execution; and, standing irresolute whether he should return to the Palace, or shut himself up in the Capitoll, having had sufficient time for either; now, when he would have done the one or the other, hee could not: For, being abandoned by the greatest part of those which did accompany him, they who were sent by OTHO, set upon him, after they had stode a good space doubtfull (as I said) and there slue him. PLVTARCH writes (although some others report it after another manner) that when as those which came to kill him drew neere unto him, he thrust out his head, to the end they should cut it off; willing them to doo it, if so it were expedient for the Good of the Common-wealth, and of the Roman people. And so it was stricken off, and set on the point of a Lance, and presented to OTHO, and from him was carried up and down the Camp; and his body remained in the place without a head, for any man to tread upon, untill at last it was buried by a bondman of his. And the same day, by OTHO his commandement, was PISO LVCIANVS put to death, whom GALBA (as I said) had adopted for his sonne and successor: and so was TITVS VINIVS also, who was Consul; and others of his Favourites, whose heads were all carried to the Camp to OTHO, whom all men now obeyed for Emperour: and, being laid together with GALBA's head, every one gloried to have embred his hands in their blood. No mans death did OTHO so much reioyce at, no mans head did hee view and review so unsatiably, as PISO's; whether hee thought himself then freed from fear and care, PISO being his enemy & concurrent; or that the remembrance of Majesty in GALBA, or acquaintance with VINIVS, had moved him to compassion.

And so ended the life of the Emperour GALBA, having held the Empire only seven months. His death was in the year of our Saviour IHSVS CHRIST 71, and 73 of his age. Hee was a man of a good constitution of body, greenish eyed, hauke nosed, very balde: and by reason of the great paine of the gowt wherewith he was afflicted, his fingers and toes were weak and crooked: he was a great feeder, very incontinent, and giuen to women.

man

THE LIFE OF MARCVS SILVIVS OTHO, FIRST OF THAT NAME, ANDEIGHT ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGUMENT.

OTHO borne of a Noble Family, took the Empire after Galba, although his euill fortune would not suffer him to enioy the same long: for at the same time that Otho was made Emperour in Rome, Vitellius was proclaimed Emperour in Germanie. And for as much as the one would not giue place to the other, in the end they came to blowes: and after vnicie battles, Otho being the los'r, not knowing what other course to take in his aduersitie, slue himself, which although he med not answerable to the life which he had led, which was more like to the life of a woman, then the courage of a man. This man governed the Empire four moneths, and dyed in the xxx. year of his age. He was so deere to his owne souldiers, that whilst his bodie was burning after the manner then of the Romanes, many of them slew themselves with their owne hands.

His Raigne of GALBA (of whom we haue now ended our discourse) of OTHO, and VITELLIVS his successors, of which we are to treat, were so short, so turbulent, so confused, & gotten by such wicked and vnlawfull means, as more properly they might be called Tyrants, then Emperours, and so some writers tearme them: neither do they put them in the catalogue of Emperours, of which are Saint ISIDORE and BEDA. And the great Magician APOLLONIVS THIANEVVS, who liued in that time vied to say, that GALBA, OTHO, and VITELLIVS were Theban Emperours: and the reason was, for that the Thebanes held the Empire a verie small time, and so did these as little the Empire of Rome. PLVTARCH in the life of GALBA, compareth them to Kings in a Tragedie, which last no longer then the time that they are represented vpon the Stage. But howsoeuer it was, they obtained the names of Emperours; whether the Senate gaue it them for feare or flattery, I will not decide: But paising on with PLVTARCH, CORNELIVS TACITVS, and the rest which write of them, I say that the same day wherein GALBA was slaine, there was no man of any account which went not to the Campe where OTHO was, to yeeld him obedience and to flatter him, as their soveraigne Lord and Emperour, commending the Cohorts and Army for that which they had done, in putting GALBA to death, and for the election of OTHO.

OTHO was a man very valiant and witty; and was the sonne of LVCIVS OTHO who had bin Consul, of an ancient and honorable familie; and was so like vnto TIBERIVS in his gesture and countenance, that some held him for his sonne. His mother also was of a noble house, and so were her progenitors and auncestors. Hereof writeth SERVATIVS, and PLVTARCH in the life of him: by which and by CORNELIVS TACITVS, may be vnderstood what was the course of his life before he came to the Empire, or had the name of Emperour; which in briefe I haue before declared, & therefore hold it needlesse to make repetition thereof. OTHO besides the occasions which he had to rise against GALBA, they write that he had this for one,

which

Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, called Theban Emperours, and compared to Kings vpon a Stage, in a Tragedie.

Otho his descent.

Otho's mother, his pretorian Bands against Galba.

Galba was slain by the direction of Otho, and his head presented vnto him upon the point of a Lance.

which was, that an Astrologer which he carried with him when he was sent by NERO into Spain, did foretell and assure him that he should be Emperour of Rome. Being in the Camp in such manner as before is recited, compassed about with Senators & the principall men of Rome, he came to the Senate; having first commanded the Pretorian Prefect of the citie to assemble the same: where besides the ordinarie blessings and applauses, they gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS, and all the other titles and preheminences which the other Emperours desired to haue. And hauing there made a briefe Oration, wherein he set them vnderstand that he was compelled and forced to take vpon him the charge of the Empire, promising to gouerne the same by the counsell and aduise of the Senate, he went from thence through the midst of the place (which was all bloudie and full of dead bodies) to IVPITERs Capitoll, and thence to the Imperiall Palace: and so was OTHO aduanced to the Empire; who was the first that by the Cohorts (which were the Army lodged too neer the City of Rome) was chosen and made Emperour, and from whom came the custome to create Emperours, after they had forsaken GALBA: before which time they were ever the Emperours ordinarie guard. This was an accursed and most pernicious introduction for the Roman Empire, and for the Emperours themselves, as experience did afterwards make manifest.

OTHO, to perform his promises, and to make a good beginning and shew of a good Prince, hee commanded much consecrated goods to bee restored to their owners, and to such men as NERO had banished; and did other things in like manner, which were exceeding pleasing to all the people, in such sort, as they took such love and liking to him, that they continued evermore faithfull unto him until his dying day, although in truth his life continued but a short time after. While these matters passed in Rome, the Legions and Army, which both in high & lowe Germania (as I haue said) were disobedient to GALBA, their Captain VITELLIVS having by gifts and promises purchased their favour and good will, after some treaties (which TACITVS and PLYTARCH describe at large) concluded to create him Emperour, and (without attending the will and pleasure of the Senate) they made him so: for as in a manner, at one instant, OTHO was advertised thereof, and VITELLIVS knew what passed in Rome.

The German Legions, presuming that VITELLIVS (whom they had chosen) should continue Emperour, pretending that they had as great authority to create an Emperour as the Legions in Spain; the Senate in like manner, the Cohorts, and army at Rome pretended to haue the supreme power, & that in them rested the absolute authoritie to choose and create the Emperour, which was OTHO only. And although that OTHO by this means seemed to haue the greatest interest and best tide: yet whether his guiltie conscience did put him in feare, or that it grieved him to thinke of the evils which were likely to ensue (as he afterwards shewed) he sought means by letters & messengers to come to a composition and agreement with VITELLIVS; but nothing was concluded: and the dissension daily increasing betwene them, either partie made preparation for the warres. And certaine tidings being brought that VITELLIVS his forces came marching towards Italy, vnder the conduct of two Captaines, whose names were VALENS and CECINNA (VITELLIVS remaining behind them attending more aile) OTHO departed from Rome with a faire and well ordered army, of all the Roman Nobilitie, the Pretorian Cohorts, and the Legions which were in the Nauiques by sea vpon the coast of Italy, which he sent for to that effect, and such others as he then could leuie: and in this manner he marched from Rome verie mightie in number of men, though not much accustomed to train'd vp to the warres, leaving FLAVIVS SABINVS, brother to VESPASIAN, for gouernour, who (as is said) followed the warres against the Iewes; and so he continued his iourney against VITELLIVS, whose forces were already come to the Alpes, to the number of 70000 men, whereof fortie thousand were commanded by VALENS, and the rest by CECINNA, VITELLIVS remaining in France expecting the remainder of those in Germany, and the Legions of Britanny which also came to do him seruice. These two Armies drawing neere the one to the other, the ciuill war began betwene them, and was very cruell in many parts; so to say better, that warre was prosecuted which was begun betwene GALBA and NERO. Rome for a good space had not bin infested with any ciuill dissensions, although it escaped not free from sundrie calamities, by reason of the wicked Princes which reigned there; by which means the present miseries which were very great, brought the battailes fought betwene MARIVS and SILLA, IULIVS CAESAR and POMPEY, AVGVSTVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, and others which depended thereon, into remembrance; with which these whereof we now treat may well make comparison, both for alteration in estates, for number of men, and effusion of blood;

OTHO was the first that was made Emperour by the Pretorian Cohorts.

Vitellius made Emperour by the Legions in Germany.

Warre betwene Otho and Vitellius.

I cannot say whether for continuance of time, in countries and prouinces, or no: for after these warres began, there died by the sword foure Emperours (as it hath bin, and shall be declared) which were NERO, GALBA, OTHO and VITELLIVS, besides VINDIX, and other Noble-men which were slain; and besides VINDIX Legions, which (as we said) were overthrowne in France, there were great encounters and battels fought, and extreme cruelties committed. And these warres lasted untill VESPASIAN came to bee Emperour, no part of the Empire remaining free from this fury; whereof I can set down but the summe and most notable accidents which hapned therein.

OTHO, coming to the City of Brixellum, upon the side of the River Pa, remained there, sending his Forces before him, vnder the conduct of good Captains; who were ill obeyed by their souldiers, being growne proud for that they had made an Emperour; imagining, that no man ought to haue the command of them. The like want of obedience was in VITELLIVS Army, and for the same reason: and, the warres waxing cruell betwene these two Commanders and their Armies, they made such haste, as leaving apart the great skirmishes and other encounters, there were within fewe daies space two or three notable battels fought betwixt them: one of which was neere to the City of Placentia, the other, neere to Cremuna, and the third neere to a place called Castor, in which were slain a very great number of men: and in all these three battels OTHO his Captains and the Romans had the better, although that of either side the word was, Rome and the Empire.

After which, VALENS and CECINNA, who were VITELLIVS Lieutenants (which untill then had made warres apart) joined their Forces together, reinforcing their Armies with new souldiers and supplies; determining to set up their whole rest in one battell, if the enemy would give it them. At that time (as PLYTARCH reporteth) OTHO, very joyfull for the victories obtained by his Captains, came to his Army at Bebriacum (where then it lay) neere unto Cremuna; and, seeing that his enemies (notwithstanding they had been put to the worse, and were routed) made shew to desire to fight again, took counsell whether that of his part he should doo the like or no. The greatest part, and wisest men, were of opinion, that he should prosecute the warres without hazarding any battell; for that his enemy endured want of many things, and with their losses past had likewise lost much reputation; and many Countries were revolted from VITELLIVS, and held for OTHO: besides that, VITELLIVS could send them little relief; and, on the contrary, his Army was well provided of all things necessary, and Rome and all Italy were wholly at his devotion. And, besides all this, the Provinces of the East stood firm for him; and the Legions in Servia, Bulgaria, Hungarie, and Austria, were vpon the way coming to his aid: so as he had no reason so often to tempt his fortune, and therefore hee ought to weary his enemy by delays, or else to stay for greater power; wherein there was no doubt of victory. But those which were haughty, and desirous to fight, alleaged many reasons to the contrary; that he ought not to lose the occasion, and the good successe of fortune, neither to suffer VITELLIVS to come to his Army, and to free it from the fear wherein it was; with many other reasons, to the end a battell might be given. And OTHO, being inclined thereto, approved it, and commanded the same to be put in execution: for, in truth, hee did so much abhorre the war, as he held it for a lesse evil to lose the victory, than long to stand in suspense. And being resolved vpon this counsell, he returned to Brixelle: for it was agreed, that hee should not personally bee in the battell; and so his Army went to seek VITELLIVS his Forces, which were not farre off. And, as of either party they were desirous to fight, so they came to a battell; where, in the beginning, OTHO his Army was deceived by a shew of peace which his enemies made: whereupon they gave the charge very slowly, and Authors report the manner thereof very diuersly, as it useth to happen in the like accidents: but all affirm, that both the one and the other fought valiantly, saving the Pretorian Cohorts, which were those in whom OTHO reposed his chiefeest trust; through whose default and cowardise, OTHO lost the battell, and VITELLIVS was Victor, and (with great slaughter of his aduersaries) became Master of the Field.

OTHO his Captaines with such others as by flight escaped from the battaile, retired themselves to their campe, and fortified the same, in hope to haue been relieved by their Emperour; notwithstanding that many fled to sundry parts: but he, hearing the newes of the overthrow of his Armie, brought by those which fled vnto him: And among the first that brought this disastrous newes was common Souldier, who when he reported the overthrow of the Army, and could purchase no credit, but was taxed with vntruth, and that he had runne away through Four Emperours slain in the ciuill warre.

Battels betwixt Otho and Vitellius.

feat

feare and cowardise, he fell vpon his owne sword, at O T H O 's feet: at which sight he cried out: That he would no more draw such valiant fouldiers, and so well deseruing, into danger. Notwithstanding he knew that in the campe there were sufficient forces, and that he had opportunity to temporize, and to stay for the legions which came out of Mysia, Hungary, Austria, and Dalmatia to his aid, and were neere at hand: yet he regarded not any of those helps, but with his owne hand resolved to end the ciuill warres, which as it passed for that it is a notable action, although I shall be somewhat tedious I will declare as PLVTARCH and TACITVS write it, and SVENTONIVS TRANQVILLVS also after the report of his owne father, who was then present, which was thus: The heauy tidings of this overthrow being published, all those which were in the citie (which were many and very good men, and the greatest part of the Senate of Rome) came to O T H O 's lodging, fearing and suspecting that which afterwards ensued, by reason of that which they had vnderstood by him before: all which with shew of great courage offered to die for his seruice, and endeouored to animate and comfort him: but all this (notwithstanding that he knew a great part of his armie yet remained, and that more forces were coming vnto him, and that there wanted neither courage in his fouldiers, nor means to continue the warres) sufficed not to alter his resolutions, so much did he abhorre ciuill discord and contention. And giuing answer to all the reasons & perswasions which they yfed vnto him, he made vnto them a very notable Oration, signifying, that hee would neuer haue begun the warres against VITELLIVS, but in hope of peace, which he had sought and procured before he took Arms, and that he had no use for those legions and forces which they said came to his aid, seeing that his enemy was neither HANNIBAL nor PYRRHVS, or any other common enemy to the people of Rome; but Romans themselves, and the Lords thereof: so as the Conquerers and Conquered did wrong their Countrey if they contended any longer, seeing that the joy of the victory was to the losse and prejudice thereof: And that hee could no way so much aduance the Roman Empire by winning battels in war and contention, as by making a sacrifice of himself for the peace thereof, seeing that by his death onely a generall union and concord would ensue: wherefore he was content that VITELLIVS should bee Emperor without any more bloudshed, and he desired no revenge nor rule, to the ruine of his Citizens, neither to diminish the Common-wealth by the losse of such Armies; and that as others had purchased honour and fame by well governing and supporting the Empire, so hee would likewise procure himself a good name by leaving it resolutely, to the end hee would not damne himselfe it. And, finally, speaking these words, and giuing other good reasons, permitting and perswading all those which were with him to go and serue VITELLIVS; night being come, he retired himself to his chamber: where he commanded all his money and jewels to be taken out, which he diuided among his servants and friends. Which although they would not accept, yet he commanded them to go to their rest: and he did the like, laying first the sharpest of two Rapiers which he had, under his beds head: and, being laid in his bed, he slept part of the night, in presence of those which were in his chamber, the door standing open; and, awaking about the break of the day, and seeing one of his servants remaining, hee commanded him to goe forth. And, then presently taking the Rapier in his hand, he thrust himself under the left side with such force as the wound was mortall, giuing one only groane, which was heard by his servants, who hastily ran vnto him, and found him struing with death, and died presently vnder their hands. By those which were present, & such as presently repaired thither from all parts of the citie to him, there was so great lamentation made for him, as it seemed the heauens had rent asunder: so much was this man beloued in so few daies. And his bodie was presently burned, according as the custome then was. And so ended the Emperour O T H O manfully and resolutely, according to the opinion and law of the Romans: scarcely foure moneths after that he had usurped the Empire, in the 38. yeere of his age, and the 71. after the birth of CHRIST, leauing after him neither sonne nor daughter. He was a man but of a small stature, and had crooked feet; but he was so neat and curious in attiring himselfe, as the care which he tooke therein, was more becoming a woman then a man. He cuer wore a petting, and suffered no iot of his beard to grow, shauing it every day, and so yfed such other effeminate toys, much dissonant from the manly resolution which he shewed at his death. Manie of his soldiers which were about him, when with abundance of reaseth-y had kissed his hands and feet as he lay dead, and commended him for a valiant man, and the onely Emperours that cuer was, presently selfe themselves nere vnto his funerals fire. And manie which were absent, hearing of his end, (oppressed with griefe) flew one another. Finally, manie who in his life cursed and detested him, being now dead, highly commended

Otho his Oration.

Otho diuided his money and jewels among his servants and friends.

Otho thrust
himselfe.

commended him; so as it was an ordinarie speech, That GALEA was not slaine by him for that he affected Soueraintie, but because he desired to restore the Common-wealth to her lost libertie.

The newes of his death & of the victory was brought to his enemy VITELLIVS in France: who hauing intelligence of the losses which his captaines had receiued; was coming with all the forces that he was able to make, to ioyne with them, and to reinforce the armie. In those daies, LIVIVS who was S. PETER'S successor, held the chiefe seate in the Church of Rome, where there was a Church and congregation of Christians; which made their prayers to God for those vvch persecuted them.

THE LIFE OF AVLVVS VITELLIVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND NINTH ROMANE EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

After Otho, Aulus Vitellius, borne of a Noble Family, succeeded in the Empire, wherein his was unfortunate: for he reigned the same but 8. moneths. This man was of a cruell disposition, and of a boonwillfull minde. In his time Vespasian, being in the East, was made Emperour by his Soldiers; who coming to a battaile in Italy against Vitellius, took him prisoner: and binding his hands behinde him, leading him (publickly) halfe naked, and his face all durty, they flew him with many wounds, in the same place where he had put Sabinus, Vespasians brother, to death. Hee liued 57. yeeres, and reigned (as is aboue said) little more then halfe a yeere.

By whose misery it plainly appeareth how variable the motions of fortune are, and that oftentimes a kingdom is lost through the same meanes whereby it was vniuersally gotten, as appeareth in this Emperour: for Vespasian did by him as he had done by his Predecessor Otho.

the contention for the Title of Emperour continued betwixt Otho and VITELLIVS, as by that which is already said may be vnderstood: Otho being dead, all yielded to VITELLIVS: which hapned in this manner: The great lamentation made for the death of Otho being ended; all the men of warre, both Legionarie and Prerorian, with all the rest, made repair to the lodging of VIROINIVS, who had been Commander of the German Legions, who fought against VINDEX his Army when they both made a mutinie against NERO. And, being all assembled together, they entreated him to take upon him the name of Emperour; offering him their seruice, and to die in the action; and if that hee pleased not to accept thereof, yet at the least that hee would be their Ambassador to VALENS and CERCINNA; and obtaine their pardon of them. VIROINIVS RVIVS, who was a wife and valiant man answered them vvith the best vvords he could deuise; alleging that to him it seemed follie to accept of the Empire from the hands of those which were ouercome, hauing refused the same of the German Legions, which now were victors, wherein the life of NERO they had offered it him. And as concerning the ambassage which they requested him to performe for them, he gaue them a doubtfull and vncertaine answer, still putting them in hope, vntill that he was gotten into his lodging, and out againe at a backe dore, and so retired to a secret place where hee hid himselfe vntill that furie was past. But a certain man of note whose name was RVIVS

I

GALEVS,

GALLVS, afterwards accepting of that iourney, went to VITELLIVS his Captaines to treat thereof, and peace and pardon was graunted, as well to these men as to the armie ouercome neere Bedriaco, and so all came to the obedience of VITELLIVS in his absence. The like was done by part of the Senate which came with OTHO, and was then in Modena. And in Rome, when as the death of OTHO was known, FLAVIVS SABINVS (being Prefect of the citie) assembled the Senate, who conforming themselves to the time (which was now to profer service and to flatter) with the accustomed solemnity proclaimed VITELLIVS for Emperor, giuing him the title of AVGVSTVS, and Pater patriæ, with other honourable titles and Epithets, resolving to giue great thanks, and to commend the Armie for that which was done. Thenewes of all this came to the new Emperor VITELLIVS in France vpon the coast of Italy: which how pleasing it was to him, may easily be imagined; wherewith he hastened his way with admirable pompe and pride, his soldiers in all the cities as they passed, committing many disorders and inuolencies.

Vitellius confirmed Emperour by this Senate.

The German Legions which were in Italy, grown proud through the victorie which they had obtained, and for that they were the Authors of VITELLIVS his Empire, committed outrages neuer scene nor heard of in that countrey before, whereof the spoils and losse vvhich these people sustained was inestimable, as TACITVS and SVETONIVS report: And VITELLIVS, coming full of pride for his victorie into Italy, either could not, or would not remedie these disorders. And that in some sort he might seem to doe iustice and shew himselfe a Iusticer, he caused all the Pretorian Cohorts, which had been actors about the death of GALLA, and making of OTHO Emperor, to be disarmed and deprived of the name and honor of Souldiers, and commanded their armes to be taken from them, and one hundred and twentie of the most guiltie he condemned to death, and being sought and found out, a iust sentence was executed vpon them, if it had proceeded from a iust Iudge. VITELLIVS, thus marching towards Rome, desired to see the place where his Captaines obtained the victorie against OTHO, his Armie, and being but fortie daies after the same, the fields lay full of dead bodies which were yet vnburied; and as many of those which were with him could not endure the euill smell thereof, the cruell tyrant reprooued them, saying, That there was no sweeter sent in the world, then the smell of an enemy when he is dead, and especially of a citizen: A speech doublelesse very inhumane and cruell; the which is written to be abhorred, and ought to be read with the like affection.

The cruell speech of Vitellius.

VITELLIVS being come to Rome, as vpon the way many scandals and outrages were committed by the sundrie nations which came with him, with infinite robberies and spoiles done in the countrey, so was his entry into the citie fearefull and terrible: for he entred into it as into an enemies countrey which had bene conquered, mounted vpon a great horse, clad in militarie and warlike habiliments, the Senate and people of Rome going before him as though that he had triumphed ouer them; compassed about with standards, with the Eagles, and sundrie other ensignes, and his whole Army both of foot and horse, armed in the best armour and furniture that could be gotten. In this manner he went to the Capitoll to make his prayers to IVPITER, and afterwards he went in the same manner to his Palace: and the next day commanding the Senate to be assembled, he came thither; where he made a fit speech, magnifying with little wit or discretion his acts and adventures, and promising great goodnes of himselfe; and by them was humble answered, obeyed and honoured as Emperor, and their soueraign Lord.

Vitellius his entrie into Rome.

Departing from the Senate and taking his way towards his palace, all the people of Rome (being accustomed to flatter and to make offers of their seruice) met him, making shew of great ioy, applauding and blessing him: and as new accidents euer bring good hopes, so all were of opinion that VITELLIVS would proue a good Emperor. These fit solemnities being ended, he made himself presently to be chosen high Priest, and perpetuall Consul; and took to himselfe certain dignities, such as he thought good, and commanded that Magistrates should be chosen for ten yeers before hand: so absolutely and tyrannously purposed he to have usurped all things, if time would have sufficed him. And, thinking by his industry to have prolonged his life, he banished out of Rome and all Italy all the Iudiciall Astrologers called Mathematicians, because they had said, that his Raig should not continue one yeer compleat. And hee was so incensed against them, as, if Information were made against any one, hee presently put him to death without hearing the Partie. Presently after the making of his Edict for their banishment by the first of October, there was a Writing set vp in the open market place, to this effect: Wee give warning by these Presents unto VITELLIVS GERMANICVS, that by the Calends

Vitellius banished the Mathematicians
from Rome.

of the said October, he be not extant in any place wherefoeuer. After this, falling to his old humors and licentious inclination, he began to giue himself to the practices and vices of NERO, and such like; which were plaies and dishonest sports vpon Theatres, with public feasts; wherein he consumed an infinite treasure, desiring to make the beginning of his Empire acceptable and pleasing. In which time he made so great banquets, as neuer any Emperour had done the like before him: at which, was given to his guests (which were a great number of people) such things as neuer were thought or heard of; wherein he spent inestimable summes. SVETONIUS writes, that he sometimes commanded one, and sometimes another, to invite him: in which feasts they spent at the least ten thousand crowns. But, above all others, one supper was most stately, made by his Brother the day he entred into Rome; at which there were two thousand choice Fishes, and seven thousand Fowle. At which supper, to make it more magnificent, hee did consecrate a Charger of a huge capacity, and called it MITHRAVS'S Shield: in the which were the Livers, Brains, and Tongues, of rare Fowles; with the spawn of Mulletts, which hee had caused to be fisht from the Carpathian Sea to that of Spain.

During these pleasures (and afterwards) hee executed great cruelties; in such sort, as, if his Raig had lasted long, he would have made himself equall with NERO, whom hee did imitate: for, he did put many to death contrary to all law and equity, seeking forgeries and false accusations against them; with some of which he had held strict friendship and familiarity: one of which, coming to visit him being sick, and calling for a little water to drink, he with his own hand cast poison into the cold water, and poisoned him. At another time he commanded two young men being brothers to be slain, for no other cause, but because they came to intreat him to pardon their father, whom hee had condemned to die. And on a time a Roman Knight being caried by his commandment toward the place of execution, he commanded him to be slaid, because hee said he had nominated him for his heir by his Will and Testament: and seeing his Will, and finding that jointly with him he had made a bondman of his, whom hee had enfranchised, his heir with him, he commanded him to be slain, and the poor Libertine also, without any other occasion. An Vsurer, coming to salute him, and to doo his duty, he delivered him to the executioner to be put to death; and presently called for him back again: But when as the standers-by commended him for his clemency, hee commanded the Partie to bee slain before his face; saying, that he would feed his eyes. Hee also used the like cruelties vpon some poor and mean people; of which vpon a time he commanded a great number to be slain, for no other occasion, but for that in certain sports which were used on horseback, and in chariots (wherein were sundry men apparellled in sundry colours) they took part with those which were clad in green, which was called the Præstian faction; hee being affected to the contrary colour, which they called Venetian, which was grey: which two colours and factions (although there were white and red also) were the chief among all the rest. And amongst these colours the good liking and favour of the Roman people was so diuided, as this affection extended it selfe euen to the Emperours themselves: as now to VITELLIVS, who fauoured the grey colour; as NERO and CALIGULA before him had affected the green: and sometime (as it shall be hereafter declared) about these vanities there followed great riots and murders.

Cruelties committed by Vi-telli.

These and other such like cruelties and tyrannies committed VITELLIVS in Rome, and some of his Captains and Favourites did no lesse: for, having obtained the victory, euerie one reuenged himself on him whom he hated; and sometime they fained displeasures, thereby to haue a colour under which they might rob and spoil the innocent: such are the fruits of ciuill war. Besides this, the violences and oppressions which were committed in Rome were very great, and in the marches thereof by the men of war which he brought with him, and were lodged in the Countrey, staying to see him settled in the Empire.

While as VITELLIVS made so ill a beginning in the City of Rome, suffering himself to be led and governed by Libertines, and such as were odious to all men; after that Italy, Spain, France and Africa, were come to his obedience; in the East the Legions which were there for the defence thereof, although that in the beginning they refused not his Command, yet they presently did beginne to mutine, and very shortly after resolved to make VESPASIAN their Emperour, who at this time (as is aforesayd) made warre against the Iewes, which began about the end of the raigne of NERO; They having rebelled, being abused with an olde fabulous Prophecie, which they did constantly beleue, That by the appointment of the destinies about such a time ther should come some out of Iurie, who should be Lords of the whole world: but the euent did shew it was meant by the Roman Empire. The issue thereof passed in such manner as followeth:

VESPASIAN, who for his worthy acts in his life past, was much esteemed, in this war gained greater estimation: for he obtained many victories, and besieged and took many cities in India, and Paxestina; vntill that at last being ready to besiege the citie of Ierusalem; the Emperour NERO died: and vnderstanding of his death, and being doubtfull what would ensue, he continued the warre for a space, vntill he might see who should succede in the Empire: and knowing that GALBA prevailed, he took no care to proceede any further or to oppress the citie, but preferred what he had gotten, & kept the enemie in awe, observing what course the new Emperour would take: and so he sent his sonne TITVS to Rome, to treat of this business, and to offer him his obedience. Who being hindred by contrarie weather, when he came to the coast of Achaia in Gracia, he was aduertised that GALBA was slaine by the direction of OTHO; wherefore he held it for his best course to returne to his father, and so he did: and as OTHO his raigne continued but foure moneths as is aboue said, and in the same followed the ciuill warres betwene him and VITELLIVS, VESPASIAN continued as a general although that he acknowledged OTHO for Emperour, vntill that VITELLIVS obtained the victory, and OTHO was slaine; which was nothing pleasing to him, neither to the Captaines in the East, neither to their armies, for the dislike they had that so vicious a man as VITELLIVS should be Emperour: and so that day wherein they sware fealtie to their new Emperour, with the accustomed solemnitie, in presence of VESPASIAN (CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth) that the Legions performed it with great silence and heauienes. And VESPASIAN prosecuting the warre with great honour and fame, and hauing now resolved to besiege the citie of Ierusalem; the murmuring and discontentment so much increased against the new Emperour VITELLIVS, as well in the armie which VESPASIAN commanded, as in those in Syria, in Egypt, and other ordinarie Legions in the East; as they all fixed their eyes vpon VESPASIAN, resolving to create him Emperour against VITELLIVS: whereto was a great helpe, the certaine newes which came that the Legions in Mysia and Pannonia, had the same resolution: for (as is before related) they came to the aide of OTHO when his armie was defeated, and he flew himselfe: and continuing in the same resolution, they disobeied VITELLIVS, desiring and nominating VESPASIAN for Emperour. In such sort as vpon these motions, there passed some messages and letters betwene TIBERIVS ALEXANDER, who was gouernour of Egypt, and LICINIVS MUCIANVS gouernour of Syria; who concluded that VESPASIAN should be Emperour, although that he refused it. And this matter being begun by TIBERIVS ALEXANDER, who was gouernour of Egypt, in the citie of Alexandria; VESPASIAN was in his absence proclaimed Emperour, and al the Army confirmed the same with great applause, doing their accustomed homage: which happened the first day of Iuly in the seauentic and two yeere after the birth of CHRIST. And this was accounted for the beginning of the raigne of VESPASIAN; and within eight daies or little more or lesse his Armie did the like, entreating him first to accept thereof: and he refusing and gaine saying it (as EGESIPIVS and IOSEPHVS doe testifie) they forced and compelled him with their drawne swords threatening to kill him if he refused the same. Hauing accepted thereof and performed all the solemnities requisite in so great an accident, VESPASIAN as a valiant and excellent prince, with the like wisdom and valour as he had lined being a subiect, began to shew himselfe a Lord; and to provide for all things with great authoritie and iudgement, sending Ambassadors, and writing letters to all parts of the world.

And within few daies after this, all the armies and prouinces of the East came to his obedience and seruice; and the like in Europe did those of Mysia, Bulgaria, Serua, and those of Hungarie and Austria then called Pannonia; and also those in Slauonia, then called Dalmatia and Illyricum, whose ancient names I will sometime vse vntill such time as they shall lose the same. The like I haue done and will doe in most of the prouinces of the Empire. All things happening so prosperous and luckily to VESPASIANVS, hauing resolved with MUCIANVS gouernour of Syria, TIBERIVS ALEXANDER gouernour of Egypt, and with his owne sonne TITVS what was best to be done, it was decreed that TITVS should continue the warres against the Iewes, that MUCIANVS with the greatest part of the Legions, should with all speede take his iourney for Italie; and that VESPASIAN should goe to Alexandria in Egypt to make provision from all parts, and with a greater power passe ouer into Italie, there to make an end of the warre; if it were not before hand finished by MUCIANVS. This being concluded, it was commanded to be presently put in execution. But while as LICINIVS MUCIANVS was trauellling towards Italie, ANTONINVS, who was Generall of the Legions in Illyricum and Dalmatia

Vespasian made Emperour, which was the first time that he was compelled to accept thereof by whom men use to make Emperours.

Antonine captain of the Legions in Slauonia came into Italie againe.

matia, hauing intelligence of what had passed, desiring to doe VESPASIAN some great seruice, and to shew the hatred which he bare against VITELLIVS, marched in great hast with his Legions, and such as he could leuie in Mysia and Pannonia, and came to make warre in Italie against the Emperour VITELLIVS, who was in armes.

Of the election of VESPASIAN and of other things (as we haue said) and of euery particular which had passed, within few daies VITELLIVS had aduertisement, who spent his time in Rome in banquetting and riot, although that he could not long enioy the same. And desirous to make resistance against so great forces, he began to leuie the greatest power he was able, besides those which he had already, the which he yet had not discharged: and knowing with what haste and resolution ANTONINVS commander of Illyricum came forwards, without staying for LICINIVS MUCIANVS, who came with as great speede, he sent VALENS and BERGINNA his Captaines before named, who had serued him in the warre against OTHO, with so great an armie and power, as seemed sufficient to make head both against him and LICINIVS MUCIANVS. He also provided extraordinary fleets and Captaines for the Seas. Thus the warre begun, but it would be too long to repeat all the particular accidents which happened: the effect was, that the two armies approaching the one neere to the other, there grew a heauesie that CRICINNA one of VITELLIVS Captaines praised some agreement with VESPASIANVS Commanders: which being knowne in the armie, he was slaine by the old souldiers. ANTONINVS hearing this, as he had a great desire to fight before that MUCIANVS should come (after sundry great encounters and skirmishes, which happed betwene them) came to a maine battaile with the Vitellians, neere to the citie Cremona: which was fought with such furie, and was so bloudy and cruell, that of ANTONINVS his side vvhv vvas Conqueror, there pvere slaine 4500. men, and of the Vitellians, vvhv were ouercome about 30000.

Antonine's tail.

This great victorie being obtained, Italie, which vntill then had been vvholly at the deuotion of VITELLIVS, and took his part, vvas suddenly diuided, and many Cities sided vvhv VESPASIAN. It is an admirable thing, and worthy of an excellent History, to recite the accidents which happed within few daies, and the cruell warre vvhich CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth more at large than any other, the vvhich I cannot relate for breuities sake, which I obserue. But the issue vvas, that VITELLIVS Captaines, vvhv were ouercom and escap't from the battaile, reinforcing their Army, and gathering together their Souldiers, made what resistance against VESPASIANVS Captaines they were able, although they were not of force to stop their passage to Rome, as hereafter shall be declared. For, ANTONINVS being Victor, with the same greatnes of mind, and expedition vvhv he began the war, endeouored to obtaine the victory, seeking means to put it in execution. As soone as VITELLIVS, being in Rome, was giuen to vnderstand of the ouerthrow of his armie, affrighted with such newes (although that hee neuer gaue ouer his vices and beastly courses) he made election of new Captaines, which were IVLIVS PRISCVS and ALPHRIVS VARRON, who with thirteene Cohorts should guard the passage of the Appennine mountains; & should also seek to stop ANTONINVS his passage for Rome, and MUCIANVS also, who as it is said, was already arrived in Italie. And of the rest of his forces which he held for the guard of the citie, he made his brother LVCIVS VITELLIVS Generall, and vvhv all possible means to leuie men of all sorts. But the successe was such, as feare made VITELLIVS desire to come to some composition and agreement howsoever: And being offered by letters from ANTONINVS, who was victor, and also from MUCIANVS that if he would quietly resigne the Empire, his life should be granted him, and a place with meanes sufficient for his maintenance; thereto he gaue care and took counsell thereupon, with FLAVIVS SABINVS, VESPASIAN his brother, who in all these troubles remained in Rome, and neuer withdrew himselfe from VITELLIVS, hauing also with him DOMITIANS, VESPASIANVS youngest sonne, who afterwards was Emperour: and it was concluded in the temple of IVNO; where he swore and promised to renounce the Empire, and would presently haue put it in effect, as he twice protested openly: so great was his feare. But those which were of greatest authoritie about him did so much oppose it, and chiefly the Pretorian Cohorts, as hee took heart againe, and alred his determination.

When FLAVIVS SABINVS vnderstood (to whose house were drawne together a great number of the chiefest noblemen of Rome, as to his brother, whom they made account should be Emperour) he was much moued therewith. And knowing that in the behalf of VITELLIVS there came some to murder him in his house, being induced thereto by those which were with him, he went forth of his house with strong hand, although with lesse power then was requisite for so great an action, and retyred to the Capitoll (which was the chiefe strength of Rome) and seiled on the fame, where he was presently besieged by VITELLIVS his friends. And as it commonly happeneth, Many will giue honourable and graue counsell, but there are few will thrust themselves into danger, neither lend their hand to put it in execution: so, few of those which had perswaded him to enter into this action, came to his aide, or made any repaire vnto him. The next morning he was assaulted with great furie, in the defence whereof was no good order, but rather little agreement: and as in such misfortunes and disasters it happeneth, all will direct and command, but few will execute; so as by the meanes of ill fighting and worse direction, the Capitoll was by force entred and burned, and all those which were therein, slaine, and FLAVIVS SABINVS taken prisoner, who within a little while after was put to death by the commandement of VITELLIVS; and yong DOMITIANVS his nephew and sonne to VESPASIAN, escaped by flight, and so might SABINVS haue done that night (as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth) if he would haue come forth of the Capitoll: for there was no sufficient guard to haue hindred him: but he with too little iudgement, and too much presumption was lost, as is said.

A conspiracy offered to Vitellius, and he was killed by the soldiers of the Empire.

After the death of SABINVS, VITELLIVS hearing that ANTONY drew neere to Rome with his forces, he again began to seek some agreement; and to that end sent letters and messengers vnto him, and he grew so fearful and dejected, as hee sent the vestall virgins, who were virgins enclosed like Nuns in a Cloister, which was the most religious and most ceremoniously guarded of any thing in Rome. But ANTONY, beeing incensed for the death of SABINVS, would give no ear to their words, neither come to any composition; but kept on his way untill he came neere Rome, where VITELLIVS his Forces attended him, resolutely determining to defend themselves. So there being, both without and within, a very great number of the best souldiers in the world, ANTONY assailed it in three parts, and VITELLIVS his people fallied out against him in as many; and there began at each of them one of the most cruell fights in the world: which CORNELIVS TACITVS describets excellently well; affirming, that it lasted the greatest part of the day. And, in the end, that City (which was the Head and Lady of the world) was taken by those which were her owne natural Subjects; and they which were subdued endured that which in like cases happeneth, and much more; as, slaughters, spoilings, violences, and extreme disgraces, as against enemies whom they deadly hated for the death of SABINVS, for that he was their Lords Brother, and for the obstinacy and fury wherewith they had fought.

When VITELLIVS saw that the City was entred, thinking to escape by flight, hee went forth of his Palace; and, finding no safe way (I knowe not with what hope) he returned thither again; and, finding it abandoned without guard or defense, in the best manner he could he hid himself in a secret place: where he staid not long before he was found by a Tribune. And beeing taken by him, without attending any further determination or counsell, they bound his hands behind him, and cast a rope about his necke, and, tearing his clothes from his back, half naked they led him through the streets of Rome, untill they brought him to the principal place, where by the way they did him an infinite number of indignities and disgraces, pulling his hair behinde him, as they used to malefactors; and, setting a dagger under his chin, that hee might be seen of all men, some casting dirt and filth in his face, others calling him Incendiarie & glutton; and some reproaching him with the defects of his body: and there hee was slain by the souldiers (no man being able to avert for certain, who either began or ended) and cast into Tiber. And this was the end of this tyrannous Emperor, and with him died his brother LVCIUS VITELLIVS, and one only son which he had at his death. He had not been Emperor much about eight moneths, as most authors affirme, although that SVETONIUS setteth downe a longer time: for he maketh his account that VESPASIAN was chosen Emperor in the East, in the eight moneth of VITELLIVS his raigne, which was some moneths before his death, which was in the 57. yeere of his age, and the 72. yeere after the birth of our SAVIOR. What hapned after his death shall be referred to the historie of VESPASIAN, seeing that it was in his time. VITELLIVS was so tall, and so corpulent of body, as he was therewith deformed. His face was verie red, by reason of the much wine which hee dranke, and was very corpulent: he went lame of one leg, through a bruise which he had received by a wagon.

THE

THE LIFE OF FLAVIVS VESPASIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND TENTH ROMANE EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

*V*itellius being ignominiously slaine, the good Vespasian attained to the Imperiall dignity, who restored tyred Rome to such rest, as it seemed to haue recovered her ancient dignity and greatness, from whence the vices and wickednes of many former Emperours had made it to fall. This man, before that he attained to the Empire, was no lesse wise then valiant in Art Militarie: so as he grew to be so excellent, as notwithstanding hee was not borne of any very Noble house, yet for his vertues he deserved to be made Emperor. In his time were ended the warres of Ierusalem, vnder the government of his sonne Titus. He made many Provinces tributary to the Roman Empire, which untill then neuer yielded obedience. He beautified Rome, not onely by repairing the ruines, growne by the fire, made by Nero; but he also built a new Amphitheater and Temple, which hee adorned with faire marble, and most beautifull Statues: for in his time painting and carving flourished. He was very courteous and milde, and amongst his other vertues, this was one: to forget injuries, and not to regard what malicious tongues said of him. He was very cleanly, and neat of his bodie. In his diet he was very temperate, and fasted one whole day in euery moneth. He was noted for no other vice but auarice, wherof he excused himselfe, alleging, that he found the Imperiall Treasurie empty, through the pilling of former Tyrants. He liued 69. yeeres, and reigned some, and dyed of the flux. Truly, it seemeth this Emperor was borne for the good of the Roman Common-wealth; to the end, that after the crueltie of so many Tyrants it should not be wholly ruinated.

*A*s fair weather cometh after tempests and storms: so was the Raign of VESPASIAN after the troublesome and stormy times of the detestable Emperours TIBERIUS, CALIGULA, NERO, and the tyrannies and civil warres of GALBA, OTHO, and VITELLIVS: wherewith the Roman Empire was so diuided and shaken, as it was ready to come to ruine, if VESPASIAN had not upheld and supported the fame by his goodnes, valor and wisdom. VESPASIAN was of the Family of the FLAVII, mean and lowe, and not honoured with any titles and dignities. Hee had, long before these civil combustions, tokens prefiging Sovereignty. First, within a Countrey Farm belonging to the FLAVII, there stood an old Oak consecrated to MARS, which at three child-births of VESPASIA, sodainly put forth a bough at every birth. The first was small and withered soon (for a daughter then born died within on a yeer): the second grew & continued long; but the third came to the bignes of a Tree. Whereupon SABINVS (Father to VESPASIAN) told his owne mother, that hee had a Nephew born which should be CÆSAR. Being in Achaia, hee dreamt that he and his should prosper, when as NERO had a tooth drawne: and it hapned, that the day following a Barber shewed him a tooth of NERO's, newly drawn. And TOSITHVS, being taken in the Iewish Wars, and cast into prison, maintained constantly, that hee should be shortly set at liberty by him, but he should be Emperour first. These, with many other prefiges, confirmed his hopes to obtain the Empire. He was 59 yeers old when hee was chosen Emperour; and came to be knowne, and to winne reputation and credit in the times of CLAUDIVS, CALIGULA, and NERO; and he obtained offices and dignities in the wars, and in the government of Cities. In Thracia he was Tribune of the souldiers; and, beeing Questor or Treasurer, the Ile of Creta (now Canidia) fell to his lot. He was Edil and Pretor in Rome, and afterwards was Lieutenant to the Legions in Germanie: and from thence he was sent to bee

Rome entred, taken, and sacked, and by whom

The death of Vitellius.

Anno Dom. 71.

Vespasian's his neg.

Vespasian's offices & dignities

Governour and Generall in Britanny when it rebelled, where (as Eutropius and Svetonius report) he fought above thirty times in battels and skirmishes, in his owne person: so as for his desert there were Arms and triumphant ornaments given him, such as they did use to give to such as did triumph. After all which, he was Consul in Rome two months in the end of a year, and was afterward Proconsul in Asia in the time of Nero; and in the end was sent thither by him to that warre against them: the which he followed when-as he was chosen Emperour against Vitellius, his Army compelling him thereto, as it is already observed. He had at that time two sonnes, the one called Titus who was with him, the other Domitianus who was in Rome: both which he had by Flavia Domitilla his lawfull wife, daughter to Flavius Liberalis; by whom hee had had a daughter which was dead, whose name was Domitilla also.

And this is the summe of his life before he came to the Empire. But, returning to our History, it passed in this manner: Vitellius being so reproachfully and ignominiously slain in Rome, although with his death the warre ceased, yet the furies and effects thereof were not ended: for, the Conquerors committed so many slaughters and spoils upon those which had taken Vitellius part, as there was no part of Rome wherein was not effusion of blood: so as that City endured (by means of this battell) the like or greater misery, than in the wars and proscriptions of Marivs and Silla, or any other whatsoever in times past. But, as soon as Mucianus came to Rome, who was the chief Commander sent by Vespasian, and that Domitianus was returned, who ever since the death of his Uncle Sabinus, and the burning of the Capitoll, lay hidden; these murders and revenges ceased, and there beganne some order to be taken in the Common-wealth.

The Senate was assembled, and the government of Vespasian was accepted and approved, and there were given unto him the names and titles which were usually given to other Emperors, and messengers with all diligence were sent unto him, to advertise him of the victory, and to yeeld obedience in the behalfe of the Senate. And for that (being absent) he could not take order and provide for the estate of Rome, his sonne Domitianus, Mucianus and Antonius which then were of greatest power, began to manage the government, not without confusion and emulation betweene them, vntill the coming of Vespasian, which by reason of the dangerous failing in the winter time was deferred. The only thing he wanted (being as it were a new unexpected Prince) was countenance and authority, and a kind of royal Maestie, which also followed suddainly vpon this occasion: Being in Alexandria (attending a seasonable time for his passage to Rome) there was a certaine man of meane qualitie starke blind, and another lame, both which came together when as he sat on his Tribunal, craving help for their infirmities, it being foretold them by Serapis in their dreames, that if Vespasian did but spit in the blinde mans eyes, hee should recover his sight; and the others leg should be made strong, if he would but touch it with his heel. He doubted much of the successe, and therefore durst not put it in practice: yet in the end, by the perswasion and importunity of his friends, before the whole Assembly he tried both the means; and they were both cured, as Svetonius writes.

Domitianus was called Cæsar, and made Pretor of Rome with Consulary authority; and, because he was the Emperors son, had the preeminence and chief place in all matters, although he proved not afterwards to be such as he ought to have been: for, besides that hee was vicious, he was disloyall and disobedient to his Father. The Senates Embassadors, and others which were sent from Rome, found Vespasian in the City of Alexandria in Egypt, with his Legions and men of warre ready to passe into Italy against Vitellius (knowing nothing, that he was dead) and staid there with the King of Parthia's Embassadors, which offered him 40000 horsemen. In like manner, there were Ambassadors from other Kings and Tetrarchs of the East (some subject to the Empire, and some free) which came to the like intent: but, seeing there was no such need to draw so great Forces to Rome, he gave great thanks to the King of Parthia's Legats, and the rest of the Kings for their offers, and resolved to take his passage as soon as conveniently he might: And so, as a wife Emperour, forgot not to take order for the defense and extent of the bounds of the Empire, resolving to send his son Titus to make an end of the warres begun by him against the Iewes and the holy City of Ierusalem: to whom besides the ordinary Legions, he gave three other Legions; wherewith Titus continued the warres with great resolution: and, by Gods permission, the Iewes were in his time, by the hands of the Romans, and through their owne civill dissension, vanquished even to their total confusion, fusion, as hereafter in briefe shall be declared. Vespasian could not so soone depart from Alexandria as he desired, by reason of the stormie and vntempestuous weather by Sea, vnfit for Navigation, in which time there arose in Rome great troubles, emulations, envie, and contentions betweene Mucianus and Antonius, each seeking to be preferred before other: Mucianus, for that he was the chiefe commander sent by Vespasian, and had borne great sway in his election; and the other, for the great victories which he had gotten in his service against Vitellius and his Captaines. The bad practices of Domitianus were also partly cause of these tumults, who could not be easily restrained; considering who he was. But the revuets and infurrections which then were in Germany and part of France, did much more trouble them that swayed the government: for all was in combustion, and in Armes against the Empire, which had a former originall in the time of Vitellius, although that then wee could not relate it. The original and occasion thereof was in manner as followeth.

In the province of Battania, now called Holland (a province in low Germany, which the Rhine diuiding it selfe maketh an Iland) there was an audacious man, of great credit among them, whose name was Clavdius Civilis, who vnder colour of taking part with Vespasian against Vitellius, when the warre began between them, leuied some forces of that countie, and induced the Frislanders and their captaine, whose name was Brinco, to do the like; and being thus in armes, they assailed those of the Roman Legions which held for Vitellius; and taking them at vnawares, slew many of them, being left weak by reason that Vitellius withdrew the greatest part of the forces from thence when hee went against Otho as before hath been mentioned: So as they drave all the Roman garri- sons out of that province, and there happened afterwards many encounters and skirmishes of eyther side, vntill that Vespasian preuailing in Italy, Flaccus Hordebonius, being for Vitellius captaine of those legions in Germany, was slaine by his owne souldiers, proclaiming Vespasian, & so the legions remained without order of commander. Clavdius Civilis with the forces of Holland and Frisland, ioyning with another captaine called Classicus, imagined that in the confusion of those troublesome times, they might free their countries; or to say better, make themselves Lords thereof, as many have done: and drawing to their faction certaine of the legions which remained firme for Vitellius, they made an infurrection against Vespasian, publishing that he was dead, in such sort as with- in few daies, some cities in France reuolued, so as it was feared that some great alteration would haue ensued in the Empire. Which, as I said, put Mucianus and Antonius in great doubt; for Domitianus who should haue had the greatest care, spent his time in his vices and pleasures. After many counfels and consultations held about this businesse, Quintilius Cerialis was sent for Generall into those parts: who both valiantly and wisely followed the warres, and reduced those legions to the seruice of the Empire, who being abused, had ioyned with Clavdius Civilis; and obtained notable victories although hardly gotten and very bloudie, which Cornelius Tacitus sets downe at large. Being in the heate of this warre, holding it to be of great importance, Mucianus and Domitianus departed from Rome, with the greatest power they could raise, to giue reliefe and ayde where neede should require: who being come to the Alps, they had intelligence that Cerialis had obtained another famous victorie in a great battaile, by means whercof, and of the fame of their coming, all those countries yeelded their obedience, and the Germanes laying downe their armes, desired peace. Notwithstanding this, Domitianus, although there were no neede, had a desire to march forwards, and to take the government and forces which Cerialis held and commanded, and wrote sundrie letters to him requesting the same: whereupon he was suspected, that his intent was to rebell against his father, and so writeth Cornelius Tacitus. Others suspect that he did it of enuie against his brother Titus, and to make himselfe equall with him: But his practices, whatsoever they were, took no effect. For, Cerialis dissembled and would not yeeld his command and government vnto him, and Mucianus hindered his passage from going any further: for Cerialis within few dayes had pacified the countie, and Domitianus returned to Rome to receiue his father, who (he knew) was coming, and within few daies came, hauing sayled from Alexandria to Rhodes in ships, and from thence in galleies, and passing all along the coast of Grecia, visited all the cities thereof which were in his way, till his arrivall in Italy, and so came to Rome, where he was most solemnly receiued (which Iosephus most elegantly relateth.) For, as his coming had

Tumult in Rome

An infurrection in Holland.

Domitianus suspected.

Vespasian's counting 16 Rome.

had been long desired and wished for, so was it very gratefull and pleasing to all men, and he presently began to do things conformable to the desire and hope which they had conceived of him, in ministering justice, in reforming the lawes and customes of Rome, rewarding those which had served him, and pardoning and punishing with singular clemencie those which were his adversaries: in conclusion, he made a good and laudable beginning of his Empire, and persevered and ended therein, as shall appeare.

Jerusalem besieged by Titus.

In the meane time while as the Emperor VESPASIAN parted from Alexandria and came to Rome, his sonne TITVS prosecuting the warres against the Iewes, hauing subdued the countrey round about, he came and besieged the Citie of Jerusalem, at such time as from all parts of the world an incredible number of Iewes were come into the Citie, to celebrate the feast of the Paschall Lambe. Of the siege and destruction thereof, because it was a matter of great moment, and prophesied of before, and was famous afterwards, it shall not be amisse in few words to declare the end thereof; and for as much, as in truth, it was the most strictly and obstinately besieged, and best defended Citie that euer was in the world; the Iewes persisting in their obstinacy and rebellion, by Gods permission, in reuenge of the death and passion of his only sonne IESVS CHRIST our Saniour God and man: all which IOSEPHVS, EOBSEPPVS and CORNELIYS TACITVS write at large, to which I remit the curious reader, besides many others which are more briefe: being by TITVS besieged in such manner, as no man could fallie forth, or enter into it. For the effecting whereof, not contenting himselfe with the multitude of his men of warre and prouision, within fewe dayes he compassed it round about with trenches and ramparts, such as were sufficient, making the souldiers of his army set their hands to the work: so as he besieged it in this manner the space of five moneths, in which time there were so many assaults, skirmishes and slaughters, as by the numbers of the dead, which we will set downe, may appeare: and such as I neuer read or heard that the like had passed before any Citie; with such obstinacy and resolution the besiegers assailed it, and the besieged defended themselves. In all which TITVS performed the dutie of a most excellent Captaine and a valiant Knight; sometime giuing direction and commanding, and also when neede required fighting, that, as IOSEPHVS testifieth, in this conquest he slew twelue Iews with his owne hands. The hunger which afflicted the Citie of Jerusalem in this siege, is wonderful to reade: for, all ordinary sustenance being spent, although they made the greatest spare thereof that was possible, they gaue themselves to eate all things that might yeelde any taste, without any difference, good or bad, eating the flesh of horses, asses, dogs, cats, rats, snakes, adders, and other vncleane and strange things, as it seemeth incredible to all humane reason: But this giueth it the more credit, for that all writers both Christian and Heathen affirme, that there was a mother which killed and ate her owne sonne, whom she had at her breast. Finally, after the death of an infinite number by sword and famine, vpon the eight day of September (hauing been besieged about five moneths, and about foure yeeres after the warre was begun by VESPASIAN in the rainge of NERO) the Citie of Jerusalem was entred by force, and a great number of those which were therein slaine: and so had they all been, but that TITVS, moued with compassion, commanded the execution vpon women, and such as bare no armes, to cease. But although that this slaughter was stayed, yet in the prouince and the citie there died of hunger and the sword (as EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIUS and other authors affirme) fixe hundred thousand men able to beare armes. And if we shall giue credit to IOSEPHVS, who was an eye-witnesse to most part thereof, there died eleven hundred thousand; and there were Captiues which were sold, nintie seuen thousand. EOBSEPPVS, who is of no lesse credit and authoritie, agreeth with him in the number of the captiues; but in the number of the dead, he setteth downe 100000. lesse, which seemeth to be an error but in the letter: both which doe yeeld the reason of so great mortalitie to be, as is said; for that so great a number was gathered together in Jerusalem to the feast at Easter, and had retired thither as to the head of all that prouince, there to die or defend the same. Also that famous Temple was burnt, and those strong and stately walles of the famous Temple of Salomon were throwne downe, and all the Citie laid waste, desolate and wholly ruined, as sundry Prophets had before prophesied.

Salomons temple destroyed.

And this iust and deserved destruction of Jerusalem happened in the second yeere of the Emperor VESPASIAN, and the fourth yeere after the death of CHRIST our Lord, and the seuentie three after his birth, being (according to EVSEBIVS and PAVLVS OROSIUS) one thousand one hundred and two yeeres after that the Temple was first built by Salomon.

and five hundred nintie & one yeere after that it was reedified in the time of K. DARIVS, hauing been destroyed by the Babylonians. In this account I follow EVSEBIVS his computation, to auoid disputation about the difference which is among Writers. All affirm, and it doth plainly appear by PLINY and CORNELIYS TACITVS, that Jerusalem had never been so rich, nor so populous, nor so sumptuous in wals, temples and buildings, as at the time of CHRIST his passion, and when it was destroyed. And so that City and the holy Temple were overthrowen and laid euen with the ground, nor one stone remaining vpon another; according as our Saviour CHRIST had told his Disciples; they shewing it to him; and extolling the greatnes and building of that Temple, as the holy Euangelist reciteth more at large: and so it lay untilt the Emperor ADRIAN began to reedifie it, although not in the same place, neither such as it was before; as hereafter shall be declared. And so that Prouince, which had been gouerned by the Romans as their friends, and in a manner free, was made captiue and tributarie; and the Iewes being captiues were sold and dispersed through all parts of the world.

Jerusalem destroyed and laid waste, so that there remained not one stone vpon another.
An. Dom. 40.

The Iewes taken in Jerusalem, sold and dispersed over the world.

This warre being ended by TITVS in such manner as is specified, his Father and all Rome greatly rejoyced thereat, and to both them the triumph was granted by the Senate, because they both had followed that warre. And TITVS, leauing all things in good order in the East, came victorious to Rome. And, within fewe daies after, both the Father and the Sonne entred triumphing with one of the most solemne and stately triumphs that euer was seen in Rome. The which he that will see more at large, shall finde it written by IOSEPHVS in his seventh book of the wars of the Iewes.

Vespasian and Titus came to Rome in triumph for the wars of the Iewes.

While as TITVS was busied about the siege of the City of Jerusalem, the Alanes, a people of Scythia (of whom hereafter we shall speak much) had their abode about the lake Meotis, neer the River Tanais: who in very great numbers abandoned their Country, it being barren and vnfertile, or for that it was not sufficient to sustaine them, and came into the Territory of the Medes, robbing and spoiling that Country; and marching forwards came into Armenia, where they did the like. TIRIDATES, King thereof, fought a battell with them; wherein he was overcome, and by great good fortune escaped by flight. Which when TITVS understood, hauing then fully ended his enterprize against Jerusalem, he marched with his Forces to the relief of TIRIDATES, to assist a King who was vassall and friend to the Empire; and came to the City of Antioch, as EOBSEPPVS writeth: but the Alanes, vpon the onely report of his coming, returned to their Country, contented with what they had gotten by theft. VESPASIAN being in Rome, enjoying the Empire in peace, had his son TITVS continually with him, hauing had good experience of his wijsdome and milde disposition: he did most matters by his counsell, and after his opinion; and in all things held him for his companion in the Empire, and made him his fellow in office in the Censurie and Tribunacie; and afterwards in seuen Consulships together.

Tiridates King of Armenia overcame and put to flight the Alanes.

VESPASIAN, continuing as he had begun the whole course of his life, neuer omitted any thing that was fit for a good and excellent Emperour, as well in preferring and enlarging the Empire, as in beautifying and reforming the same; in correcting the abuses and euill customes, as in execution of Iustice and other vertues: and chiefly he took great care for the publicke edifices and buildings, wherein he spent much treasure; and made the Capitol which VITELLIVS had burnt (when his brother SABINVS was slain) to be reedified and new built, farre more stately and beautifull than euer it had been. He also repaired the City of Rome of those ruines which yet remained since it was burnt in the time of NERO, as in his life we haue declared. Besides this, he built a most stately Temple to the goddesse PALLAS; the workmanship whereof was so rich, so exquisite, and so excellent, as the like had neuer been seen in Rome. For, touching the painting, caruing, and inlaying, all the most excellent workmen of the world (these Arts being then at the height) shewed their skill, and left memorials of their handworking, as PLINY writes; and IOSEPHVS (who was an eye-witnes) affirms, that men came from all parts of the world to see the riches and excellencie of this Temple. VESPASIAN also built an Amphitheatre, of singular and most rare workmanship; which is yet at this day to be seen in Rome, although ruined and defaced: which is a building of marvellous and sumptuous greatnes, round in form, as if two Theatres were joined together like to half circles: in the middle of which were represented the plaies, Iewes, wrestlings, fightings with wilde beasts, and also combats of sword-plaiers: And every thing was wrought and framed in such manner, as by means of their seats it was capable of an infinite number of people, without any hindrance one to the other; which we may comprehend by the Theatre which OCTAVIANVS CAESAR, so did TITVS cleer himself of the suspitions conceiued against him, with the brightnes of his vertues and worthy actions. He came to the Empire at the age of 39 yeeres, and somewhat less; in which he followed the warres, and gat great experience both in peace and war. First, in his infancy he was brought up in learning and other vertuous exercises, and thereby grew to be very learned both in Greek and Latin, and expert in many Arts. He was a very good horseman, and most skilfull in Musick; a very good Singer, an eloquent Orator, and could make verses with wonderfull ease and facility. He had a singular memory, and was endued with an excellent wit, and was so speedie in writing in ciphers and abbreviations, as he excelled all his Secretaries and Notaries; and would so well counterfeite any mans hand and writing, as it was said of him, that he might have been a notable counterfeiter or forger.

The good deeds of Vespasian.

Being endued with these graces and sufficiencies in his youth, before his Father came to the Empire he bore Arms in the wars, and was Tribune both in Germany and Britanny, and purchased the reputation of wife and valiant. After which, being come to Rome, hee used to plead and defend causes and actions (which was then the exercise of the most eminent men); and afterwards in time he was made Questor or Treasurer. In proceesse of which time hee married twice: the first, with ARACIDIA the daughter of a Roman Knight whose name was TRIVLLVS, who had been Prefect of the Pretorian Legions; and, after her death being a widow, hauing neuer a childe, he married the second time with a woman of great blood, whose name was MARTIA FVLIA, whom hee afterwards put away, hauing first had a daughter by her.

The warres beginning against the Iewes, he went thither with his father, hauing the command and charge of a Legion: and matters succeeding in such manner as is already said, he made a small end thereof. And although that some practiced to bring him in suspicion with his father, falsely suggesting that he would haue rebelled against him; yet after those victories he came into Italy, sufficiently cleered himselfe, and triumphed of the Iewes; and (as wee haue said) obtained so much grace with his father, as hee made him his companion, and in a manner equall with him in the Empire. In his fathers life time hee purchased dislike vpon some occasions: whereof one was, that they charged him with the couetousnes and auarice of his father, for the new impositions which he laid vpon the subiects of the Empire: whereof although that he might well haue purged himselfe, yet he would not make manifest his innocencie, for that the fault should not be imputed to his father. The other was, for that hee had caused AVLVVS CINNA and certaine others of great note to be put to death, although hee had iust occasion to doe it; as SVBTONIVS sheweth in AVLVVS CINNA: and other authors, in others.

TITVS also discredited himselfe for bringing of QUEENE VRONICA from Indea with him for his friend or concubine, whom hee so deely loured, as hee entertained her in a manner as his wife: and there is an author which affirmeth that he slew AVLVVS CINNA, through ialousie of her. All which being laid together, when by the death of his father hee came to the Empire, they doubted that hee would haue proued wicked and cruell: but his clemencie and other vertues did presently disperse all those cloudes of suspicion. The first, and happily the greatest conquest was, the forcing of his will and bridling his desires and affections by withdrawing himselfe from the company of VRONICA, for the which he was taxed with infamie, although that he loured her exceedingly, and was by her beloued in the same degree. Hee also gaue ouer his other pastimes, which he held vnfit and vnbecoming an Emperour, and began to liue and carrie himselfe very modestly and honourably, and to shew his liberaltie, clemencie, and singular curesse. Whereof I hold it requisite (although I keepe not order, seeing his time was so short) to make some mention; that seeing his bountie, clemencie and wisdom made his Empire void of ciuill mutinies, warres and alterations, which vsually please the readers, yet they may speake of the vertues & greatnes of this Emperour. First for a shew & ostentation to the world (which great Princes sometimes should make, because that thereby they do in some sort purchase the loue of the common people) he repaired & made from new great buildings, and he also presented games and sports, wherein (according to EVSEBIVS, EVTRUPIVS, and SVETONIVS) were slaine 5000. wild beasts, and therein also fought a great number of Sword-players. He caused also to be represented a Nauall battaile in one of the auncient Nau-machias, whereof mention hath been made heretofore. And as he was by nature most noble and liberall, all the fauours, graces and rewards, which his Predecessors had giuen and granted (which none of them would confirm, but they granted some new) hee confirmed by a decree. And, moreover, to any petition made vnto him he neuer gaue vnpleasing answer, neither suffered any

any to depart from him discontented, or without hope to obtain his demand. And being reproued by some of his Councell, for promising more than it seemed hee was able to perform: hee answered them, that It was not fit nor worthy, that any man should depart from him sorrowfull & discontent with his entertainment. He was naturally so desirous to do good and to help others, as one night after supper remembring himself, that that day he had giuen nothing, with a sad and heauie countenance he turned towards those which were in his company, and said: My Friends, I haue lost this day; which were speeches worthy to be noted and engraven in the mindes of all great Princes. Hee was also so desirous to pleasure and giue contentment to all men (holding alwaies his gravity and authority) as in all his speeches and discourses with any people whatsoeuer, he alwaies shewed himselfe affable, pleasant, courteous and tractable.

In some sinister accidents which in his time hapned in Rome, as one was (as saith PAVLVS OROSIVS) a great fire, wherewith were burned a great number of houses, and also a great plague; he not onely vfed the diligence of a carefull Prince, but also shewed the loue and affection of a pitifull Father; helping with his owne rents to repair and new-build that which the fire had consumed, and causing those which were wounded to be cured with great diligence; and those which died of the pestilence, to be buried. The clemency and mildnes of this Prince extended to so high a degree, as he not onely pardoned many, and moderated the rigour of the lawes in cases of ordinary crimes; but two great men of Rome hauing conspired against him, and being thereof conuict, so as they could not deny the fact, he would make no other inquisition, nor put them to any torments, or otherwise punish them, but onely aduised them in secret that they should alter their euill purposes; willing them to consider, that the Empire was giuen by Gods providence and ordinance, and by the fates, and not by any humane industry; and if they desired any other thing, it should be more fit to sue to him, and he would not deny it: and saying this, he pardoned them, and used them lovingly, and afterwards entertained them with other complements, which SVETONIVS writeth; so as he took such order, that they did repent and reform themselves: whereby he did better assure his life, than if hee had put them to death. For, therein he should haue had greater cause of fear, and more would haue hated him. The like temperance he held with his Brother DOMITIANVS; who neuer left to lay snares to intrap him, and to ly in wait for his life, and to practice his death, and to incense the Legions and Cohorts against him: yet for all this he would not put him to death, as he might justly haue done, neither seclude him from him, neither diminish his reputation and authority wherein hee liued; but made him his companion in the Empire, and proclaimed him for his successor. And the better to reclaim him, sometimes retiring him into a secret chamber alone, with tears in his eyes he would admonish and require him, not to attempt that by treason and fratricide, which he shortly should haue voluntarily, and that which hee already enjoyed with him by his good will. And, for conclusion, this excellent Prince TITVS, in the short time that he reigned, gouerned with such wisdom and in such manner, as he was through the whole Empire extremely beloued, and generally obeyed and serued by all men: So as during his whole Reigne there were no contemptis, insurrections, warres, rebellions, nor contentions. But as men for their finnes were not worthy of so good a Prince, so by Gods secret judgement hee was taken away from among them: for, being taken with a strong burning Feuer, within fewe daies hee died thereof in the same village wherein his Father died, near Rome, being of the age of one and fortie yeeres, two moneths and twenty daies, although EVTRUPIVS sets downe some monthes lesse, which may be through error in a letter.

As soon as his death was knowne, there was the greatest lamentation and sorrow that euer was seen in Rome: and, the Senat being assembled, there was more spoken to his honor & commendation, being dead, than was of any man that euer liued before him, or was euer spoken in his presence in his life-time; which hapned in the yeer of our Lord 83.

Successor
Domitianus enters upon his Reigne that Titus

The death of Titus

THE LIFE OF DOMITIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND TWELFTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

Domitianus, brother to Titus, after his death was made Emperor, who in the beginning of his government, shewing much goodnesse, was milde, pitifull, and above all, most iust. He prevaile in all the warres he began, and in Rome finished many edifices already begun, and built many more from the ground: so as in the beginning of his raighe he purchased much reputation, and the credit of a very vertuous and good man. But afterwards altering his conditions, he became so cruell, so insolent and so covetous, that pursuing men to death for very small and ridiculous causes, he usurped the goods of the dead, pretending that he was their heire. Hee persecuted the Iewes, and particularly those which were of the line of David: being informed that from him should descend a man which should be Lord of the whole world. He was also a great Persecutor of the Christian Religion, so as in his time many holy men were martyred. He made such warre with Iyze, a Courtier being demanded, who was about with the Emperor; answered, that there was not one fyre with him. He made great show of Astrologie, and was a great friend to those which made profession of that fanaticke: yet he death hardly with an Astrologer, which told him that he should dye shortly. He lived fine and forty yeeres, ruled the Empire fiftene; and by the conspiracie of one Stephen, who was Steward of his house, and certaine others, amongst which his wife was an assistant, he was slaine in his Palace. The common people were neither sad nor glad of his death: but the Gentlemen and Senators were so well pleased with it, that even the very same day they made all his statues to be throwne to the ground, which he would have of no other thing but of pure gold.

Domitianus
was wicked, and farre vn-
like to his brother Titus.

The good Emperour TITVS, his brother and successor DOMITIANVS was farre vnlike, for this Emperour was wicked and lewde, although that in the beginning of his raighe hee did some things which were pleasing, and governed the Common-wealth reasonable vprightly; vying clemencie, humilitie, and liberalitie, deceiving the world with fained bountie, cleane contrarie to future actions. When he came to the Empire, he was of the age of thirtie yeeres (little more or lesse) in his younger yeeres, he lived in meane estate, and in euill fame, for the dishonestie of his person. His father being Emperour, in his absence he was called CÆSAR, and to him was giuen the greatest dignitie and authoritie in Rome, which hee used licentiously and dishonestly, committing adulteries, with other vices and insolencies: vpon one day, he deposed twentie seuerall persons from their charges and governments, and gaue them to others: so as his father (when he vnderstood thereof) said, that he marvelled, that his sonne DOMITIANVS had not sent one, to haue succeeded him also: and warres then growing in Batavia, he attempted that which we haue related. But when his father was come to Rome, to dissemble and cloke his wicked practices he gaue himself to study, and to the exercise of poeie, although with little affection: for before that time he neuer regarded it, or any other learning, and so afterwards abhorred it according to that flattering age. For the small time which hee spent spent in poeie, SILIUS ITALICVS, QVINTILIAN, and PLINIE in the poem of his naturall historie, commend him: and MARTIAL forgetteth him not in his Epigrammes. And much lesse did DOMITIANVS giue himself to the practice and exercise of armes, but was much affected to shooting with bowe and arrowe; wherein hee was so skilfull, as he would oftentimes for his glorie cause a Page to spread his hand open for a marke against a butte, and he standing a good distance off, would sticke his arrowes betwene the boies fingers without hurting him; and in like manner would doe many other strange things, which SVETONIUS reporteth as an eie-witnes, wherein and in dying was his principall delight and pastime. After the death of his father and brother, for whose sakes he came to be Emperour, without any contradiction, he governed the same contrarie to his naturall inclination, as may appeare by that which he did afterwards. But because we will not deprivie him of the commendation, which his good deedes deserued; before that we will speake of his accursed cruelties, wee will first speake of that which was good and commendable, seeing hee liued in such manner, as his actions were intermixt with some blemishes of euill: wherein I cannot obserue any order or time, as I alwaies desire to doe, because the authors which I follow write it so confusedly and out of order.

First, he made great shew of liberalitie, and iointlie therewith of clemencie, iustice, and equitie, of either of which we will produce some examples. He shewed himselfe so free from covetousnes, and so willing to giue; that he refused certaine heritages which certaine free personages would haue giuen him; and gaue ordinarie gifts and rewards, and forgave penalties and tributes, and erected certaine pillars and publike buildings, which were verie excellent, and of wonderfull great cost, among which this was one: He repaired and new built the Capitoll, which againe had bin burnt, wherein he caused a sumptuous Temple to be built to his god IVPITER, and other Temples and wonderfull buildings. And to obtaine the loue and applause of the people, he ordered so many shewes and games which were so rare and costly, as it was wonderfull to reade, and tedious to write them. First he made a Lake, for a Naumachia or battaile by sea, wrought all by mans hand, which was so great as it was sufficient to containe many galleyes, wherein were such battailes, as they wanted nothing to proue them to be in good earnest and not counterfeit. He had also a verie great number of Syvord-players, and great rewarde for those which did runne with chariots. He had turneyes and battailes of horsemen and footemen, and huntings of an infinite number of wilde beasts, in such sort as other Emperours had don, and more then any other: for he had also women which like men fought with wilde beasts, whereof SVETONIUS, IYVENAL, and MARTIAL, make mention. He also made games and feasts which they called secular, represented but euery hundreth yeare, which were the most solemne of al others: for then were accomplished a hundred yeeres since the time that OCTAVIUS AVGVSTVS had celebrated them, although that the Emperour CLAVDIVS at another time commanded them to be made, without observing any order or time, wherein he made the addition of the two new colours; which the horsemen did before vs to wear, whereof before hath been made mention, which were purple, and gold colour. And besides all this abovesaid, he caused disputations and arguments to be held, wherein great rewards were diuided betwene Poets and Orators both Greeke and Latin, and all kind of Musick. There were also Comedies, dumb shewes, tragedies, and wrestling games. In conclusion, there were made by his commandement all those feasts, games and reuels that euier had been seene or knowne in Rome vntill that time, besides many which were newly invented. Among all which he made a distribution among all the Roman people, which they called Congiarij, of 300. deniers to euery person: and during the time of these reuels (which was not short) he made many banquets and publike feasts, and there were throwne to the common people all kinds of coines, and clothes, with other things which were cast from out the windowes, this was called Missa. I will not herewith forget one pleasant thing, whereof SVETONIUS writeth, which was, that in the beginning of his Empire he was wont euery day one houre to be in some chamber or secret place alone, wherein he did nothing at all but catch flies, which he afterwards filled vpon a silke or long sharp needle: So as vpon a day one asking whether any bodie were within with DOMITIANVS, answere was made, that there was not so much as a flye with him; meaning, that he had killed and thrust vnto them all away.

DOMITIANVS did not only those things which were pleasing to the people, as making of feasts and sports, but in all other things he took good order, shewing himselfe diligent in hearing complaints, and doing iustice, and particularly in punishing such Iudges as receiued bribes

Domitianus
his good deedes

Stellar games made but once in a hundred yeeres.

Gifts giuen by Domitianus.

Domitianus
delighted much in catching of flyes.

The Justice of Domitian.

Domitianus
had his statue of pure gold.

Sarmatia what countries contained.

Dacia how it is called at this day.

and rewards, as well the Roman Magistrates, as the Presidents and Governors of Prouinces. And herein concerning Iudges he persecuted, not only before that he discouraged his cruelty and wickedness, but even afterwards: and thought that he were euill of himselfe; yet he forbore not to punish euill Governors: and so SVETONIVS affirmeth, that Governors were neuer so temperate, iust and vpright at any times in his. He also caused himselfe to be chosen Censor, wherein he endeuoured to reforme and correct the abuses and euill manners of the Romans; as though that his owne conditions had been good; and so he made many other good orders, and did justice in all things: and of the other side shewing himselfe mercifull and pitifull, in such sort that if he had persecuted in that manner of gouernment which he began, he had this day been held for a very good Emperor. But neuer any man fell from good to euill so notably, nor made so strange an alteration as he did, whereof in that which we haue before said, he gaue some indice and forewarning. For in those good things which he did, he vied such pride and elation, and shewed himselfe so vaine-glorious, that a man of any iudgement might well perceiue, that what he did, proceeded not from any good mind, or from his naturall inclination, which he manifested in some of his words and speeches: chiefly when he was made Emperour (without shame or blushing) he vaunted in the Senate, that hee had giuen the Empire to his father and to his brother, which they had now restored vnto him; this being as false, as by the historie before doth appeare. And those his statues which they commaunded to be set vpon in the Capitoll, he would not consent that they should be made of any other thing, then of cleane gold, and so in other things hee shewed extreme pride. But hee did one thing which was so accursed and abominable, as to make mention thereof onely, is a sufficient prooffe of the incomparable pride of this man: for he commaunded by a publicke Edict, that in all Letters and Edicts they should write our Lord and God, which both the christians and heathen authors doe asseme: For which sinne and wickednesse it pleased God to suffer him to fall into those abominations which he afterwards incurred, as contumeliousse, crueltye, and other wicked actions: whereof before that we discourse, it shall not be amisse, to treat of the warres which happened in the time of his wickednesse, although hee persecuted them not in his owne person, which were three or foure with strange nations, and one euill warre.

The first warres abroad were against the Sarmates in Europe, which invaded the Empire, with whom and also with those of Asia, there voyaged many of the ancient Scythians. That Prouince is situate in the north of Germany, and stretcheth to the sea called Mare Sarmaticum. On the East it is bounded with the river of Tanais; and the lake Meotis: and on the West with the river Pyssus. Vnder this Prouince are now contained Mysconia, Russia, Polonia, Lithuania, and some other Prouinces. This warre was cruell and dangerous, and in the beginning it went ill with the Romanes: for in a battaile were slaine the Generall of the Romanes; and one whole legion: but DOMITIANVS afterwards reinforcing his armies, the Sarmates were overthrowne and constrained with losse of many of their people to retire themselves. He had twise warres with the inhabitants of the great prouince of Dacia, the inhabitants whereof (as Plinie affirmeth) were called by the Greekes, Getae. That prouince contained all that which is now called Wallachia, and Transylvania; and other countries. Of this warre SVETONIVS, EVTROPIVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS make mention, but none of them reporteth how it passed; neither for what cause it was undertaken, although they affirme that it was very costly to the Romanes: for in the first warre, wherein OPPRVS SATVRNVS was Generall, who had bene Consul, whom EVTROPIVS calleth AFFRVS, he was overcome; and the greatest part of his armie slaine.

And, in the second, CORNELIVS FLETIVS, Commander of the Pretorian Cohorts, had the like fortune; whom DOMITIANVS made Generall of that warre. In both the one and the other were great encounters and battels; wherein was spilt much of the Romans blood, as PAVLVS OROSIVS relateth; and hee saith, that CORNELIVS TACTVS treacheth thereof very largely and copiously in his Histories: but that perished with the rest of that Authors works, whereby we knowe not the discourse of those wars: but they all write, that DOMITIANVS triumphed of that Prouince. And hee also triumphed of a people in Germany, which they called Catti, with whom he also had a doubtfull warre: During the time of these warres, wholly discouraging his wicked inclination, DOMITIANVS neuer ceased to commit murders, robberies, violences, and other vices, as heereafter you shall heere: Wherefore, having freed himself from the warres aforesaid, there arose a euill warre more dangerous, which was, that LIVIVS ANTONIVS (called also SATVRNIVS) being Generall in Germany, rebelled belled against DOMITIANVS, vsurping the name of Emperor; making profit of this occasion, that DOMITIANVS for his euill life was ill-beloued: against which SATVRNIVS, DOMITIANVS sent AFFRVS NORMANDVS for his Generall. This war was very doubtfull and much feared: but, coming afterwards to a battell, LIVIVS ANTONIVS was slaine, and AFFRVS remained Victor. And herein hapned a most strange and wonderfull Accident; which was, that the same day wherein this battell was fought in Germany, it was known in Rome how euery thing particularly did passe: and DOMITIANVS, that same day seeking to knowe the Author of those newes, could not finde him, and therefore beleued that it was false; so as preparing himself to goe to those warres in person, messengers came which brought certaine newes of the victory, and they auouched that it was at the same instant according to the newes then in Rome.

After the warres were ended (as we haue recited) and during the time thereof, DOMITIANVS put to death many eminent men, Senators, and such as had been Consuls, for so light and fained causes, as thereby hee clearly manifested the cruelty of his minde. ELIVS LAMIA hee commaunded to be slaine, for that hee used pleasant speeches and iests: which although hee suspected, yet were they offensive to none. Hee commaunded SALVIVS COCCIANVS also to be slaine, because hee celebrated the birth-day of his Vncle, the Emperor OTTO; and MATTVS POMPOSIANVS, for that hee heard that his constellation did prognosticate vnto him Imperiall dignity, and because hee had giuen to some of his slaves the names of HANNIBAL and MAGO: And, in like manner, SALVSTIVS LVCVELLVS, for that hee caused certain lances to be made of a new fashion, which (according to his owne name) hee called Luculeian. He put IVNIVS RVSTICVS to death, because hee published a Treatise in praise of PATRVS TRASSA, and of VIRIVS PRISCVS, very wise men; who had been of a faction contrary to his Father.

How little loue this tyrannious Emperour bare unto learning, may well appear by that which SVETONIVS and other Authors write of him: for hee commaunded to be banished out of all Italy the Philosophers, and with them (as EVSEBIVS writes) the Astrologers; of web banishment, AVLVS GELLIUS and PHILOSTRATVS make mention: PHILOSTRATVS saith, that some fled into Spain, and others into the deserts of Libya and Scythia. And, hauing expelled the Philosophers and Wise-men, proceeding in his cruelty, hee slue an infinite number of people (as SVETONIVS reports) for very ridiculous causes: and his fury was such, that some whom hee purposed to put to death the next day, hee entertained one night in his chamber, and shewed them many fauours with a cheerful countenance. And, among these his cruelties; hee gaue himself to luxurie and incontinency, and other dishonest exercises, couersing and keeping ordinary company with dishonest women; and heere with committed many robberies & strange extortions, seising vpon mens wares and goods for fained crimes; and those so light, as they deserue not to be mentioned. He would faine himself to be heire to those which were dead, seising vpon their goods, and burning some to depose that they had heard the deceased in their lifetime say, that they meant to leaue him for their heir. With which devices, and as many more as hee could imagine or inuent, hee neuer left robbing and spoiling men, as well in Rome and Italy, as in other Prouinces subiect to the Empire. But, amongst all other nations, those which endured the greatest oppression and tyranny were the Iewes; by Gods permission for their sinnes: for, all those which were of that religion, or liued after their manner and custome, although they were not so, hee made them pay a certain new and rigorous imposition and tribute by the head, ouer and aboue all that any other nation paid. And SVETONIVS and EVSEBIVS write, that as HEROD when CHRIST was born, so was he in fear, that out of the stock of DAVID one should come, which would beaue him of the Empire: for, hee was informed that it was written, that from DAVID should descend a man who should rule and command the whole world. Wherefore hee commaunded with all diligence all those among the Iewes, which were of the lineage of DAVID, to be sought out and slaine: yet EVSEBIVS writeth; that hee pardoned two which were of that lineage. And, to set his seal to all his wicked deeds, being induced by the diuell or some of his angels, hee gaue himself to the persecuting of the Catholick Church, and by his Letters and Edicts, both in Rome and out of it, an infinite number of Christians were banished and put to death: vpon whom hee executed horrible kindes of cruelties, written by EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS; and other Catholick Authors. And this was the second generall persecution of the Primitive Church; in which Saint IOHN the Euangelist was banished into the Ile of Pathmos, where he saw the Vision of the Apocalypse. How long this persecution did put many noble men to death with this cause.

Domitianus

Domitian had suppld Philosophers and astronomers out of Italy.

The cruelty and incontinency of Domitian.

The fear of Do-mition.

The second persecution of the Primitive Church

cution endured, I cannot say: but by EVSERRVS it seemeth, that it lasted little more than two years; for afterwards, in the thirteenth Chapter of his third Book, hee saith, that DOMITIANVS did moderate this persecution, and commanded it to cease. So as by that which is written and hath been seen, DOMITIAN was one of the worst Princes that euer was in the world, and so bad, as he used to say, The vice of the flesh was but a kinde of honest recreation: and such were those wherein he used to passe his time.

For these causes, and many other which I omit, wherein DOMITIANVS spent foureteen yeers of his Raigne, he came to be extremely hated and abhorred of all men. And as now it was growne to a custome in Rome, Not to endure wicked Emperours long; and as God also permitte, that sometime wicked Princes come to euill ends: so those which were most private and neere about him conspired against him; the Chiefe & Captain of which was STEPHANVS, who was steward to his wife and Emperesse DOMICILLA, whom they affirm to haue been partaker in the conspiracy and practice to murder him: and they afterwards slue him in such manner as I will tell you.

During the timethis conspiracie was a plotting, there appeared certaine signes in the skies, whereof all men conceited and prognosticated, that the death of DOMITIANVS was at hand: and hee also stood in extreme feare thereof, as he which took great heede to auguries and signes, and presumed much to be an Astrologer and Diuiner. And amongst other signes which then were seene, there appeared for many daies together round about the Sunne a great bright shining Crowne that did compasse it about, which resembled the Raine-bow against foule weather; but, that it was a whole Crowne and did compasse the Sunne in such manner, as it becaued and eclipsed the same of his brightnes: Which signe all men did interpret to signifie a change and alteration in the Empire, with the death of DOMITIANVS. And for as much as STEPHANVS in Greeke signifeth a Crowne, there were some which conceited that the said STEPHANVS should kill him, notwithstanding they knew nothing of the practise. By meanes whereof, and of other things which then were seene, DOMITIANVS was in such feare and despair, that as vpon a day there was a great tempest, and there happened certaine flashes of lightning, which hee and all others did preface to be against him: and he being very angrie, they write that he said, Let IVPITER then smite whom hee will. Whereof, the feare which I tolde you of, was the principall cause: for euen then was the time accomplished which the Astrologers, casting his constellation, had told him that he should die. But one thing about all the rest made him most amazed, which in truth was very strange, and for such (although it be of small importance) I will declare it, which was this: that he liuing in this feare, sent for an Astrologer, who at that time was very famous, and asked him many questions thereupon; who answered him, that by his art he found that his death was neere at hand. Wherewith DOMITIAN was so wroth, that hauing determined to command this Astrologer to be slain, hee asked him, if hee knew what end hee himselfe should haue. The Astrologer answered him, that by his constellation hee knew, that hee should shortly be torne in pieces by dogges. And DOMITIAN thinking to make him a liar in that which hee had foretold, and that, what hee had prophesied of his owne death, should not come to passe, commanded him presently to bee slain, and his bodie to be burnt, and his ashes to be buried, to the end that dogges should not tear him. And hauing begun to burne his bodie, there fell such a tempest & raine as quenched and dispersed the fire, and the body of the poore Astrologer remaining half vnburnt, there came certaine dogges which tare it in pieces, as he had prognosticated. Which (I thinke) was, by Gods permission, a practise of the diuel, as he which knew the secrecie of the conspiracie, which then was in hand to kill him. Now STEPHANVS and his consorts hauing agreed vpon the day, wherein they determined to giue DOMITIANVS his deserved death, one morning this STEPHANVS came into his chamber, bringing a poiniard hidden vnder his arme, which for that purpose he had some daies before fained to be fore, and comming to the Emperour (who was suspicious enough and verie fearefull) hauing opportunitie to come to his presence, by reason of his office, with much dissimulation he told him that he had brought him certaine intelligence of a conspiracie against him. Which when DOMITIANVS heard, as he was very ielous thereof, and beleeuing his words to be true, without any further consideration, heewith drew himselfe apart to talke with him about this matter: and standing in that manner, the rest which were of the same confederacie, being all his ordinarie seruants, and at hand, this STEPHANVS gaue him a memorie, such as he had deuised; wherein he discovered a conspiracie, naming therein such as hee thought good. And DOMITIANVS beginning to ride it with great attention, STEPHAN at his pleasure stabbed him into the groyn, and the Emperour feeling himselfe wounded, began to call and to cry out aloud: and as he was very strong and valiant, before that STEPHAN could giue him another wound; hee clofed with him and threw him to the ground, and struing to take the poiniard from him; he cut and mangled his owne fingers: And by this time before that any succour could come to him, there came vpon him SATVRNVS, CAODIVS, PARTHENVS, MAXIMVS, and others which were of that conspiracie, being all his owne seruants: and there giuing him many wounds, they slew him. And so had DOMITIANVS such an end as his deedes deserved; which happened in the yeere of our Lord 98, in the five and fortieth of his age, and the fifteenth of his raigne, leaving no sonne to succcede him: for although that in his fathers time, hee had a sonne by his lawfull wife, named DOMICILLA, that sonne died being a child. DOMITIANVS was a man tall of stature; and in his youth of a good constitution, and pleasing countenance; big eyes, and somewhat redde: but comming to age, he lost his proportion and good grace, by reason of a long sickness; so as his legges became little and slender, and afterwards hee had a great gorbelly, and a very bald head. His death was taken in Rome in diuers manners, for it grieved the Pretorian souldiers very much: so as if that daie they had had any Capitaine that would haue made the motion, they would haue slaine all the conspirators. The common people took it indifferently, shewing neither loy nor sorrow. The Senate was not onely well content therewith, but conceiued exceeding ioy therat; and assembling themselves that same day, they caused all his statues to be throwne downe, and all the inscriptions and memorials of him to be cancelled and defaced.

Signes prognosticating the death of Domitian.

An Astrologer foretold Domitian of his death, and of his owne also.

The death of Domitian.

The Senate glad for the death of Domitian.

THE LIFE OF COCCEIVS NERVA, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THIRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

His worthe Emperour was borne in the Citie of Narnie: it is not certainly knowne whether hee were an Italian, or of some other Nation, yet all agree that he was of a Noble house: hee was advanced to the imperiall dignitie being old, and in the beginning of his raigne he had new (though false) that Domitian was not dead, which much troubled him. He recalled the Christians from banishment, eased the oppressions of the citie, and made the children of poore parents to be bred up at the publicke charge, and to be briebe, did many good and vertuous deedes. There was neuer but one conspiracy against him; which had ill success: the conspirators in his time were consumedly slaine, which slew Domitian, though against his will: Hee adopted Traiane for his sonne, hauing none of his owne, to whom hee might commit the charge of the Empire. He held the Empire thirteene months onely, and dyed of cholera, taken against a Senator, whose name was Regulus, which cholera cast him into such a sweat that he died thereof, and the same day that he departed out of this life, there was a great eclipse of the Sunne.

HE death of the Emperour DOMITIAN was not onely profitable for the Empire, being freed and deliuered from his crueltie and tyrannic, but for that it gaue meanes to NERVA to succcede him: and that afterwards TRAIAN and ADRIAN should raigne, who were most excellent Emperours, and honored and enlarged the Empire. And although that NERVA raigned but a while, yet hee did many good things: but the best that hee did was, in that hee made TRAIAN his successeur, as when time serueth, shall be declared. The death of DOMITIAN, as I haue said, did not grieve nor ioy the Roman people, but pleased the Senate exceedingly: who hauing commanded the remembrance of him to be cancelled, they presently tooke order to giue him a successeur, before that any one should be chosen

with

son by the armie. COCCIVS NERVA, being at that time for his many vertues, wisdom, experience, and age, a man of the greatest reputation and authority in Rome, was by the Senate chosen Emperor, having beene favoured and assisted therein by PETHRONIVS SEVERVS, Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts, & PARTHENIVS, who was one of those which killed DOMITIAN. This NERVA was of a noble family, borne in the Citie of Narva in the province of Pamiria in Italy, his fathers name was also NERVA. Saint IEROME onely saith, that he was borne in Spain, I know no ground for it, neither have I read it in any other auncient author. Being receiued in the Senate and accepted to the Empire, vpon a sodaine without knowing who was the author, it was told him that DOMITIAN was liuing, and that the report of his death was vntue. This newes did so much trouble NERVA, that all the colour went out of his face: and being vnable to speake, he had much a doe to stand vpon his feete, vntill that PARTHENIVS did encourage him, assuring him of the truth. Whereupon he came againe to himselfe, and set a good countenance vpon the matter: presently they all came to him to doe him reuerence, and to receive him for their Lord and Emperour, shewing great ioy, in hope of good successe. Onely ARRIVS ANTONIVS, who was a very wife and iust man and had bin his familiar friend, spake vnto him in a more strange manner then any of the rest: therefore I will relate it. Truly NERVA, in that thou art aduanced to this high degree, I will attribute the benefit and happinesse thereof vnto the Senate and people of Rome, and generally to the whole Empire (for such hath bene their good fortune) but not vnto thee. For thou having escaped with such honor and reputation by meanes of thy vertue, and wisdom, from the iniurie of those wicked Princes past, art now made subject to infinite troubles and daungers; and above all, to the infamie and hatred of thy enemies, and as much or more of thy friends: for they will presume that they have deserved all fauour, in respect of the ancient friendship which they held with thee; and if thou shalt deny them aie thing they shall ask, although it be neuer so vnjust, they will become greater and more cruell enemies vnto thee, then those which openly shew themselves to bee such. Now, as the solemnities and accustomed ceremonies for the new Emperour were ended, in the beginning of his Emprye hee began to doe most noble and excellent workes, whereof in summe wee will make a breefe relation, without distinction of time, seeing his Emprye was so short, as in a manner not to be diuided. And one of the best and first was, in releasing from banishment all the Christians, which from Rome and other Cities were banished in the time of the Emperour DOMITIAN, and to permit and give liberty to every man to hold what faith and religion he would; and in this time (according to EVSEBIUS, and other Catholike historiographers) Saint Iohn the Evangelist came from the Ile of Pathmos (whither hee was banished) to the citie of Ephesus in Asia. The like humanitie did NERVA use in all other matters: First hee released and discharged all the cities of the Empire from the new impositions, which VESPASIAN and DOMITIAN had laid vpon them. And to many which by DOMITIANVS were unjustly dispossessed of their goods, hee commanded their possessors to be restored to all their moveables, which could bee found in the imperial palaces. And hee not onely shewed himselfe liberal to those which were oppressed: but to all poore men which had sones, hee made them to bee bred up at his charges. Hee made also a distribution among all the people of Rome in greater measure then was usually done by any others. And to some poore Citizens of Rome which hee knew had no wealth, hee made certaine possessions, which hee bought for that purpose, to be diuided among them. And above all hee did great favours, and bestowed great gifts vpon those which had bin his friends and allied vnto him: and his liberalitie was so great, as DIOMEDES writeth, that in the beginning and first comming to the Empire, hee was contrayned by necessity to sell his gold and silver plate, and other moveables of his house, to performe those his favours and good deeds. And in this manner hee did many deeds of charitie and pietie; for it is written for certaine, that hee swore that no Senator of Rome should by his commandement be put to death, which hee afterwards performed, although there were those which deserved the contrary. He also forbade many flanders and accusations used in those times, desiring, all men should live contented and at liberty.

Although that NERVA was so good a man (as we haue said) and vsed so milde a kinde of government, so as there was nothing in him to be reprooued; yet there wanted not some which murmured against him, as wicked men vse to doe against the good, alleging that so great humilitie and mildnesse in a Prince was not profitable: so as FRONTO a principall man in Rome presumed to say openly, that it was an euill thing to haue such an one for Emperour, which would suffer no man to doe any thing that hee desired; but it was a worse matter to haue such an one

vnder

vnder whom euery man might doe what hee listed. When NERVA was aduertised thereof, he was not angry, but forbade some things, which had giuen him cause to say so: and he desired so much to gouerne vprightly, as hee did nothing of his owne head, but had alwayes about him, and sent for wife and good men, such as were of the greatest experience in Rome, by whose counsell hee provided, ordained & dispatched all matters. He also made during the small time of his Emprye some very good lawes & ordinances; among which, hee sharply forbade an abuse of those times, which was, to geld men & to make them Eunuches. He also forbade that any man should marry his neece, or brothers daughter; and many other things which wanted reformation. To conclude, this Emperour had in his short time at those parts a good prince ought to haue; and so cleere a conscience, that hee oftentimes said, hee remembered not to haue done any thing (albeit hee gave over the Empire) why he should not liue secure, and without feare of any body. And, though all this was true, (as to the wicked, the yoke & scepter of the iust is a heauie burthen, and Rome had then got such a custome, that it could neither indure an euill Emperour, nor obey him that was good) yet there wanted not some which practised his death, and conspired against him: the motor & head therof was CASSIUS CALPURNIVS; but it pleased God that it took no effect, but was revealed to the good Emperour; who without any rigor or bloodshed was freed therof, contenting himselfe only (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth) with the banishment of those which were culpable, though the senate would haue inflicted a more rigorous punishment.

All these things being passed (as I haue said) and all things succeeding well and prosperously both in Rome, and all the Provinces subject thereto, it hapned that ELIANVS CASPERIVS, who at that time was Prefect & Captain of the Pretorian Cohorts, incited the souldiers to reuenge the death of the Emperour DOMITIAN, & to put all those to death which had bin confederates therein; which they determined to put in execution, though NERVA gave them no leave. This motion was sodaine, & NERVA was much troubled, & would haue hindred it, and haue defended those from whose hands hee receiued the Empire, or haue died in the quarrel; and so he said & published openly: but the matter came to such issue, as the old Emperour was not able to resist or prevent it: & so PARTHENIVS & PETHRONIVS were slain, & all those which CASPERIVS would require or nominate of those which were culpable. With this contempt NERVA was so grieved & offended, that hee was very sorrowfull hee could not punish it as the case required; for by reason of his old age & infirmities hee was not regarded by the souldiers. Wherefore to redresse the present, & provide for that to come, hee determined to adopt & make TRAIAN his successor, who was then Captain & Gouernour in the neather Germanie, & was at that time in the city of Colem, which charge hee had executed with great honor & fame, & was the most excellent man then liuing, as well in peace as war: to whom hee was no way allied, being a Spaniard, & a stranger to Rome & Italy. And although NERVA wanted not allies & kinsmen, yet hee chose TRAIAN, having more respect to the publike good, then to his owne house & posterity: wherein how iustly hee made his choise, this history will hereafter manifest. Having put this his determination in executio, & the accustomed solemnities performed, & adopted him in the Capitol, & made him CESAR in the Senate, hee presently sent him Ambassadors with the Ensignes & Armes of the Empire, & they inuested him in the Emprye: & herewith hee sent him a verse in latine, wherein hee briefly exhorted him to come & succour him. The adoption of TRAIAN was so great a bridle to the mutinies which were feared, as all remained still & obedient. But it pleased not God that NERVA should long enjoy his good resolution; for as SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth, hee liued onely three months after: in which time they write not that there passed any notable matter, neither is it understood by the histories that TRAIAN came to Rome before his death, which happened (in a manner) sodainly, through anger and displeasure which hee conceived against a Senator, whose name was REGVLVS: for as hee was old and feeble, hee gave a great shout, and was taken with so great a sweate, that being unable to endure it, hee died thereof. The same day there was a great Eclipse of the Sunne, which might be (in part) cause of his death; which was in the 100 year of CHRIST. He reigned 1 year, 4 months and odder daies; according to SEXTVS AVRELIVS, EVSEBIUS, and BEDA. About the time of his age there is some difference among Authors: for, some say, hee was 71 years old; others, 76. But as it imports little, so I mean not to spend much time about contrarieties of so small moment; and heerein I hold decorum with my curious Reader, to the end hee condemn me not of negligence, if hee finde me to differ from that which hee shall reade elsewhere.

THE

Nerva chosen Emperour by the Senate of Rome.

Speeches made by Antonius to Nerva.

Nerva his good deeds.

Testimonie addressed and inuolued in the Emprye by Nerva.

Testimonie addressed and inuolued
in the Emprye by Nerva.

The death of Coccivus Nerva
as at the Eclipse of the sun, An.
Dom. 100.

THE LIFE OF TRAIAN, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND FOURTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the good Nerva succeeded a better Traian, born (as is said) in the citie of Italia neere to Seuil: yet some say that he was borne elsewhere, whose fathers name was Traian; and his mother, Plotina. He was advanced to the Empire with the good liking of all men, for that his goodness, clemency, liberalitie, and equity towards all men was publicly knowne; which vertues he lost not when he was Emperor, but rather seemed to have increased the same: neither did he omit them, although he were neuer so much busied in matters of importance concerning the warres, or standing for the recreation of his minde, to behold feasts and sports. The first action he undertook, being Emperor, was against the King of Dacia rebelling the second time: and he likewise persecuted the Christians, but afterwards he mitigated the persecution, which was the third that the Church suffered, then daily greatly increasing. In his time there was a very great earthquake, which was in a manner generall, but it did most harme in Antioch, where he then was. After this he made very great voyages. In his time the Iewes rebelled, whom when he had tamed, he returned to Rome, where there was a wonderfull triumph prepared for him: but being overburdened with age, and infirmities, he died in the citie of Seleucia, to the universall sorrow and griefe of the whole world. He lived 64. yeeres; and being dead and burnt, his ashes were carried to Rome, and set upon the top of a pillar, which is to this day to be seene in Rome, which was a wonderfull piece of worke, and truly worthy of so great an Emperour, who was a no lesse father to the country then to all vertues and vertuous men.

The virtues of Traian.

The place of Traians buriall.

After the wise and good Emperour NERVA, succeeded TRA-IAN, as he had ordained in his life time, who was the flower of all the heathen Emperours, and in his time was the Romane Empire at the greatest height: for neuer, either before or after, was it so great, so much feared or esteemed. The valour, vertues and excellencies of TRAIAN were so many & so great, that as SEX-TUS AURELIUS affirmeth, the best writers of those times were hardly able to expresse and declare the same. For although that I would exceede in the historie of this excellent Prince, for the loue of my country, of whence I might say that TRAIAN was (as presentlie shall appeare) yet I could not doe it according to my desire and his deserts, for the breuitie of those authors which we haue at this day which wrote of him: wherefore I hold it for a better course to observe the stile and forme already begun, then by breaking it, to be notwithstanding too briefe and de-fectiue. I say then that TRAIAN was by nature and birth a Spaniard, whereof there is no doubt: for so do all auncient true authors affirme. EVROTIVS in the life of him, and EVSE-BIUS in his Chronicle, say, that he was borne in the towne of Italia, which is subiect and neere to Seuil: the which is also affirmed by SEXTUS AURELIUS, although he name it not; and ANTONY LEBRISHA, whom we may alleage among the auncient authors, calleth Italia TRAIANs country: wherefore I cannot coniecture by what authoritie he did it, which wrote that TRAIAN was borne in Cales. This towne of Italia (according to PLINIE in his third booke) was in that time in subiection, and within the iurisdiction of Seuil: and ANTONY in his perambulation saith, that it was sixteene miles from thence: the same in a manner is gathered

thered by POTOMIUS his geographic, and that it lay Northwest from Seuil: but at what time it was ruined, or where about it was, I could neuer certainly vnderstand: so as Seuil may glorie and vauit it selfe to be TRAIAN his country: for although that he were not borne in it, yet he was borne in a place subiect and neere vnto it. TRAIAN was also of noble bloud and linage, although not very famous for any great dignities. His fathers name was also TRAIAN.
When he came to the Empire, he was 42. yeeres old, but not fullie compleate, and married to a woman of great account, whose name was PLOTINA. For the certaine knowledge they had in Rome of his goodnes and valour, he was by generall consent ioyfullie received and obeyed: and he presently beganne to put his great vertues in practice, shewing himselfe both in word and deed, good, affable, milde, mercifull, very wise, and a louer of truth and equitie, and of all other vertues, wherein he persevered vntill the end: it shall not be amisse if I recite part thereof in the beginning, seeing that all historiographers which write of him do the like.

TRAIAN, taking vpon him the government of the Empire, first endeouored to reforme the lawes, and to cause them to be observed, and that equitie and iustice should be vsed in all things.
In publike charges and offices he tooke care to preferre noble and vertuous men; and such as were not so, he reformed and reclaimed with gentleness and clemencie, and not with rigour and extremite. He did so moderate and repress his wrath and choler, as he was neuer knowne to be overcome therewith, and was most abstinent from other mens goods, and free from countousnes. His liberalitie and bountie did exceede, bestowing benefits and fauours vpon all men, greatly relieuing the poore and needie, imitating and excelling his adopted father NERVA.
He bestowed much cost and took great care for the bringing vp & instructing of poore mens children in Rome and in all Italy. He was a great builder of publike and necessarie Edifices; and also made an infinite number of bridges, gates and temples, and repaired his waies & caufetes; as yet is to be seene in many places in Spain, wherof one (as saith S. ISIDORE) is the bridge at Alcantara. In all his buildings he neuer made benefit of any mans goods or labour; as some of his predecessors had done. He was to the multitude and common people milde and courteous, and the principal personages he honoured and entertained with loue and familiaritie; and chiefly those which deserved it, he admitted to priuate conuersation: wherof being vpon a time reprooued, he answered, that he desired to be such an Emperour towards his subiects, as he would wish they should be to him, if he were not so. In Arts and Sciences he was not very learned, by reason of his great affaires; but he neuer left to practice when he had time;
hauing for his master the excellent Philosopher and Historiographer PLYTARCH, whom, and others for their excellent wits, he loued and honoured much, as IYERNALE testifieth; besides other writers.

Traian his good deeds.

His liberalitie.

Plutarch was Traians master.

To conclude, this Prince had all the good parts and conditions which an excellent King ought to haue: in peace he was vpriight and iust, and in warre (whereto he was so affected as hereafter shall be declared) he was valiant; and in both the one and the other very wise and prudent. And for that wee will not conceale the truth, of two vices and passions he was noted, and accused: the one was, that he did eate and drinke much, and that very sumptuously; and the other, that he was much giuent to the vice of the flesh: the cause wherof was the want of faith, together with his great power and libertie; but it was neuer knowne that wine ouercame his wits, or that by means thereof he committed ought that might seeme vnfit, neither through the other passion, that he euer vsed violence, or forced any woman, or offended any.

With these conditions he began his raigne and Empire, governing it most happily for some space. As he was a most excellent and valiant Capitaine, and addicted to the wars, desirous of honour and fame about all his predecessors, he refused to extend and enlarge the bounds of the Empire by armes. His first enterprize was against the King and inhabitants of the province of Dacia, a very great and spacious country; wherein are now included Wallacia, and Transiluania; and other provinces, taking the occasion for the warres and spoiles which that nation had done to the Romane Empire, in the time of the Emperour DOMITIAN. TRAIAN went to this warre with an exceeding great Army, and the King of Dacia, named DECEBALVS, had leui-ed for his defence all his force and power, being very great: so as this war was very cruell. But the King of Dacia, being no other way able to defend himselfe, determined to come to a battaile (as he did) wherein TRAIANE had the victorie, with exceeding great losse to his enemies, and not a little to the Romanes, for the battaile was very cruell and bloudie. This victorie being obtained, and TRAIAN following the chase of his enemies, he pursued them so hard, that DECEBALVS, being in despaire, sent to him, humbly desiring peace, offering to accept any conditions

Warres made by Traian against the King of Dacia.

Decabalus did much peace of Traian.

Conditions prescribed to De-sculus.

conditions he should prescribe. And T R A I A N (who took as great glory in pardoning the humble and meeke, as in taming and subduing the proud and haucie) notwithstanding that hee had taken almost all his countrey, was contented to admit him to his grace and fauour, sending certaine conditions to be performed: which were, that he should presently deliuer vp all his instruments and engines of warre, and the engines and masters thereof, together with all fugitiues that were within his dominion, which were Romans, or their confederats, and ranne to the enemy. And that out of all the Castles and fortresses within his dominions, hee should withdraw the garriisons, and should throw downe such as should be appointed: and before all these things, that he should surrender certain lands which he held within the bounds of the Empire; and that he should euer hold for friends and enemies, those which the Senate of Rome held for such.

These articles and conditions the King of Dacia accepted and promised to accomplish, more through necessity then for any good will; and hauing sworne to obserue them, he came to the Campe to the Emperor; where prostrating himselfe vpon the earth before him, he confessed himselfe to be ouercome, and to be his vassall. This solemnity being ended, and other things done which were expedient, T R A I A N returned victorious to Rome, where hee entred in triumph, as faith E Y S B R I V S hauing reigned two yeeres, and brought with him the Ambassadors of the King of Dacia, to whom was giuen audience in the Senate; and the peace, which T R A I A N had granted, was there confirmed. And he for his victorie was called Dacicus, for that he had subdued the countrey of Dacia, as the Romans in former time had vsually done to some other excellent Captaines.

When T R A I A N had ordered all things in the prouince of Dacia in this maner, for ioy & honor of this victorie, and to please the Roman people, he made all manner of sports and games, which of custome were wont to be obserued by the Emperors (as is aboue said) adding thereto such other things as he thought good. But these games and sports did not withdraw him from doing iustice, neither from care of the government: but rather so long as they lasted, he spent the greatest part of his time in dispatching of busines, and doing iustice, going himselfe in person to the Tribunal and publike audience, to iudge and determine many causes: which he did most iustly and wisely. Passing sometime in good quiet, rest, and generall peace, the King of Dacia being as vnable to endure subiection and seruitude, as his predecessors, began some combustions and alterations, first secretly, and afterwards publicly: repaying and fortifying his Castles, providing armes and engines, and leuying his neighbour forces against the Empire: whereof as soone as T R A I A N and the Senate had intelligence, he was adiudged the second time, an enemy to the Empire. And so with an equall armie, but much more incensed then formerly, T R A I A N went this second time to the warres in person: in which the King of Dacia taking warning by that which was past, refused to come to battaile, and vsed policies, stratagems and trecheries against T R A I A N; which were such and so many, as the Emperor was in danger to haue been either slaine or taken: and by trecherie (vpon a safe conduct) they took a singular good Captaine and a great fauorite of the Emperors called L O N O N Y S. The King of Dacia hauing so good a pawne, sent to T R A I A N to entreate a pardon, and to treat of peace, threatening that except he might obtaine the same, he would put the said L O N O N Y S to death. Whereto T R A I A N gaue such an answere, as the King vnderstood, that he preferred his honour and the publike good before any particular perill, and prosecuted the warres by all waies and meanes possible: During the which, within a very short space he built a bridge ouer the riuier Danubius, beyond which (parting from Italy) lieth the countrey of Dacia, which was one of the most stately bridges that euer was made in the world, all of squared stone of marueilous beautie. This bridge contained twentie Arches, each of which was one hundred and fiftie foote high, besides the foundation, and fixtie foote broad; the one Arch was distant from the other one hundred and fixtie foote, which was the compasse of the Arches of the bridge: which truly was a wonderfull worke, as well for the greatnesse thereof, as for the many difficulties, and the short space wherein it was made: Which among other things is an argument of the wealth and greatnesse of the Romane Emperours. Which bridge this Emperor made, to hold a free passage for his Armies to passe the riuier Danubius, against those barbarous nations: And A D R I A N his successor being of a contrarie opinion, to becaue the barbarous of the like passage (as some say) commanded it to be broken. This bridge being finished, T R A I A N continuing the warre, did many things, wherein he shewed himselfe to be a valiant and excellent Captaine: and so oppressed the enemy (notwithstanding that

The King of Dacia rebels against the Empere.

A bridge over the riuier Da-nubius.

The death of the King of Dacia.

that the countrey was great, and the people very fierce and hardie) that he conquered and subdued it all, and put their King D A C T A L V S to such a straight, that to escape taking, being in great danger thereof, he slew himselfe; and his head was carried to Rome, and the countrey of Dacia was made subiect and tributary to the Romane Empire: the greatest part whereof at this time (for our times) is subiect to the Turke. After this, taking such order for all things in those parts as was requisite, T R A I A N came to Rome with great honour, bringing with him an exceeding great summe of money and wealth, taken from that King and countrey, being now (as E Y S B R I V S testifieth) the fift yeere of his reigne. And his name and boutie was so famous through the world, that vpon the way Ambassadors met him from the East Indies, and diuers other parts to sue for peace, and to acknowledge him for their Lord. Being come to Rome, hee entred in great triumph: and afterwards there were made great shewes and feasts for ioy of his Victorie and Returne; which did laste 120 daies, which were foure whole moneths: which being ended, he applied himselfe to the administration of iustice, and the tranquillitie of the Empire. Remaining in Rome busied in these exercises, hee made many bridges, caufices, and other publike edifices both within Italy and without. About this time there died a great friend and fauorite of his, whose name was S V R A L I C I N I V S, whose death he took heauily and honoured his memoriall with publike statues, which he commaunded to be erected to him, and other honors then vsed. This S V R A was so good a man, and T R A I A N reposed such trust in him, that being told one day for certaine, that S V R A meant to kill him, hee went that night to sup at his house; and commanding his guard to returne, remained there alone amongst S V R A his friends and companions, and commanded his Barber to shauie his beard with a razor, which the Emperors then held for a custome, vntill the time of his succellour A D R I A N, who wore his beard somewhat long: and hauing so much trusted and tried this S V R A L I C I N I V S, he returned to his Palace, and calling those vnto him which had told him thereof, he said to them, that he had made tryall of L I C I N I V S loyalty, and that they should no more hold him in suspicion: and so he euer after loved him both aliue & dead, as I haue said.

T R A I A N living in this prosperitie without blemish or disorder in any thing that might deserue reproofe, being deluded by the diuell, or some of his ministers, he resolved to persecute the Christians, and made edicts and decrees against them, commanding them to adore his Idols, so as an infinite number of them were put to death vpon that occasion. This was the third generall persecution of the Christians, whereof E Y S B R I V S treating faith, that it was in the tenth yeere of his reigne, and so doth O R O S I V S and other Christian authors. Which persecution T R A I A N commaunded afterwards to cease, as it appeareth by some histories, and by the Letters written by P L I N I V S to T R A I A N, and from T R A I A N to P L I N I V S, which are extant to this day: Wherein hee commaunded, that if the Christians were not accused of any other crimes, they should be suffered to liue at libertie, and according to their lawes. In these and other things, and in doing iustice, T R A I A N, busied himselfe in Rome, vntill that moued with desire of fame and glorie, he resolved to make war against the King of Parthia, and against the King of Armenia, making this his occasion; that the King of Armenia had recieued the crown and enignes of a King, from the hands of the King of Parthia (acknowledging him for his superior and soueraigne) and not from the Emperour of Rome, as he was bound to haue done, as appeareth by that which is already said. And hauing ordered his troupes, and made such provision, as for so great an enterprize was requisite: he parted from Rome, with a very great army both by sea and land, and arriving in Asia, hee invaded Armenia, where the fame of his coming was such, and there was so great a feare ouer all the Countrey, that but in very few places hee found any resistance, aswell in Armenia as in countries adioyning. And the greatest part of the Kings, Nobles and Gouernors of the prouinces bordering thereupon, came peaceably to him, humbly confessing themselves to be his subiects, and him to be their soueraigne Lord, and bringing him many presents they made great shew of subiection. Among many other things of great price which they presented vnto him, there was brought him a horse, in greates, colour and shape, one of the most faire in the world: which being taught before hand, as soone as he came in the Emperours presence, kneeled downe vpon both his knees, and bowed downe his head to the earth; which although it were knowne to be artificially, yet it made a very good shewe, and did greatly delight the beholders, being a thing rare and vnthought of.

T R A I A N hauing in short time subdued Armenia, and gotten the King thereof into his power, P A R T A M I T A S T E S by name, who had submitted himself, he seized all into his hand.

A feast of one hundred and twenty dayes continuance.

The death of Sur-ra Licinius lamouried by Traiian.

The third generall persecution of the primitive Church.

Traian made warre against the Parthians.

A horse giuen to Traian.

Armenia and Mesopotamia made tributary to the Empire.

New titles giue to Trajan by the Senate.

An horrible and terrible Earthquake in the citie of Antioch.

A bridge ouer the riuer Euphrates.

Arbela.

Babylon and Theſſephonte reſcued by Trajan.

And ſo as EUTROPIVS and SEXTVS RVFVS teſtifie) the countrie of Armenia was made a tributary province, and at that time he gratified and gaue gifts and rewards to thoſe Kings and Tetrarchs, which had ſerued him in thoſe wars, and to many others. And others he condemned in great ſums of money, according as each one had deſerued. And ſetting all things in good order, leauing ſufficient gariſſons to defend the ſame, he marched forward with his Armie, conquering the dominions of the King of Parthia, and particularly entred into the fertile countie of Mesopotamia, and took the citie of Niſſus, and other places there, and made that province, like Armenia, tributary and ſubiekt to the Empire; the King of Parthia being no way able to hinder the ſame, therein happening many ſkirmiſhes, encounters, aſſaults of cities, and feates of arms, TRAIAN ſhewing himſelfe in all things an excellent Captain, as well in trauailes and dangers, as in directing his armie, in lodging it, in marſhalling his men, and marching with them according to militarie government and diſcipline. For whom the Senate (being aduertified of his great victories and good ſucceſſe) commanded great ſacrifices to be made, after the manner of the Gentiles; and ſent him new titles and names, ſignifying his victories, calling him Optimus, Armenicus, Parthicus, and other titles, for the conqueſt of Armenia, and other countie of the Parthians. Hauing had in all things good ſucceſſe, encreaſing and enlarging the Romane Empire, deſiring, for ſome reſpects, to repoſe himſelfe for ſome fewe dayes, hee came to paſſe the winter in the Province of Soria; where diſperſing his Armie in thoſe marches, he lodged himſelfe in the Citie of Antioch, whither came Ambaſſadours from many parts of the Eaſt: And being there in great proſperitie and at reſt, with a full determination to returne to the wars as afterwards he did, the whol citie being full of his Court, and of Ambaſſadours and Princes which came to ſee him, and to follow their ſuits vnto him, there happened an earth-quake which was in a manner generall, which in that citie and in a great part of Aſia (but chiefly in thoſe quarters) was the greateſt that euer was ſcen or heard of, which began after this manner. On the 22 of October there did riſe fo furious and violent a winde, as it tare and turned vp trees, made the birds fall to the earth, vncovered the rooſes, and made the houſes ſhake: then followed lightning and thunder, in ſuch abundance, as being yet night, it ſeemed noone day; after which there fell from heauen ſuch fearful thunderbolts, as with their violence they brake downe ſtately buildings, and ſlew many men, ſo as it ſeemed the world had been ſet on fire, and that the earth had opened. The Sea was alſo wonderfully troubled; after all which there was ſuch a violent heate, as, not able to endure it, men ſtrippt themſelves, and hid them vnder ground; and the ſkie was ſo darke, and the duſt ſo great, as one could not ſee another, but ſhocking together fell downe dead: But he that will know the wonders which paſſed therein, let him reade DION, and COCCIVS in the life of TRAIAN; for many cities were ruined, much people periſhed; many mountains and hills ſunke and became plaine; many riuers were dried vp; and many fountaines and waters ſprang where neuer had been any before. And in the Citie of Antioch, almoſt all the houſes and buildings thereof fell to the ground; and the Emperour TRAIAN, eſcaped by flight, and was driuen to leape out at a window into the fields, ſeeing that all his palaces fell downe: in which fieldes hee remained many dayes in Tents, vntill the earth-quake was paſt; ſo great feare poſſeſſed him for that which was already happened. This miſfortune being paſt, and this Citie and others, which endured the like calamitie, being repaired by TRAIAN, and ſommer being come, gathering together all his forces, he parted from Antioch to proceede in the warre which he had begun, directing his iourney towards the Eaſt, to make a conqueſt of Aſſyria and Chaldea, with the great Citie of Babylon, head of the ancient monarchy of the Aſſyrians. And being to paſſe the riuer Euphrates, at a great turning which it maketh, he underwent many difficulties and dangers, for the Parthians with all their whole power endeouored to ſtoppe his paſſage: But TRAIAN knew ſo well how to vie ſuch induſtrie, and to proceede ſo warily, as making boates and bringing them in carts, from the mountains neereſt at hand, he made a bridge, and paſſed his Army in deſpite of his enemies, although not without great ſlaughter and danger to both parts: And hauing paſſed the riuer, he marched forwards, conquering Cities and Caſſes on euery ſide, and among other the great Citie of Arbela in Aſſyria, which MARCELLINVS calleth Gandabala, in whole fields ALEXANDER the Great, ouerthrew King DARIVS. And from thence he went and took other countries, wherein neuer had any Romane enſignes been diſplayed: And from thence without finding any that durſt to giue him battaile in his march, he came to the famous Citie of Babylon, of whole greatneſſe and power we read maruels, and taking it by force of armes, he did the like by all the borders: and from thence he marched

by

by land to the riuer Tigris, and aſſaulted and took by force the great citie of Theſſephonte, which is in Perſia, and other townes in thoſe parts. But in what manner TRAIAN took this Citie, and what happened in the many aſſaults and battailes giuen, and how long this warre continued, we finde it not written: for thoſe authors which are come to our hands treat thereof ſuccinctly; and the bookes of his life and famous exploits which FLAVIUS MARCELLVS and AVRILIUS VERVS wrote at large and copiouſly, are periſhed, with other notable works, which time hath conſumed and waſted; by which means the acts of this Emperour are vnknowne. Neither is he compared with ALEXANDER the Great, or the greateſt captaines of the world; notwithstanding that he was no leſſe, conſidering the countries, the Seas, and Nations, which he travelled, tamed and ſubdued, with his armie, his minde, his wiſedome and bounty.

TRAIAN hauing made himſelfe Lord of all thoſe Countries, both on this ſide, and beyond the riuers Tigris and Euphrates, to wit, Syria, Babylon, Chaldea, and other countries and provinces; thereto adioyning; DION writeth that he went downe the riuer Tigris, towards the Perſian Sea, to ſubduce mightie King, named ATHABALS, who liued in an Iſland (which that riuer maketh, diuiding it ſelfe into two arms) &c. committing to that countie, the King and inhabitants of thoſe countries not daring to make any reſiſtance, yielded all thoſe places into his hands. But here he was in the greateſt trouble and danger of all others: for winter coming on, there fell ſo much raine, and there were ſuch tempeſts, and the riuer Tigris made ſuch inundations, as hee was in danger to haue loſt the greateſt part of his armie. After which, theſe authors affirme, that he rigged vp a great ſceete, wherewith ſaying along the Perſian Sea, he came into the maine Ocean, conquering euen to the Indies, and ſubduing them to the Roman Empire: and finding by chance certain Merchants ſhips which failed to the Indies, on this ſide the riuer Ganges, they write, that he informed himſelfe thereof, and diſcouſed with ſuch as were in thoſe ſhips of all matters concerning thoſe parts. And he ſometimes ſaid, that had it pleaſed God that hee had been a little younger, and had more ſtrength & health, he would not haue ſtaied vntill that he had attained to the vitermoſt and moſt remote ends of the world: and that he accounted ALEXANDER the Great for very happy, in that he began to raigne when he was but young; yet he purpoſed to paſſe further then he had done. And ſo he wrote from thoſe Seas to the Senat of Rome, and ſent them the relation and names of all the Nations which he had conquered and ſubdued, the number whereof was ſo great, as they could hardly be reckoned and knowne. Vpon which newes, there were made in Rome great ioyes, new ſacrifices, and many other things to his honor; among which was a moſt ſumptuous Arch. But this attempt and enterpriſe of the Indies proſpered not with TRAIAN, according to his expectation: for as thoſe countries, which he left behinde him in the Eaſt, were newly conquered; while as he continued his Navigation and conqueſt by Sea, many of thoſe countries reuolted, and thruſt out the Roman gariſſons which were left in them. Beſides this (whereof he was aduertified) he found not in thoſe coaſts and countries where he came, ſuch fertilitie and abundance of victuals as he expected; neither were they anſwerable to the reports of writers, which fabled thereof: for he found there great ſcarcitie and want of many neceſſaries, and the enterpriſe ſeemed vnworthy of ſo great a Prince: for which cauſes, and for that that he was now old and vnwieldie, he reſolued to return with his ſceete to the place from whence he came.

TRAIAN returning in this manner by the Perſian gulfe, and taking land neere to the riuer Tigris, he ſpeedily took order for the puniſhing of thoſe which reuolted, and the recouerie of thoſe countries which had rebelled, whither he ſent two Captaines called LVCIVS and MAXIMVS, with two good armies, which in the beginning proſpered ill; for MAXIMVS in a battaile againſt the Parthians was ouerthrowne and ſlaine: but LVCIVS afterwards reinforcing and relieving his armie, obtained ſome victories againſt the enemy, wherein he repaired the loſſes recouered, and recouered againe by force of arms the citie of Niſſus in Mesopotamia, and others which had rebelled; and did the like by the citie of Adiſa in the ſame province, which he ſet on fire and wholly ruined. While as LVCIVS was buſie about theſe things, TRAIAN his other Captaines and Lieutenants, named EVRETIVS and CLARIVS, made warre in other parts againſt ſuch as had reuolted, and took by force the citie of Selenia, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer Tigris, and other cities which the Parthians had recouered in thoſe quarters: ſo as in ſhort ſpace TRAIAN not only recouered all thoſe countries which had rebelled, but alſo conquered many other cities and provinces: ſo as he was Lord of the greateſt and beſt parts of Aſia. His wiſedome and valour was ſo great, that during all the time that hee followed theſe warres and conquests, so remote and farre from Rome, yet there was not any tumult or disorder in the Citie.

Traian made warre in Perſia and the Indies.

But this sage and wife Emperour seeing himselfe now old and tired, and knowing how great the Romane Empire was, and that it seemed impossible (as indeed it was true) well to gouerne a state so large and great, chiefly those provinces which hee had conquered from the Parthians, who were so hard to be tamed and kept vnder; he resolved to settle a King in Parthia and Persia of his choosing, and in some other countie which hee had taken from the Parthians, which King should rule and gouerne the same, as before they were ruled, yet as a King which should be subiect and a vassall to the Romane Empire, reseruing to himselfe the supreme iurisdiction and soueraignty. And with this resolution he came to the great citie of Thessponte, which is in Persia; and calling thither the principall men of the Parthians, hee conferred with them concerning the making them a King of their owne stocke and nation, they giuing him great securitie to serue and obey the Romane Empire. This being concluded, he placed and established, in the royall throne with great solemnitie, a great man of the royall house of the Parthians, whose name was PARTHENASPATES. And afterwards (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS and EVTRUPIVS record) he did the like in the province of Albania in Asia, neere to the Caspian Sea, seating there a King to gouerne the same: and placing gouernours and Presidents in the other provinces, he enlarged and extended the bounds & limits of the Romane Empire beyond the riuier Tigris, where before his time the name of Romane had scarcely been heard of. And hauing ended all things in good sort in the East, with great glorie and honour (for no place could defend it selfe against him, sauing one little citie in Arabia deserta, which the Agairens had taken, which could not long be besieged for the great sterilitie and want of water in all the fields and marches therabout) hee resolved to direct his journey towards Italy, and so to Rome, with greater honour and triumph, then any of his predecessors had euer obtained.

While as TRAIAN made prouision for his journey towards Italy, it happened that the Iewes which inhabited the province of Cyrene, which is in Africa, to the East of Syria Magna, conspired and rebelled against the Romanes and Greekes which liued in that province, and slew most of them. The like did those Iewes which dwelled in Egypt, and both the one and the other committed such cruelties, as were neuer seene or heard of: So as PAVLYS OROSIVS writeth, that they left the land in a manner dispeopled; and that Nation was euer so readie and apt to rebell, as those Iewes which dwelt in the Ile of Cyprus, knowing what had passed in the province of Cyrene, and in Egypt, rebelled also, and committed greater crueltie and excesses, then the others had done: so as DIDON saith (although it seemeth incredible) that there were slaine by them 200000. persons, which inhabited that Iland. Which is confirmed and made credible by that which EVSEBIVS and PAVLYS OROSIVS report, who affirme, that they slew all those which dwelt in the citie of Salamina, which is in that Iland: vpon which occasion there was afterwards an Imperiall law made, that no Iew vpon paine of death should come within the Ile of Cyprus, vpon what occasion soeuer. This law was afterwards so seuerly executed, that if any of them came thither, although through mischance or fowle-weather at sea, they were presently put to death.

When the Emperour TRAIAN vnderstood of this great rebellion and crueltie (being vpon his way toward Italie) as a iust prince willing and desiring to giue condigne punishment, according to the qualitie of the crime, he sent Captaines with sufficient troupes of souldiers into diuers parts, to put to death all the Iewes they should finde in those countries before named, or in any other wheresoeuer: which they affirme, was the greatest execution and punishment that euer was done in the world, God permitting the same for their stubbornness, and obstinacy. This great slaughter & punishment being executed, taking the best order that might be for matters in Asia, the good Emperour began his journey towards Italie, leaving his Nephew ADRIANVS, who was afterward Emperour, for General of the Armies in the East, and so continued his journey with infinite honour and ioy; there being in Rome the greatest triumph and the most solemne reception prepared for him, that had euer beene made. Comming into the province of Cilicia, which is in Asia the lesse, as he was old and somewhat sickly, his distaste increased vpon him in such sort, as staying in the citie of Seleucia, within few daies after, he died there, of a naturall sickness, although that some suspected that he was poisoned. And so ended this excellent Emperour, hauing reigned nineteene yeeres and a half, and liued sixtie and thre, in the yeere of our Lord 119. leaving neither son nor daughter by his wife PLOTINA, with whom he was married; neither would he adopt or name anie one that should succeed him, which Traian in Persia.

The Iewes rebelled against the Romanes.

The crueltie of the Iewes.

A iust punishment inflicted by Traian vpon the Iewes.

The death of the Emperour Traian.

which hee did in some mens opinion (as S. PARCIANVS writes) to imitate ALEXANDER the Great, whom he euer sought to excell in honour and renown. TRAIAN's almes were afterwards brought to Rome, and set vpon the top of a Pillar, which he had commanded to be erected in the market-place: which Pillar was of one whole peece, containing one hundred and forty foot in height. This Prince subdued many Countiees and Prouinces, and held the greater part of the world in subiection; or, to say better, was the greatest and mightiest Prince that euer was in the world, either before or after him; as he which is curious may finde by this our History. True it is, that discouraging indifferently touching valour in Armes, and many other parts, he was not to be paralleled in greatnes with IULIVS CÆSAR. He gouerned the Empire with such authority and so much iustice, and his vertues were so many, as he therein excelled all those which had not the light of our faith: for, therein is no comparison. And this was held for a custome in Rome after him, that, when they poured out their blessing vpon their new-chosen Emperours, they would pray that he might be as fortunate as AVGVSTVS CÆSAR; and as good as TRAIAN; accounting him to haue attained to the height of all goodnes.

It is good pity To think that so excellent a man should be lost and damned, as doubtlesse hee was: for, hee not only was an Idolater; and held not our Christian faith (without the which there is no saluation) neither did hee confesse or professe it; but, persecuted and oppressed the Christians. And some men, being moued more with pity and compassion, than with any wit or vnderstanding, fained a fable and jest; saying, that, through the prayers of S. GREGORY, TRAIAN's soule was released out of hell (from whence is no redemption) and carried to Paradise: whereof, besides that our faith doth controul it, there is no Historiographer either antient or modern, of any authority that euer I saw, that makes any mention thereof in their Treatises of TRAIAN, and of S. GREGORY: whereby it is cleer, that those which maintain it bear false witness both against heauen and hell. TRAIAN was of a bigge stature, of a swarthy complexion, and had thin hair on his head and beard; and likewise had a hook nose, great broad shoulders, and long hands; and, aboue all, had a very louing aspect with his eyes. He was born the one and twentieth day of May, in the second yeere of the Reigne of the Emperour NERO.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS AELIVS ADRIANVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

After Trajan, Adrian was aduanced to the Empire, more through the policy of Trajan's wife, than by the election of the people or the Senate, or for that Trajan had adopted him. Nevertheless, after he was preferred to the imperiall dignity, he gave so good an account of himselfe, as Rome had no cause to repent for hauing made him her Lord. He made very great voyages; and in his person visited in a manner all the Roman Empire. He was very studious in all arts and sciences, and caused all such as were famous and excellent in any Art, to come to Rome. He happily ended all such wars as he began; and was very kinde to the Christians. His many vertues were accompanied with many vices; nevertheless, he could so well dissemble the passion of his minde, as he seemed to content himselfe chiefly in doing. He liued 62 yeeres, and gouerned the Empire 12. In his old age he had so grievous an infirmity, as he desired to dye, and intreated his familiar to kill him; who hauing not the heart to commit so brutish an act, he was finally aduised by his physicians to abstaine from meat & drinke, so as following their counsell he fastened his death by hunger.

Adrian bring in Antich, was thoſen Emperour.

Adrian nephew to Traian and a Spaniard.

The Parthians and others were lately ſubdued, be-ſides of Tra-ians death, reſcued.

He death of the good Emperor TRAIAAN was much lamented and grievously taken through all the Empire; beeing for his bounty and goodnes much beloved of all the people and nations ſubject to the Empire. And, as he neuer had any ſon, either naturall or adopted, that might ſucceed him, and ſeeing his Nephew ADRIAN for his vertues, great wiſdome, and the affinity between them, was much beloved and eſteemed; PLOTINA, the Emperreſſe, wife to TRAIAAN, who was with him at his deceaſe, for the great loue he bare vnto ADRIAN, ſought means to aduance him to the Empire. To bring which her deuice to paſſe, ſhe agreed with ADRIAN (who already was a man of great power, and had been very familiar with TRAIAAN, and was his cuntryman) and took ſuch order, that his death was concealed vntill hee had founded the good will of the Army which he led, and of ſuch other great Perſonages as were in the Emperours Court; ſaining (after ſome Writers) that TRAIAAN had adopted him for his ſonne, ſhewing a counterfeit inſtrument or Writing to that effect. Finally, the matter was ſo cunningly handled, that it took ſuch effect as they deſired, and the Army preſently ſware obedience and did homage to ADRIAN; notwithstanding that he was abſent in the City of Antich in Syria, where he was left (as is ſaid) Generall. Who being aduertified heereof, and the Legions whereof he was Generall conſenting thereto, he preſently wrote to the Senate, entreating to be conſtituted in the Empire. When the Senate had receiued his Letters, and vnderſtood what paſſed, his requeſt was eaſily granted, and ſo was he of all men obeyed and held for Emperour.

ADRIAN was TRAIAAN'S Nephew, as ſome ſay, by his mother; and ſome ſay, by his father: it may be that he was his kinfman of both ſides, and ſo both the one and other may ſay the truth. He was alſo a Spaniard both by lineage and birth, and according to EYTAOPVS and EVSABIVS, was borne in the ſame citie of Italia: yet SPARTIANVS interreth that his father in Rome was called ADRIAN as he was, but was borne in Italia; and his mother DOMITIA PAVLINA, was alſo native of Spaine, and borne in the citie of Caleſ. He was married to SABINA TRAIAAN'S ſiſters daughter (as DION writeth.) And was a tall man of ſtature, of a good conſtitution and countenance; and of a very cleane ſtrength, which he much exerciſed. He is reckoned among the good and excellent Emperours; and with great reaſon, conſidering his many vertues and excellencies, his knowledge and wiſdome wherewith he gouerned, and the peace and iuſtice wherein he maintained the Empire two and twentie yeeres, that he liued therein; whereof for that all authors write briefly, I alſo purpoſe to treat thereof in ſumme, ſeeing I ſpent ſo much time in the laſt, ſo as except I vſe more breuities then hitherto I haue done, the volume of this my booke will growe to a greater proportion then I purpoſed, or is convenient. Wherefore I will doe, as he which within a lymited time hath determined to trauell a long journey, and hauing taken leaſure in the beginning, deeming that travelling in this manner, he ſhall not bee able to attaine to that place at the time appointed, haſteth his way with greater ſpeece, vntill that he know that he may come to his iourneis end before the time be expired. So will I do from henceforth. At the laſt when I am paſt ADRIAN, I purpoſe to proceede with greater expedition then heretofore, vntill I come ſo farre on my way, that I may ſafely diuide the proceſſe of this hiftorie, and hold the proportion which I haue determined, preſuming rather to make this inequality in the ſtile, then to make a worke ſo tedious and wearſome.

I ſay then, that when-as the barbarous nations vnderſtood that TRAIAAN was dead, notwithstanding they alſo knew of the election of his Nephew ADRIAN; the Parthians chiefly, and other nations which were lately ſubdued, began to mutine and rebell: and there were alſo ſome alterations in Britanny, and in ſome other parts. All which, ADRIAN might eaſily haue pacified and ſubdued by force of Arms, and wanted neither courage nor means thereto: but he would not ſeek it by the extremity of warre and rigor. For, truly, albeit theſe two Princes were both very valiant and excellent Captains and Gouerners, yet heerein they did much differ: for, TRAIAAN, being greedy of honour and fame, deſired by conqueſts and wars to increaſe and enlarge the Empire; but ADRIAN'S care was To preſerue the ancient limits without any greater ambition, and rather he diminiſhed a great part thereof: and ſo preſently in the beginning of his Raig, to the end he might liue in peace, he left to the Parthians, and to other Princes of the Eaſt, all thoſe Provinces beyond the Riuer of Euphrates vnto the Indies which TRAIAAN had conquered; nothing regarding Armenia, Media, Aſſyria, Perſia, Meſopotamia, nor all the reſt; and he ſet his bound and placed his Legions at the Riuer Euphrates. Some thought and alſo wrote, that he did it of purpoſe, enuying TRAIAAN'S honour: but I truly attribute it to that he held it for the better and moſt aſſured courſe. And hauing taken ſuch order in the Eaſt (as is ſaid) and left CATTELLIVS SEVERVS for Gouernor of Syria, and pacified the troubles lately raiſed by the Iewes; he took his way by land towards Italy, and ſent the allies of TRAIAAN by ſea: and, coming neer to Rome, hee was aduertified that they had prepared a triumph for him in the ſame manner as it was provided for his Vncle TRAIAAN, for that hee was in the ſame wars and conqueſts with him. But he would not accept thereof, commanding that the ſame triumph and entertainment ſhould bee made and giuen to TRAIAAN'S Image; and ſo it was done; and he (as far as I haue read) was the onely man that euer triumphed after that hee was dead. And ADRIAN was receiued and obeyed with the greateſt loue and applauſe that could bee, and preſently performed many parts of an excellent Prince, conformable to the courſe of his life paſt, and the hope conceiued of him for the time to come; ſo as all were glad and well ſatiſfied with his government, with his manners and conditions: and truly with great reaſon, for he deſerued no leſſe. And becauſe that the graces and excellencies of this Emperour were in the hiſt degree, beſides the vertues and wiſdome wherewith hee was adorned, I ſhould it fit in this place to ſpeak thereof, to the end that they may ſerue for an example to other Princes; whereby they may make themſelues the more reſpected by his imitation.

Fiſt, he was naturally enclined to learne all ſuch ſciences as appertained to wit, and to the exerciſe both of mind and bodie, aſwell in learning, as in the exerciſe of armes and other vertues, wherein he fought to excell all men. It is a wonderfull matter to conſider how God ended this Prince with wit and vnderſtanding, capable to comprehend whatſoeuer he deſired, with ſkill, ſtrength and abilitie in all exerciſes: whereby he grew very learned in both the tongues, Greek and Latine, and compiled excellentie well, both in verſe and in proſe. He pleaded cauſes and exerciſed himſelfe in the art Oratorie; and ſo much affected the ſtile & phraſe of ancient times, that he preferred CATO before CICERO, ENNIUS before VIRGIL, and CÆLIUS before SALVSTIUS. He was as ſkilfull in other arts as herein: for he was a ſingular Mathematician, Arithmetician, Geometrian, and a great Aſtronomer, and took great delight in iudiciall Aſtologie, and would giue his iudgement: ſo as SPARGIANVS writeth, that the ſiſt day of the yeere he would caſt the reuolution of the whole, and foretold what would enſue, and did ſo by the ſame yeere wherein he died. Hee was very ſkilfull in Phyſick, and knew the vertues and properties of hearbs and ſtones. Hee was expert and very politick in warres and militarie diſcipline, and was very ſtrong, able and ſkilfull in armes both on foot and horſeback: And beſides all this, he could play on inſtruments, and ſing maruelouſly well. He could draw and paint, aſwell as the ſkilfulleſt maſter workman in that art. Finally, in all things he had ſo great ſkill, as any man could haue in any one thing particularly: wherein, beſides his deepe vnderſtanding, his exceeding memorie did much help him: for they affirme, that he forgot not any thing that he had either read or heard. He was of ſuch capacitie (as SPARGIANVS writeth) that he would both endite, write, and conſer of buſines all at one inſtant, and had a ſingular grace & promptnes in vſing quick ſpeeches and quips, either in earneſt or in ieſt; and the like in anſwering vpon the ſodain, if he were toucht by any. Of his quick and ſharp ſpeeches which they write of him, I will recite one, as ſitting this time, although it be none of the ſharpeſt and ſubtleſt of them, which was thus: A certaine Romane Knight came to intreate a fauour at his hands, who (according to his age) had a gray beard, and full of white haire: and ſaith that which he deſired, within few dayes after he came againe with a new periton to the ſame effect: But in the meane ſeaſon (it ſeemeth that men were then as ſkilfull in painting as now they are) he had dyed his beard, and looked yong againe: which was noted by the Emperour; who to giuld him therewith, anſwered to his requeſt, I would be very glad to do you the pleaſure which you require, but a few dayes paſt I denied it to your father who deſired the ſame, wherefore it ſeemeth to me a matter vniuſt, to grant that to the ſonne which I would not yeeld to the Father: and ſo the olde man departed with ſhame, and in this manner he ſued many ſuch like ieſts. Beſides all that is ſpoken of him, he was very ſtrong, and able to endure any labour; and was ſo active of his body, as he ordinarily went the greateſt part of his way on foote, and bare headed, in the ſunne in the raine and miſts. He was much addicted to the chace, and was a great Hunter, and excellent therein: ſo as with his owne hands he killed Lions, Beares, wild Boares, and

Adrian (ruſ Traians offer to Rome.

A triumph giuen to Tra-ians ſtatue after his death.

Adrian was expert in all ſciences.

and other most fierce Beasts; he was oftentimes in great danger, falling once vpon a waues from a rock; where he put one of his shoulders out of joint, and brake one of his legs, with some of his ribs. Finally, there was nothing wherein the Emperor A D R I A N was not excellent and very able, and in all things presumed to excell the wisest; as truly he did in the most. And although hee were a great reprob of Masters in all Arts, and did often put them to their shifts with his questions and arguments, yet he did much honour them, and bestowed many gifts and rewards vpon them; and had about him Philosophers, Astronomers, Poets, Rhetoricians, Grammarians, Musicians, Arithmeticians, Geometicians, and excellent Painters and Carvers: with all which he might compare, and the most of them he did farre excell, and did vnto say, that he had not forborne to learn any thing more than other men did, that might be needfull in peace or warre, either for an Emperour, or a man of any other condition whatsoever.

Being endued with these qualities aboue mentioned, he was not void of other vertues & gifts of his mind, which he shewed and put in practice during the time of his raigne, more, and better then before, although in the beginning he was noted of cruelty, for that some speciall men, by his commandment and permission, were put to death. There were also some vices and bad inclinations noted to be in him: but they all affirm he did suppress and dissemble them, and was so much master of himself, as he easily mastered his naturall euill inclination, which well appeared in his manner of gouerning the Empire, and the good vsage of his subjects, bestowing fauours vpon all men, abating the tributes and subsidies through all the Empire; ministering justice with indifference; doing all things by the aduice and counsell of the Senate, and of wise men which he kept about him, and caried with him whither he would: for, he not only loued to be counselled, but also to be reproofed and aduised. Hee entertained all men mildly and courteously: and although to the common sort he shewed greatnes and majesty, yet men of note he honoured much, and visited them in their sickness, and invited them, and went to them when they invited him. And although he euer loued and procured peace, yet all his life-time he had exceeding great care of martiall discipline; punishing the liberty and vices of men of warre; reforming errors past, and prescribing rules for time to come. In this manner (as I haue said) he had liued when he was private, and followed the same course after he was Emperour.

A D R I A N hauing remained some space in Rome; gouerning the Empire in good form and order, many northern Nations rebelled against the Empire, to wheet, the Alanes and Scythians of Europe; and the Sarmates, which are now the Inhabitants of Russia, Muscovia, and Poland, and other Countries thereto adioyning; which, with intent to make war in the Empire, came down into the Prouinces of the vpper Misia (now called Seruaia) and the lower Bulgaria, both which at this day are in subjection to the great Turk. Against which nations, the Emperour A D R I A N parted from Rome with a mighty Army: but, coming neer to those Prouinces where the enemies were, there were certain treaties of peace propounded; and A D R I A N, who was addicted thereto, granted the same: and, making his abode for some daies in those Quarters, hee returned to Rome, leaving M A R C I V S T Y R O for Lieutenant and Gouernor of Pannonia and Dacia. In this journey there was a certain conspiracy against him; which being discovered, foure principall men which had been Consuls (being guilty thereof) were put to death: which execution the Emperour A D R I A N afterwards denied to haue been done by his will or consent. Being com to Rome to purge himself of the infamy and enuy thereof, he made a great congiarie or distribution of money among the people, bestowing many graces and fauours vpon all men; and commanded also infinite games and sports to be made, such as were accustomed in Rome, not forgetting (neuertheless) the execution of iustice in his gouernment. Staying at this time a lesser space in Rome than at the first, he departed with a great Court and Army to visit France, and the Prouinces neer adioyning vpon the Cities whereof, hee bestowed many graces and fauours. And from thence he went to visit the Legions and Armies in Germanie; wherein hee set good order in many things concerning militarie discipline: and, hauing remained a while in those parts, hauing resolved to visit the whole Empire (as afterwards he did) he directed his journey into Flanders, and from thence into Brianny, where hee reformed many things, and reconciled the Inhabitants, and the Romans which liued there; as well the garrisons, as the Inhabitants and Colonies. And, for their better quietnes and security, S P A R C I A N V S saith, that he caused a strong wall of fourescore miles long to be built, to make a diuision of the lands of the one from the other, which was a marvellous great work. And, hauing made such provision for all things in that land as he thought needfull, he returned into France: where he erected some singular Buildings, and bestowed other graces and fauours in that Countrey.

After

After that the Emperour A D R I A N had visited France and the borders thereof, and the Ile of Britannie, he directed his journey for Spain, where he was ioyfully received, as a miniature and borne in that countrey: and after that he had visited some places, he went to winter in the citie of Tarragona, where he called a parliament of all the prouinces, and ordained many things for the publicke good thereof. After that the furie of winter was past, he trauelled through all Spain, visiting the cities, and bestowing benefits vpon them: principally vnto his owne Countie Malica and Senil, he granted many priuiledges and exemptions, and did many great fauours, as D I O N writeth; but would not come thither, notwithstanding that he was in the marches thereof. Thus hauing visited all Spain, he returned towards Rome, & at this time he set downe the limits and bounds of the Empire, from the barbarous Nations: where there were no riuers, to diuide them with notable markes of stone, pillars, trees, and other things; and his authoritie & reputation at that time was so great, that to the high Germanes who were free, he appointed a King: and at that time some tumults were punished in Africa.

The Emperour A D R I A N liuing now in peace, being the seauenth yeere of his raigne, the Parthians a fierce and turbulent nation, began to arme and to make warres against the Empire; and A D R I A N making provision for all things accordingly, passed into the East, with a sufficient Armie to follow that warre in person: but seeing that he managed it himselfe, they propounded certain treaties of peace; which being concluded, he trauelled peaceably through all the Eastern prouinces, and came into Asia the lesse, and from thence into Gracia, where he did many fauours to the Athenians, and other cities, where he remained some space. From thence he took his passage into the Ile of Sicilia, and visited the principall places of that land, and desired to see mount Etna, which is so famous for the fire which it continually casteth out. Setting all things in Sicilia in such order as he thought good, being very ioyfull he returned to Rome, now the fourth time after that he was Emperour. After his last coming, he staid not long: for he had vnderaken (for the better gouernment thereof) to visit the whole Empire in person; and to that purpose preparing shippes and gallies he passed into Africa: where the ioy is incredible that was conceived for his coming. For besides that A D R I A N was very much beloued, it happened (as S P A R C I A N V S and others doe write) that Africa for five yeeres space had endured great want of raine, and by consequence hunger and famine; but as soone as he was arrived in that Countrey, raine fell plentifully: which made his coming most ioyfull. And the time that he was in that countrey, he spent in reforming of the gouernment, in ending controuersies, and commanding certaine publicke buildings to be erected: among which was the reedifying of a great part of the citie of Carthage, which (according to my author) he commanded should be called Adrianopolis, after his owne name.

And all matters being ended in Africa at his pleasure, and hauing staid there so long as to him seemed good, he returned prosperously to Rome, where hee provided for all other matters of the Empire: yet the time was not long that he staid there; and when euery man thought least of any journey, hee againe provided for his passage into the East. And within short space he went into Gracia; and traouailing through it, staid in some cities, and made those buildings & temples to be finished, which before he had commanded to be begun, and enioyned others to be built: and so continuing his journey he went into Asia the lesse, and did there as he had done in other prouinces where he had traualled. Being come into Syria, by letters and messengers he inquired the Kings and Tetrarchs, as well those which were friends and subiects, as others which were neighbours and strangers, to come to see & speake with him. Among which one was the King of Parthia, to whom he freely sent his daughter, whom the Emperour T R A I A N in the former wars had taken prisoner; for which generous act, manie came to his Court to visit him and to doe him honour: all which he so friendly and courteously entertained, as such which came not did exceedingly enuie those which came, grieving very much that they had not done the like. These meetings and feasts being ended (which in truth were very great and memorable) A D R I A N took his way towards Syria, and came into Palestina and Iudea, visiting the principall cities thereof; and from thence went forwards, and did the like in Arabia: After which, he presently went into Egypt; where he remained longer than in any other part, and there commanded a most sumptuous Sepulchre to be built ouer the great P O M P E Y, for that his Tomb was ruined and decayed. He also caused a City to be founded to the name and memoriall of a most fair young youth which died there, whom hee dearly loued: And at the same time he permitted and also commanded, that the holy City Ierusalem, which (as is before said) was destroyed & laid desolate, should be reedified & new built, which was presently done with for cruelty.

Adrian taxed

Northern nations rose against the Empire.

Adrian visited
the Empire.

He came into Spain, and did many fauours to his Countrey.

Adrian in Africa.

Carthage reedified by Adrian.

A Sepulchre made by A drian ouer the great Pompey.

The power of the Roman Emper-
ors.

with admirable expedition, principally by the Iewes; and commanded, that (leaving the first name) it should be called Ælia Adria Capitalina: so great was then the power and wealth of the Roman Emperors, that it was as easie a matter for them then to build Cities, as now houses, or things of lesser moment. And although the Iewes did greatly reioyce for the new-building and restoring of Ierusalem, yet afterwards they took it very grievously, that the Gentils should jointly dwell there with them; who built Temples to their gods and idols, not suffering the Christians freely to use their rites and ceremonies. And this is the cause of the rebellion which afterwards ensued.

The peruse
of the Roman Emper-
ors.

Truely, it is a thing much to be noted in this Nation; which became so stiffe-necked, that when they were bound to keep and observe their law, being good and holy; for very light occasions they would forsake it, and take strange religions, and become idolaters: but after that it was abolished, and ought no longer to be observed, they would neuer leave it, neither receive the holy Catholike faith; and yet, untill this day, some of that generation in sundry parts of the world obstinately persevere therein.

These and many other things being ended by ADRIAN in the time of his abode in Asia and in Egypt, he returned into Europe: and, arriving in Græcia, he staid with his whole Court in the City of Athens. Being there (which was in the eighteenth yeer of his Reign) all the Iewes rebelled, and cast the Roman garriſons out of their Prouinces of Iudea, Galilee, and the rest; killing as many of them as they could, with a very great number of Christians. This was a very dangerous warre: for, with them did conspire all the Iewes that dwelt in any other Prouinces, which were very many. ADRIAN considering the importance of this accident, provided a new Army, whereof he made LULIUS SEVERVS Generall against the Iewes, causing him to come from Briann, where hee commanded the Army; who came with great power, and passed into Syria, and made most cruell warre: wherein, after the shedding of much blood on both sides, the Iewes were ouercome and destroyed, and the whole Countrey left in a manner desolate. So (as witeth DION) there were fifty excellent strong Castles and Fortresses laied euen with the ground; and nine hundred, fourscore and five Townes and populous Villages burnt; and there were slain in skirmishes and battels fifty thousand fighting men, besides those which without number died of hunger, sickness, and misery of the warre: and so was performed the subduing, and (in a manner) the totall destruction of the Iewish Nation. And ADRIAN gaue commendement and made an edict, that the Iewes should be perpetually banished from the new Ierusalem, and prohibited to inhabit there.

The Iewes overthrown and destroyed by Iulius Seuerus, and banished from the new Ierusalem by Adrian.

Within few daies after the war against the Iewes was ended, the Alanes and Masagets, which are barbarous and fierce Nations of Seythia Asiatia, came with great fury, and entered into Media making war, and afterwards into Armenia, and came as far as Cappadocia (where FLAVIUS ARRIANUS was Generall for the Empire) putting all the Countreys therabouts in great fear. But ADRIAN (who euer loued peace) used such means, as through the gifts which hee sent to their King VOLOGES by his Ambassadors, they returned peaceably to their houses, laden with spoils and riches which they got in other barbarous Countreys.

ADRIAN, having ended all matters to his best liking, after he had bestowed many gifts and fauours vpon the Cities of Græcia, came in the end to Rome, hauing (as I haue said) travelled a long time through the world; where his coming was very grateful to all citizens in that City: and although he were now old and vnwieldy, yet he failed not to provide and take as good order for all things then, as when hee was of greatest strength. But, considering his age, which was now about threescore yeers, that he had not any sonne, and that a disease he ordinarily had, which was much bleeding at the nose, did now more oppress him than euer; hee took great care who should bee his Successor, and therefore determined to adopt some excellent man to succeed him in the Empire; and heereupon took much counsell, and made many doubts before he would resolve. In the end, contrary to the liking of most of his Councell, hee adopted one LUCIUS CECILIUS COMMODVS, intituling him CÆSAR, and nominated him for his Successor; which (as SPARCIANVS reporteth) had not been vied to be done in that manner untill then: and changing his name, after his new Father he was called ÆLIUS VERVS. The same day he did this, he commanded SEVERIANVS to bee slain (who was a great man in Rome) and FVSUS which was his nephew, for certain euident signes and suspicions which he discouered, that they practised to tyrannize and vsurp the Empire: and so likewise he commanded some others to be put to death, and made away. After this election and adoption, and great feasting for the same, this new-adopted CÆSAR was overtaken with an infirmity, which was fo-

Lucius Cæcilius adopted by Adrian to be his successor.

grie-

griuous, and of so long continuance, as ADRIAN found himselfe deceiued: and seeing that now he could not liue long, he repented that he should leaue so weake and feeble a successor. It is written, that he often said, he leaned to a rotten wall. But it so happened that within few daies, he was cald of that care: for this LVCIVS CECINIUS, whom he had adopted and called ÆLIUS VERVS, died. And notwithstanding that this man left sonnes behinde him, yet ADRIAN presently adopted ANTONINVS or ANTONIVS (for I finde him written after both names) who was afterwards surnamed PIVS; vpon condition that he should also adopt a sonne of the layd ÆLIUS VERVS, who was called LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS, and MARCVS AVRELIVS also; but in the first place ANTONINVS, of whose linage hereafter mention shall be made, who were Noble, and verie excellent and vertuous men. This being done to the good liking, and with the consent of the Senate, and of all the principall men in Rome, ADRIANs infirmity encreasing, he made himselfe to be carried to the citie of Babes; where his griefe so extremely tormented him, and therewithall came so many passions and convulsions, as he oftentimes desired to die, and procured his owne death; and with gifts and flatteries, and sometime with threatnings prouoked some to kill him: and seeing that no man would doe it, and that he wanted strength to doe it himselfe, for the last remedie of his infirmity, by the aduice of some of his Physicians (for he had many about him) he resolved to forebake either to eate or drink, and so he died in the yeere of our Lord 140. vſing the common saying, Turba Medicorum interfecit Regem; which is, A multitude of Physicians killed the King.

The death of
the Emperour
Adrian.

ADRIAN at the time of his death was sixtie two yeeres old and five moneths, & had reigned twentie one yeeres and eleven moneths: he neither left behinde him, or euer had any sonne, he was but once married, and then with a woman whose name was SABINA; and after her death, he married no more. He was a man tall of stature and of a good presence, and did weare his beard and haire long, and took delight therein. Hee was as excellent a Prince as euer was any, although that he had some vices, which with his wisdom he couered and kept secret. As concerning the Christian faith, although in the beginning (as an Infidel) he did hate it, and was an enemy to it, yet afterwards he shewed himselfe more temperate towards the Christians: foras EVSEBIUS and others doe write, QUADRATUS a disciple of the Apostles, and ARISTIDES a Philosopher of Athens and a Christian, did compile certaine notable booke in defence of our faith: wherewith ADRIAN being moued, wrote to MNVCIVS FVNDANVS who was Proconsul in Asia, and to other parts, that no Christian should be compelled to renounce his faith, neither punished, except he were accused for some other offence. So as the Christian faith was taught and preached freely, a great part of the raigne of the Emperour ADRIAN.

THE LIFE OF MARCVS ANTONINVS PIVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND SIXTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

ANTONINVS was adopted by ADRIAN, and by reason of his adoption, succeeded him in the Empire: in which dignity hee liued so vertuously, as it may bee said, that hee liued without example, and was compared to the good NUMA POMILIIVS. There was no great warre in the time of this good Emperour: for hee with his authority bridled all Nations; and to him came Ambassadors, in a manner from the furthestmost parts of the World. Hee would neuer bee vnto farre from Rome, in such manner as his Predecessour had beene, being of opinion that it was most fit for the Emperour to remaine in that citie, which was head of the Empire. He was liberal, courtuous, iust and pitifull, and a great lover of vertuous men, so as it might be said, that he was father of the vertuous. His life was not stained with any vice, as his predecessours were. And being of the age of 72. yeeres he died in his Citie of a fluxion, when he had ruled the Empire 23. yeeres whose death was much lamented by the world, for that they had lost an Emperour and a father, who, they might iustly say, was Pius.

M

COMPTON,

Antoninus Pius descent.

Antoninus compared with Numa Pompilius.

Antoninus
answers to Faustine.

DRIAN was not onely wife and fortunate in gouerning and ruling the Empire, the time that he held it; but he was also, in the successor whom he chose and left there: for hee prooued to be such, and so good, that after he had ended his daies, A DRIAN was not more praised and remembered for his wisdom and good gouernment, then for the succession which he left, by adopting ANTONINVS: who what he was we will presently tell you. The death of A DRIAN being knowne (which was greatly lamented) ANTONINVS PIVS, his adoptd sonne, was presently without any contradiction admitted and obeyed for Emperour, accordingly as he had appointed by the consent of all the Senate, as in his life we haue written. This ANTONINVS was the sonne of AVRELIVS PVLPVS, and Nephew of TITVS AVRELIVS PVLPVS, who had been Consul and had held other offices and dignities, and were Noble men and of an ancient Family, whose originall was in Gallia Cisalpinna, now called Lombardie.

His mothers name was ARRIA FATIDIELLA, the daughter of ARRIVS ANTONINVS a Noble gentleman and twice Consul. This Emperour ANTONINVS was one of the most excellent princes in vertue and bountie, that euer was in the world; and who with greatest authoritie, iustice, liberalitie, and clemencie gouerned the Empire. Hee had a good aspect, was tall, and of a good constitution of body, of an excellent witte, mild of condition, moderate in eating and drinking, well learned, and singularly eloquent, very bountifull, and willing to giue of his owne, and very abstinent from taking from others. He was a great lover of husbandrie, and delighted much in hunting; and he was so free from all manner of vices, as therein neither TRAIAN, A DRIAN, nor any of his predecessours could compare with him: Wherefore the women of his time compared him with NUMA POMPILIUS, who was second King of Rome, and deferred to be called PIVS, for which they shew many reasons. Before that he was Emperour he had bin Questor, Pretor, and Consul, and had held some other charges and magistracies. In his time their was little warre, or at least little spoken of, and those troubles which were, he easily pacified by his Capitaines: and therefore the most that Historiographers write of him, is of his good conditions and bountie: and so will I; although it will not be so pleasing to the Reader as to discourse of warres; yet to follow the truth, and principally to shew the fruit which is to be gathered out of this historie, which are examples to liue well: as for the rest there will be sufficiently enough found in the proecess of this booke, and that is not a little which is already written.

ANTONINVS, as soone as he began to rule, he presently made shew of his natural goodnesse: for he removed not any of those from their offices and charges, which he found placed and established by A DRIAN; but rather confirmed them therein: and euer held it best, to suffer those which produced good Gouernours to continue long in their charges and gouernments. He commanded also his rents and seruices (besides that they should be moderated) to be fauorably and temperately collected. He presently did so many fauours, and gaue so many gifts of his owne goods which he had before, that his wife ANIA FAVSTINA daughter to ANIVS VERVS reprooued him for it: to whom he made answer that she knew not what she said, and therefore he did let her know, that at what time he attained the Empire, he had lost all that which before he enjoyed liuing priuate. In matters of equitie and gouernment, he was as vigilant, and took as good order as A DRIAN did. He resolved neuer to depart from Rome during his raigne, except it were to recreate himselfe, and sometime to hunt, being herein contrary in opinion to his Predecessor A DRIAN: for he said that the Court and people, which travelled with the Emperour, were troublesome and preiudiciall to the Countreies and Cities by which they passed: and that in visiting some parts, he was far from others; and therefore the most fit and conuenient place for the Emperour to stay and make his abode in, was in Rome,

Rome, which was the Lady and head of the Empire, and in the midst thereof, and most fit to receiue Ambassadors and messages from all parts. So as following this counsell (which indeed prooued not ill) the Warres and Insurrections which happened, he suppressed and pacified by his Capitaines; as the Brittaines, which rebelling in part of that Iland, the Rebels were defeated by his Capitaines, and the Iland brought to subiection.

And within a little afterwards, the like happened in the Country of Dacia, and also in Germania, which tooke Arms; but through the victory of his Legions, peace was established: whereby he wanne so great reputation, that during the rest of his raigne, there hapned no dangerous warre, and all men feared and honoured him for his goodnesse; and therewith he was so much beloued, as he was held and esteemed, for Father, Lord and Emperour. The barbarous Nations which were vnknewne to the Romanes, did so much loue and esteeme him, as in contentions and matters in controuersie which fell out betweene them, they chose him for their Iudge and Arbitrator; submitting themselves to his censure. And so those of Sircania, (which is a Province of Asia, neere to the Caspian Sea) and the Bactrians which are more to the Eastwards, and both very faire and remote; and also the East Indians sent to him their Ambassadors, offering amity and obedience. And from other Countreies which were exceeding far, there came some Kings to doe him honour: among which, they make mention of STANGORVS from India, and of King PHARASMANES, and others. And in other Countreies, he settled Kings at his pleasure: whereto the Inhabitants did consent, notwithstanding that they were not subiect to the Empire. And the King of Parthia resolving to make warre, being with a great power entered into Armenia, one Letter from the Emperour sufficed to make him retire and to discharge his Armes.

ANTONINVS being in this manner beloued and feared by Strangers, was no lesse esteemed and beloued by his Subiects and Vassals, but rather without comparison farre more; as by those which knew and enjoyed his goodnesse and equity: and seeing that he was such, he was by the whole Senate intituled, Father of his Countreie, which he much refused, but yet in the end hee accepted thereof, with great courtserie and humility: for hee was naturally milde, and Noble of condition; and therewith so courtuous, as he entertained the Senators and principall men gently and lovingly, with great honour and courtserie; and neuer did any thing of importance, without their counsell and consent, and towards all men generally he sought to moderate the state and maiesty of an Emperour, shewing himselfe affable and pleasant. And about all, he tooke order that no man should make benefit of his fauour to another; neither take bribes from such as were Suters vnto him: for he gaue audience and answer to all men himselfe in person, and in this he knew the quality and difference betweene men, vsing herein sometime the opinion of others when need required. Whereto, besides the ordinary counsell of the Senate, and his owne skill and knowledge in the lawes, he had alwaies some excellent Lawyers neere vnto him, as VELIANVS, MARCELLVS, IABOLENVS and others: By which meanes and such others as shall be declared, the Prouinces and Cities in his time flourished and grew rich, which he relieved with his owne rents towards the buildings thereof, as well such as were necessary as others, to beautifie and adorne the same. And when any misfortune or calamity hapned, he repaired and reedified it with money out of his Exchequer; as a great fire which hapned in Rome, wherewith were burnt three hundred and forty principall houses, and a great part of the Citie of Narbone in France, and the Citie of Antioch in Asia, with the Market-place in the Citie of Carthage. In time of great famine which was in Rome, hee provided for their vnants, and maintained the people with bread and wine, the most of the time that the famine lasted, making Victuals to be brought from all parts, paying for the same at his proper cost: so as generally through the whole Empire, all men were well content with him; for he maintained them in peace, quietnesse and equity.

And doubtlesse in this place there is to be obserued (as touching the power and gouernment of humane things,) how great and potent the Romane Empire then was; and how contentedly, and at what liberty the Subiect liued in the time of ANTONINVS, TRAIAN, A DRIAN, and other good Emperours; and to see the greatnesse and riches of that Court frequented by the worthiest and best men in the world: and to obserue the greatest buildings & wealth of that most populous Citie of Rome, beautified with the goodliest Statues and Pictures that euer Eye had seene; so as at this day her ruines are more esteemed then all the fairely buildings in the world; and to consider the liberty and security wherin men might trauaile through the world, no man being tyed to obey more then one Lord and King, and he good and iust,

Ambassadors and persons from all countries come to see Antoninus

Great harme done by fire in seuerall places.

A wonderfull obedience, and mournefull peace.

without feare of warres, thecues by Sea or Land, vvithout finding euetv where new Lawes, new Lords, Kings and Tyrants, needing no security or safe Conducts, vvithout being taken prisoners, and made Capitives, or ill vied by enemies, strangers and vnknowne perfons, but vving all men as friends and neighbours in the greatest and best parts of the World, which as a little Kingdome was quietly and iustly gouerned. One Countrey vvvas furnished from another, vvith such things as in the one did abound, and the other wanted; Merchandize and Trafficke passing through the World vvithout so many Impositions, molestations and troubles, as we see now adayes, all liuing then vnder one lawe, being in the best and most habitable parts of the Earth in vnion and peace: vvich they more perfectly enjoyed, after that the Emperours were Christians, as hereafter shall be declared. But as this was but humane power, so could it not continue long vvithout alteration and change: for such is the condition of this world; nothing can continue long in one estate.

But returning to our ANTONINVS, among his other vertues vvhervvith he made the time of his raigne happie and pleasing, one was his clemencie, vvhervvith he greatly moderated the rigor of the lawes, punishing offences vvith pitie, or pardoning them, euer desiring and procuring peace: So as to such as sometimes discoursed vvith him of the valour of IVLIVS CÆSAR and HANNIBALL, he did commonly answer vvith that saying of SCIPPIO, that he more desired the preservation of one friends or subiects life, then the death of an hundred enemies. This Emperour ANTONINVS was a great friend to Learning, and much honoured learned men, giuing them great rewards and pensions, drawing them from all the parts of the world; among vvich he caused to come from Chalcide a great Philosopher vvich was a Stoick, vvhole name was APOLLONIVS, vvhom he sent for to be Maister to his adopted sonne MARCVS ANTONINVS, vvho afterwards was Emperour. This Philosopher being come to Rome, ANTONINVS sent for him to come to see him, seeing that he staid long ere he did it of himselfe: vvhereto the Philosopher made answer, that vvith greater reason the scholler ought to come to the maister, then the maister to the scholler. This arrogance did nothing offend ANTONINVS: but laughing thereat, he said to those vvich vvith him, that he marvelled that APOLLONIVS should deeme it a shorter way from Chalcide to Rome, then from his lodging in Rome to his Palace. This Emperour, among the vvaightie affaires and matters of importance, forgot not to please and recreate the people; but (as the custome then was in Rome) at certaine times caused feasts and solemne sports to be made. In conclusion, he was an excellent Prince; and left nothing vndone, that was behouefull for the good gouernment of the Empire: and hauing ruled the same 23. yeeres, being aboue threescore and ten yeeres old, he was taken vvith a burning feauer, vvhereof vvithin three dayes he died in peace and rest; first recommending the Empire to MARCVS ANTONINVS, vvho was his sonne in law, and married to his daughter FAVSTINA, and is commonly called MARCVS AVRELIVS, commaunding that the image of FORTVNA vvich the Emperours did vse to haue in their chambers, should be carried to ANTONINVS chamber, vvich hapned in the yeere of our Lord 163. Some time before he dyed, being a man of great stature, and by reason of his age vvnable to goe vvright, but stooping, he vvore vvpon his breast certaine thinne boords, vvherevvpon he made fast his clothes vvith such art, that it couered the defect of nature. His death vvvas generally lamented, and the Romanes did him great honour, and made sacrifices vvnto him, canonizing him for a god, and builded a Temple also vvnto him, as they did to the vanities of their other superstitious gods.

THE

THE LIFE OF MARCVS AVRELIVS. ONLY OF THAT NAME, ALTHOVGH

SECOND OF THE ANTONINES, CALLED THE Philosopher, and of LVCIVS COMMODOVS VERVS, ANTONINVS his companion, and seuenteenth Emperour of Rome.

THE ARGVMENT.

Marcus Aurelius being adopted by Antoninus Pius, succeeded in the Empire, and was endued vvith so much bountie and vertue, as he was vvorthily called the Philosopher: and considering the many calamities vvich in his time oppressed the Romane commonwealth, there needed a man no lesse good and vertuous. In his time vvere most dangerous warres, vvary great earthquakes, inundations of Riuers, pestilence, and most extreme famine, all vvich he, through his singular vvisdomme, remedied. He made the Christians to be persecuted, vvherety the Church endured much. He vvvas vvunhappy in his vvife, and in vvife children; and notwithstanding that shee vvvas dishonest, yet he vvould not put her away, accounting to haue had the Empire for her dowry. This good Emperour dyed in the warres against the Germans, taken vvith a most grievous infirmities, vvhen hee had reigned 18. yeeres. His death vvvas deplored through the vvhole Romane Empire, vvhere hee had euer serued himselfe a good Prince, and loving father.

W hen as the Emperour ANTONINVS PIVS was dead, MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS VERVS, vvithout any contradiction succeeded him, vvho vvvas called the Philosopher, vvhom (as we haue said) ANTONINVS PIVS had adopted for his sonne in the time of the Emperour ADRIAN, and afterwards married him to his daughter FAVSTINA. This man vvhen as he vvvas confirmed in the Empire, and began to gouerne, rook for his companion and equall, LVCIVS VERVS COMMODOVS ANTONINVS: vvho vvith together vvith him, vvvas adopted, by ANTONINVS, by the cõmandement of the Emperour ADRIAN, being the sonne of LVCIVS CÆRONIVS COMMODOVS, vvhom ADRIAN had first adopted, but died before him. These two vvvere the first that euer ruled in Rome vvith together vvith equall power. This excellent Emperour MARCVS ANTONINVS vvvas also called AVRELIVS ANTONINVS. I vvould that the Reader should vvnderstand, that this confusion and varietie of names is caused by reason of the adoptions vvich then vvvere made: for the Romanes did vse to haue three names, a forename, a name, and a surname. And to declare it more plainly, vvhen any one vvvas adopted for a sonne, he receiued the name and surname, and sometime changed all the three names. Sometime they held one, and changed the rest, to continue the memorie of both fathers: and from hence grew so many names, vvich obscure the historie, and oftentimes deceive the Reader. To be eased of this trouble, I vvill call this excellent Emperour, MARCVS AVRELIVS; and his brother and companion, LVCIVS VERVS, giuing to them both sometime the surname of ANTONINVS.

Marcus Aurelius called the Philosopher.

Lucius Commodus called by Marcus Aurelius for his companion in the Empire.

Adoption in vvhat manner.

The origin of Marcus Aure-lius.

MARCUS AVRELIVS was the naturall and true sonne of ELIVS VERVS, who died Pretor. And his Grandfathers name was ELIVS VERVS, who had been twice Consul and Prefect in Rome, and was enobled and made Patrician by the Emperour VERASPASIAN, as IULIVS CAESAROLINVS relateth. His mothers name was DOMITIA CAMILLA and was the daughter of CALPURNIVS TVLLVS, who had been twice Consul. By his fathers side he was of so ancient a linage, as it was reported that he was descended from NUMA POMILIIVS the second King of the Romanes. This Emperour was indued with so many vertues, good qualities, and rare parts, as there will not any be found that hath excelled him, and hardly any to be compared vnto him. In his time there were such dangerous warres, and so many calamities, as there was great neede of his vertue, wisdom and valour, to resist so many perils, and to prevent so may ill fortunes. He was so addicted to the studie of Philosophie, and all Arts and Sciences, as he was surnamed the Philosopher, and he did honour and greatly enrich wife and learned men. His chief matters in Philosophie amongst others, were APOLOINVS CHALCIDONENSIS; in the Greek tongue, SEXTVS CHERONENSIS, nephew to PLYTARCH; and in Rhetoricke, FRONTO an excellent Orator in that time, by whose instructions he greatly profited. And beginning to gouerne in companie of his adopted brother LVCIVS ANTONINVS, as he did in all things farre excell him, so (in a manner) he had the administration of all matters: for which cause, of him chiefest mention is made; as also for that he liued longer, and remained alone in the Empire; gouerning them with the good liking and contentment of the whole Senate and people of Rome, for the great experience they had of his vertue and bountie. In the beginning of his raigne, there happened so great an inundation and ouerflowing of the riuer Tiber, as it ouerthrew many buildings in Rome, and drowned many people, with a great number of cattell; and spoiling the fields caused an extreame dearth and famine. Which, MARCVS AVRELIVS through his great liberality, with the consent of his brother LVCIVS VERVS, sufficiently repaired, relieuing and victualling the Citie at their owne proper cost and charges, making prouision of coine to be brought from all parts.

The ouerflowing of Tiber.

Warre with the Parthians.

After this, in the third yeere of his raigne, followed the dangerous warre against the Parthians (a nation which the Romans euer feared) which warre was raised by their king Vologesvs; who, leuying an exceeding huge Armie, came against the ordinary legions in Syria, where ATIODIVS CORNELIANVS was Captaine, and gouerned that countrey for the Empire; who hauing no sufficient Armie to make head against the Parthians, was driuen to retire, and Vologesvs took some Prouinces. At that time also rebelled a certaine people in the Ile of Britanny, and in Germany in like manner: and northern people called Catti, invaded the borders of the Empire, against all which MARCVS AVRELIVS made speedie prouision. Into Britanny was sent CALPURNIVS AGRICOLA with new supplies; who ioyning with the ordinary legions of that Iland, pacified those troubles. Against the Catti, was sent AVVIDIVS VICTORINVS for Generall. To the warre against the Parthians, because it was important and more dangerous, it seemed requisite to the Emperors and to the Senate, that one of them two should goe; and it was concluded that LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS should vndertake the charge, because that MARCVS AVRELIVS could not be spared: for his presence was very needfull in Rome for the generall government, and to prouide for all occurrences. And so LVCIVS VERVS with great prouision, and a great Court, departed, whom MARCVS AVRELIVS accompanied to the Citie of Capua: but LVCIVS fell sick by the way (as some write) through his disorders, riot, & surfeiting; by reason whereof and his long lingering, the Roman legions were put to the worse, and were ouerthrowne by the Parthians, and their Generall slaine in a battaile which was fought betwene them. But LVCIVS VERVS being arriued with his great Armie, the warre was managed with apparant aduantage to the Romanes; not by the endeuour of LVCIVS VERVS, but of his Captaines ESTACIVS PRISCVS, AVVIDIVS CASSIVS, and MARCVS VERVS, valiant commanders; he giuing himselfe to his pleasures and pastimes, in Summer, in the Citie of Antioch; and in winter, in Laodicea, for foure yeeres space, that these warres continued: wherein passed many great conflicts, skirmishes and battailes betwene the said Captaines, and the King and Nation of the Parthians. But succeeding prosperously with the Romanes, they obtained many victories in diuers parts: so as recouering what was lost in Syria, they did the like in Armenia, and entered the prouince of Media: finally, being masters of the field, they came with their Ensignes displayed, euen to the Citie of Babylon. While as these things were in action, the Emperour MAR-

CVS

Lucius Verus against the Parthians.

CVS AVRELIVS continued in Rome, applying himself with great care to the good government, providing all things necessary for the warres, with great wisdom and foresight; dissembling and with patience enduring the vices and neglect of his Companion LVCIVS VERVS, to whom at that time he sent his daughter LVCILLA to be married vnto him in Syria, where he then was; which he did, the better to confirm the friendship and brotherhood betwixt them. And, during the time of these warres with the Parthians, EVSEBIVS and PAVLVS OKOSIVS write, that the Christians were persecuted by the commandment of the Emperour, chiefly in Asia where LVCIVS VERVS was: which was the fourth persecution the Church endured. Wherefore (as it is to be supposed) God sent a generall pestilence, and other calamities, which afterwards ensued.

The fourth persecution of the
primitive church

Hauing obtained so many victories against the Parthians, LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS resolved to come to Rome; leaving that Countrey quiet and in subiection: and, setting the affairs of Asia in good order, he diuided the Kingdoms among those which to him seemed to haue most right, leaving them as subjects and vassals to the Empire; and in other Prouinces and Countreies hee made the Officers of his House and Court, Gouerners; which were called Comites or Earles: from whence the title and dignity of Earles now-a-days might haue the Originall. Being come into Italy, with the new surname of PARTHICVS, for the victory attained against the Parthians, which was also giuen to MARCVS AVRELIVS, with the triumph, they both together triumphed with great solemnity: and so this enterprife was happily achieved and ended. And although this coming of LVCIVS VERVS from the East was very joyfull, by reason of the many victories obtained by his Armies, yet was it otherwise the cause of much sorrow and heavinesse: for, when he came out of Syria, the plague was very sore there, and he dispersed the same into sundry places by the way as hee came; so as many of his Souldiers, and of his Court and Company, died thereof: and, doing the like in Italy and Rome, he infected the whole Countrey; in such sort, that it was the greatest and most furious pestilence that euer was seen vntill that day. For remedy whereof, MARCVS AVRELIVS vied all care and diligence possible, as well in preferring those which were infected, and avoiding further infection, as in curing the liuing, and burying the dead; to his great cost and hazard of his life. This calamitie being past, before it, and whilst it continued, he omitted no time nor care that was necessary for the government and good of the common-wealth; hearing and dispatching all causes in generall; seeing in person what was done in the Senate; without whose opinion (and of the principall and wisest men) hee did nothing: for, hee vied to say, that there was greater reason he should follow the counsell of so many and so good friends, than that so many and so wise men should do after his will alone. At the meetings wherein Magistrates were chosen, he was euer present; and in all things caused the ancient order and liberty to be obserued. In Courts and Iudgements he encreased the number of the Iudges and the iudiciall daies. Hee also increased the alms and rewards of his Palace; and, in a time of famine and want of corn, he spent an infinite treasure, providing for many Cities a sufficient quantity of grain. And in Spain (being more fruitfull than the rest) where his Predecessors had too much gleaned, he mitigated great part of the tributes, releasing many taxes and seruices.

Marcus Aure-lius released many cities with corn in time of starving.

And herein hee was so temperate and pitifull towards his subjects, that whatsoever briberies and extortions were committed by his Collectors and Receiuers, hee most severely punished: yet in all other crimes and offenses hee euer vied great clemency, and euer inflicted lesse punishment than the lawes commanded. This Emperour not onely tasted of aduersities (as wee haue said), as famine and pestilence, with inundations and earthquakes; but within his owne house he endured a greater plague with his wife FAVSTINA, who was (as all Writers affirm) dishonest and wonderfull dissolute; which hee sought by all means possible to reclaim, although not by such rigorous punishment as she deserved. And, being by some persuaded to put her away, and to diuorce himself from her, seeing that he would not put her to death; he remembering, she was ANTONINVS PIVS his daughter, who had left him the Empire, they write that he answered them in this manner:

Faustina, Marcus Aurelius wife, dishonest and dissolute

If we put away FAVSTINA, we are also bound to leaue the Empire; which was the dowrie we had with her at our mariage.

There ensued so many calamities after that LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS came from the East, as well by means of the generall and cruell pestilence, as by earthquakes, famine, inundations, and caterpillers, not onely in Italy, but in other Prouinces of the Empire; as that all Writers affirm, that if it had not hapned that MARCVS AVRELIVS had been so diligent, so wife,

M 4

wife, and worthy an Emperour as he was, the Romane Empire had been ruined and rent in sunder, and barbarous Nations had subdued the greatest part thereof. For taking occasion of that which is aforesaid, seeing the Countries wasted and unpeopled, many northern Nations conspired against it, as the Sarmates, Vandales, Marcomans, Sueuians, and in a manner all Germany, who fell upon the Provinces of Pannonia, which were Austria, Hungary and other countries, threatening Italy and France. Whereunto the Emperour MARCVS AVRELIVS desirous to yeeld redresse, thought it not sufficient to send thither his companion, and much lesse, durst he leaue him in Rome, he was so rechelesse and vicious, and therefore resolved that they would both go together: Which putting in execution, with all prouision necessarie, it happened vpon the way, LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS was taken with an Apoplexie, whereby he died suddainly, hauing reigned about nine or ten yeeres in company with his brother. And so MARCVS AVRELIVS remained alone in the Empire, who only was worthy thereof, prosecuting his journey with his Armie, and began the warre with great courage and iudgement: in which, the infection did greater harme to his Armie, then the force of his enemies; although it passed not without many battailes and encounters. And so with great difficulty by reason of the pestilence, he maintained this warre three yeeres: and wanting money to pay his souldiers (for the Provinces, by reason of the miseries past, could not pay their taxes) he was constrained to sell all his iewels, vessels of gold and siluer, the furniture of his chamber, and his owne proper possessions, therewith to pay his Armie, which was greatly diminished of the chief commanders and valiantest men which died of the plague, whereby it receiued much more harme then by the enemy: Wherefore he was often counselled to leaue the wars and to returne. But he, willing rather to die then to lose any iot of his honour, continued it with a very great resolution, vntill that (after many great perils and extremities, which were such that Historiographers describe this warre to be as dangerous as the warres of Hannibal) he obtained the victorie, which he thoroughly accomplished in a great battaile. Wherein (as was thought) through the prayers of the Christians which were in his Armie, vnto which he recommended himselfe, God shewed a most euident miracle: which was, That he and his people being ready to perish through want of water (the passages being on euery side stoppt by his enemies) there fell such abundance of raine from heauen, that his Armie was sufficiently relieved with drinke: and therewith there fell such lightning and so cruell a tempest amongst his enemies, that he then setting vpon them ouerthrew and slew a great number; as EVSEBIVS and IULIVS CAPITOLINVS report. And this being past, he recovered the Pannonies, and the rest which they had vsurped, and had done much more, but that at that instant AVIDIVS CASSIVS, before named, who was Captaine and Gouverneur in the East, rose against MARCVS AVRELIVS, proclaiming himselfe Emperour, taking occasion for that he was so much troubled in so doubtful a warre: Wherefore the Emperour was constrained to leaue the best order hee could, concerning Germany, and to returne into Italy, from thence to take his way towards AVIDIVS CASSIVS; whereupon he came to Rome, and he entered in triumph for the Germans, and ioyntly with him his sonne COMMODVS, whom he had made CÆSAR, and nominated for his successor.

The triumph being ended, and leauing in Rome such order for the gouernment as was most expedient, with part of his victorious Armie which he brought with him out of Germany, and with other forces which he had newly leuiued, he departed towards the East, against AVIDIVS CASSIVS; where being arriued, the matter went so well of his side, as before that hee came to any conflict or battaile, the same Legions which AVIDIVS CASSIVS commanded, rebelled against him, and slew him, without the commandement or knowledge of MARCVS AVRELIVS: For, he was rather displeased therewith then otherwise; so milde and noble he was. And his head being brought vnto him, he commanded it to be honorably buried, and therewith seemed to be very sorrowfull, saying, That they had bereaued him of all meanes to shew him mercie; and that he much desired to haue had him in his power alieue, to haue given him his life, and to haue reprooued him of his ingratitude. And those Cities which had conspired with him, he easily pardoned, and commanded that they should not be rigorously dealt withall. And of their goods, which the Senate had commanded to be confiscated, and put into his Exchequer, he would not receive any part; but commanded that they should be put into the publicke treasure of Rome. And being by one of the Councell reprooued, for shewing such clemency in a crime so notorious, telling him that he ought not to haue done so, and that AVIDIVS CASSIVS would not haue dealt so by him if he had been overcome, he answered

Northerly nations conspired against the Emperour.

The death of Lucius Verus.

A most manifest miracle.

A rebellion against Marcus Aurelius.

Marcus Aurelius pardons Cassius rebels.

swered with great constancy and assurance, that AVIDIVS had not so well serued the gods, nor liued in such sort, as to be able to haue ouerthrowne him.

BVLGACIVS GALLICANVS, who is an Author very antient, and liued in the time of the Emperour DIOCLESIAN, in the life which hee wrote of this AVIDIVS CASSIVS, reporteth, that the Emperour commanded to be given to his sonnes and daughters the one half of their fathers goods, and that there should not any injury or disgrace be done vnto them; and that they should be admitted to magistracies and dignities, if they were thereto chosen: and so to others which were guilty, he vied the like clemency and grace.

This rebellion being pacified, MARCVS AVRELIVS withdrew himself to the City of Antioch in Syria, now called Soria; whither came vnto him many Kings and Ambassadors from the East; where, treating of peace & amity, and concluding the same with them, he was greatly esteemed and beloued of all men. And, setting all matters of the East in good order, being now old and wearied, hee made his return into Italy; and by the way, his wife the Emperesse FAVSTINA died, whom he buried sumptuously and with great honour. Being come to Rome, hee entered in triumph for the victorie obtained against AVIDIVS; and returned to his accustomed goodnes; and vpright gouernment of the Empire, as he was wont to doo. When he thought he should now haue rested from his former toils, there began new alterations and insurrections in Germany: which he fearing (as was reason: for, that Nation had alwaies been feared & doubted) determined in person to go to that war, and did so with a very great power, and prosecuted the same for the space of three yeeres together; wherein were done many feats of Arms on either side, and he obtained some notable victories. But, being ready to haue fully concluded his conquests (they being as it were in his hand) hee was taken with a grievous pestilent Fever; which perceiving to be mortall, he commanded all the principall men which were with him to come before him: to whom he made a notable speech, which HERODIANVS reciteth: wherein hee recommended vnto them the Roman Common-wealth, and his onely son COMMODVS, whom he left for his Successor; and him hee charged very effectually to end that warre which he left in so good tearmes; concluding, that he should not suffer the enemy which was brought lowe, and well-nigh to confusion, to recover force and courage: And then, being no longer able to resist his sicknes, hee died, hauing reigned eighteen yeeres, in the year of our Lord (as EVSEBIVS reckoneth) one hundred, fourescore and two, being threescore and one year old. Yet SEXTVS AVRELIVS saith, two yeeres lesse.

His death was extremely lamented and bewailed through the whole Army, and afterwards in Rome, and generally through all the Provinces of the Empire: for, in them all hee was infinitely well beloued. MARCVS AVRELIVS had had another son, whose name was ANTONINVS OF VERISTIMVS, who died young; and one daughter named LVCILLA, who married with a great and mighty man called POMPEIANVS.

Faustina the Emperesse died.

The death of Marcus Aurelius, Anno Domini 181.

THE LIFE OF COMMODVS ANTONINVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND EIGHTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the good Marcus Aurelius, succeeded his wicked son Commodus: who, for that he was held to be the Son of so good Father, was without any difficulty iusted Emperour: and for that when his Father died he was in Germany, when he returned to Rome all the City made great joy. But, being come to the City, giving himselfe over to all the wickednes that man could imagine, hee behaued himselfe so, as some conspired against him, which escaping he took occasion to shew his cruelty. He was very assiduous of his bowes, and so expert in casting of darts, as he would openly kill wilde beasts in the Amphitheatre. Finally, his wife Mar-his, finding a book wherein were written the names of such as he had refused to put to death, and her owne name among the rest, she took order for his dispatch: and giving him poison, whilst he was committing it up again, she made him to bee stabbed. And so died that monster, to the great contentment of the whole Empire, which hee had wickedly governed thirteen years.

Commodus suspected to be a buffard.

THE good MARCVS AVRELIVS beeing dead, his Son COMMODVS was by the whole Armie obeyed and acknowledged for their Lord and Emperor; and so he was afterwards by the Senate and people of Rome, and likewise by all the Prouinces: for, no man would deny obedience to the Sonne of so good a Father. But hee proued so lewd and wicked, as he seemed not to be his sonne: and, considering the adultery of his mother FAVSTINA, hee was suspected to be the sonne of some base fellow. The ancient Authors which write of him (which are many) in a manner treat of nothing else but of his abominable vices and cruelties, which were so great, as it seemeth he exercised himself in no other thing, neither left any other memory behinde him. He came to the Empire being of the age of nineteen years, and was of a good constitution of body, of a very fair complexion, clear-eyed, and had a flaxen hair; all (in truth) ill bestowed vpon him, seeing that these gifts and such exquisite corporal beauty, hee imployed so filthily & dishonestly; being a Gamester, incontinent, negligent, slothfull, a glutton, a drunkard, and (about all) cruell.

Within some few daies after his Father was dead, hee came to the Camp where the Armie lay, accompanied with all the Roman Nobility; and made a good speech to the souldiers, promising a good hope of him, and matters clean contrary to that which followed; and hee gaue such donatives to the souldiers as the new Emperors were accustomed to giue.

At these good beginnings hee continued some few daies: which being expired, through the the counsell of some lewd persons, hee resolved to leaue the warres, and to return to Rome. And the aduice and counsell of POMPERIANVS, being his brother-in-law, a man of great authority, could no way perswade him to stay, neither other wise men and his loyall seruants; who were of opinion that he ought to stay, and to see an end of the war.

With this resolution he presently wrote to Rome, aduertising them of his coming; making such a truce or peace with his enemies, as was rather to their aduantage than his. HERODIANVS writes that he bought it with money: yet onely EVTROPIVS affirms, that he first won a great battell. He then, leaving Captains on the Frontiers of Germany, held on his way towards Rome; and in all the Cities through which he passed, was receiued with incredible joy and solemnity, for the great loue they bare to his father, and for the hope they conceived of him; not yet knowing his conditions. In Rome hee was receiued with exceeding great joy, triumph and blessings, generally of all men; they strewing the wayes with flowers where he went, making all the demonstrations of joy that were possible; hoping and assuring themselves that they should haue a good Prince, being the sonne of MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS, and nephew to ANTONINVS PIVS; who were good and excellent Emperors. But it was not long before he put them out of doubt, making frustrate their good hope: for, hee openly gaue himself to vice and incontinency, going by night with others of his condition (as there neuer want those which will imitate the prince, although in doing euilly to brothell houses, and publicke taverns; spending also whole daies and nights in banquetting, feasting, bathings and most abominable luxurie. And as wicked men neuer loue any, but such as are like themselves; so hee sent for Governours into the Prouinces, such as were his companions in his villanies: whereto he was so much addicted, and spent so much time in them, as he took no care for the government; leaving all to the disposition of a Favourite of his, whose name was PARENIVS (whom he afterward made Pretorian Prefect, which is, Captain of the Pretorian Cohorts) who was a most covetous, vicious, and cruell man; yet very expert in the wars. This man governing all things, the accursed Emperor COMMODVS increased so much in his vices and lewd life, as they write he kept three hundred Concubines, and as many boyes, for detestable vices: for which cause he his concubines.

Commodus

grew

grew to be so odious, that certaine eminent men conspired against him, resolving secretly to haue slaine him, his sister LVCILLA who was wife to POMPERIANVS being a partaker in the action: Whereby it may well be imagined what he was; seeing that his owne sister held him worthe of death.

All being concluded how it should be done, and the charge of the execution being giuen to one, whose name was QVINCIANVS (as HERODIANVS reporteth) yet LAMPRI- DIVS saith, that the charge was giuen to POMPERIANVS, that he should first strike him, and should haue beene seconded by the rest of the conspirators; It happened that this man, as he was very bold and hardy, sayled in the action: for hauing had sufficient oportunitie to haue slaine him, and being come neere, he would not so dispatch him, but in a brauing manner, being somewhat farre from him, he set his hand vpon his poiniard; and going towards him, said, here COMMODVS, the Senate hath sent thee this poiniard; and for any halfe that he could make to stab him, with greater haste he was prevented by some of the Emperors guard, and by them was taken; so as the conspiracie was presently discovered, and a great way laid open to COMMODVS his cruelties. For after that all such as were guiltie, had been executed, together with his own sister LVCILLA, and her husband POMPERIANVS, by the hand and direction of PERNIVS, many Senators and a great number of other Noble and prime men, were also put to death, and their goods seized vpon, by producing false witness, which were suborned to accuse them: Wherewith PERNIVS became so rich, as he practised, and was in hope to haue made himselfe Emperour. But COMMODVS being aduertised of these and other his treacheries, made him and a sonne of his to be slaine. After which he suffered himselfe to bee gouerned by another favorite, named CLEANDER, who was so wicked and extreme in cruelty, rapine, and bribery, that he surpassed PERNIVS. And this fellow did so excede, as the people of Rome vnable to endure him, took Arms, and in a tumult, went to a house of pleasure in Rome, where the Emperour was, and required to haue CLEANDER head; and notwithstanding that the Emperors guard began to make resistance, yet the matter came to such issue, that COMMODVS was constrained in despite of himselfe to deliuer him; and so were both he and his two sonnes slaine.

This tumult being pacified, which COMMODVS durst not punish, he was so incensed and therewith so fearefull, that from thenceforth he trusted no man: but as a Swine drawne out of the mire, so returned he to his abominable vices, taking care for no other thing. Within a while after, according to his accustomed manner, he suffered himselfe to be abused by another favorite, whose name was IVLIANVS, and another called RAELIVS, both which he afterwards caused to be put to death; with other his favorites which succeeded them; together with a multitude of great men, which LAMPRI- DIVS reciteth: and all things were so farre out of order, that magistracies and the gouernements of Prouinces were sold for money; and they which bought them were oftentimes slaine. Matters being thus managed by the Emperour, and by those which ruled him, he spent his time only in vices, and most dishonest and effeminate pleasures; colouring his hayre, and often bathing himselfe in company of others of his condition: whom he called by most dishonest names, to the end they should be conformable to their liues and actions. And he was not ashamed (notwithstanding these his vicious and abominable courses) to take the name and habit of a man who was a great enemy to those vices, which was HERCVLES: so as for COMMODVS ANTONINVS, sonneto MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS, he commanded himselfe to be called HERCVLES the sonne of IVPITER; and cladding himselfe in a most ridiculous manner with the skin of a Lion, and a club in his hand, like HERCVLES, he so vied to goe abroad, whereto some laughed, and others murmured. And sometimes he went clothed like an Amazon woman, which was more correspondent to his condition: which he did for the loue of one of his Concubines whom he much loued, whose name was MARYIA, whose picture he ware, drawne at life, vpon that habit. After this, as if he had as well deluded it as AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, he commanded the moneth of August should be called Commodus; and September Hercules, for he had taken that name: and December Amazonius, after the name of an Amazon: But this was observed no longer then he belived.

This accursed man, among his vicious parts, had a strange abilitie of body, which was, to cast or hurle a dart or a lance, better then any man of his time: he was a most certaine fhooter, eyther in crosse-bow, or long bow; and so skilfull, that (in certaine feasts and huntings, which according to the custome were then made in Rome, whither came an infinite number of people

Lucilla, Com-modus his eys sister, conspired against him.

Commodus
slew his favorite Pernivus and his sonne.

Cleander slain
by the people.

Commodus changed his name.

Commodus
attired like an Amazon.

to behold the same) he commanded a gallerie to be made round about the Amphitheater; within which he might runne freely and in safety, and there running round about with exceeding swiftnesse, hurling his darts or iaculins, he killed almost all the Stagges and Harts that were let loose, without missing one throw, or needing any more then one throw; he was so sure to strike them, eyther in the heart, in the forehead, or any other part wherfocuer he would: and he did the like by Lions, Panthers, and Ounces, which to that end, were brought thither that day. With his bowe and arrowes he would kill birds flying in the ayre, and did such other actiue exercises, as in truth were very strange: Whereby it appeareth that this man wanted not witte and abilitie to haue applied himselfe to goodnesse, as well as to sinne and wickednesse. And as crueltie was the thing wherein he did principally delight, so it pleased the most mercifull King of heauen, that the same was the cause of his death. For it happened, that having resolved to put a great number of the best reputed Citizens to death, he wrote a memoriall of those which he purposed should die, amongst which was his louing friend MARCIA, and AELIUS LERTVS Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts: it happened that this his beloued MARCIA vpon some occasion came to the sight of this note, who seeing her selfe condemned to death, determined with her selfe to assure her life by the death of COMMODYVS. And taking counsell with AELIUS LERTVS, and with another whose name was ALICTVS, who was also condemned, concerning the contents, they agreed amongst themselves to poyson him, which as speedily as might be, was given him by the same MARCIA in a cuppe of mingled wine which hee did vse to drinke: and being presently taken with a heauie slumber, MARCIA commanded all the company to goe forth of the chamber, vnder colour to suffer him to take his rest. This being done, within a little while after he awoke, extremely vomiting; and MARCIA and the rest fearing that he would again haue cast vp the poyson, in all haste called in a valiant yong man named NARCISVS, shewing him the note, and how the Emperor would haue put him to death also; and making him large promises, they concluded that he should goe in and kill him, which he did: and so this vnhappy and wretched COMMODYVS vomiting and strangely tormented with the poison, was by this NARCISVS flabd and flaine, to the good liking of the Roman people, and generally of all the world. When his death was knowne, there was no man but did commend and approue the fact. He died, being of the age of 32 yeeres, and in the yeere of our Lord 194. hauing reigned twelue yeeres and eight moneths. The ioy which afterwards was conceiued in Rome when his death was published, was incredible: and although that at the present it was not certainly knowne, but that he died sodainly of an Apoplexie, which EVTROPIVS affirmeth in his life. They ran vp and downe the streetes that night, crying and calling one to another with ioy, and went to the Temples to render thanks to the gods for so greata benefit: and others went to the Palace to behold his dead Carcasse. The Senate and Roman Nobilitie conceiued no lesse ioy then did the people, which may sufficiently appeare by the number of curfings which the Senate gaue him, when PERTINAX was chosen Emperor, and his successor: which MAXIMVS writeth, and AELIUS LAMPRIDIUS maketh relation thereof, which is a pleasing thing to reade.

The crueltie of Commodyus
was the cause of his death.

Commodyus
poysoned by his friend Marcia.

Commodyus
slaine by Narcissus.

An. Dom. 194.

By conceiued by the Romans for
the death of Commodyus.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS AELIVS PERTINAX, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND NINETEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

After Commodyus, Pertinax was Emperor: who being borne of base condition attained to the Imperiall dignitie, more by his vertues, then the Nobilitie of his blood, or the glory of his ancestors; being the sonne of a Libertine. He was first a Doctor of the Law, and afterwards leaving that profession, he gaue himself to Armes; wherein he behaued himselfe so excellently, as he deserved to be made Emperor; so which dignitie those which conspired against Commodyus advanced him; who went to him, he lying in his bed, expecting death.

death rather than the Empire. And notwithstanding that he carried himselfe excellently well in the government of the Empire, and neuer sought to be reuenged on those which had offended him, yet there failed not some which enuied his goodness, and desired his death; which was given him with many wounds, when he had reigned the space of three months; being of the age of sixty seven years: for whose vertues, the Senate resolved to place him in the number of their gods.

THE good and valiant PVBLIVS AELIVS PERTINAX succeeded the wicked and tyrannous Emperor COMMODYVS, being almost threescore and ten yeeres old; and held the same but three months. The manner how he attained herto, I will presently shew you, when we shall briefly haue declared the wars, the offices and troubles, which he first passed: for, they were such and so diuerse, as he was therefore called The wheel of Fortune. Truly this Emperor was a notable example of humane changes. He was the sonne of a Libertine, which had been a slave and made free, called AELIVS; and being a childe was taught to write and reade, and cast account; which his father did, to the end hee should help him in his poor Mercery-shop. Afterwards hee came to learne the Greeke and Latine Gammar; so as he came to be a Master, and to keep a school in Rome. After this he gaue himself to the study of the Lawes; and, by the intercession of LOLLIANVS AVITVS who had been Consul, and his fathers master, he obtained liberty to plead, and to defend mens causes; which hee did for some space. But, being naturally a man of strength and courage, and more inclined to Arms than Letters, he gaue ouer that exercise, and went to the wars; wherein he carried himself so well, as within few daies he was made Captain of a Cohort in Syria against the Parthians; and, increasing in credit or estimation, he was sent to the wars in Britanny, and afterwards to the warres of Misia, and was made a Captain of horsemen in the wars which MARCVS AVRELIVS waged against the Germans; and afterwards was Admirall of a Fleet in the Flemish Seas; and, that charge being ended, he continued in the warres of Dacia; where through finisier informations he was deprived of the charge hee held, by MARCVS AVRELIVS: although afterwards he returned into grace by the intercession of POMPEIANVS the Emperors sonne-in-law, and was made a Senator, but then he vsed it not: and, in recompense of the disgrace past, the Emperour made him Colonel of a Legion; so as in the warres which were in the time of MARCVS AVRELIVS he performed many notable feats of Arms, as well against strange and barbarous nations, as against AVIDIUS CASSIVS; who (as wece said) rebelled against MARCVS AVRELIVS. His valiant acts were so many and such, that hee was many times publickly praised by him, and made Consul of Rome. After that, hee had the government of both the Misia, and of Dacia; in all which charges he caied himself so valiantly, and with such equity, as the same Emperour honored him with the government of all Syria & Asia; which was the greatest charge the Emperours gaue. And, MARCVS AVRELIVS being dead, and the time of his office expired, he came to Rome, after that he had gouerned foure consulary Prouinces, and had himself bin Consul, besides other commands, gouernments, and charges of greater quality, with great renown and fame of bounty and valour. But, coming to Rome during the Raig of the wicked Emperor COMMODYVS, by the instigation of a certain fauourite of his, he was banisht from Rome. But, hee being dead, who was the cause of his banishment, COMMODYVS sent him into the Ile of Britanny, to reforme the abuses of an Army and certain Legions, which were there; whither he went, and setled all in good order; but he was first in great danger, and hardly escaped with his life: for, a Legion being in mutinie slue some of his people, and vsed him in such manner that hee was left for dead in the field among the dead: and, having escaped this danger, hee resolutely punished the offenders, and pacified the Legions. At his especial request there was one sent to succeed him, and hee was sent Proconsul into the Prouince of Africa: wherein he likewise passed many dangers in mutinies, in seditions of the people, and of the ordinary Legions; for, as long as COMMODYVS was Emperor, there was no such order in any place as was conuenient. And Writers affirm, that had it not bin for PERTINAX & such other Captains as liued after the death of his father M. AVRELIVS, the Roman Empire had bin ex-

Pertinax called the wheel of Fortune.

Pertinax deposed from his charge by Marcus Aurelius.

Pertinax made consul by Marcus Aurelius.

Pertinax banisht
from Rome
by Commodus.

Pertinax Pro-consul in Africa

Pertinax made Prefect of Rome by Commodus.

posed to great daunger. But hauing performed his charge in Africa with honour, although not without much trouble & difficultie, being now old and spent, he came to Rome, and Commodus made him Prefect thereof, being in this estate, death seized vpon Commodus by reason of his cruelties, Pertinax daily expecting when Commodus would haue bereaued him of life. This valiant man lying one night carelesly sleeping in his bed when Commodus was dead; Martia, his friend, which had plotted his death, and Aelius Laetius Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts, and those which conspired with them, agreed together to cause Pertinax to be chosen Emperour. And to this effect about midnight, before that the death of Commodus was published, the said Captaine Aelius Laetius with some of his souldiers of the Cohorts, came to the house of Pertinax, who (as I said) lay secure in his bed; and in great haste causing the dore to be opened, went vp into his chamber: whom when he saw, yea and before, when he but vnderstood that he was coming vp, he assured himselfe that by Commodus's his commandement he came to kill him, not knowing him to be dead: and resolving to suffer death with courage and patience, he lay still, without any shew to be moued thereat, but said vnto Aelius Laetius: I haue for manie daies expected to end my life in this manner, and I marueiled that Commodus hath deferred it so long: and seeing it is so, why stand you still? Make an end with me, and do that which you are commanded.

The speech made by Pertinax.

Where to Aelius Laetius answered, perswading him to put away all such feare, and not to thinke that he came to kill him, but to desire safetie of his owne life, for that the tyrannous Emperour Commodus was dead, and that they came to offer the Empire vnto him, who was onely worthe thereof. Pertinax could hardly belieue what he heard with his eares: but in the end the matter being declared vnto him more at large, and the occasion which induced them to kill the Emperour, he accepted of their offer; and was carried by them to the Cohorts Camp: where the souldiers being assembled, their Captaine made a speech vnto them, containing the wickednes and vices of the Emperour Commodus, and how that he by means of his exceffe was dead of an Apoplexy; and reciting the vertues and excellencies of Pertinax, counselled them to make him Emperour. Which they presently performed ioyfullie, and calling him Auoustus, swaere to him as the custome was; yet Pertinax remained still doubtfull, and accepted thereof with feare, and against his will.

This being ended, and the day coming on, they came with him into the citie: and assembling the Senate, this old new Emperour came thither, vnwilling they should beare before him the Imperiall Ensignes, neither the fire, as the custome was; vntill such time as the Senate had agreed and given their consent. But when as he came into the Senate house, all the Senators saluted him Emperour, Casars Auoustus, and with great acclamations and blessings swaere and yielded to him obedience: which he still wished, saying, that he deserved it not, alleging his old age, and nominating others, which he said were more worthe of that dignity. But in the end being overcome and forced by them, he sat downe in the Imperiall chaire, and made vnto them a solemne oration (which Herodianus writeth). His oration being ended, he went forth of the Senate house (accompanied with all the Senators and Roman Nobilitie, with an infinite number of others, to the exceeding ioy of all men) to the Temples, as the custome was, and from thence to the Imperiall Palace. And so he began his reigne, and obtained the Empire, to the generall good liking and contentment of all men, and was obeyed in like manner in all the prouinces of the Empire, in all which he was well knowne: and truly they had not beene deceiued in their opinion and great hope which they had of him, if the wickednes of the Pretorian Souldiers had not hindered his good thoughts and resolutions.

The first thing he attempted in the government of the Empire, was to bridle the licentiousnes of the Pretorian Cohorts, and the insolencies and wrongs which they did to the citizens and people of Rome, by means of the fauour and loose life of Commodus. The like he also performed in all other disorders and abuses, which in his time were tolerated; seeking to reduce all thingsto that forme and manner of government which was vsed in the time of his father Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. He entertained all men honourably and lovingly, which had any occasion to negotiate with him; and he diuided the fields of Rome, and of the prouinces which lay vntilled and waste, granting that for tenne yeeres space no rent or tribute should be paid for the same. With these and such other things, this excellent and gracious Emperour so wanne the hearts and loue of the common people, that all men held themselves haplie in such an Emperour: for which occasion, besides the honourable titles which were giuen him by the consent of the Senate, the same Senate intitled his son, Casars, and

Pertinax after many changes of fortune in made Emper-
our.

to his wife Licinia was added the name of Auoustus: the good Emperour said, That his wifes name he did accept, because her vertue was worthe thereof: But for his sones name, hee would that it should rest vntill that he had better deserved it. Perseuering in his good works, all the goods and moueables, which Commodus had echeated and taken, he made to be restored to their owners, for which they should pay some small matter in exchange.

The Senate
made Pertinax his sone Casar, and his wife Augusta.

Every day when the Senate did ordinarily sit, he went thither; and in his house he neuer refused to giue audience to any person at what time soeuer. When as the barbarous Nations and enemies to the Roman Empire had intelligence, and did certainly know that he was Emperour, they laid downe their Armes, and ceased to make warre against the Empire; and many sent Ambassadors vnto him (if they had found him liuing) to treat of peace and friendship: so as the small time he reigned, was to the generall good liking and contentment of all the world; excepting the men of warre, principally of the Pretorian Cohorts, which lay about Rome, who presently began to abhorre him for that he kept them in quietty, bridling them with iustice, not suffering them to commit such riots, abuses and outrages as they did in the time of Commodus; and in like manner he was not beloued by the officers and ministers of the Imperiall Palace, for the like reasons. The shamelesse audaciousnes of the souldiers grew to this height, that one day they would haue taken a Senator of a very Noble & ancient house, named Tiberius Materius, and haue carried him to the Camp to haue made him Emperour, to the end he should haue rebelled against Pertinax. But this Materius was (as a good and loyall seruant) escaping out of their hands, came to Pertinax, and therewithal from Rome: which put the Emperour in great feare and amazement. And to content and pacifie them; hee made donatiues and distributions amongst them. But this he so did, for they esteemed it not, but sought meanes to liue dissolutely at their libertie.

Pertinax hated
by the Pretorian Cohorts.

Triarius Materius, not to yield to the will of the souldiers, which would haue made him Em-perour, fled to Pertinax, and so from Rome.

Pertinax reigned about three moneths: in which small time he had set all things in so good order, as the state of the Empire seemed to be changed, and not the same. And although he were so good, yet was there one whose name was Fabius, which practised his death, with a conceite to haue been Emperour: which being discovered to him, he came to the Senate, and would not endure they should proceede against him as against a tyrant. And notwithstanding that the proofes were so plaine and manifest, as the offence was apparently yet he pardoned him: but iustice was done vpon certain souldiers which had practised this treason; which the souldiers took to ill (their hatred and presumption daily increasing) as they concluded to kill him; and being so resolved, they cared not to conspire, or to vie any cunning or deceit. But openly a great troupe of them went from their lodgings in a tumult with their Swordes drawn, and with Halberds and other weapons, and came into Rome; and without resistance (as the matter was suddaine) they entred the Palace.

The Emperour being aduertised hereof, sent Aelius Laetius to stay and pacifie them; who forgetting that he had made Pertinax Emperour, cared not to performe his commandement, but rather approving the fact, being (as some say) a partaker in the action, went forth another way to his owne lodging, at such time as the souldiers came into the Palace, where there was no meanes to make any resistance, being taken sodainly and disarmed. Wherefore the greatest part abandoned the Emperour and fled; and those which remained counseled him to flee, which he might easily haue done, and the people would haue defended him. But notwithstanding that he knew their counsell to be good and profitable, and that they spake the truth; yet would he not follow the same, alleging it to be unworthy the maiestie of an Emperour and his acts and life past, to saue his life by flight, or by hiding himselfe: and so he resolved to goe forth vnto them; conceiuing that with his presence they would be alhamed, and so returne. And truly this conceite was ready to haue taken effect: for, coming forth of his chamber, and meeting with a multitude of them in the Court, they made a stand, and gaue him place to speake vnto them; which he did with great courage, without any shew of alteration. First, asking them what might be the occasion of their coming in such a tumult, and without any respect? And afterward (without shew of any humilitie or fearfulness), but with as great grauitie and authoritie, as best fitted the dignity of his person he began to say to them;

The wickednesse of Aelius Laetius

The high minde of Pertinax being assailed by

Souldiers and companions, if you come to kill me; and doe put in execution what you haue determined, you shall performe no act that is valiant, great, or commendable; neither very grieuous vnto me, which am now so old, and haue gotten so much honour and fame, that I regard not my life: for euery mans life hath an end. But you to whom belongeth the guard and defence

Speeches vsed
by Pertinax to the souldiers.

defence of my Person, seeing your charge is to free and deliver the Emperour from perils and treason; and shall be the first to lay your hands vpon him; consider, that for the present, it will be shamefull and odious, and hereafter in time to come, dangerous, and prejudiciall: For I haue done you no displeasure nor iniurie. If the death of COMMODOVS offend you, it was no new matter to dye, seeing that he was a man: if you suspect that he was murdered, I am guiltlesse thereof; and you know that I am free from all suspicion in this case: yvbat then passed, you knew before me; if there be any suspicion of his death, it concerneth others, and not me: But I say this, and assure you, that by reason of his death, there shall nothing be taken from you that you shall require, or that shall seeme necessary for you; requiring such things as are honest and possible; and nor by force and violence.

Pertinax, hearing the ending his speech, some of them began to alter their mindes and to depart, moved thereto by his words and grauitie; but the furie of those which came behind them was so great, as they could not doe it nor defend him; so as one of them called TRYPHVS charged him; and wounded him in the breast with a Launce: and hee seeing their determination, couered his head, with his Robe, suffering himselfe to bee wounded by their all; and so they slew the poore and innocent Emperour. And EAIVS LAYVS, who had been one of the chiefe in making him Emperour, going about to help to defend him, was also slaine, hauing first with great courage and resolution slaine two souldiers: and so they also slew some others which were his chamberlaines and other officers. A sonne and a daughter of his escaped, for that they were not lodged in the palace.

This Prince in his gesture, shewed great grace and maiestie: his stature and constitution did well represent his state and dignitie. Hee wore his beard long, and his haire curled, his breitt was large and full of flesh, and he was indifferently eloquent, vsing smooth and louing speeches. This Accident was so sudden, that he was slaine before the people knew of any mutinie, or the coming of the souldiers: and the souldiers fearing the people, who they knew would take it grievously, returned with as much or greater haste than they came; and, fortifying their Camp, they set out sentinels, and held guards in the Bulwarks and Towers, fearing to be assaulted.

As soon as the death of the Emperour was knowne in the City, the sorrow and lamentation which was made for him was extreme; the people running vp and down the streets with incredible wrath and fury, seeking the murderers to be reuenged of his death. Thus they went vndoubtedly, without any certain knowledge of what passed, doing nothing but weep and complain one to another. But, when they vnderstood what hapned, they saw they neither could or durst proceed any further.

This Emperour died in the year of our Lord 195: some say lesse. Hee gouerned the Empire (according to EVSSEIVS) six months: IVLIVS CAPITONIVS in his life saith, 85 daies, and no more; with whom agrees SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR. All which write, that his Successor, IVLIANVS, was of counsell and accessary to his death.

The miserable death of Pertinax.

THE

THE LIFE OF DIDIVS IVLIANVS. ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND TWENTITH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

Didius Iulianus took the Empire, being a man proud, rich and ambitious; and, seeing that the Empire was set to sale by the souldiers which murdered Pertinax, was so presumptuous, as to go to buy it, with one other who would haue had the same for money; who was son-in-law to the murdered Emperour. But the souldiers doubting, that making Pertinax his son-in-law Emperour, he would reuenge his death, they agreed to sell it to Iulianus; who was confirmed contrary to the will of the Senate, and in worse manner accepted by the people. Nevertheless, at though he had obtained that dignity by his vertue, or that it came to him by inheritance, he gave himselfe to pleasures, respecting no mans enuie. But Septimius Seuerus, a man of much wisdom and great power, being Captain of the Legions in Germanie, hoping to be able to gette the Empire by force of Arms, came to Rome with his Army: of whom Iulianus standing in fear, would haue sent the Vestall virgins for Ambassadors vnto him. But the Senate, refusing to yeeld thereto, deprived him of the Empire, and proclaimed Septimius Seuerus Emperour: who sending to Iulianus (the palace being abandoned, and he retired to weep) caused him to be slaine, hauing been 7 months Emperour.

After the goodould PERTINAX, IVLIANVS succeeded in the Empire; hauing obtained the same for money from those souldiers which slue the Emperour PERTINAX. This IVLIANVS was native of Milan by his Fathers lineage, who was called PETRONIVS DIDIVS SEVERVS: his mothers name was CLARA EMILIA: his grandfathers name was SAEVIVS IVLIANVS, who had been Prefect of Rome, and twice Consul; which did enoble his house. This IVLIANVS was brought vp in the house and seruice of DOMICIA LVCILLA, mother to MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS the Philosopher; by whose fauour he attained to offices, and was made

The line of Didius Iulianus.

Questor, Edil and Pretor, in Rome. Afterwards hee followed the warres, and proued a good Captain, performing many notable exploits, which in the time of MARCVS AVRELIVS were in Germany and other parts. Hee was in the beginning Captain of a Legion, and afterwards with an Army he had the charge and gouernment of Dalmatia, and then of lowe Germany; and, after that, he was made Gouernor of Bithynia in Asia, although in this gouernment hee did not bear himself with so good fame as in the rest. Hee was jointly Consul with PERTINAX, and afterwards Proconsul in Africa; and, hauing executed these charges and offices, was now growne old, and very rich by means of his possessions and money which hee had in Rome.

When PERTINAX was dead, hee obtained the Empire in such manner as was shamefull, and vnbecfitting the greatnes of Rome. For, after that the souldiers had murdered the Emperour PERTINAX (as is said) they fortified their camp and lodgings for fear of the people: and the people durst not assail them, for that they were too strongly defended with great bulwarks and turrets. The Senatours and Nobility knew not what to doo in this so cruell an Accident; but retired themselves to their houses, wherein they fortified themselves; and many of them went to their Castles and Possessions in the Country, holding themselves not very safe in Rome:

and so they passed that day, and the next after PERTINAX death.

The Pretorian Souldiers (as writeth HERODIANVS) seeing no man durst attempt to offend them, became yet more audacious: for, some of them, standing vpon the Ramparts of their Camp, cried out with loud exclamations, that they would giue the Empire to whosoever would buy the same, and pay best for it. This sale was presently published in the City, and this Proclamation was so odious and full of scandall and reproach, and also there were so few rich men left in Rome by reason of COMMODVS his cruelty and tyranny, that there were but two merchants to be found to buy the Empire that was to be sold. The one was SVLPITIANVS at that time Prefect of Rome, a man who had been Consul, and was sonne-in-law to the late Emperor PERTINAX; and the other was DIDIVS IVLIANVS, of whom we now speak. Truly, it is a matter worthy of great consideration, and a notable example for Princes: whereby it plainly appears, how little constancy there is in their greatnes, and generally in all things in this life; and how little they ought to esteem the power, the kingdoms and dominions of this world, and all those other things called goods which are gotten in this world. For, considering that a Roman Emperor, being a wife old man, redoubred, beloued, and knowne to be good and valiant by long experience, who (as we may say) was Lord of all the world (for, hee peaceably governed (in a manner) all that which the Kings in Christendome hold in Europe, and the Infidels in Africa, and as much as the great Turk possesseth in Asia, Gracia, and Egypt, and many other Princes and Lords besides) only three hundred, or fewe more souldiers, sufficed to bereaue him of his life & dominion; being in Rome it self, which was the head & strength of all the Empire; and that they should escape free without any punishment, no man then seeking any reuenge of his death.

Who would regard or greatly esteem the riches and dominions of this world, or account the dignities, estates, and riches thereof to be great, and lose his owne life, and pawne his soule to get them; seeing that a Throne, and so great a power and majesty as was the Roman Empire, was set to sale at an Ouncery; and there were but onely two that came to buy it, and it was sold for a little money? Truly, in my judgement, it was handled as it deserved.

And this may suffice for a warning and example to vs, that there is nothing in this world that is ought-worthy, and to bee held of price; nor ought to bee gotten and held with the danger of the soule: and therefore men ought lightly to regard the losing or winning of the goods of this world, so as they may encrease the riches of the soule, and liue virtuously as Christians ought to doo. He that can attaine heerto, is rich and mighty: and all the rest without this are miserable, beggerly and vnhappy, although they command and raig oner the whole world.

To return to our History: HERODIANVS writeth, that the same of the souldiers proclamation cam to the house of DIDIVS IVLIANVS, being held the richest man in Rome: who with his wife and daughter sitting at dinner, very merry and pleasant in the midst of his fauourites and pleasant company, was by them all counsell'd, that, seeing hee had more money than any other man in Rome, he should not let slip so good a bargain, and so precious a sell as was the Roman Empire; but that he should go to the Camp to conferre with the souldiers, and to procure himselfe to be chosen and sworn Emperor: Who, presently arising from the table, went thither accompanied with his friends and seruants. ELIVS SPACIANVS (who wrote his life) saith, that the first which perswaded him heerto, were PVBLIVS FLORIANVS, and VECTIVS APERR, Tribunes. But, whosoever were his counsellers, they all agree, that when he came thither he found SVLPITIANVS the Prefect of Rome there before him, soliciting the souldiers to make him Emperor; promising them a great sum of money, with other fauours and rewards: And the reason why his offers were not accepted, was, for that he was sonne-in-law to PERTINAX whom they had slain; and therefore they suspected him. Whereof, DIDIVS IVLIANVS put them also in minde, willing them to take heed that they made not choice of one who another day would reuenge the death of PERTINAX: Hee promising to giue them an infinite summe of money which he had in readinesse, and that hee would restore all things to that order and form wherein COMMODVS had left the same, and would presently bring them a great summe of money to be diuided among them. His offer at last was accepted by the souldiers, and hee with laddys was receiued into the Fort, wherethey sware obedience vnto him: and, there hauing done certain ordinary ceremonies and sacrifices, hee went into the City, accompanied with the Pretorian Cohorts in Arms; ranged in so good order, as if they had been going to a battell: for, they were in great fear of the people. And so IVLIANVS entred the City, all the souldiers proclaiming his name, and calling him Empe-

Didius Iulianus
made Emperor came into Rome.

ror:

ror: the citizens durst not make any resistance, neither did they approue his election, as they vnto do by other Emperors, but cursed him and threw stones at him.

IVLIANVS then went to the Senate: where assembling such Senators as were present, by their decree he was proclaimed Emperor, and they presently made his sonne-in-law CORNELIVS REPENTINVS Prefect of Rome, putting SVLPITIANVS out of that office: and from thence he was carried to the Imperiall Palace, and held for Emperor, more through force, then the good will of any honest men. And he as though that the Empire had descended to him by inheritance from his father, and that he had peaceably obtained the same with the good will of all men, gaue himselfe to riot and pleasures, shewing himselfe negligent and rechelesse in matters of government. And notwithstanding that he was milde and affable, and did no harme to any man in all the time of his raigne; yet he presently began to be hated of the souldiers, for that he did not performe that which he had promised. The people of Rome hated him, because he was chosen and made Emperor by those which murdered PERTINAX whom all the world loued; and they were of opinion that he was guiltie and accessarie to his death. So as when-soeuer he went out of his Palace, the people openly powred out their curses against him; which he patiently endured, sometimes with laughter, beekening with his hand that they should come to him, making shew of loue and goodwill vnto them: yet it little auailed him, but rather increased their hatred, in such manner, as standing one day to behold certain games and sports, the people of Rome proclaimed PESCENIVS NIGER who was Proconsul, and Gouernour of Syria, which was the greatest charge and government of the Empire, calling to him that hee should come to their rescue and to procure their libertie, of all which insolencies, IVLIANVS made little reckoning. And it hapned that as loone as the Armies which were on the frontiers of Germany and in Syria, vnderstood how ill IVLIANVS was beloued in Rome, and how carelesly he gouerned, each of these Armies presumed to make their Generall, Emperour. In Syria PESCENIVS NIGER was Gouernour, who was a man of good yeeres, and had held great commands and governments, and had done very many notable feates of Arms: it was reported of him, that he was milde and wise, and seemed to imitate the life and government of the Emperor PERTINAX. This man knowing the goodwill which was borne him in Rome, and that his Armie and souldiers loued him, determined to proclaime himselfe Emperor, and presently took the ensignes thereof: and all those nations, Kings and Potentates of Asia, yeelding obedience, came or sent Ambassadors vnto him. The Army in Germany held for their Generall SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS, borne in Africa, a man of great courage and counsell, and aboue all, very double and subtile, and of great experience, who had had many governments, magistracies, and commands, and had been Consul in Rome, and Proconsul in the gouernments of Sicilia, Africa, and the Pannonies, and was also very well beloued of his souldiers, by whom he was importuned: and seeing the occasion and opportunitie, he resolved also to proclaime himselfe Emperour, taking vpon him the state and ensignes thereof: and publishing that he would reuenge the death of the Emperor PERTINAX, he made himselfe beloued of the men of warre in Germany, and of the Romane people: so as there were at one time three Emperours, or to say more properly, three tyrants. IVLIANVS (who was Emperour in Rome) notwithstanding that he knew what passed in Syria, when it first began, made no great account thereof, holding it sufficient to send to kill him: but knowing what SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS did in Germany, it troubled him very much; and he dealt with the Senate to proclaime him rebell, and that they should send certaine principall men Ambassadors to procure the Army to abandon SEVERVS, and to hold him for Emperour whom the Senate had approued, which was himselfe: and he sent VALERIUS CATVLINVS to further the businesse, and to succede SEVERVS in his government. But SEVERVS had taken so good order, that this did little profit him: for he had already obtained their obedience, and had assured vnto himselfe the loue of all that countrie and the marches thereof, resolving to march with his Army towards Rome, where he knew that IVLIANVS was not beloued. Now PESCENIVS NIGER who was called Emperour in Asia, was not so circumspect as he might haue bene: for, seeing himselfe seru'd by Kings, rich in gold and siluer, mightie in Armies and men of warre, confidently trusting in the loue of the people of Rome; he gaue himselfe to feasting and banqueting in Antioch.

When it was knowne in Rome that SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS came thitherwards, IVLIANVS awakened from his drowfie sleep, began to put himself in Arms, and applied himself wholly to make prouision for the warres; and, mustering his Troops, took the Fields with the Iulianus generally hated.

Pescennius Niger proclaimed Emperor in Syria.

Septimius Severus a valiant Captain of great experience, pretended title to the Empire.

Pretorian Army which had made him Emperor; which he found very feeble, as well for want of experience and exercise in Arms, as for that they were ill paid by him: and the people of Rome repaired also vnto him with a very ill will, for that he was made Emperor against their liking: and the Cities of Italy had a long time liued in quiet and peace, and were not accustomed to the wars.

In this manner all went ill with IULIANVS; and well with his enemy: and IULIANVS was generally ill obeyed; whom his friends counfelled, that, with the best forces he could be able to leuie, he should meet SEVERVS vpon the way, and stoppe his passage ouer the Alps: but either he would not, or durst not do so, but made the best prouision in Rome he could; and, before he was aware, he vnderstood that SEVERVS was already entred Italy, and that the most part of the Cities had receiued him, and yielded him their obedience. The people of Rome seeing this, and that PRISCENVS NIGER whom they desired remained in Asia, began to like of SEVERVS his coming.

Seuerus resolves to be partner in the Empire with Iulianus.

IULIANVS, seeing himself driuen to this streight, obtained of the Senate to write and to send Ambassadors to SEVERVS, offering to make him equall and companion in the Empire with IULIANVS. But SEVERVS, not contented with part, but with the whole, would not accept thereof, holding himself to bee of greater power than IULIANVS, notwithstanding that vntill then the Senate held with him: but they, seeing the little counsell and lesse strength of IULIANVS, beganne to abandon him. And although hee desired that the Vestall Virgins (which was the most precious and highly-esteemed thing in their vain religion) should be sent to pacifie SEVERVS, and to work some means of peace; yet the Senate would not yeeld thereto, alleging that he was vnworthy to rule, who durst not defend the Empire by force of Arms. And the matter came to this passe, that disguised persons daily came into Rome from SEVERVS, and others went from thence to him; and IULIANVS, void of all reliefe and succours, remained in his Palace generally abandoned, sauing of a very few souldiers.

The Senate abandoned Iulianus.

The Senate was assembled, and by the common consent of all the Senators it was decreed, that IULIANVS should be deprived of the Empire, and SEVERVS proclaimed Emperour; and there were of the principall of the Senators sent to SEVERVS in ambassage, to yeeld to him their obedience, with the ensignes of Emperour, CÆSAR, AVGVSTVS; and spreading a rumour abroad that IULIANVS had poisoned himselfe, they commanded him to be slaine in his Palace, where the infortunate Emperour was found disarmed, and with some few of his friends weeping like a child. And so was IULIANVS slaine at the age of 57. yeeres, hauing reigned only seauen moneths, in the yeere of our Lord 195.

Iulianus slaine by the Senators.

THE LIFE OF SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND ONE & TWENTITH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

Septimius Seuerus hauing taken the Empire more by force of Armes and feare, wherein he did put the Senators and people of Rome, then for any right he had; the first thing he did, was to reuenge the death of Pertinax, by depriving all those which had slaine him and sold the Empire, of all Military dignities. Afterwards, entring Rome with great pompe, he persuaded the Senators and people to hope well of him, and to bend their weapons against Pelcentius Niger, who was called Emperour: Whom finally after many changes of fortune, he ouercame. He likewise ouerthrew Artabanus King of Persia, and took the Crowne of Tyshphonte, wherein was all that Kings treasure, and ouercame Albinus, who was made Cæsar. This Seuerus was a man addicted to the warres, ambitious, ambitious; desirous in his resolution to bring any thing to passe that he had once undertaken, and therein very wilful and circumspect in all matters appertaining to the preservation of his estate, and government of the Empire. Finally, oppressed with a long infirmity, and particularly with an inveterate paine in his feete, hee dyed, hauing reigned the Empire eighteen yeeres; using no lesse wisdom in performing it, than hee had shewed boldnesse and courage in getting it.

WARRE

SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS succeeded in the Empire, who onely among all the Emperours was borne in Africa, in a citie called Lepis. His fathers name was GERVA, and his mothers EVLIA PIA. He had two Vncles by his mothers side, which were Consuls in Rome; his grandfathers name by his mother was MACBIZ, and by his fathers side, EVLVIVS ARIVS. IULIANVS being dead in such manner as we have declared, and SEVERVS marching with his Armie towards Rome against his enemies; vpon the way certaine Ambassadors met him, which in the name of the Senate and people of Rome yeelded to him their obedience, and gave him the title and ensignes of Emperour, certifying him of the death of IULIANVS. He receiued this Ambassage in presence of the Armie, being marshalled and in Armes, and gave gifts to the Ambassadors; and entertaining them with great honour, continued his iourney towards Rome: where aswell the Pretorian souldiers stood in feare of him, for that they had slaine the Emperour PERTINAX, whom they knew he loved, as also all the Romane people, for the desire they had that PRISCENVS NIGER should haue been Emperour, who in the East (as is said) was called so. SEVERVS, when he came neere to Rome, sent commandement that all the Pretorian souldiers should come forth to receiue him, clad in shew of peace, leauing their armes in their campe, which they did, hoping thereby to haue pleased and pacified him, by ioyfully obeying his commandement. And hee concealing what he purposed to doe, hauing only acquainted some of his favorites and captaines therewith, attended their coming in field, in a place which he had chosen for that purpose; where they coming to doe him reuerence, were compassed about by his Armie: and making a short speech vnto them, hee reproched them with the crueltie and treason which they had vied in killing the Emperour PERTINAX: Which being ended, he made them to put off the clothes and apparell which they ware, and to put away their daggers and poniards from them (for other weapons they had none) and then he pronounced sentence against them; wherein hee deprived them of the honour of souldiers, and banished them from Rome and a hundred milles about. He presently sent to their Campe to take their armes from them, and the imperiall ensignes; and so they were punished and disgraced, although not so much as they deserved, for the cruell murder which they had committed, and the selling of the Empire.

The lineage of Seuerus.

The punishment of the Pretorian souldiers which slew Pertinax.

This being done, SEVERVS entred into Rome, with his whole Armie, with their Ensignes displayed, and his souldiers in armes, apparelled in the best and most sollemne manner they could. The number of his men was so great, that it was a most faire and stately spectacle to behold. The Senate went to the gates of the citie to receiue him, and there saluted him after the accustomed manner: and the people receiued him with blessings and applauses; notwithstanding that it was odious vnto them to see him come armed, and in warlike manner. Hauing performed the solemnities, and visited the Temples, as the manner then was, he went to his lodging in the Imperiall palace: and the next day he commanded the Senate to be assembled, whither he also went accompanied with armed men; wherein (as he was a wise man and well aduised) hee made a very smooth speech, giving them great hope of good government, and excusing himselfe for taking vpon him the name and authoritie of Emperour, without their consent and good liking first obtained; pretending that hee did it, to reuenge the death of PERTINAX, and to free them from the tyrannie of IULIANVS: for that it was a thing vnworthy the Romane Empire, he should liue which had bought it with money. In conclusion, his words were of such efficacy, as the Senat went thence satisfied and well content: yet some of the old Senators which better knew his condition, gave little credit to his words; for they held him for a man that was very double, subtil and a great dissembler: and notwithstanding that he was so, yet in truth he was a most sufficient man in any thing, very valiant in armes, and before that he was Emperour had governed great prouinces, and attained to be Questor, Tribune, Pretor, Proconsul, and Consul; and had held Commands and charges, wherein he purchased the name

Seuerus entred Rome with his souldiers displayed.

His speech to the Senate.

The valour and learning of Seuerus.

name and reputation of a valiant, wife, and excellent Captaine. And if a man well consider how the Empire was then divided between three Lords, and with what valour hee subdued the whole, with the other warres and accidents which happened in his time; he may well be esteemed for a very valiant Emperour and excellent Captaine, and may be compared with any of those in ancient time. Besides all which, he was very learned, and a great Mathematician, a good Orator and Philosopher. But his proweesse in Armes was so great, as it cannot be written by me (considering the breuitie which I vse) but cursorily; and so to expresse such things as are most cleere, although in halte; yet will they glister in their sight which shall behold the same.

After that he had taken vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, he set speedie order for the reformation of abuses in the Citie, by reason of the diffensions and tumults passed. He also presently honoured and buried the Emperour PERTINAX: and in remembrance of that good old man; he took to himselfe his surname, calling himselfe SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS PERTINAX. He paid and gaue gifts and rewards to his men of warre, and also to the people of Rome; and as the custome of the new Emperours was, he made distributions and gaue large donatiues. He also married two daughters which he had, with two principall men, one called PROBUS, and the other BICUS: and after that he had giuen great dowries with them, he vndersuch means that they were both chosen Consuls. And whereas at that time there was great scarcitie of come in Rome, he took such order; and that with such expedition, as the Citie was sufficiently provided for and furnished; which course he held euer during all the time of his raigne, in such sort as there was neuer any want. All these things and other, concerning the gouernment of the Empire, he performed with such expedition, in thirte dayes only that hee remained there; for from the first day that he was Emperour, hee determined to adresse his iourney towards the East with his Armie against PESCENIVS NIGRA, who (as is said) was called Emperour, and was very powerful, and an excellent Captaine. Having made preparation for his iourney, he sent a Captaine and new legions into the Prouince of Africa, to guard the same; to the end that by the way of Egypt and Libya, PESCENIVS NIGRA should not make any profit of that Prouince. And the better to leaue all things in safety behinde him in the West (for he was in feare of CLODIVS ALBINVS, a Nobleman and a Senator of Rome, who was Captaine of the Legions in Britanny, and was a man of a great parentage, rich, and well beloued, he thought himselfe how he might compass him and make him his friend, by giuing him the name and title of CÆSAR and his successor; whereof hee aduertised him with very louing and gracious speeches: by which means for that time he remained in quiet and in peace.)

This being done, leaving the best order in Rome he could, and such as was most expedient (nominating and choosing companies and Pretorian Cohorts to remaine in the Citie, in the place of those which he had cashiered and degraded from the honour of bearing Armes) he departed thence, continuing his iourney with the best and greatest force he was able to leaue. PESCENIVS NIGRA being aduertised of the coming of his enemy, as vntill then he had liued idle and carelesse, so now with great diligence & expedition he leued soldiers: and beside the ordinary Armie which he had, he sent some Captaines speedily to stop the passages out of Europe into Asia the lesse; and also sent to craue aide of the Kings of Parthia, Armenia, and other Kings and Tetrarchs of the East; from whom, and from the Prouinces which were vnder his obedience, there came great power and reliefe vnto him; and so the world was diuided into two factions; so as there began one of the most cruell warres that euer had been, as well for the valour of the Captaines, as for the power and multitude of souldiers; which warre was continued in many parties, both by sea and land. SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS passed out of Europe into Asia the lesse, but with great trouble and difficultie, having many skirmishes, and being often assailed by PESCENIVS his troupes, who sent against him an excellent Roman Captaine called EMILIANVS, who was Generall of all his forces. This EMILIANVS hauing drawne together all the power which PESCENIVS sent him, and all the rest that he was able to leaue out of Cappadocia, Galatia, Bithynia, and other Prouinces of Asia the lesse, took the fildes, in the way where SEVERUS was to passe: where followed many great skirmishes and encounters, and in the end a most cruell and terrible battaile, wherein EMILIANVS was ouerthrowne. After this battaile, the conquered troupes which escaped, went to PESCENIVS NIGRA, who with all his power was in the Citie of Antioch in Syria; from whence he departed to meete with SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS vpon the way as he was coming: and marching towards him

Seuerus goes against Pelenius Niger.

Seuerus against Niger.

Pelenius leaues what force he can.

Emilianus overthrowne by Seuerus.

him (after some masters of lesser importance which passed) the two Armies drew neere the one to the other in a great Plaine by the Sea side in the countrey of Cilicia (as HERODIANVS reporteth, yet SPARCIANVS and EVTHOPIVS differ therein) in the same place where DARIVS was the first time ouerthrowne by ALEXANDER the Great; where (by the consent of both the Generals) they came to a battaile with the greatest numbers and best souldiers that then were in the world; which by reason of the experience, valour, and wisdom of the Captaines, was most cruell. For, fighting the greatest part of the day without any apparant aduantage, the number of the slaine and wounded was so great, that the streames of water which ranne through the fildes, were so full, and died with the blood of men and horses, as there seemed to be no water therein; A great number of disarmed people of the inhabitants thereabouts, standing vpon the tops of the hils to behold the battaile, and to see whether partie should haue the victorie. Which when either partie by all means possible had endeouored to obtaine, in the later end of the day PESCENIVS NIGRA was ouerthrowne, without failing in any point in what he ought, and was most expedient for a good Captaine to haue done: for in truth SEVERUS his souldiers were more expert and better trained in the warres; and seeing there was no other remedie, he fled, but was followed and afterwards found by SEVERUS his souldiers, who smote off his head, and carried it through the Campe vpon the point of a Lance. This PESCENIVS NIGRA was a man of meane parentage; yet some say that he was Noble and ancient: his fathers name was ANIVS FVSCVS, and his mother was called LAMPRIA. He was a man indifferently well learned, and obtained great riches. He was sharpe and quick witted, euer followed the warres, and was an excellent souldier; and afterwards performed the charge committed to him, with great discretion and courage: for, they write of him, that he was a valiant and much commended Tribune; a very singular and excellent Captaine; a most seuer and vpriight Lieutenant General; a most wise and prudent Consul; and in all things happy and fortunate, but only unfortunate in being Emperour, not knowing how to gouern himselfe therein. So as it plainly appeareth, that men doe often times desire and purchase to themselves shame and perdition, by presuming to attaine to honour and greatness.

SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS, hauing obtained so notable a victorie, with all speede aduertised the Roman Senate thereof, and as a conqueror did his will vpon the conquered, cruelly killing many of those which had taken part with NIGRA: and principally he ruined the Citie of Antioch, by reason that it (more then any other) had aided and assisted his aduersarie, whose wife and children he commanded to be banished from Rome. And to the contrary, hee gaue gifts and rewards to those which had done him seruice and assisted him; and repaired the harmes and damages which some Citie, which held with him, had receiued by NIGRA'S souldiers. For in truth this man was very cruell in punishing offences, and in persecuting his enemies; and very liberrall and gratefull to his friends, and most bountifull in rewarding those which had done him any seruice. In all the Prouinces of the East, after this victorie, he found no resistance, sauing among the Parthians, the Persians, and the Adiabians, very mightie Nations: who for the loue they bare vnto NIGRA, and the ancient hatred to the Romane name, presently took Armes against SEVERUS; and hee in person went against them, and had many battailes and encounters, and obtained great victories, which I haue no time to relate: so as hee enlarged the Empire and the Romane name, and pacified the Prouinces.

SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS hauing brought all his purposes to so good and prosperous estate, being seduced by the diuel, he resolved to persecute the Catholike Christian Church, so as an infinite number of the faithfull were put to death; and this was the first persecution of the Church. For which occasion (as PAVLVS OROSIVS noteth) God would not permit that he should long enjoy the Empire in peace: for he was aduertised from Rome how that AELIVS, who (as we said) was Captaine in great Britannie, and whom he made CÆSAR when he went for the East, was risen in Armes, and proclaimed himselfe Emperour; and that he was of very great power, and much beloued of the Romane Nobilitie: for he was native of Rome, and of a great and Noble Familie. But he being of a hautie minde little regarded those difficulties: and setting all things in order in the East, with his Armie, took his way towards Rome, to the end he might goe against AELIVS, as against a tyrant and a rebell. And passing from Asia into Europe ouer the Ithright at Byzantium, which is now called Constantinople, he wholly ruined that Citie; for that when he went towards Asia, that Citie would not receiue him; and so he left it leuell with the ground (which was one of the most famous Citie in the world) and

A battaile betweene Septimus Seuerus and Pelenius Niger.

Pelenius Niger overthrowne and slaine.

The image of Pelenius Niger.

The wisdom and valour of Pelenius.

The first persecution of the Christian Church.

Albinus in Armes against Seuerus.

it remained so desolate untill the time of CONSTANTINE the Great; as in his time we will declare.

SEVERUS traueiling thus towards Rome, his Adversary ALBINUS being aduertised thereof, came out of Britanny into France, where he raised a mighty Armie; part whereof hee sent to keepe the passages of the Alpes, thereby to hinder him, who was arrived at Rome, and was now upon his way comming to meete him: before which time he put PASCENIUS NIGER children to death, thereby wholly to extinguishe all remembrance of him. And going to the warres, he appointed his sonne BASSIANVS ANTONINVS for his successor, and intitled him CÆSAR; and changing his name, he commanded him to be called, AURELIUS ANTONINVS. Drawing neere to his enemies, the warres began in a most cruell manner betweene them; where in the beginning in some encounters, SEVERUS his Capitaines were ouerthrowne by those of ALBINUS his partie.

But after that he had passed the Alpes, and was entred into France, the warre was kindled in many parts; and in many conflicts and skirmishes fortune shewed her selfe variable, the victorie inclining sometimes to one side, and sometime to the other; untill at last neere vnto the Citie of Lions, (wherein ALBINUS was) either partie drawing together his whole power, they fought one of the most bloody batailles that euer was written of: which continued the greatest part of the day without any appearance of aduantage. First, the victorie seemed to bee of ALBINUS his side: for his Battalions were of such force, as they forced SEVERUS Troupes to retire; in such sort, as his Souldiers began to flye: and it so happened that SEVERUS horse fell with him, and euery man held him for dead; and ALBINUS his Souldiers began to crie Victorie, victorie, taking no care but to follow the execution. Then LEON, one of SEVERUS his Capitaines, who untill then had neuer charged, with a very great Troup of armed men which he brought with him, renewed the fight in such sort, as SEVERUS was rescued: and being remounted vpon another horse, charged with such fury, as heooke the victorie out of ALBINUS his Souldiers hands, who accounting themselves Victors, observed no order; and the matter was so handled, that ALBINUS his Troupes were driuen to turne their backs, and SEVERUS followed the execution, killing them even to the gates of the Citie of Lions.

The number of those which were slaine and wounded, was infinite: and the citie was presently entred, and ALBINUS taken; and his head being stricken off, was brought to SEVERUS. A man may well beleue that he was not a little ioyfull when he saw it, considering that a little before he was wounded and cast to the ground, and by all men accounted for dead, and his enemies victorious; but escaping all this, he now saw himselfe an absolute Lord, and his enemies confounded. Wherefore let euery Christian reader consider how inconsistent all things are in this life, and that a man neither can, or ought to repose his assured confidence in any thing in this world. Great were the cruelties which SEVERUS committed after that he had obtained this victorie: and truly if this Prince had not been so cruell and greedie of bloudie euent both in warre and gouernment as he was, I am of opinion that no man either before or after him, had excelled him; considering the actions and enterprises which he brought to an end, whereof I write but the summe.

These things being past, SEVERUS presently wrote to the Senate and people of Rome, aduertising them of his victorie, and sending them ALBINUS his head, which he commanded should be set vpon the end of a pole in the publicke place; and all those Senators which of ALBINUS his partie were slaine in this battaille, he commanded to be quartered; and those which were taken alieue, he commanded to be slaine. He was so cruell and vindicative (as some write) that he mounted vpon a verie furious great horse, and rode many times ouer the dead bodie of ALBINUS: which is not much to be marvelled at; considering from how cruell and barbarous a Nation he was defended. Some write, that he first caused his body to be torne in many pieces, and to be throwne into the Riuer Rhodanus. And SPARTIANVS sayth, that hee commanded his wife and children to be slaine, and did by them as he had done by ALBINUS: and so he made a number of his kinsmen and friends which were found with him in Lions to be slaine, and with them other principall Noble men of France and Spain. He concluded the victorie which he gat neere Lions onely in Rome, thereto make an end of the warre: and after this victorie he presentlie assailed certaine cities and holds which continued friends to ALBINUS; which he subdued, not without great trouble and danger. And as he was busie in these matters, newes was brought him that one of those Legions which he had left in Arabis, did did mutine, and took part with ALBINUS before this battaille: and so he leauing France and Germany in peace and quiet, and sending into Britanny the ordinarie Capitaine, to keepe the inhabitants in subiection and peace, he came triumphing to Rome, bringing his Armie with him, where he was most solemnly receiued, with great shew of ioy and contentment, although that in truth they stood in great feare of him: whither when he came, hee paid his souldiers with larger allowance, then euer had been seene, and the first day that he went to the Senate, in disgrace and despite thereof he renewed the titles and memory of the wicked Emperor COMMODVS, and made him to be canonized, and adored as a God. He also condemned to death, and confiscated the goods of a great number of Noble Personages of Rome which had bene Pretors, Consuls, and Senators, for that he found they had been friends to ALBINUS, and of his faction, shewing letters which he said were written by them, wherein they had offered their persons and goods to ALBINUS seruice; alleaging other reasons and proofes, which peraduenture were forged. Finally, he vsed great crueltie, and put many to death; whereby hee extremely enriched himselfe in treasure, whereof some he distributed and gaue to others: but principally he enriched and aduanced in the highest degree, one whose name was PLACIUS, a great favorite of his, who also was an Africane, and his countrie-man, whom he made Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts: and afterwards he married his son BASSIANVS ANTONINVS, whom he had made CÆSAR, with his daughter, whose name was PLAVTINA; and then he made him his companion and equall, and made the Senate to giue him the ensignes and prerogative of the Empire; by reason whereof PLACIUS grew yet more proude and insolent. Matters standing in this estate, the cruell SEVERUS stayed but a small time in Rome; in which space he executed many cruelties vpon those which had been friends to NIGER and ALBINUS, putting to death a great number of Noble Personages most cruelly, together with many Matrons, and Romane Ladies: and to the contrary, he shewed himselfe very liberall and bountifull, and bestowed many fauours vpon others, and became also very popular, and sought to be pleasing and acceptable to all men, and to that end made the greatest and most costly feasts and games that euer were made in Rome, and diuided money amongst the people. But he stayed but a little while there, as I said: for knowing that matters were in no securitie in Asia, principally that the Parthians infested the bounds and frontiers of the Empire, and desirous to be reuenged of certaine Kings, which had assisted his enimie NIGER, as hee was most valiant and desirous of honour, although olde and gottie: yet with his accustomed celeritie hee departed towards the East; and being come into Asia sooner then any man expected him, he presently beganne the warre in Armenia, marching against BARZABANUS, King of the Atrenores, who had been PASCENIUS NIGER'S friend: The King of Armenia durst not make any resistance, but sent him presents, suing for peace, and gaue him such hostages as he required. Whereupon finding no resistance, this valiant Emperor returned against Arabia felix, wherein there was a mutinie, and there took and sacked some Cities: And from thence returned to the frontiers of the Atrenores, and besieged the Citie of Atrax, or Atramus. But being vnable to take it, for that it was very strong and well furnished, in great fury he went against the Parthians, and the Persians, and besieged the famous Citie of Tesphonte, wherein King ARTABANVS lay with all his power and household: and after many assaults, encounters, and slaughter of men of either side, he entred the Citie by force of Armes; and the King escaping by flight, his children and treasure fell into the hands of SEVERUS, which was held for a very great victorie: for the Romans stood in greater feare of the Parthians, then of any other nation of the world.

SEVERUS presently wrote to Rome, aduertising them of his victories and good success, and sent them the description of the countries, cities, riuers, battalies, and assaults which hee past, drawne and painted in tables.

When he had ended all things at his pleasure, he bountifullly paid his souldiers: and coming into Palestina, and from thence into Egypt, he was desirous to see the Pyramides, and other great and ancient monuments in that countrie: And from thence he returned to Rome in great triumph, loaden with the spoiles and riches gotten by his victories in the East. At this his returne hee married his eldest sonne to PLAVTINA, daughter of his great favorite PLACIUS, which marriage BASSIANVS ANTONINVS solennized much against his will; and so would not conuerse or keep companie with her. Whereupon there began great dislike and dissention betweene PLACIUS and BASSIANVS: PLACIUS knowing himselfe the richest and most mightie man of the Empire; and seeing that SEVERUS was now old,

Seuerus the triumphing into Rome.

Placitus a great favorite of Seuerus.

Seuerus his reprent Tessphonte with the King of Parthians children taken by Se-uerus.

Seuerus put to death Nigers children.

A great bat-talle betweene Seuerus and Albinus.

The valour of Leon, one of Seuerus Captaines.

The crueltie of Seuerus.

Seuerus killing his children.

old (with whom he was in great favor) and fearing that if BASSIANVS should succeed him and inherit the Empire, he should be ill intreated at his hands, hee resolved to kill both the father and the son, and to make himself Emperor, making choice (for the effecting this exploit) of a Tribune of the Pretorian Cohorts, whereof hee himself was Commander. But it pleased God that this treason was discovered by the same Tribune. SEVERVS held this in a manner incredible, conceiving it to be some practice of his sons, who loved not PLANCIVS. But being assured thereof by the Tribune, it was concluded, that hee should go and bring him into the Emperours chamber. The Tribune, coming to PLANCIVS, told him that he had slain SEVERVS and BASSIANVS; and that if he would go with him, hee should see them dead: which having delivered, hee made a renurance as to the Emperour. As PLANCIVS desired their deaths, so he easily gave credit to his words, and went with him. The Tribune (it being late in the night) brought him to the Emperours chamber, where he found him and his sonne lying, amongst many of their confident friends, the chamber being full of torches. Which PLANCIVS seeing, he was much amazed: and being demanded by the Emperour what hee did there at so unreasonable a time, not knowing what to answer, but confessing his error, and craving pardon, he was slain by BASSIANVS.

After that SEVERVS had escaped this danger, hee spent his time in visiting some Cities in Italie, in hearing complaints and doing justice, and in most sumptuous Works and Buildings in Rome, and other Cities; and, seeking to bring vp his sonnes virtuously, and (by abating their pride) to reconcile them, and make unity between them; for, they did ill agree, and were very vnquiet and ill-affected the one to the other. He desired to establish peace and amity between them, having determined that after his death the Empire should be diuided between them, and to that end inuited them both therein. And so this poor old Emperour laboured in vain to reform the bad inclination of his sonnes. And, living in rest from warre, although not without domestical care, he received Letters, importing, that the Inhabitants of great Britanny were in Arms and rebelled, in such sort, that his Legions there were in such danger, as they were at the point either to be overcome and lost, or at least to flee and abandon the Countrey; whereunto he was much displeased. And to the end that the Empire in his daies should not be diminished by the losse of that Island (it being of such importance) hee determined to go thither himself: a person to pacifie the same. And, without any delaying of time, he went thitherwards with all his forces. Being arrived in Britanny, the Inhabitants conceived such fear, by reason of his sudden coming vpon them, that, as he was a warrior, if he had been inclined to peace, they would haue conuen to any reasonable composition: but he, rather desiring to punish them, made cruell war against them: which was both tedious and dangerous, by reason of the lakes and many ill passages for his men in severall places of that Countrey; so as he was constrained to make many bridges and other deuices, with wood and timber, for his souldiers to passe. And so he obtained many victories, and subdued the Inhabitants. And to the end that his Legions from thenceforth might liue in greater safety, and that the Picts and Scots should not so freely passe their bounds (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR and EVTROPIVS report) hee commanded a strong wall to be made, which did crosse the Ile from sea to sea; which wall was two and thirty miles in length; wherein (as I conceiue) hee did but finish or repair that wall which the Emperour ADRIAN had made before: which truly was a work worthy the greatnes of SEVERVS his minde, and the mighty wealth of Rome. Which when hee at his pleasure had ended in like manner as he had done all his other enterprises, his old grief did so much torment him, that he desired and sought means to end his owne life: and, having reigned 18 years and ten months, he died in the same Ile of Britanny.

This Emperour was one of those which fought as many battels, and obtained as many victories, as any other that euer ruled the Roman Empire: for, he ouerthrew and brought to confusion three Roman Emperours, and many other Kings, and subdued an infinite number of Provinces and Cities. He took so good order for the preferuation of his treasure, and was so covetous and greedy in gathering the same together, that, notwithstanding his great expences, and the infinite great gifts and rewards which he bestowed, yet he left more ready money and treasure in his Treasury and Exchequer than any other Emperour of his Predecessors. He paid and maintained so many Legions of souldiers, as there was no cause to fear any King or Nation in the world. Hee left in Rome so great abundance of wheat, wine and oile, as was sufficient (as SPARCIVS writeth) to maintain and victual the same for five yeeres. He erected wonderful works and Buildings in Rome and in other parts, and in many things performed the part of a good good governour, and of a wise and prudent Prince: So as the Romans vsed to say of him (noting his cruelties and couetousnes; and afterwards his prouisions and victories) That it had been good that this Emperour had neuer been borne, or that he should neuer haue died: and so after his death he was highly extolled and commended. He left for his equal successors in the Empire his two sonnes, the one called BASSIANVS, and the other GETA: and when he lay a dying, the last words he spake to those which were with him were these: When I took vpon me the gouernement of the Empire, I found it tyrannized and out of order; and now being old, and powtie, leave it in peace and subiection to my sonnes (if they prouee good) a firme and settled Empire: but if they prouee euill feeble, and without force, and ready to fall. This good Prince was so temperate and spare in his diet, that hee did seldom eate any flesh: for his common foode was salades, pulse and fruits of his countrey; but he vsed to drinke somewhat deepe: yet neuer so that he was at any time dis tempered therewith. He was of a very comely personage, representing authoritie and maiestie, and was tall of stature, and vsed to weare a long white beard; his hayre was curled and gray, and he spake with a deepe sounding voice. Finally, his personage and minde were fitting for an Emperour. He liued (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR and others do testifie) seuentie yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord, two hundred and three.

The Britains subdued by Severus.

The death of Severus.

The words of Severus as he lay dying.

THE LIFE OF BASSIANVS ANTONINVS CARACALLA (THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FOURTH OF those which were called ANTONINI) and of his brother GETA, being the two and twentieth Emperour of Rome.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the decease of Seuerus, his two sonnes, Bassianus Antoninus Caracalla, and Geta, took the Empire: which two being borne of several mothers; as brothers oftentimes use to doe, the one, deadly hating the other, sought one anothers death and destruction. But Caracalla, who was a warlike man and bloudie, unable to endure the company of his brother, who led the life of a Philosopher rather than that of an Emperour: or that for his good parts he should be so much beloued by the Romane people as he was, failing to kill him secretly with poison, in the end slew him openly in the lap of his mother in law, which was Geta his mothers remaining sole in the Empire. And knowing himselfe to be generally hated, he disposed of himselfe to visit the Empire: where neerer he came, he sought to imitate the fashions of the countrey wherein he was; sometimes attiring himselfe after the Germane fashion; then after the Greece: besides that he would be called Alexander, and be reputed another Achilles, for that he had trauailed the countreies of those Princes. He was very inhumane and cruell, and so dishonest in his life, as he shamed not to marrie his stepmother Iulia, who was mother to his brother Geta, who also was so shamelesse as to consent to so wicked a marriage. But they both ended accordingly as they deserved: for the Emperour was slaine by the practice of Macrinus, at such time as he went to ease his bodie; and she bearing the newes, falling into despair killed her selfe, he having held the Empire six yeeres.

SEVERVS being dead, his two sonnes, which he had by several women, according as he had ordained, remained Emperours. One of them hee had by MARZIA, which was his first wife; and the other by IVLIA, as is already said. The eldest had to name BASSIANVS ANTONINVS; and the other GETA; both very young men, and in vertue farre vnlike to their father, chiefly BASSIANVS CARACALLA which was the eldest: Although that in his youth being but a child, hee seemed to make better shewe of himselfe, to be of a milde condition, and of a good witte; he profited very much in learning (as SPARCIVS writeth) and therefore was much beloued and greatly ly accounted of; but afterwards, with his yeeres, and the Empire, he altered his condition, and in crueltie not only surpassed his father, but any other cruell Prince of all that euer were; as if he had been borne at one birth with NERO.

Bassianus and the first women and beloued.

As soone as hee was Isworne Emperour in England, where he then was (for his father carried both his Sonnes with him, and his wife IVLIA also; which was mother to the second sonne) ANTONINVS CARACALLA practised with the Armie to chuse him Emperour alone, and to disphier his brother GETA. But the men of warre would not consent thereto, because that GETA was chosen CESAR and successor to his father by them; and BASSIANVS ANTONINVS was nominated by his father SEVERVS. Whereupon being out of hope to bring his purpose to effect, accompanied with his brother and mother in law, they agreed to come to Rome, and brought with them the bodie or ashes of their father SEVERVS. But there presently grew so many ialousies betweene the two brothers, that it was daily feared the one would kill the other; notwithstanding that IVLIA (as though she had been mother to them both) vsed all possible meanes to haue pacified them, and to haue brought them to liue louingly and like brotherstogether: which the could neuer bring to passe, and so vpon the way either of them did lodge and eate apart; and either of them stood vpon his guard, for feare of the other. Being come to Rome, they were receiued with great solemnitie, triumph and ioy; but in their palaces they tooke their lodgings apart, and each of them had his guard and particular officers from the other: and they neuer visited, saw, or spake the one to the other, except when they went to the Senate: so great was the hatred which the one bare to the other.

The first thing they did after their coming to Rome, was to burie their father, whom they canonized for a Saint, placing him among the Gods, as the custome was to doe by those which were good Emperors. And seeing that occasion will often be giuen to reade of some Emperors which haue been deified; in my opinion it shall not be amisse, in this place to recite the ceremonies which were then vsed therein. The order which they held (the Emperour being dead) was to assemble the Senate, to consider whether such an Emperour had deserved or were worthe to be placed among the Gods or no; and finding him to haue been wicked, the Senate would not be present at the ceremonies vsed at his funerals: but if he had bene a good Prince, they all went in mourning attire to doe him honour at his consecration. The manner to consecrate him, was first to burie him without any ceremonies; then they made his image of wood, which resembled a pale sickly weak man, which they placed vpon a high scaffold ouer the entring into the Palace; which image was clothed in rich attire; and on the one side thereof, sate the Senate, and on the other side the Roman Marions, where they continued from the Sunne rising vntill the euening, doing nothing but groane and sigh. This order they obserued the space of seven daies, in which the Physicians came and felt the pulles of this Statue, saying, that the Emperour would surely die: at which words, they lamented and screeched out. The sixth day the Physicians said that he was dead: then the most ancient men carried the image on horseback in a beere to a place which was called the old place; passing through that way which was called Via Sacra. In this place was erected an edifice after the fashion of a throne, with staires roundabout it, and vpon this throne they placed the Image: on the one side of the staires were many children, which were gentlemen's sonnes of Rome; and on the other, a number of yong Roman damels which sung some haueie and sorrowfull songs and ditties; and the boyes sung hymns in prayse of the dead Emperour. From thence they carried the Image with the beere to the field of Mars, where was another scaffold made of moist drie wood, vpon which they placed this Image. Vpon that day people came from all parts of Italy to Rome to see the solemnitie: and euery one there present, was bound to cast vpon the staires, certain precious odors of sundrie sorts. After this the Senators made shew of a skirmish on horseback; and after them the two Consuls gave a turne vpon their chariots richly adorned, being followed by the most ancient men in Rome, and those which had been Captains in the wars, on foote: all which after they had gone round about this scaffold, making sundrie shoutes and exclamations, fell to the ground. Then came he which did inherit and succede in the Empire, and with a burning torch gaue fire to this throne or scaffold; which, for that it was made of moist drie wood, in short space was set all on fire.

But before any of these ceremonies were performed, the Senat provided a great Eagle: which being set on that side where the Image of the dead Emperour was, while as this image did burn, the Eagle was very cunningly let loose, which, according to her nature, mounting aloft into the aire

aire, the people said that it was the Emperors soule which flew to heaven, there to dwell amongst the gods: which HERODIANVS doth write at large in the historie of these two Emperours. GETA the younger brother was of a more gentle nature: for shewing himselfe milde and courteous, he began to be generally well beloued of all men. ANTONINVS CARACALLA was fowre, and would be obied for feare. Enuying the loue which he saw all men beare to his brother GETA, and the reputation wherein he was held, he deuised with himselfe how he might secretly kill him with poison, or otherwise howsoever: he also sought to get the good will of the Pretorian Souldiers, giuing them many gifts, doing them many fauours, and giuing them leaue to do what they listed. So as it was easily perceiued, what manner of government there would be in the Empire, where were two Emperours with equall power and authoritie, and so contrarie in condition each to other, that being brothers they practised and desired each others death; and in matters of iustice and government were euer contrarie in opinion; and for Captaines and gouernours which were to be made, each sought to preferre his friends and favorites, and did the like in chusing of Consuls and other Magistrates: And so all things went by fauour and in contention. There were committed intolerable disorders, and wrongs, either of them persecuting the contrarie faction, without daring to punish those which were of their own partie, for feare to make their enemies: whereof grew an vniuersall prejudice to all the prouinces, and generally to the whole Empire. Wherefore to auoide these troubles and inconueniences, some practised to make a diuision of the Empire; and that ANTONINVS BASSIANVS should remaine in Rome and gouerne the West; and that GETA should gouerne Achaia and all the East. But this took as little effect: for IVLIA, mother to GETA, hindred it, thinking to draw them to some composition and make them friends: and when she thought herselfe to be in the right way to haue brought them to concord and agreement, BASSIANVS CARACALLA (who was more proud and presumptuous, and who in truth did some his brother, as well for that he was his younger, as for that he gaue himselfe more to his book & to ciuill discipline, then to Armes and chiuallrie; hauing alwaies about him honest and learned men) resolved to kill him in what manner soeuer; which he had till then attempted to do by secret and coloured meanes, thinking with himselfe that he was and ought to be sole Emperour, and could not endure any riuall or companion in command. And with this cruell determination, as they were lodged both in one palace, GETA being one day with his mother, nothing suspecting any open violence, although he mistrusted secret practices; BASSIANVS iust at the time when euery bodie was at dinner, suddenly entred his brothers lodging, and with the aide of those which came with him, slew his brother in his mothers Armes, before that he was able to put himselfe in defence, or could be rescued. And hauing committed this detestable murder, with the like furie and haste as he had done this fact, he went forth at his palace gates, compassed about with his friends and seruants, and shewing great amazement, cried out, that his brother would haue slaine him, and he said to those which saw him, that he had escaped an extreme danger of death, but his innocencie had preferred him. And calling to his guard, he commanded them to conuay him to his Pretorian Cohorts, where he might remaine in safeties, for whilest he continued within the citie he stood in feare of his life.

Those which heard him, not knowing what had passed, beleeued what he said: and both those which heard him, and heard him not, followed him; and the people began to be much troubled to see their Emperour, so out of season, and in such haste and manner go to the Camp. When he came to his Camp, where in truth by reason of his former practices, he was better beloued then his brother, the first thing that he did was to go to a place apart, where their ensignes and banners were, which they held for religious and sacred; and then he began with great exclamation to say, That he gaue infinite thanks to the gods for deliuering him from such and so imminent a danger. And the souldiers flocking about him, maruelling at his so vnseasonable coming, he put himselfe in the middelt of them, and with a huge voice began to implore their aid and succour, telling them that his brother would haue slaine him; and being assailed by him, was rescued, and had fought, and God had giuen him the victorie, although vwith great difficulty; and that he now fled vnto them from the furie of those which would haue slaine him. He spake and fained the matter with such efficacie, as the souldiers beleeued him: and notwithstanding that he expressed not so much, yet they plainly perceiued that he had slaine his brother, as he gaue them to vnderstand: and incontinentlie he promised them, seeing he remained sole Emperour, that he would bestow vpon them the accustomed fauours, gifts & rewards; and presently sending for a mass of money which remained of his fathers treasure, he diuided it among them:

O 3

Enmity between Bassianus and his brother Geta.

In what manner the Romans deified their Emperors.

The folle of the ambros.

Bassianus sought meanes to put his brother Geta to death.

Bassianus slew his brother Ge-ta in his mothers armes.

them: whereby having got their good wils, although som were hard to be perswaded, and did contradict; yet in the end they proclaimed him sole Emperor, and approved the death of his Brother, GETA, pronouncing him a rebell, and an enemy to the Roman Common wealth.

Cruelly & folly Bassianus, in putting many great men to death.

BASSIANVS, remaining all that night in the Camp among the souldiers; the next day compassed with men of warre, returned into Rome; and assembling the Senate, he wente thither, and brought in his guard with him, wherein he made a set Oration (which HERODIANVS writeth at large) excusing himself, and grievously accusing his Brother; affirming, that he was openly assailed by him, but being refused, in defending himselfe, he had slain his Brother. The Senators, some for that they were his Favourites, and others for fear, approved his death: and he, to justify his wickednes with greater cruelty, began to proceed against men of all estates, as though they all had been guilty, and had practised his death, committing infinite murders and cruelties. First, he commanded all his Brothers servants to be slain, together with many Senators and Roman Knights, which had taken his Brothers part: He also made PLAUTINA, the daughter of PLAUTIUS, which had been his wife, to be put to death. He slew POMPEIANVS, nephew to the Emperor MARCVS AVRELIVS the Philosopher, and sonne to L. CILLA and POMPEIANVS. He caused all the Governours and Captains to slay, which his Brother had placed in the Provinces. To conclude, hee murdered an infinite number of men of quality, so as in all parts of Rome most horrible murders and cruelties were committed: for which he is accounted one of the worst and most cruell Emperors that ever governed the Roman Empire; and was generally hated and abhorred of all men, saving of the Pretorian Souldiers onely, whose loue and good will hee bought with his money, and therewith did continue them for his friends, (by suffering and enduring them, and giving them liberty in all things) permitting them to commit whatsoeuer outrage or insolency they would.

Bassianus was nile & foolishness

Having exercised himself in these abominable cruelties, his owne conscience accusing him, and knowing how much hee was abhorred in Rome, hee resolved to depart from thence, and to go and visit all the Provinces of the Empire; which he did, and in his journey played many mad pranks, some of which in truth were very ridiculous. Purposing to go into Germany, where-as Rome ever maintained great Armies against the northerly nations, who could never be brought to any perfect subjection; hee gaue it out in speeches, that hee went to reform the Legions, and to visit the Provinces; and, taking his way towards the River Danubius, where (to winne the hearts of that Countrey people) he followed the fashions vied in that Countrey, hunting and killing wilde beastes, and apprelling himself like a German, praising and esteeming their fashions better than the fashions of the Romans, he chose such of the German Souldiers as seemed to be most strong and active, for his guard. Hee sought also to win the good will of other men of warre, shewing himself very affable and sociable, helping them in person in their bodily exercises; eating and drinking with them such things as they did; and dooing many other things like a souldier and a man of warre: whereby hee made himself beloved both of the one and the other, although hee forbore not to commit sundry cruelties, killing certain eminent men among them.

Having set all matters in such order as hee thought good in Germany, taking his way towards Thracia, hee passed through Macedonia, where a notable folly possessed him: for, heer hee made shew to be much affected to ALEXANDER the Great, and to publish his Noble acts; sending commandment to erect his statue in many parts of Rome: amongst which hee set vp one with two faces; the one resembling ALEXANDER, and the other himself, desiring to make others beleue (himself being so perswaded) that hee did very much resemble him; and, because hee had read that ALEXANDER's neck stood a little awry towards one shoulder, he counterfeited the like: and so within fewe daies, of an Alman, he was become a Macedonian in apparell, behaviour and fashion; and one Squadron of his Army hee commanded to be called Phalanx (for so were they called in that Kingdome) and some of his Captains hee caused to bee called by the names of some of ALEXANDER's Captains. Having made this shew in Gracia, hee took his way towards Asia; where hee desired to see the ruines of Troy; and, seeing the Sepulchre of ACHILLES, another humour took him, which was, to resemble ACHILLES; so as hee seemed to trauell the Countreies like a Player, with Comedies and making shewes: at which his lightnes and inconstancy, the Romans which were with him, laughing to themselves, were much discontented and ashamed.

Traueilling through Asia the lesse, and thence into Soria, hee went into Egypt (as hee said) to see the City of Alexandria, because ALEXANDER the Great was Founder thereof: where he was most solemnly received, and with great ioy, for which hee ill required them: for although that he shewed them a pleasant countenance, yet secretly he was much displeased with them: for hee vnderstood that they had vied quips and jests of him behinde his back, and gaue him nick-names conformable to his vices, and the cruelties which hee committed: Matres, in truth, not so haious as could deserue for cruell punishment; as that which he inflicted, which was: that the people being vpon a day assembled together to see certain publike pastimes, he made them to bee compassed about by his souldiers, and an infinite number of them of all ages, conditions, and degrees to bee slaine, to the great feare, griefe, and terror of the whole Citie.

was

Extreme cruelty executed by Bassianus vpon
the citizens of Alexandria.

After this his great inhumanitie done in Egypt, he returned by Palestina: and travelling towards the East with a very mightie Armie, of his fathers old souldiers, hee invaded the Parthian countrey, which suspected no such matter; and did great spoile there (as SPARTIANVS SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR, and HERODIANVS doe write) for vpon safe conquest and assurance of peace which he made to the Parthians, he obtained some victories, deceiving their King ARTABANVS, giving him to vnderstand that hee came of purpose to marrie with his daughter; and the other comming to receive him in peaceable manner, was suddenly seet vpon. But the King (by great hap) escaped by flight. And although that this his victorie wercof small importance, yet he made great boast, writing to Rome tedious and proud letters thereof; and in all these actions hee forbore not to be cruell: but to gouerne vprightly, and to do iustice, as hee ought to haue done, hee took no care. Hee was very gluttonous, and vnmeasurably giuen to wine, luxurie and dishonestie of life, so as hee married with his owne mother in law, IVLIA; yet HERODIANVS maketh no mention thereof, but seemeth to be of a contrary opinion; for hee euer speaketh of IVLIA, as though she had been mother both to BASSIANVS and GETA: But SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth it; and also EUSEBIVS, EVTROPIVS and SPARTIANVS say, that it passed in this manner. IVLIA was a verie faire woman; and vpon a day, the mother and the sonne in law standing talking together, the carelessly or dishonestly, as it afterwards appeared, letting fall a vaile which shee ware, discovered part of her brests which when BASSIANVS saw, hee said, If it were lawfull, I would haue that which I see: shee, forgetting all honestie, and that shee was mother to GETA whom BASSIANVS had slaine, answered, To thee any thing that thou desirest is lawfull: dost thou not know, that the Emperor maketh lawes and is subiect to none? When hee heard her say so, setting aside all dutie and loyalty which hee ought to his dead father, and his liuing mother in law, hee resolved to marrie her, and celebrated his nuptials with the mother of his brother, whom hee had bereaued of life.

Gluttony and incenitury of Bassianus.

A monstrous fact.

But to retorne to the Historie of his life, it passed in this manner: That comming from his inuasion against the Parthians, hee stayed some daies in Mesopotamia: For, that countrey was very pleasant and commodious for hunting & other sports; where, within fewe daies hauing reigned full sixe yeeres, hee was slaine by treason. The manner whereof HERODIANVS writeth, saying that hee was much addicted to Mathematicians and Astrologians, and gaue great credit vnto them; and in all matters vied their opinions and iudgements, and had in Rome and with him all the Astrologers that hee could get; wherein he resembled his father SEVERVS, who did the like. Being fearefull of conspiracies, knowing what hee had deserved; hee sent to MATRINVS who was the greatest and most confident friend hee had, whom hee left gouernor of Rome, commanding him secretly to assemble all the best Astrologers hee could get, and demand of them what death he should die; and procure them to giue their opinions, whether any conspired or practized his death or no. MATRINVS did what the Emperor commanded in the foote of his letter, and with great haste answered him (either faining it, or being so aduersified by the Astrologers) that MATRINVS which was his Prefect, and with him in Mesopotamia, went about to kill him, and therefore hee should in any case presently dispatch him; for so did the Astrologers aduise him. Which letter hee sent sealed, and made it vp amongst other letters, to be the more secretly conveyed. The whole packet was delivered to the Emperor as hee was going into his chariot, to runne for a wager with other chariots; which was a kind of sport, wherein hee took much pleasure, and was greatly vied in those daies. And hee, for that hee would not giue ouer that which hee had pretended, gaue his letters to the said MATRINVS to read, and afterwards to make relation to him of the contents thereof. MATRINVS reading all these letters, met with that wherein BASSIANVS was counselled to put him to death: whereat hee was much astonished; and concealing that letter, made relation to the Emperor of all all the rest. And considering with himself, that hee which wrote that Letter would doubtlesse write another, and that length he should surely dy; he resolved first to murder the Emperour: and, ruminating vpon the matter, he bethought himself of a lustie strong fellow, a Centurion of the Emperours guard, called MARTIALL; who, being discontented, murmured against the Emperour, and secretly hated him, for that he had caused a Brother of his to be slain, and he him self was ill-increated and disgraced. MACRINVS, conceiuing this man to bee fit for his purpose, after some other discourse told him, that seeing he had opportunity to kill the Emperour, being euer neer vnto him hauing charge of his Person, hee ought to reuenge the death of his Brother, and then flee to him; who, with others of his faction, would protect and defend him against all such as might seek to offend him.

Some daies after MACRINVS had laid this plot, it hapned that the Emperour, coming from a Temple wherein he had been, neer to a City called Carras, and riding finally accompanied towards the City, withdrew himself out of the way behinde a bush, to doo such things as nature required; with one Page with him to hould his horse, the rest for manners sake being withdrawn. Which when MARTIALL perceiued, being one of them, faining that the Emperour had called him vpon some necessary occasion, he ran hastily vnto him; and, before he was perceiued, stabbed him in the behinde, whereof hee presently fell down dead. SPACIANVS saith, that, coming to help the Emperour to horse, hee stabd him in with his poiniard; and that MARTIALL, returning to take horse from which hee was alighted, by little and little withdrew himself from the company: but the Page bringing newes of the Emperours death, he began to flee so fast as his horse could runne; but could not make such speed, but that hee was overtaken by the Germane horsemen of the Emperours guard; who presently slue him.

The death of BASSIANVS being vnderstood by those which accompanied him, there grew a great tumult among them, not knowing with whom to be angry: for, as then it was knowne by whose order hee was slain. And, they approaching to the dead body of the Emperour, the first that came to haue aided him, was MACRINVS; who, weeping and lamenting, seemed to bee very sorrowfull; no man suspecting him or any other, all men conceiuing that MARTIALL had murdered BASSIANVS vpon passion, and for some priuate reuenge. Taking the Emperours dead body they burnt it, according to the custome then; and, putting his ashes into a pot, they sent them to his wife and mother-in-law IVLIA, who was in Antioch; who being in despair poisoned her self: and so they both had such ends as they deserved. BASSIANVS at the time of his death was full three and forty yeeres old, hauing reigned six yeeres Emperour. He left one sonne very yong, whose name was ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, by his wife whose name was SEMIRA, as SPACIANVS writeth. AVRELIVS VICTOR calles her SEMBA, a very dishonest woman, and his cosen German; who liued like a strumpet. ANTONINVS BASSIANVS was by his surname called CARACALLA, for a certain kinde of apparell which he gaue to the people of Rome. Hee died in the year of our Lord 219.

The death of Bassianus Ca-racalla.

Julia poisoned her self.

THE

THE LIFE OF OPILIVS MACRINVS.
ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND THE THREE AND TWENTITH ROMANE EMPEROR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

N E Audentius having refused the Empire; for his excuse, alledged his olde age to be vnfit for the troubles of so important a government: but Macrinus without any such consideration accepted thereof, it being offered him by the Souldiers, notwithstanding that hee was the author of the death of Caracalla. He took the Empire, made head against Artabanus King of Persia, who rose in Armes against the Romanes in reuenge of the injuries done by Caracalla; and being come to a battaile, which continued two daies, in the end they came to an agreement. Artabanus understanding of the approbrious death of his enemies. But fortune, which had prepared a trouble some rage for Macrinus, saw him no longer out of one danger, but it cast him into another farre greater, which was this; that Heliogabalus a Youth of fiftie yeeres old, being by the meanes of an old woman made Emperour, it becommed him to fight with him; and being ouerthrowne, fled unknowne through Affric helpe, with an intent to come to Rome: but being overtaken by the Souldiers which pursued him, in a Cite wherein hee fell sick, he was slaine, together with his sonne Diadumenus; whom he had made his companion in the Empire: Hauing reigned onely fourteen months.

BASSIANVS being dead, a councell was held in the Armie concerning the election of a new Emperour: for there was little account made of his son ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS; as well for that he was but a child, as also for that his mother led such a life, as it was doubted whether he were the sonne of BASSIANVS or no. In the Army, besides MACRINVS which was Pretorian Prefect, was AUDENTIUS, a man of good sort and of yeeres, very expert in the warres, and an excellent Captaine: of these two they were in great doubt whether they should choole, and in this doubt they continued two daies: and in the end they resolved to chuse AVENTIVS, who was a discreet old man, and little regarded the Empire; who considering the perils and disorders, would Audentius refused the Empire.

not accept thereof, excusing himselfe by reason of his great age, alledgeing, that he was not able to gouerne the Empire as it ought to be, a thing seldome scene that any man would refuse the Empire of the world. The men of warre perceiuing that AVENTIVS would not accept of the Empire, presently made choise of MACRINVS, who was the author of the murder and death of BASSIANVS; and so was chosen, and he gladly accepted of their election. This MACRINVS was of a very base stock and parentage, who with small deferred, and by way of fauour attained to the office of Pretorian Prefect. As soone as he was chosen Emperour, he made

Opilius Ma-crinus chosen Emperour.

made a notable flattering Oration to the Army, and payed the Souldiers, and distributed much money among them, thereby to purchase their loue and good will, and addrest himselfe with all haite against ARTABANVS, King of Parthia, who came with great power against the Romans, to be reuenged of the iniurie which BASSIANVS had done them, knowing nothing of his death. He also presentlie nominated and chose a sonne of his for his companion in the Empire, whose name was DIADUMENVS, whom he made to be called ANTONINVS, as well to take away the suspicion of the death of ANTONINVS BASSIANVS, as for that the name of ANTONINVS was very acceptable to the Romans, in remembrance of the good Emperours ANTONINVS PIVS; and MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS: for all these Emperours did leaue their owne names, or together with them did take the name of ANTONINVS, vntill that for the abominable and execrable life of ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, they left it, as we will presentlie declare. He also wrote long letters to the Senate and people of Rome, setting the manner of his election, and desiring them to approue the same, with many flatterie duties that he was not guiltie of the death of BASSIANVS. The Senate being certified of the death of BASSIANVS, approued the election of MACRINVS, and the election and companie of his sonne in the Empire.

A cruell battell betweene Ma-crinus and Artabanus.

Peace betweene Macrinus and Artabanus,
upon condition.

The cause of the death of Macrinus.

This new Emperour MACRINVS, and his sonne DIADUMENVS, going against ARTABANVS and the Parthians, who came very strong both in foote and horsemen, and also brought many camels with them, the two Armies came to a most cruell battaile which continued two daies, wherein both the Romans and the Parthians fought so valiantlie, as in both daies the darke night parted the fray, and either partie cried Victorie, victorie, although that in truth there was none: for the slaughter and number of the dead and wounded was equall.

MACRINVS, knowing that ARTABANVS came greatly enraged by reason of the iniurie done him by BASSIANVS, sent him Heraulds and Ambassadors, certifying him of the death of BASSIANVS: and moreover, that if he desired the friendship of the Romans, he would grant it. ARTABANVS, being aduersified of the death of his enimie BASSIANVS, was very joyfully of the newes: for vntill then he had no intelligence thereof, and was also glad of the peace offered him, which he accepted, vpon condition that all such prisoners as were taken by BASSIANVS through treacherie in time of truce, should be restored, which was accordingly performed; and they concluded a peace; and the King of Parthia returned home to his countrey; and MACRINVS, to Antioch in Syria: Where he gaue himselfe ouer to lust & sensuality, forgetting the government of the Empire, delaying his going to Rome, whither by letters from thence he was dayly sollicitated to come; wherein he committed a very great error: for if he had left his Army, and had gon to Rome, and there settled himselfe in the government of the Empire, without all doubt both his raigne and life had lasted longer; but he taking no care of that which he ought to haue done, and which most concerned him, gaue himselfe in Antioch to riot, pleasures, and banketting: whereat the Romane souldiers began much to murmur, and to make little account of him; moved thereto through their desire to returne into their countrey. They also much abhorred him for that he did most cruellie punish them: for in thosetimes loyaltie was so out of vse, and men of war had such libertie, were so audacious, and had taken such a custome to make Emperours, as they presentlie began to repine and murmur, yea and boldlie to speake ill of MACRINVS, and to wish his death, within little more then one yere after he had giuen him the Empire, and within few daies after plotted the same in this manner. In a citie of Phoenicia called Emesa, was young ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, who had there a Grandmother, sister to IVLIA wife to SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, which afterwards married with her sonne in law BASSIANVS, sonne of the same SEVERVS. This his Grandmother, whose name was MESA, had there another nephew called ALEXIANVS, of whom more shall be said hereafter, and she also had in her companie SIMIANTRA, mother of the said ANTONINVS, and another which was sister to ALEXIANVS.

This MESA was a very rich woman both in iewels and money: for she had been mother in lawe to two Emperours, the father and the sonne: and it is to be beleued that in their life time there were infinite bribes & gifts bestowed vpon her, and so she remained there after the death of BASSIANVS with her daughters and nephewes. These two colins, her nephewes, MESA made Priests in a most sumptuous Temple which she builded and consecrated to the Sunne, from whence it grew that this ANTONINVS was called HELIOGABALVS, which is as much to say, as a Priest of the Sunne: for the Phoenicians did call the Sun HELIOGABALVS, to which Temple for their vaine deuotions sake came many Romane souldiers of the Legions which which lay there in garison; and many from MACRINVS his camp also, whom this MESA, Grandmother to these youths, entertained very courteously, bestowing many gifts vpon them; and shewing them her nephew HELIOGABALVS, she vsed to tell them that this her nephew was sonne to their Emperour BASSIANVS, whom MACRINVS had slaine by treason. With these and such like effectuall speeches, she brought the matter to such passe, that what with the courttesie which she vsed towards them, and also for that the boy was a most fine child, they generally began to affect him, some by seeing him, and others by report of him; so as the whole Armie loued him, and desired that he might be their Lord and Emperour. And to the contrarie, MACRINVS being generally hated of all men, some Coronels and Captaines moved by the gifts and large promises made by this MESA vnto them, the greatest part agreed that they should send ANTONINVS to their Camp, and then they would proclaime him Emperour. The good old woman, who had bin accustomed to Emperours Courts, setting all other matters apart, tooke her nephew by the hand & went with him to the Camp, and he presentlie was received for Emperour, and they swore obedience vnto him (as writeth HERODIANVS). But IVLIUS CAPITOLINVS saith, that certaine of MACRINVS Legions being in a mutinie came to seeke HELIOGABALVS. But howsoeuer, as both the one and the other might be, HELIOGABALVS accepted of the Empire, being but fiftene yecers old: and the matter being published abroad, the newes thereof caused great alteration in mens minds; and all men began to affect him, for that he was both sonne & nephew to Emperours, and for the names sake of ANTONINVS, which they held for sacred and happie. MACRINVS presentlie vnderstood these newes in Antioch, where hee then was, and made lesse account thereof then he ought to haue done, iesting at HELIOGABALVS, for that he was but a childe, and at his mother and grandmother, deeming it sufficient to send a Captaine of his whole name was IVLIANVS, with certaine Legions to besiege, and so to ruine him: which (as it was thought) hee might easily haue effected, if he had himselfe gone presentlie in person. When IVLIANVS with his troups came, HELIOGABALVS forces were not of sufficient power to giue him battaile, but being in their Camp, which was well fortified and victualled, they suffered themselves to be besieged: but the souldiers of the one side conferring with those of the other; and those of the Campe shewing young HELIOGABALVS to IVLIANVS his souldiers, putting them in minde of his father, perswaded them to follow him. Whereof it insued, that they not onely did so, but apprehending their Captaine IVLIANVS, smote off his head, and went ouer to HELIOGABALVS; and the one and the other made such such an Armie, as MACRINVS resolved with his whole power to make head against HELIOGABALVS. Doing so, they ioyned battell in the confines of Syria and Phoenicia; in which, conscience and feare made HELIOGABALVS souldiers to fight valiantly; and of MACRINVS side only the Pretorian souldiers fought well, but all the rest of his Armie fought faintly, and a great part thereof abandoning him went ouer to HELIOGABALVS: wherefore he accounting himselfe lost and foreloren, fled from the battaile, and so HELIOGABALVS had the victorie. MACRINVS and his sonne, with certaine of their friends which would not forsake him, traualled with the greatest speed they could make, secretly, through the citie of Asiath to Elle, and came into Bithynia, with a determination to get to Rome; where MACRINVS knew that his coming was much desired. But falling grieuouly sick in the city of Chalcedonia, those which HELIOGABALVS sent to pursue him, found him there, and bringing letters and commandement to the citie, through the same of HELIOGABALVS his victorie they were obeyed; and MACRINVS lying sicke, void of all fauour and friendship, together with his sonne, was there put to death, within one yere and two moneths after that he had been chosen Emperour. And being dead, all men fixed their eyes and thoughts vpon HELIOGABALVS.

Surly, it is a pitifull thing to consider of the infelicicie and miserie of those times, to see how many Emperours were murdered, and how wicked and vicious the most part of them were; and how little time they reigned; and that which maketh me most to admire, is, to think how lightly they were slaine, notwithstanding that they were Lords of the whole world. And how easie a matter it was for a Captaine, hauing the fauour and friendship of five or sixe Legions, to make himselfe to be obeyed. So as it seemeth that he which first had intelligence of the Emperours death, and was any thing friended, and therewith doubtful adventure, was commonly chosen for his succesor, as we said of IVLIANVS: And that which is worse, that he which murdered the last Emperour commonly became his heire, as we see in MACRINVS and others. And touching him of whom we now discourse, one feeble old woman, and childe of foureteen or fiftene

The policy of Mesa to make Helioabalus
Emperour.

Helioabalus made Empe-
rour.

Tulianus, a captaine sent by Macrinus,
slaine by his owne souldiers.

A battaile where Helio-abalus had the victorie, and Macrinus fled.

Macrinus falling sicke in Chalcedonia, being oueraken
by such as Helio-abalus sent after him, was after him slaine.

fifteene yeeres old were sufficient to ouerthrow and ruine him, being an ancient, wife and mighty Emperor, and to bereaue him both of his life and Empire, and quietly and in peace to enjoy the same, if the contentment and rule of the wicked may be called peace and quietnes.

By this afore said it appears more cleer than the light, how variable and inconstant all things are in this world: and that there is no other firm and stable dominion or kingdom, but the seruice of God: whereof the faithfull Christians in those daies had especial care, and fought no worldly dominion, Magistracies nor Empire, but to liue holly and vprightly; and so, contemning the world, attained the euertlasting Kingdome of heauen. But these vnhappy Infidels forbore not to commit any cruelty or treason whatsoever, so as thereby they might gette the supreme gouernment and command, although it were but for three daies. God for their finnes permitted (for the example of others) that by the same means whereby they obtained it, by the self same they commonly lost it; being either put to death by the sword, or else by treason, as they had done by others. And, that which is worst of all, together with their bodies they lost their miserable soules: in such fort, as is said, it hapned to the Emperor MACRINVS, who died in the yeer of year of our Lord 220.

The seruice of God the fairly commended.

THE LIFE OF HELIOGABALVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, FIFT OF THOSE WHICH WERE CALLED ANTONIN, AND FOURE AND TWEN- TITH EMPEROVS OF ROME.

()
THE ARGUMENT.

Hellogabalus, being a Priest of the Sunne, attaining to the Empire, as soon as hee had taken the Imperiall dignity became so wicked, that in filthinesse he far surpassed all his Predecessors. He was most dishonest in his life, more than bestiall a lasciuious and intemperate man; and was so addicted to women, that he granted them to build a Senate by themselves. When he was near to the sea, he would eat no meat but such as were bred far within the land: and when he was far from it, he would eat nothing but sea-fish; neither would hee eat of any thing that was not of an excessive price. He was inclined to no kinde of vertue, neither regarded any but parasites, vssians, bawds, and such like persons: and all his actions were so abominable, and his riotousnes so great, that to write the same, were to amasse a heap of villany. He made one which was his cosen german, Cælar, a very honest and virtuous young man, whose name was Alexianus. He was slain by his souldiers; who, because they could not cast him into a most filthy ditch, traile him through the City, and throw him into the river Tiber, he having held the Empire for a certain time: the truth whereof is uncertain, Writers do so much differ; and had such a death as his filthy life had deserved.

MACRINVS dying as he deferred, ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, without any contradiction, was made Emperor: who in truth proued to be such, that in Histories there ought no memoriall to bee held of him, nor mention to be made of his life; to the end, that if it were possible, none should knowe that such a monster had euer attained to the Majesty of the Romane Empire, if we had not already written the liues of CALVOYA, NERIO, VITELLIVS, COMMODVS, and such others. But as one and the same ground commonly produceth vnholysome hearbs full of payson, and which kill; and likewise good and holysome, which heale, and feedeth both sheepe and serpents: So in our Historie, in recompence of these wicked Princes, we will oppose

OCTAVIAN, VESPASIAN, TITVS, TRAIAN, ADRIAN, ANTONINVS PI-

VS,

VS, M. AVRELIVS, and (in part) SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS; who were singular Emperors, and gouerned the Empire with great wildome and equity. And so the vices of the one are to be laied open, as well as the vertues of the other; to the end, that if any Prince of our time shall read their liues, he may see how abominable and detestable their actions were; and so, eschewing the euil, and making choice of the good, may follow the same; and may consider how short a time those cruell and vitious Emperors reigned, and what shamefull and fatal ends they had; and how that the good liued and gouerned longer time, and ended their daies in peace and quiet, dying their naturall death: except some which were murdered by traitors, to vsurp the Empire.

But, coming to HELIOGABALVS: when he had obtained the victory, and that MACRINVS was slain, and he chosen Emperor, hee wrote the most louing and kinde Letters to Rome that could be deuised. But the Senate and people of Rome did hardly digest the newes; for, they would rather haue had MACRINVS: but, daring to do nothing to the contrary, they yeilded obedience to HELIOGABALVS; of whom they presently conceiued a good hope, for that which they heard of his gallant feature, and of the good constitution of his body, and for the names sake of ANTONINVS, which in Rome was exceedingly much beloued and respected. In the beginning of his Raig (by reason of his yong age) all things were ordered by the counsell and direction of his grandmother MESA, and her fauourites: who, taking order for all matters in the East, determined to come speedily to Rome with the yong Emperor, which shee put in execution; but was driuen to stay longer than shee purposed, by reason of the winter which was very tempestuous. Wherefore she wintred in Bithynia, where he began to discouer his wicked inclination, giuing himself to most odious luxurie; and apprelling himself in such attire as was fit vnto an Emperor, and feeding on most delicious fare, he gaue himself ouer to all sensuality: which faults his prudent old grandmother endeouored by speech and good admonition to reform and amend; but she prevailed nothing. Being come to Rome, hee was most solemnly receiued; where he spent the whole time of his Raig in such manner, as wee haue nothing else to write of this Emperor, but of his abominable vices: which were such, that I neither can nor will describe them for the filthinesse thereof. The first thing he took in hand after his coming to Rome, was, To build a Temple to his god the Sun, or HELIOGABALVS, whose Priest hee had been in Phœnicia. Hee procured that the Christians (whose number at that time was infinite) should also build that for a Temple, and therein should vse their ceremonies, make their prayers, and doo their deuotion to CHRIST. But it pleased not God to permit, that the Sun, being a creature, should in worship be made equal to the Creator. He shewed himself so effeminate, and so addicted to women, that the first time he went to the Senate, he carried his mother SYMMIATRA with him, and took order that her opinion should be demanded in all causes; and that from thenceforth shee should bee present when any matters of importance were determined: a thing neuer seen, that any woman vntill then had any voice in the Senate of Rome. After this, hee made a Chapter-house or Senate apart; where women should meet and confult, what apparell and attire the Roman Matrones should wear. And, proceeding to a far more shamefull practice, he commanded certain Stews to be made in his Palaces, of common women, for his friends and fauourites. And, delighting himself so much in the company of such, he commanded vpon a day all the women that could be found of that name and life, to be assembled together; and hee, clad in womens attire, came into the place where they were, and made a very set and studied Oration vnto them, calling them Commilitones; a word vsed by Captains to their souldiers when they would doo them honour, by calling them their fellows and companions in Arms. The matters which there were treated of, were inuentions & means how to practise their filthinesse and abomination: and thither he brought with him ruffians and bawds, which were his Brokers in those detestable actions and assemblies. In truth, this HELIOGABALVS was so detestable in all manner of vices, that it cannot be sufficiently expressed. He was so great a spender, and so prodigall in his attire, and in the furniture of his house, in his fare and diet, and his other follies, as that which is written of him seems incredible. HERODIANVS and AELIVS LAMPRIIDIUS write his life; wherein they recount most strange matters, besides what other Authors report of him. All his study and care was, To deuise how he might spend excessively, and to finde out such dainties and delicacies as neuer had bin thought of. He neuer fare but among sweet-smelling flowers, mixed with Amber, Musk, and other most exquisite sweet odors; neither would hee eat any thing but should be of an excessive price, and sought means to make all those things which he did eat to be most costly; and vsed to Mesa, grandmother and gouerness, as the Heliogabalus.

Heliogabalus
built a temple in Rome, and dedicated the same to the Sunne.

A Senate of women made in Rome by Heliogabalus.

The prodigallitie of Heliogabalus.

P lay,

say, that that meate had no taste, which was not deare bought. He attired himselfe in cloath of gold and purple, set with pearles and most precious stones: and euen on his shooes he wore stones of incalimable value. The chamber wherein he lay and all his palace, was furnished with cloath of gold, silver, and of silke, and his beds were of cloath of gold, of siluer, and of silke, couered with Roses and sweete flowers; among which were strowed many iewels and pearles: And all the way wherupon hee should set his feet, betwene his chamber and the place where he took horse or coach, when he would ride abroad, he made to be couered with the powder of gold & siluer: for he disdained to tread vpon the earth, as other men did. All his tables, chests, chaires, and vessels of seruice for his chamber, euen to the basest offices, as close stooles, chamber-pots, and such like, were all of fine gold. He made no account of wax light, but had in his hall and chambers great lamps, which in stead of oile burned most excellent Balsame, brought from Indea and Arabia: and euen his very vrinals were made of Onyx and other most precious stones. His expences were so infinite and so excessive, as no Kings reuenues in the world were sufficient to defray the charge thereof, but his onely: for he deuoured all the reuenues of Spaine, France, Africa, part of Germanie, Italie, England, Sicilia, Grecia, Asia, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, and of all the Ilands and prouinces of the world; and yet all this was not sufficient but that he endured want, by reason of his prodigious expences: for he neuer wore any one fute of apparell twice, being such as wee haue said. His fingers were euer full of rings, and those which he had had once put off, he neuer wore any more: and so in plate of gold or siluer, he would neuer drinke twice of one cup: which hee gaue to him that serued and attended on him that day. And the very Bathes wherein hee did vie to bathe himselfe, must be new built, and furnished with perfumes, and most precious odours; and after once bathing they were to be throwne downe: so as they built new Bathes continually. His matteresses and beds were neither of wooll, flocks, nor feathers; but of the downe growing vnder the wings of Partridges. He made certaine feasts in Rome, which were the greatest and most sumptuous that euer were: and hee gaue to the citizens and souldiers a donatiue and distribution of money and corne, to an infinit value. After the feasts and sacrifices were ended, he gaue to the people (as HERODIANVS reporteth) great store of plate, gold, siluer, and other iewels, which truly was the cause why they endured this detestable man the little time he liued in the Empire, for the desire of those gifts and benefits which they enjoyed by him, as also for that his grandmother, being a most wise and discrete woman, fought by all means to reforme his voluptuous sensuality and rioting, and to procure a good order in the gouernment. But there were great oppressions in the prouinces, and the barbarous nations inuaded the frontiers of the Empire. For he gaue all offices and places of charge vnto wicked men, which did accompanie him in his abominations, and by their counsell he was gouerned: for, depriving all offices and Magistracies from all charge, he sent them into exile. Among which his favorites, one whose name was ZOTICVS was so priuate, and in such fauour with him, that he was held as a Lord ouer all the rest. This mans counsell was as a law vnto him, and by his direction all offices and Magistracies were sold; and he made Consuls such as were the sonnes of slaues, and men of most base condition.

Zoticus a favorite of Helio-gabalus.

*Alexander Se-uerus chosen by Helio-
gabalus
for his companion in the Empire.*

*The credit of Alexander Se-
uerus.*

The like order he obserued in the chusing of Generals and Lieutenants, giuing those charges vnto base and simple men: for which and his other vices, notwithstanding that they made benefit of his prodigality, yet both the people & souldiers began to wish his death, so as he was oftentimes in great danger. Which when his mother & grandmother perceiued, they perswaded him to adopt his cousin germane ALEXANDER, and to make him his companion in the Empire, who was the son of MAMA his mothers sister, which he performed accordingly, and ALEXANDER was called ALEXANDER SEVERVS; ALEXANDER after the name of the great ALEXANDER K. of Macedonia; and SEVERVS after SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS, grandfather to HELIOGABALVS.

This young man was so well inclined, and so well bred, that during the time his Cousen led a wicked and infamous life, hee spent his time in learning, conuersing with learned men, and such as were good and honest, and exercising himselfe in Armes and in such other practices, as were fit for a Knight and a vertuous Gentleman, and fought excellent matters to instruct him in all those faculties. Wherefore, all men, conceiuing good hope of him, began to loue and affect him; and the hatred which they bare against HELIOGABALVS daily encreased. Which hee perceiuing, fought means to kill ALEXANDER, or at the least to deprive him of the name of CÆSAR, and his successor: But he could not effect it, by reason of the diligence vsed by his Grandmother in protecting him: and also for that that the men of warre deereley loued him; but vpon a time they would haue slaine HELIOGABALVS for that cause, as he was walking in a garden: where he escaped by hiding himselfe in a corner, so as he was not seene; and through the entreatie of ANTIOCHIANVS, who was his Pretorian Prefect, the souldiers returned to their Campe, where remaining in a tumult and mutiny, they threatened him; and vpon composition, they required that HELIOGABALVS should put from him, certaine vicious and wicked persons which were very priuate with him, and which fold and gaue offices for bribes; and after this manner dispatched the business which men had with the Emperour. They also required that certaine of their companies might haue the particular guard of ALEXANDER SEVERVS, to the end that HELIOGABALVS should not kill him; and that his favorites and familiars should not conuerse with him, for corrupting him with their euill conditions: all which demands were presently put in execution.

But after that the furie of the Cohorts was pacified, HELIOGABALVS returned to his former abominable vices, gluttonies, and incredible expences. First when he went forth of Rome (as sometimes he did) he had with him six hundred chariots and horsefellers: the principal carriage was most dishonest young boies and wenches, with bowdes and their interpreters; and all was little enough, considering his insatiable beastliness: for as he was most luxurious, so did he account it for a greatness, to haue the companie of one woman but once; except her two whom he was married, and that one he neither loued nor regarded. For as HERODIANVS reporteth, he first married a Romane Ladie, of a Noble house, to whom he gaue the name of AVGVSTA, and other titles; and within a while after he forsook her and deprived her both of her name & honour; and married himselfe to a Vestall virgin: which in the vanitie of the Gentiles was held for a matter so religious, that she which had carnall knowledge of a man, was buried aliue. And so he left her and took another, behauing himselfe as a most beastly barbarous man.

*Helio-
gabalus
his progress.*

*Helio-
gabalus
his wife.*

And amongst other matters, he did one thing which the diuell himselfe would neuer haue imagined, which was, he commanded that all businesses to be done by day, should be dispatched by night; and those that were to be done by night, should be done by day; and so he arose from his bed at the sun setting, and was then saluted as other Emperours were in the morning; and he said him to sleepe about day breaking, so as it seemed that the world went backwards. All his studie was to finde means to spend excessively in his diet, and in all other things. That supper which was of least price did commonly cost thirte pound waight of gold, which after out computation, might amount to the value of about a thousand pounds sterling; and there were some which did cost threescore thousand crownes. Sometimes he promised to giue his guests a Phenix to eat, whereof (they say) there is but one in the world, or else he would giue them a great quantitie of gold for it: which he afterwards performed. When he was neere to the sea, he would neuer eate any fish, but land fowle, and other flesh which should be brought from farre. And when he was farre from the sea, he would eate nothing but fish, which by Posts was brought fresh and aliue, to the end that it should be deere and costly. And for the same reason he would eate such things as were neuer thought of, and had a great quantitie of eury thing: as, of the combs of Cockes, the tongues of Peacocks and of Nightingales. To all his whole Court (which was without number) he made ordinarily to be giuen to eat, certaine great beasts, stuffed or sauced with puddings, made of the liues and lights of Peacocks, of small birds braies, Partridges, Gees, Parrots, and Pheasants heads. He also kept certaine dogs and hounds, which did eate nothing but the soules of Geese: and his Lions (which were many) were fed with Pheasants and other costly birds, for this was all his studie. Truly, who shall well consider of this mans expences, may coniecture what the chargemight be, and how hard they were to be gotten. He also spent infinite summes of money in keeping of all kinds of the most fierce wild beasts in the world, which were brought from farre countries, as Lions, Panthers, Onices, Tigres, Hippotames, Crocodiles and many other suchlike. And if he were by the sea side, hee accounted it a speciall greatness of minde, to sinke such shipping as he should finde there laden with merchandise, paying afterwards the worth both of shippes and goods. And being vpon a time reprooued thereof by a friend, who asked him what he ment to waste and consume so much, warning him to take heed that he stood not in need hereafter, he answered what better thing can there be, then for a man to be hie to himselfe liuing? And said moreover, that he desired not to haue any children, for that they peraduenture through desire to rule would conspire against him.

*Helio-
gabalus turned the day into night, and the night into day.*

*Helio-
gabalus
his diet.*

The vituperable death of HelioGabalus.

Finally, the vices and leud conditions of this wicked Emperour were such; as in that kinde, none either before or after him was to be compared with him: wherefore I will not spend any longer time in so bad a subiect; for the rest of his doings were so filthy and abominable, as they neither may well be written, neither ought to be published; and so could not long be endured: neither were the means used by his grandmother M. A. S. A. sufficient to protect him, nor to pacifie the wrath & rage the people had conceiued against him. Having (according to HERODIANVS) reigned six yeeres (yet AURELIUS VICTOR, and EVROPIVS say, that he reigned but two yeeres and eight monthes) the Pretorian Souldiers conspired against him. And as AURELIUS LAMPRIIVS reporteth, they came one day armed from their Camp; and hauing slaine most of his seruants, and such as were his companions in his beastly actions, they killed him in this manner. First they hated him out of a Priuie, wherein he (flying from them) had hidden himselfe; and then drawing him from thence, they threw him into a most filthy sink: from whence (for that therein was not roome enough for him) they traile him like a dogge through the principall places of Rome, and threw him into the riuer Tiber, and tied grece stones and waights about him, to the end that his body should neuer be found againe, and so want buriall. All this was done to the good liking and contentment of the people; and the Senate also approoued the same, and commanded that he should no more be called ANTONINVS; and that in detestation of him, no other Emperour should euer afterwards be called by that name; and that he should be called TRAIANVS, according to the manner of his death. HERODIANVS writeth, that he was slaine in the Campe out of Rome, whither he went with his cosen ALEXANDER SEVERVS: and that they killed his mother also, who went with them. Wherefoeuer it was, it was in this manner, and he died according to his deserts, and conformable to the life which he had led: for it is the will of God, that wicked princes make euill ends. For being by his diuine providence made lords to gouerne and giue good example to their people, to minister iustice and equitie, and to correct and punish the wicked and malefactors; these by their owne euill example hurt and corrupt others; and protect and support the wicked. Let Kings and great Lords and Princes know, that as they haue grece power then others, so haue they lesse libertie to sinne and to commit wickednes, and so God inflicteth greater shame and punishment vpon them, then vpon other men. HELIOGABALVS, after the opinion of HERODIANVS, died at the age of twentie yeeres: for he saith that he reigned six yeeres; and all agree that at the age of foureteene yeeres, he came to the Empire. AURELIUS VICTOR saith, that he died in the seuenteenth yeere of his age, and is of opinion that he reigned not fully three yeeres; which (according to EVSEBIUS) was in the yeere of our Lord 224. whereby it appeareth that this Emperour reigned not about foure yeeres, and so the same B. E. S. A. affirmeth in his ecclesiasticall Historie.

Ann. dom. 225.

THE LIFE OF ALEXANDER SEVERVS, ONE OF THIS NAME SECOND OF THE SEVERI, AND FIVE AND TWENTIETH EMPEROVR.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the death of HelioGabalus, his cosen Alexander Seuerus took the Empire, under whom it seemed that the Romanes commonwealth had a flourishing for he retained in the imperiall dignitie, the good parts which his cosen had learnedly desired, that all things should be ordered and gouerned by wise and learned men. He was very seuer to Iudges, sharply punishing those which for their meanes had swayed from the right line of reason and equitie. In warres he was most fortunate, as a man which gouerned with wisdom, and he returned to Rome triumphing from the East, to the great contentment of the Romanes people. He was no enemy to the Christians, but gave libertie to such as would become Christian.

Christian, setting up the image of Christ in his Temples; and he had an intent to haue erected a particular Temple to his name, but was thwarted by his Priests. Finally, the German soldiers, unable to endure the ferocity of his military discipline, slew him, together with his mother Mammea instigated thereto by one Maximianus. His death was much deplored in Rome; for it was hoped, that seeing in his youth he gouerned so well, he would do much better when he should come to ripen yeeres.

After the darke cloudes of the forpast miseries and sorowes which miserable Rome had endured, it pleased God to send them ioy, and contentment: for when this accursed HELIOGABALVS was dead, by the common consent of the Senate, and of the Romane people, and of all the men of warre, his cosin german ALEXANDER SEVERVS, was sworne and obeyed for Emperour; who was the sonne of HELIOGABALVS mothers sister called MAMMEA; and his fathers name was VARIVS, borne in Syria, in a citie called Emesa. He came to the Empire being of the age of 16. yeeres, and gouerned the same little more then 13. yeeres, with such wisdom and integritie, that he is accounted one of the best Emperours that euer hath bin in the world: whereto was a great help the discretion and good aduice of his mother, who was a good and discreet woman, vnto whom her sonne was most obedient. AURELIUS LAMPRIIVS, and HERODIANVS report so many excellencies of this Emperour, that of necessitie I must needs make some little stay, as on a pleasing subiect. First, he was much affected to learning, and hauing excellent men for his maisters and tutors, he was very skillfull in all the liberall sciences: for he was a good Mathematician, and did perfectly vnderstand the rules of Geometrie. He was much delighted with Musick, and could paint and carue very well, and had good skill in Song: but he neuer sung but in secret, in the hearing of some of his chamber. He was a very good Poet, and wrote some workes in verse, and could play on the viol, the organs & the lute, more then indifferently well; but after he was Emperour, no man euer saw him do it. Vnspeakable was the ioy which was in Rome vpon the day of his election, and coming to the Empire; and infinite were the blessings which by the Senate & people of Rome were poured vpon him that day. Beginning his reigne with the loue and good will of all men, he gouerned the same with such discretion, as he rather seemed a wise old man then a youth: and by the aduice & counsel of his wife mother, he chose the wisest, best, and most experienced men that could be found for his counsellors: and he neither did, nor decreed any thing without their opinion and aduice: notwithstanding that of himselfe he was of singular iudgement, and so wise, as no man could deceiue him. He had euer neere vnto him DOMITIUS VIPIANVS, a wise man and excellent Lawyer, and of a good & holie life, by whose counsel he did chiefly dispose of all matters in his gouernment: although that at that time there were of his counsell FABIVS SABINVS, a iust and vpriight man, who was called the CATO of his time; and with these, POMPONIVS and AELPHENVS, AFRICANVS, VERULEIVS, MODESTINVS, IULIVS PAVLVS, MEGIANVS, CELSVS, PROCVLVS, MARTIANVS, CALISTRATVS, FLORANTINVS; all noble, vertuous and learned men in the lawes, and which had bin shollers to the great PAPIANVS: vnto which he ioined other most noble men, as his kinsman CATILIVS SEVERVS, CALVS MARCELLVS, AURELIUS SERENIANVS, which were good and vpriight men, and others whom he found out, to the end he might in all things follow their directions & aduice as he euer did; by reason whereof, his gouernment was highly extolled and pleasing, and there was a sodaine alteration in all things: for in the time of HELIOGABALVS, and of his father BASSIANVS, many insolencies and disorders were committed and tolerated.

Wherefore the first thing that ALEXANDER SEVERVS did, was, To reform all the offices and magistracies in his owne House & Imperiall Palace, displacing and discharging all those vitious and dishonest persons which HELIOGABALVS had established there; neither would he admit any man to his seruice, or to any office in his house, that was not an honest man, and of good fame and behauiour. The like hee did by all the Iudges which HELIOGABALVS had made; and also, in the Senate and in the order of Knighthood, hee restored to their offices and dignities those which vnjustly had beene depriued. He obserued so good a rule and order in his gouernment, that all matters of iustice were to bee determined by men learned in Maximian took Seuerus for his mother.

Wife and learned men, Alexander Seuerus his Counsellors.

Alexander first reformed his owne house.

the lawes: and matters concerning the warres were managed by wife men, and such as had experience therein, and by such wise old men as were well read in Antiquities and in ancient Histories. Finally, hee neuer gaue any charge to any man either for fauour or reward, but for desert and sufficiency onely; being thereto chosen by him and the Senate.

He held another custome which in my opinion was very commendable; that when hee resolved to send to any City or Prouince a new Gouverner, hee gaue them to vnderstand thereof, making his name knowne to them before hand; to the end, that if any man could except against him why he ought not to be preferred, another might be provided; but the allegation must be iust and true: otherwise, they were grievously punished who did falsely slander or defame him. This custome it may bee he learned of the Christians of that time, who chose their Priests and Bishops by voices, for their vertues and good works; and in no case he would permit, that any office of iustice, of what kinde soeuer, should be bought or sold; and he made diligent inquiry thereof, and did rigorously punish the offenders: for, said he; He that buyeth his office, must sell iustice; and I cannot endure merchants of charges and offices: for, if I tolerate them, I cannot afterwards condemn their doings; and I shall be ashamed to punish him that bought, seeing I permitted him to buy.

Besides all this, he was a most seuerer punisher of such Iudges as took bribes; and vsed to say, that he alwaies had his finger in a readinesse to pull out that Iudges eies which was partiall, or a receiver of bribes & rewards; wherein he was so extreme, that, among other Senators, one coming to do him reuerence who had bin accused thereof, he cried out aloud, that ARABINVS (for, so was his name) did not onely lye, but should him for senselesse and of no worth, seeing he dared to appear in his presence. Also they write of him, that he, seeing an vnjust Iudge, was so troubled therewith, and choler did so much abound and ouercome him, that it made him to vomit. To the contrary, he did greatly honour those Gouverners and Iudges which were good; and, when he passed through their Prouinces, he took them into his litter or chariot with him, and bestowed many fauours and rewards vpon them; and, the better to vnderstand the truth concerning these men, he vsed singular diligence and care, the manner whereof was this: Hee had certain secret and vnknowne chosen honest men, which diligently looked into the dealings of Magistrates; and sought to knowe the truth of all that passed in all the Prouinces of the Empire. Which care I would to God the Princes of our time had; for, besides that iustice should then be duely executed, they should knowe the good from the bad; and then they should bee informed of many injuries done in secret, which for fear are concealed by those which endure them; so as the truth neuer comes to light, and the errors and abuses are seldome punished.

SEVERVS desired also that good Iudges, Gouverners and Magistrates, should remain long in their offices and charges; and did vsue to say, that it was not a sufficient punishment to deprive an euill Gouverner of his charge, but to giue him most seuerer punishment; yea euen to bereaue him of life. When hee sent any one to succeed in the place where had been a good Iudge, hee sent to him to giue him thanks in the name and behalf of the whole Common-wealth, and bestowed rewards vpon him; as, possessions, herds of cattell, and corn, with many other things. As for money, he gaue but little: for, this Prince although he was very liberall, yet was he nothing prodigall; and the gifts which he gaue were for the most part such goods as fell to him by confiscation, and by order of law and iustice, and such things as became void by some mens death which died without issue or heirs, and so fell to him. But of his money he was euer very sparing; for, he vsed to say, that the publique rents and reuenues ought not to be spent, but in publique Buildings, in the warres, and in publique occasions; and not vpon the Princes Fauorites and Familiars: and so both within and without Rome hee built most sumptuous and stately edifices of Palaces, Baths, Theatres, Courts of Audience, and many other. He abated the ordinary charges of his house, and reduced it to a convenient order, abolishing the superfluous Expenses of his Predecessors. He apparelled himself decently, but not costly, and neuer wore any precious stones or jewels, neither would hee haue any in his chamber; houlding it for a vanity; that a thing of so small a quantity should be of so great a price. His diet was ordinary, neither delicious nor costly. He was a great feeder: for, he had a good stomach, not that he took any delight therein. In drinking he was very temperate, and neuer exceeded mediocrity. And although hee were very careful of his publique Rents, and the Reuenues of his Exchequer, yet hee neuer increased the same; neither inuented any new impositions; but rather mitigated and limited those which HELLIOBALVS had imposed: so as in his time the third part of the tribute was not paid, as was in the time of his Predecessors. He also reformed the coins of gold

Alexander liberally, but not prodigally.

and silver, and the value thereof; so as, although it cannot be denied but that he was most careful in augmenting his treasure, and in preferring the same, he cannot be charged to haue wronged or endangered any man. He punished all offences ordinarily, but without cruelty; and above all he was most seuerer against theues: vpon whom he had no mercy; but was very liberal to such as he knew to be poor, to the end they should haue no occasion to steal, or to couet other mens goods.

In all other actions hee was very mercifull, and shewed great clemency; in such sort, that in his time there was nor any Senator put to death, neither any other man, but that his accusation was thoroughly heard; and his offense sufficiently proued. Hee neuer gaue any office, or charge of government, for fauour, or in reward of seruice done him, but for desert; and vsed to say, that offices and places of charge were not to be giuen to such as sought or laboured to haue them; but to those which refused them. He neuer chose any Senator, but by the voice and consent of the whole Senate: much lesse made he any man a Knight that was the sonne of a bond-man, or of base condition, as other Emperors had done. Besides all this, he was so affable and milde in condition, that he admitted any man to his presence, and heard him willingly. He longingly visited all men of esteem in time of their sickness, and permitted any man to inform him in person of his affairs: and, having vnderstood the demands to bee reasonable, hee performed their requests; if otherwise, hee debated the matter with them, and made them to see their error. Being sometimes reproved by his mother and wife, who was the daughter of SEPTIMIUS (a man worthy to haue been, and had been Consul) alleging, that hee beeing so priuate and familiar made his Raig of lesse authority and reputation: hee answered, that it was true; but yet it was thereby the more firm and durable.

Among all his vertues he had one which did excell; whereby it is to beleeued, that although he were an Infidel, yet God gaue him the grace to gouern well: which was, that he permitted all those that would, to become Christians; so as in all his time there was no persecution, neither were the Christians grieved: and in his Temples he had the image and picture of CHRIST, and of ABRAHAM. But, as a blinde man without knowledge, he accounted him among his other gods; and would haue acknowledged and adored CHRIST for a God, and haue built him a Temple a-part, if hee had not been disuaded by his Priests. Notwithstanding all these good conditions wherewith this Prince was adorned, the people did not forbear to murmur against him; complaining, that he was too much ruled by his mother, who was reported to bee a most couetous woman, although in all other matters she was held for excellently wife, and very honest and vertuous.

ALEXANDER, houlding so good a form and rule of government in time of peace, failed not to doo the like in time of war, and in the exercise of military discipline; so as in the warres which hapned hee thoroughly performed the office & duty of a good and most valiant Captain, especially in those which were most dangerous, as in brief I will declare; particularly in that which hee had against the Persians, wherein hee obtained most noble victories: and although HERODIANVS writeth otherwise, yet in this place he is not to bee beleued; for, all other Writers affirm the contrary. And this his notable victorie against ARTABAXXES the mighty King of the Persians, is recited by ELIUS LAMPRIDIUS, EVTHROPIUS, SEPTIMIUS AVRELIVS VICTOR, EUSEBIUS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, and other ancient Authors: so as HERODIANVS onely writeth this war after another manner, to the dishonour of ALEXANDER, being deceived by false information or report; or otherwise of malice, or vpon some particular occasion.

To the end that the Reader may the better vnderstand this war which ALEXANDER had with the Persians, it shall be requisite he call to memory, that in ancient time, when the mighty King CYRVS translated the Monarchie from the Medes to the Persians, ouercoming King ASTYAGES: this their Monarchie and power lasted 200 and odd yeeres, and they grew verier rich and powerful; vntill, in the time of DARIVS, who gouerned infinite Nations and prouinces, ALEXANDER the Great took Arms against him and entred ASIA: where coming to a battaile with him, DARIVS was ouerthrowne and slaine, and ALEXANDER made himselfe Lord of ASIA, and so the Monarchie of the Persians ended, passing to the Grecians; and the kingdomes of ASIA remained for some space vnder the successors of ALEXANDER the Great; vntill that a valiant man whose name was ARSACES, borne in the countrie of the Parthians, arose and made himselfe King, whereby the dominion of the descendents and lineage of the Greeks, was transported to the Parthians; and it became a most famous kingdom, and greatly

Alexander held
the image of Christ and of Abraham in his temples.

The originally succession, and continuance of the Kingdom of the Persians, by monarchie of the Persians.

greatly feared during the time of his successors, which lasted about four hundred yeeres, and the most of them (after his name) were called ARSACIDVS. With this Nation of the Parthians, the Romans had often very dangerous warres, and they euer stood in feare of them.

Artabanus the last King of the Parthians.

ARTABANVS being King of the Parthians, of whom in the life of BASSIANVS and of MACRINVS we made mention; a Persian borne, being a man of base lineage, but of great courage and very politike, whose name was ARTABANVS, took Armes and rebelled, and by little and little grew to be very powerfull, and comming to a battaile with ARTABANVS, he ouerthrew and slew him, and made himselfe a mightie King. And so he againe restored the Kingdome of the Persians, and defeated the kingdome of the Parthians: Which the Romans were neuer able to doe. And he gaue it out, that he would restore the kingdome of the Persians to their ancient power and greatness: and not content herewith, he began to inuade the borders of the Romane Empire, infesting the countries of Syria and Mesopotamia. These newes being brought to ALEXANDER, who was then in Rome, and had therein reigned three yeeres in peace, exceedingly beloued of all men; and having intelligence of the power and forces of this King; duly considering thereof, and holding the action to be very honourable, he presently with all expedition made preparation for this warre, and went himselfe in person into Asia with an infinite number of men of warre. HERODIANVS writeth, that he first sent his Ambassadors vnto ARTABANVS, requiring him to containe himselfe without the bounds of the Empire, and to liue in peace with him. Which request ARTABANVS (seeing himselfe rich in treasure and very mightie) would not performe, perswading himselfe that it was an easie matter for him to become Lord of all Asia. SEVERVS being come into Syria, the wars began on either side to be very cruel and bloudie. In which warre he obserued so good order and discipline, that it hath not been read or heard, that any other excellent Capitaine hath shewed greater iudgement, or vsed greater diligence. First, he maintained such iustice in his Army, and so severely punished theft, robberies, violences, injuries and misdemeanors committed by his souldiers, that his Campe seemed to be a very well gouerned Citie. He was very careful concerning munition and victuals, as well to provide them, as to preserve them; and that no man should robbe or defraude any man: so as if any Capitaine or Coronell detained neiter so small a quantitie of his souldiers allowance in any thing, he was condemned to die. And in other things he was very diligent and careful, principally in curing those which were sick or wounded in the Armie. He endeouored that all his souldiers should alwaies bee in very good order; well apparelled, and well armed, and their horses very ready and well furnished, their Ensignes and Tents very neate and good: He behaued himselfe very familiarly with his souldiers; and when he at dinner or supper, his Paullion stood euer open, and he sat in the view and sight of all men, hauing no other meate, but such as all the rest did eate. Besides all this, he paid his souldiers with advantage, and bestowed many rewards vpon them: and otherwise he was very severe in punishing offences; so as if his Armie marched among gardens and orchards, they durst not any thing that might deserue to be reprehended; and he that did otherwise, was whipped with rods of iron. But if he were a man of worth and qualitie, he reprobued him with sharpe and reproachfull speeches; hauing these words euer in his mouth: Doe not that to another, which thou wouldest not another should doe vnto thee: which he learned (as hee said) of the Christians. Other more hainous offences or mutinies, he punished with such rigor, that sometimes he tithed whole legions, which was, to put to death the tenth man of all the legion. He did as little endure that any Capitaine or Coronell should wrong a souldier, or that hee should diminish the least part of a souldiers pay, or allowance: And if he saw that a souldier was poore and out of apparell, he relieved him with what he thought necessarie for him: for (quoth he) how can that souldier liue vnder due command, which hath not clothes on his back, and money in his purse: for hunger and penurie will put him in despaire, and make him aduenture to doe that which he ought not. For these and such like matters, which would bee long to relate, this Emperour was infinitely beloued, and feared by all his men of warre: and in his time souldiers were better ordered, gouerned and trained then in the time of any other Emperour.

Warres with the Persians.

The singular good order and pauilion for the Armie.

Note the mar-tiall discipline of Alexander
Seuerus.

The pietie of Alexander.

What is to beate a Legion.

Returning to the Persian warre, during the time it lasted, there passed betwene the Armies of the one and other partie, many great skirmishes and encounters; wherein were many notable feares of Armies, vntill that at the last they came to a battaile wherein they ioyned with all their whole forces; ARTABANVS bringing in his Armie an innumerable company of foot-
men

men, and 130000 horsemen (a proud and bold nation, for the victories which they had lately obtained against the Parthians) and had moreouer in his Armie seven hundred Elephants, and one thousand and eight hundred Chariots armed with fithes, which the Persians then vsed in the wars. The Emperour of the other side brought so many men, both of foot and horse, as hee who was Lord and Commander of the Roman Empire might be able to leuie. SEVERVS in this battell performing the office of an excellent Capitaine, visiting every Squadron, encouraging the souldiers with most kinde speeches, calling them by their proper names, promising them great rewards, and fighting in person a great part of the day like a valiant Knight; in the evening (for, so long did the fight continue) hee wanne one of the most fierce and cruell battells that euer was fought in the world. King ARTABANVS escaped by flight; and there were slain in that battell ten thousand horsemen, and so many footmen that they could not be numbered: as it appeareth by the Oration which SEVERVS made in the Senate after his return to Rome; which is recited by LAMPRIDIUS. And by the same it appeareth, that there were slain by the Romans two hundred Elephants, and that three hundred were taken, with one thousand armed chariots, and a great number of Persians; which afterwards were ransomed for a great summe of money. So as after this victory, the Emperour, without any resistance, recovered those Countries which ARTABANVS had taken: and, passing through Mesopotamia, he enlarged the bounds of the Empire; and, leaving therein such a guard as he thought fit, hee returned to the City of Antioch. Being in that City (according to the custom of the Roman Generall) hee paid his souldiers, and gaue them great rewards, diuiding the spoils of the victory among them; so as they remained infinitely joyfull and well contented.

130000 horsemen in one Army

A most great battell fought betwene the Romans and the Persians.

And so, leaving all parts of the East in peace and quiet, he returned to Rome; where hee entered in triumph with greater solemnity and pomp than euer any had triumphed before him; his chariot being drawn (to the wonder of the beholders) by Elephants which he had taken: and all the people and Senate of Rome blessed him, and received him with vnspokeable joy. Arthur Infant, FVRVVS CILVS obtained a great victory against the Mauritanians and Tingitians in Africa, which rebelled. And, in Germany, VARIVS MACRINVS had very good successe: and, from Armenia, IVNIVS PALMATVS returned with victory.

Alexander came into Rome in triumph.

The victory of Furius C. C. in Africa.

After this triumph was ended, SEVERVS made the accustomed donatiue and distribution among the souldiers and people of Rome, with the feasts and ordinary huntings; remaining in Rome certain yeers, in hearing causes and doing iustice. And in such sort hee diuided the houres, as there was no jot of time lost, and the time of leasure he spent in reading of excellent books; principally, PLATO'S Common-wealth, and TULLIVS'S Offices: and he did often vse to read HORACE and VIRGIL.

He liuing thus in peace and tranquillity, deeply beloued of the Romans, and by all the Provinces subject to the Empire, it being about the thirteenth yeer of his reign, the high Germans and other northerly Nations, with such fury and such infinite numbers of men (as in former time they had vsed to doe) took Arms against the Empire; so as, hauing past the riuers of Danube and the Rhine, they put all Italie in great fear. By reason whereof, the good Emperour ALEXANDER SEVERVS with all haste departed from Rome, with the greatest forces hee then could leuie; which was not done without great grief and heauinesse of the Roman people; so deeply was he generally beloued. And then the warres began between his forces and the Germans; wherein, notwithstanding his enemies were very mightie, yet through his great diligence and valour he suppressed their fury, in such sort that they were daily put to the worke in all skirmishes and encounters. But the ordinary Legions which lay there in garrison, accustomed to rapine and other disorders permitted in the time of HELLIOGABRVS, the Emperour was neither able to endure their insolencie, neither they his equity: for, vertue and vice cannot dwell together. Whereupon, they conspired among themselves to kill him, and to chuse one MAXIMINVS, a most valiant old souldier, for Emperour; whom SEVERVS had made a Capitaine of Tyrans (for, so did they call new souldiers) with their conspiracy they afterwards put in execution. Others write, that the cause of his death was, for that following his mothers counsell in gathering of treasure, he was not so liberrall to his men of war and others, as he ought to haue been; and also for that he had determined in his counsell to leaue the wars of Germany, and to goe into the East: for which cause the souldiers conceived great hatred against him. But I should the first for the most certain cause: of which opinion were LAMPRIDIUS and IULIVS CAPITOLINVS, writing his life, and the life of MAXIMINVS. Finally, whatsoeuer the occasion were, the Legions of Germany slue him; the good Emperour being in his Tent, void

Wars betwene Seuerus and the Germans.

Alexander Se-uerus slain by his German soldiers, together with his mother Mammaea.

void of all fear and suspicion, neer to the City of Maximin or Meniz. And, together with him, they slue his mother MAMEA; which they did by the counsell and aduice of the accursed MAXIMINVS; who was afterwards his Successor. HERODIANVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR write, that before they murdered him they made the other Emperor.

SEVERVS was twentie nine yeeres, three months and seven daies old when he was murdered, and had reigned thirteene yeeres and nine daies. His death was more lamented in Rome, then euer was any Emperours before him; and all the Cities and Prouinces of the Empire were extremely grieved thereat. In this manner was this most excellent and vertuous Prince slaine by treason, who neuer had commanded any man to be slaine, in the yeere of our Lord 237. And although that we reade that he was married, yet we reade not of any children that he left behinde him.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMINVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SIX AND TWENTITH EMPEROR of Rome.

THE ARGUMENT.

Maximinus was a Thracian borne, of a base and ignoble house; but he attained to credit through the aduice of his bodie, which brought him into fauour with many Emperours; yet Helio-gabalus did not greatly please him, being riotous and lasciuious. But fortune, as hee is blinde, so doth shee blindly bestow her benefites and fauours, and aduanced him in the end to the Imperiall dignitie: wherein he carried himselfe so cruelly and tyrannically, that poore Rome could neuer haue had a worse, or more wicked Prince. First, upon sundrie occasions hee put to death all Alexanders friends; and being ashamed of his owne sinage, he also slew all such as had knowe his father, shewing himselfe very courteous; betwene his spleene against the Christians, and afflicted them with new and vnaccustomed tormētts. He discovered a conspiracy, which he punished severely; and sought to maintain the loas of his soldiers, being of opinion that it lay in them as well to support him in the Empire, as it did to gaine it him. He warred against the Germans, and was of so hateful a disposition and so cruel, that in a manner all the whole Empire rebelled against him. And in his life-time old Gordianus was made Emperour in Africa. But about all these rebellions, that of Rome did most displease him, against which conspiring in a great rage, and having in a manner befoged it, he was slain by some Roman soldiers, considering the miserie which their country was like to haue endured, if Maximinus obtained the victorie. And in the end that the Emperour should reaping of so wicked and cruell a man, they slew his sonne also, whose head being carried to Rome, brought great contentment to the Citi- zens.

How great good, a good Prince bringeth to the world, and how preiudiciall and hurtfull it is to lose him; the death of ALEXANDER SEVERVS did sufficiently manifest to the Roman Empire; which (during his life time) enioyed all the contentment that could be desired, for his equitie, clemency, and iustice; but he dying, and that cruell monster MAXIMINVS succeeding (who reigned but three yeeres) in exchange of these and other blessings, there ensued discord, ciuill warres, insolencies, robberies, cruelties, seditions and other calamities. Wherefore, in my opinion, men ought more earnestly and with greater instancy pray to God to send them a good King and gouernor, then for health, wealth, or long life: for in the raigne of a wicked and vnjust Prince, vices abound, which corrupt good customes and manners, and vertue is suppressed, and men liue in danger both of life and goods. And in the time of a good Prince and Gouernor, all these defects are repaired: for the iust reigning, the wicked amend and become vertuous. For (as the Philosophers say) Such as is the Prince, such will be the subiects: so he which prayeth for a good king, may be iustly said to pray for the benefit of the whole kingdom: For it doth often times plainly appeare, that the diligence and industrie of a good husbandman doth more auaile, then the fertilitye of the soile: and so we see that some places which are barren, doe abound with necessaries to the vse of mans life; and to the contrarie, other places which are most fertile, through euill gouernment, become wild and ouergrown with weeds, yeelding little profit. And so histories, and experience doe teach vs; that in time of good and peaceable Kings, men grow rich and mount to estates and dignities: And in time of troubles and calamities which happen when the Gouernment is in the hands of Tyrants, many men lose their estates and liues, and sometime their Soules, by their meanes, and all things goe to confusion and out of order.

abound

But comming to our History, the good Emperour SEVERVS being dead: as he had neither sonne nor brother that might challenge the Empire; and MAXIMINVS being the chiefe man in the Army, and of greater power then any other, they all agreed to chooſe and sweare him Emperour, willingly yeelding obedience vnto him, which they ought not to haue done: for hee proved wicked, cruell, and couetous; notwithstanding that he was old and laden with yeeres. And because that this man was of a goodly stature, and came to the Empire by great aduecture, I will briefly declare the successe of his life, which I presume will be a pleasing Historie.

This MAXIMINVS was the sonne of a man whose name was NICRA, borne in Gotland, and his mothers name was ABARA, of the nation of the Alances, which liued in a village in Thracia; so as of either side he descended of barbarous nations: and he afterwards grew to be so tall of stature, as he seemed to be a Giant: for (as IVLIUS CAPITOLINVS reporteth) he was eight and a halfe Geometricall foote high; which is two foote and a halfe more then we see any man ordinarily to be in these daies. And as he had a great bodie, so had he all parts thereof proportionable to his greatnesse: for he had a good face and was very faire, with great full eyes; and was so extremely strong, that a cart heuily laden, and which two oxen could hardly moue, he would easily draw and turne at his pleasure; and with his fist he brake a horses leg: and (as IVLIUS CAPITOLINVS saith) striking a horse in the chap with his fist he brake out all his teeth; and with a spurne with his foote, he split him in pieces: also with his fist hee brake a stone, and with his hands cleft a tree, and did many other things, which were they not recorded by very true authors, would be accounted fables. And besides all this, he was of so great courage, that he was neuer knowne to stand in feare of any thing, and was naturally fierce, proud and presumptuous, and made no account of any man. His bringing vp when he was a boy, was in keeping of beasts (for his parents were poore, and liued in the country) and afterwards his minde increasing with the strength of his bodie, he came to the Roman Armie to seeke entertainment to be a souldier, and to follow the warres: where by reason of his greatnesse of body and his extreme strength, he was soone knowne, and admired of all men, which was in the raigne of SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, who was father to BASSIANVS and GATA. CAPITOLINVS writeth, that SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS being in Soria with his Armie, celebrating the birth day of his sonne GATA, with many sports (which was a thing much vsed in ancient time) and giuing the winners for reward jewels, collars, bracelets, souldiers girdles, and such like things; MAXIMINVS, who was but newly come to the Army, and could scarcely speake the Latine tongue (which was then the vulgar Roman speech) came before the Emperour, and intreated him to giue him leave to try himselfe in those exercises. The Emperour mercenall at the vnmeasurable proportion of his person, and seeing him so faire and well proportioned, granted his request; but vpon condition, that he should not encounter & contend with any Roman souldier, but with such as were water-bearers, and seruitors of the Camp, among which were many very valiant and strong men. MAXIMINVS comming to handy grips with them, ouercame 16 of them which were of greatest strength, and fought out for that purpose, without resting, or once taking any breath, not being moued by any of them: for which victorie, the Emperour caused some jewels of small price to be giuen him, but not any such as were usually giuen to the souldiers; and commanded also that he should receive pay, and be entered in the muster role to serue as a souldier.

Maximinus chosen Emperour

Maximinus his lineage.

The stature of Maximinus.

The force and bodily strength of Maximinus.

Maximinus being first to follow the wars in the time of Septimius Seuerus

Vpon

The fastenman.
Ship of Maximinus.

Maximinus
his diet.

The distrust speeches vsed
by Helio-gabalus to Maximinus.

Officers given by Seuerus to Maximinus.

Vpon a day the Emperor riding to view his Camp, hee saw this MAXIMINVS (who was yet but a raw souldier) out of order; wherefore he willed a Coronell to call him into his rank, and to instruct him in the duty that he ought to obserue in the wars: and MAXIMINVS, imagining that the Emperor spake of him, came before him, and kneeled down at his feet. The Emperor, desiring for his pastime to see whether he could runne well or no, spurred his horse, and gaue sundry turns in the field; and seeing that MAXIMINVS cuer kept euē with him, and that his horse was tired, and he running afoot shewed no signe of weariness, hee rained his horse, and asked of MAXIMINVS whether he could wrestle: whereto he answered, that he would wrestle so long as it should please his Majesty. The Emperor, maruelling at his strength, made choice of certain of the strongest men in all his Army to wrestle with him; and MAXIMINVS, without breathing or any resting, ouercame seuen of them. Whereupon, SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS commanded a collar of gold to bee giuen vnto him, and certain peeces of siluer, and made him one of his guard, and commanded that hee should attend in the Palace: and by this means he came to be much esteemed among the Coronells and men of warre. And he daily increased both in stature and strength: for, when he came to the Camp hee was bura boy, and sometime in wrestling he would ouerthrowe twenty or thirty of the strongest men in the Army: and in battels and encounters he cuer bare away the prize and chiefeft honour, performing strange things. Wherefore SEVERVS fauoured him very much, and gaue him good places and charges in the wars. He did eat and drinke according to the proportion of his body, or rather more: for, CAPITOLINVS writes, that he did daily vsē to eat 40 pound waight of flesh, and to drinke a measure of wine which contains about 6 gallons of our English measure.

SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS dying in England, as we haue said, he serued his sonne ANTONINVS BASSIANVS, and was a Coronell, and had other offices and dignities in the wars. And, after the death of BASSIANVS in Syria, he would not serue MACRINVS, because he held him guilty of the death of his Lord: but, returning to the village wherein he was born, he there purchased certain possessions, and liued there some time in rest, vntill MACRINVS was dead, and that the young vitidus HELIOGABALVS came to the Empire. At which time he came to Rome, as to the son of BASSIANVS, and nephew to SEVERVS, both which had bin his Lords; imagining, that he should haue been as much respected by him, as hee had been by them. But HELIOGABALVS more regarding lasciuious and dishonest men, than such as were of worth and valorous, he found with him no such entertainment as hee expected. For, when hee came to kisse his hand, HELIOGABALVS said vnto him; MAXIMINVS, it could me that in wrestling thou art too hard for twenty or thirty men: I would gladly knowe, whether thou darest in amorous assaults encounter as many women. Which speeches did so much displease MAXIMINVS, that he would presently haue abandoned the Court; but that certain of HELIOGABALVS friends (for his honors sake) staid him: for, they held it a shame to him, that one which was held to be the most valiant and strongest man of his time (and who for that cause was by some called ACHILLES, and by others AJAX) should not be entertained in his pay to serue in his Army. And so there was giuen him by HELIOGABALVS the leading of certain footmen. But MAXIMINVS, abhorring and not able to endure the behaviour of this effeminate Emperor, in all the time of his Raigē after that time, neuer came into his presence; sometimes faiming himself to be sick, and other times seeking occasion and means to absent himself; vntill the good ALEXANDER SEVERVS was made Emperor after the death of HELIOGABALVS; and then hee returned to Rome: where SEVERVS received him very gladly, commending him highly in the Senate; and made him a Coronell and Commander of the fourth Legion, which hee had raised of new souldiers. MAXIMINVS accepted the charge, and performed his duty singularly well in the wars of Germany, where hee shewed great prowess: by means wherof, and of the gifts which he vsed to bestowe vpon his souldiers, and of the Emperors fauor, he wan such honour and reputation with all men, that ALEXANDER (as we haue said) being slain by his souldiers, he was by them created Emperour: and some write, that he was one of those which conspired his death. Of such force is the desire of rule, that men forgetting the duty and loyalty they owe, and the benefits they haue received, practise notable villanies, and commit horrible treasons, to the end they may raigē and command; not remembering, that by what means they obtain rule and dominion, by the self same they commonly lose their governments, and are throwne down by the same means that they mounted.

After that MAXIMINVS saw himself an Emperour; as he was naturally proud and fierce, and as base of condition as he was high of stature; so was he of opinion, that his best course was to make himself obeyed rather for fear, than for loue; and presently beganne to shew himself most cruell. His election being knowne in Rome (after they had lamented the death of ALEXANDER SEVERVS) was generally displeasing to all men; and, vpon report of his cruelty, they stood in great fear of him; in so much that both men and women made vowes and praiers to their gods, to the end he might neuer come to Rome.

The first cruelty this fierce Barbarian committed, was, To put to death all those which had serued and been familiar with ALEXANDER SEVERVS: and then he banished an infinite number of others, and would not suffer that in the Army there should be any Captain, or in the Senate any Senator, that had been aduanced by him. And, for as much as hee was affained of the basenes of his owne parentage, hee commanded all those which were near about him, and had knowne his parents, to bee slain: among which were many who in time of their pouertie had relieued them, of compassion and in charity. And to all these his cruelties he added a greater: for, he persecuted the Christians which were fauoured by ALEXANDER; and by his commandement was the first persecution of the Church of God; principally those were persecuted which had the charge and government of others; wherein he vsed strange kindes of cruelties, and new deuices in putting people to death; repoyling such confidence in his own strength and courage, that he held no man able to kill him. Wherefore, as CAPITOLINVS reports, he held himself for immortal: yet one day in his presence vpon the Theatre these verses were recited in the Greek Tongue;

*Whom one man cannot because of life,
many his blood may easily spill.*

*The Elephant is great, yet done to death:
strong is the Lion, and men him kills.*

*If through thy valour thou fear not any one,
beware what a number may do to thee alone.*

The cruelty of MAXIMINVS did principally extend it self against such as were rich, and in high degree and authority; whom hee intreated very ill, and for very slight occasions put them to death, and confiscated their goods; which the common people little regarded: for, the rich are commonly odious and hatefull to the baser sort, and to such as are poor. On the other side, he cunningly held himself in the loue and good liking of the men of war: for, besides their ordinary payes, he gaue them many pensions and rewards, and provided all things necessary for them; and took as great pains as any ordinary souldier, with incredible courage and diligence: and as he was a strong man, and had a very able body; so hee cuer went armed, and vpon all occasions was as ready as any souldier in the Army, and had alwaies valiant men about him, although of base degree and condition. Finally, the effect of all his actions was, To bee feared and to command like a tyrant: which was the occasion that a noble Roman Gentleman called MAXIMVS, who had bin Consul, conspired against him, and practised with the old souldiers which had serued SEVERVS, and with some others (to whom, MAXIMINVS behauiour and conditions were nothing pleasing) that whereas hee with his Army was to passe a River vpon a wooden Bridge, as soon as hee should bee come to the further end thereof, the Bridge behinde him should be broken or drawn away, and so he abandoned to his enemies. But this was revealed to him: or else (as some surmised) it was a matter fained by him, thereby to haue the better colour to shadow his cruelties; which he executed in so high degree, that hee caused 3000 persons to be slain, which he said were guilty of that treason.

After this, a great multitude of SEVERVS old souldiers mutined; and, withdrawing themselves from the Camp, proclaimed one QVARTIANVS for Emperour (as HERODIANVS writeth); but CAPITOLINVS saith, his name was TIVS, and it may be he was called by the one and the other; who, for that hee was a man of great account, was by MAXIMINVS depozed from the charge which he held. And the souldiers (against his will) forced him to accept the Empire; which he not without great reason refused: for, one MACBONIVS, who seemed to bee his great friend, and was one of those which had aduanced him to that dignity, within fewe daies after murdered him as he lay sleeping vpon his bed; and, having stricken off his head, carried the same to MAXIMINVS: who greatly rejoiced to see himself freed from so great a danger. And although hee then gaue him a good countenance which brought it, yet he afterwards put him to a cruell death, as for his treacherie hee had deserved: first, for murdering his Soueraign; secondly, for being a traitor to his friend.

Maximinus
lecting disliked in Rome.

The first persecution of Christians.

A conspiracy against Maximinus.

Quartianus proclaimed Emperour murdered in his bed.

With

With these two good fortunes, the tyranny and cruelty of MAXIMINVS encreased. But following the wars he went out of Hungarie into Germanie; and, making most cruell war against the Germans (hauing in his Army those fouldiers which ALEXANDER SEVERVS had left, being many, very well trained, and of great experience) the number hee increased; so as with them he wan many battels, putting all to fire and sword where hee came, spoiling all that was in that Country: and in all the encounters that euer hapned, he euer fought in person, and performed more in Fight than any man in the whole Army.

Executiones done in Rome by Maximinus
order.

Hauing pacified all matters in Germanie, so as he found no more resistance; by reason of winter which then came on, he returned into Hungarie: from whence hee wrote to the Senate, extolling his victories; and sent vnto them all his battels and skirmishes painted in Tables. I cannot particularly set down the murders and cruell slaughters of men which hee commanded to be executed in Rome at this time, they were so many: for he did put to death many men which had been Consuls, and confiscated their goods, vsing infinite other tyrannies against the nobell and of most esteem; presuming onely vpon his owne personal strength, and the power of his Army; to which he gaue many great gifts. And yet among his men of warre he forbore not to execute notable cruelties: for, he more desired to bee feared, than any thing else. Wherefore both in Rome, and in diuerse parts of the Empire, they studied how they might bee rid of him, and to finde out some other man fit to be Emperor; which began in Africa, and passed after this manner:

Maximinus his vnu-gatherer
Quain in Africa.

Gordianus
closten Emperor

In the Prouince of Africa MAXIMINVS had a Procurator, who with great rigor and authority gathered his Rents and Tributes; and, being of his masters conditions, committed incredible extortions and outrages, robbing and pilling the Countrey, doing wrong to all men: and not content therewith, but as he spoiled many of their goods, so he bereaued them of their liues. And he continued so in his rapine and cruelty, that the people could no longer endure his oppression: wherefore the chief among them concluded to kill him, and did so. Afterwards considering with themselves how great and how dangerous a crime they had committed, they resolved to commit yet a greater, which was, To create an Emperor. Wherefore, conferring with the fouldiers of those Legions which lay in Africa, who detested MAXIMINVS for his cruelty, they all agreed to chuse GORDIANVS, a Noble-man, who was Proconsul of Africa, and to make him Emperor, being a man wellne fourscore years old.

GORDIANVS (as I said) was of a Noble house; by his fathers side descended from the GRACCHI; and, by his mother, from the most excellent Emperor TRAIAN. He had been Edill, Questor, Pretor, and Consul, in Rome; and had held many other offices & dignities, and had been Commander and gouernour of many countries and prouinces, which he had gouerned with great wisdom and authority; and at that time was Viceconsul in Africa, by the appointment of ALEXANDER SEVERVS, who was MAXIMINVS his Predecessor; by whom, for his deserts and vertues, hee was greatly honoured and esteemed: for, GORDIANVS was a vertuous and most temperate man in all his actions. He was a man of a tall stature, rather inclining to be fat than lean, and of a goodly presence. His face was high-coloured, representing great authority. He was in his face and diet (as in all other matters) very temperate, and was learned, and much giuen to the study of Philosophie. He was married to the daughter of SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS, and by her had sonnes and daughters, and by chance had with him when he was chosen Emperor a son, whose name was also GORDIANVS; who had bin Consul, and was held in great honour and reputation: whom they also chose Emperor together with his Father.

Gordianus resisted the empire

The fouldiers and the country-people being assembled together (whereof, one MAVRICE, a Decurion was chief & first motiue of the matter) they entred tumultuously into GORDIANVS house: who, not thinking of any such thing in the beginning was in great fear and trouble, conceiuing that they came to haue slain him: but after that hee vnderstood wherefore they came (for, they could it him) he vterly refused their offer, excusing himself by reason of his old age. But they came so resolute, that notwithstanding his opposition, yet hee could not otherwise chuse, but he must accept of the Ensigne, and title of Emperor; which they gaue him, together with his son. GORDIANVS, although he were therto compelled, and accepted thereof against his will: yet he presently wrote with all speed, giuing the Senate aduertisement of his election, and how he had consented thereto, and accepted of the Empire, that he might free the same from the cruelty of MAXIMINVS. Hauing published the same in the city of Tyre, where hee was chosen Emperor, hee took his way towards Carthage, with the magnificence, Ensignes, and and officers of the Empire, where he was with great ioy received. From thence he sent his Ambassadors to Rome with particular letters to many his friends and kinsmen; and likewise took order that VALERIANVS the Pretorian Prefect of the Legions & companies which lay neere Rome should be slaine: whom HERODIANVS calleth VITALIANVS (who was a most cruell man) a favorite and great friend of MAXIMINVS. These letters were received with incredible ioy and gladnes, for the great hatred they bare against MAXIMINVS; and VITALIANVS of VALERIANVS was slaine accordingly, by those which were sent for that purpose.

The Senate and people of Rome approued the election of GORDIANVS and his sonne; and MAXIMINVS and his sonne (who was already made CÆSAR, and named his successor) were adiudged enemies and rebels; and the people with great furie tare in pieces many ministers of MAXIMINVS his cruelty, among which were some which were not culpable. They also slew SABINVS the Prefect of the citie, for that he labored to haue hindered the approbation of GORDIANVS; and the Senate elected for CÆSAR a young man whose name also was GORDIANVS, who was nephew to old GORDIANVS: and so there was a sodaine alteration in all things, for there was a generall feare and confusion.

Maximinus
and his forces advised for rebels and enemies to the Romane countrey.

The Senate considering then in how great danger the citie was, and what might ensue by reason of the great power of MAXIMINVS, they made great preparation, writing their letters into all the Prouinces, commanding that all those gouernours which were placed by MAXIMINVS, should be displaced, and therewith also they proclaimed GORDIANVS for Emperor. This order and direction (as HERODIANVS writeth) in the most part of all the Prouinces was obeyed, and in the most of them they flew the gouernours set there by MAXIMINVS. And in some places they did the contrarie, killing or apprehending the messengers; so as euery where was bloudshed: for the cruelty of the Emperour had made all men cruell. When as the newes of that which happened in Rome and Africa came to MAXIMINVS (CAPITOLINVS writeth) he was therewith so troubled and enraged, that he cried out like a man dismperd: and running his head against the wals, he tumbled in the floore, rent his cloaths, and made many other shewes of furie and passion.

This Fit being past, the next day he assembled his whole Armie, whereto he made a speech, complaining to them of the treacherie of the Africanes, and of the lightnes and inconstancie of the Romanes, prouoking them all he could to be reuenged; and making great promises, assured them that they should possesse the goods of all those which had offended. And when he had ended his oration, he presentlie gaue them their ordinarie pay with great aduantage; shewing himselfe very bountifull: so as they all promised to serue him faithfullie, notwithstanding that many among them hated him deadlie. In this manner vsing all possible diligence, MAXIMINVS directed his journey towards Rome, with the best fouldiers, and the greatest prouision of munition he could, with intent to assuage his wrath; by the execution of his extreme cruelties: and so he began to march; not so fast as he would, for the great number of men, of carriages, and baggage which went with him, and want of victuals: for all the cities (being risen against him) had put all the victuals and fruites of the earth in safe keeping.

While as these things passed in Germany and Rome, CAPELLIANVS, who was Gouernour of the Prouinces of Nubidia, and Mauritania in Africa, rebelled against GORDIANVS, as well for that they were auncient enemies, as for that CAPELLIANVS was a very great friend vnto MAXIMINVS; and had been settled there by him: who, as soone as he heard that the GORDIANVS were chosen Emperours, put those Legions which were vnder his command in order, leuying thereto the greatest forces he could, and took his way towards Carthage, against whom came yong GORDIANVS, with all the forces he could leue (the old man remaining in the citie in great care and feare of that which afterwards followed) and these two Armies ioyning battaile (which was very bloudie) CAPELLIANVS in the end had the victory, and GORDIANVS was ouerthrowne and slaine: for the greatest part of his people were Bjonian, or raw fouldiers, and not accustomed to the warres. The father hearing of the death of his sonne; and of the losse of the battaile, seeing no hope of reliefe, and the victorious enemy at the gates of the citie, with the girdle which he ware hung himselfe: and so died he with reproach & dishonorably (hauing a few daies enioyed the name of Emperor) who had liued fourscore yeeres very honourably & in great reputation. And CAPELLIANVS following his victorie entred Carthage: where he slew the principal of those which escaped from the battaile, and robbed many houses & temples, shewing great cruelty both within the citie, & abroad in the countrey; robbing & sacking towns & villages, in colour of reuenge for the wrong done to MAXIMINVS;

Young Gordianus slaine
in a battaile.

And old Gordianus hung himselue in his girdle.

seeking by all means possible to please his souldiers, with a desire to make himselfe Emperor.

The fame of this aduerture came speedily to Rome: wherewith the Romanes were incredibly troubled and perplexed, to see themselves deprived of the fauour and succour which they hoped for from GORDIANVS and his sonne. And knowing that MAXIMINVS came like an enraged lion against them (for redresse and remedie against so great a danger) the Senate assembled in the Temple of Iupiter; and after many consultations held betwene the principal & best experienced men of the citie, they chose MAXIMVS PVPIENVS and CLODIVS BALBINVS for Emperours; both which had held great offices, and had been valiant Captaines and gouernours, and liued with great fame. And to please the people which consented not to this election, the Senate named young GORDIANVS, nephew to that GORDIANVS who hanged himselfe in Carthage, CÆSAR, who was his daughters sonne, and of the age of eleuen yeeres.

Maximvs Pu-piens and Claudius Bal-binvs chosen Emperours, and Gordianus the nephew of old Gordianus
made Cæsar.

These two being created and sworne Emperours, and hauing taken the Imperiall robes and ensignes, they leuied the greatest forces that in Rome and the borders thereof they were able. MAXIMVS PVPIENVS, who was the wiser and more sufficient man, left the citie, to make head against MAXIMINVS, who with great haste and turie came towards Italy, and had conceiued incredible ioy, for that he was giuen to vnderstand of the death of GORDIANVS and of his son, and of the victorie which CAPRIANVS had obtained against them: but after that he knew of the election of the new Emperours in Rome, his rage and wrath redoubled. And vnderstanding that PVPIENVS came against him with a sufficient Armie, he put his troupes in order; and hauing passed the Alpes, entering into Italy, where he thought to haue found great plenty of victuals, he found all cleane contrarie: for all sustenance was carried away, and those places and townes which were not fortified, and able to defend themselves, were abandoned and left desert: wherefore the souldiers for the hunger and want which they endured, began to murmur and to speake ill of MAXIMINVS; and he punishing some of them for it, grew hatefull to all.

Maximinus
entered Italy.

Drawing neere to the citie of Aquileia, which hee made account to enter without difficulty, he found very great resistance: for besides that the citie was very populous and rich, there were within it for the defence thereof, two Romane gentlemen, which had been Consuls; the one was called CRISPINVS, and the other MENFELVS; who had in such sort furnished the citie with men and munition, that MAXIMINVS with great difficultie passing the river, and encamping himselfe before it, gaue a very cruell assault, in which much people died of either side: but those which were within, defended themselves so valiantly, as he was enforced to alter his determination, to raise his siege, and to retire. While as MAXIMINVS lay before Aquileia, and PVPIENVS with his Army marcht toward him, Rome endured a great affliction: for there grew a contention betwene the Pretorian souldiers and the people of Rome, about two souldiers which had beene slaine by two Senatours, whose names were GALLICANVS and MICENAS. And both parties taking Armes, there were slaughters and cruelties committed, the like whereof haue bin seldom heard of: for the city was set on fire, & a great part thereof burnt, the new Emperour BALBINVS not being able to quench or stay it: who seeing that he could not redresse so great an inconuenience, retired himselfe to his palace. So as whosoever shal wel consider hereof, shall finde that the three yeeres tyrannous government of MAXIMINVS (for so long it lasted) was the cause that the citie of Rome and the whole Romane Empire were neuer free from warres, tumults, robberies, murders, and all manner of calamities. And he (as I haue said) lying before Aquileia, preuailling little by the assaults which he gaue, by reason of the great resistance made by the besieged, and wanting victuals (for PVPIENVS, and the Senate had commaunded all to be carried away out of that territorie, and the borders and marches thereof), and ioyntly herewith his souldiers daily hearing that all the East had revolted and rebelled against him, by letters sent from the Senate of Rome: With this feare and for the secret hatred which the old Romane Souldiers bare against him, they agreed to mutine and to kill him, seeing that Rome (wherein were their parents, their wives, children and kinsfolkes) and also that all Italy was enemie vnto them, and had proclaimed them rebels. It happened that MAXIMINVS and his sonne one day about noone reposing themselves in his Tent, the souldiers and many others with them, came very boldly to his pavilion, and without any resistance flew him: the like they did by his sonne, saying, That of an euill fire could neuer prooue good whelpe; when he had reigned three yeeres, and was fixtie and odd yeeres old; and his sonne nineteene, and somewhat more. His death was approoued by all the

Maximinus
and his sonne flame in his Tent.

Arme:

Army: and as soon as it was knowne in the City of Aquileia, they opened the ports, and became all friends. They sent the heads of this tyrannous Emperour and his sons, to Rome; where with vspeakable joy they were receiued: and by the way they carried them to PVPIENVS; who was in Ranenma. This hapned in the yeer of our Lord 246.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMVS PVPIENVS AND CLODIVS BAL- BINVS, ONELY OF THOSE NAMES, and seuen and twentieth Roman Emperours. ()

After the death of MAXIMINVS; MAXIMVS PVPIENVS & CLODIVS BALBINVS, without any contradiction continued Emperours; which (as I said) were so already created: and PVPIENVS, who then was in Ranenma, with all speed went to Aquileia, to content the Army which MAXIMINVS had left there; where, by those of the City and of the Army, he was with great joy receiued, sworn, and obeyed: and he paid the souldiers, and gaue them great rewards, and afterwards dispatched and sent the Legions very well contented to their Prouinces and places where they vsed to remain. And himselfe came to Rome with some companies of Germans for his guard, by reason of the discord betwene the Pretorian souldiers and the Citizens; who, vnderstanding of the death of MAXIMINVS, pacified themselves, and went with the Senate to receiue BALBINVS into the Empire, and GORDIANVS for CÆSAR, as is afore said: and so they were most solemnly entertained. And being comm into the Senate, besides the ordinary acclamations, blessings and applauses, in remembrance that these Emperours were created by the Senators, they vsed such like speeches: Princes, wisely chosen, rule accordingly; and those which are chosen by vnwise men, and such as knowe little, in like manner end their daies: wherein they seemed to note the men of warre, who made choice of MAXIMINVS. Which speeches the Pretorian souldiers took in so ill part, that they presently began to mislike and to be discontented with the Raig of PVPIENVS and BALBINVS; and they held themselves for scorned and disgraced, in that the Senate should seem to triumph ouer them, and to haue taken from them the authority to make Emperours: so great was their pride and ambition, that from thence forth they not onely wished, but practised the death of them both, who gouerned all things most excellently and prudently, and made very good and profitable lawes and ordinances; and into all the Prouinces where need required, sent ordinary Legions, doing iustice to all men indifferently, greatly honouring the Senate; and generally to all men shewed themselves gentle and courteous. But all this sufficed not to get the good will of the souldiers: for, vertue and goodnes do not pacifie the hatred of the wicked; and by so much their enuy & mallice the more increaseth, by how much they see those whom they hate, exercise themselves in vertuous and good actions: In such sort, that as those accursed men in time of peace were not so much esteemed, neither had the liberty to liue so dissolutely and licentious, as in the time of warres; all their care and studie therefore was (although they did dissemble it, and keep it secret) how they might without any danger to themselves, kill those two vertuous and honourable old Princes, PVPIENVS and BALBINVS. Whereto, the emulation, jealousie and contention, betwene these

Speeches vsed
by the Senators.

Emulation between Bal-binus and Pup-pienus.

these Emperours, although in secret, opened the way to their determination; for BALBINVS held himselfe for farre more Noble and of a more ancient house and family, then PVPPIENVS: For it was three hundred yeeres or little lesse since that his ancestors came from the Isle of Cales in Spain, with the great POMPEY; and being made citizens of Rome had liued cuer honorably and richly: and therefore as PVPPIENVS was but of a new risen family, hee made account to be more regarded then he, and disdained him. And PVPPIENVS notwithstanding that he was a newer citizen and lately risen: yet was he of greater courage, very graue and seuer, and had held many offices and magistracies; which with great valour and wisdome he had discharged, and therefore was of opinion that in true nobilitie, which wholly consisteth in the vertue of the person, he did farre excell BALBINVS. And thus their vaine presumption cost them both their liues. Notwithstanding that they stood vpon these points; yet they no way forgot ought that might concerne the good government of the Empire. These two wise Emperours agreed between themselves, to goe the one into the East against the Parthians; or to say better, the Persians, which ruled in the East, as I haue already declared, and by means of the ciuill discords past, had entred the bounds of the Empire, and taken certain Cities: And the other to the warres of Germanie. And as one day all the whole Citie was busie in beholding certain games and pastimes which were made, with them was also the greatest part of the Emperours guard and household; so as they remained in their Palaces smally accompanied, without any mistrust or suspicion of any trecherie. Whereof the Pretorian souldiers being aduertised, they came with great furie fully armed in order of battaile, towards the Emperours Palace: Which when PVPPIENVS vnderstood, and that they came to kill him, hee commanded in great haste the companies of Germanes which were his guard, to be called: the which truly had beene sufficient to haue defended them. And he also gaue BALBINVS to vnderstand thereof, desiring him to doe the like. But BALBINVS entering into a fond suspicion, that PVPPIENVS sent for his guard to haue done some thing against him, did not only leaue that vndone which was requested at his hands, but hindred it, so as the guard was not called. By which means the Pretorian souldiers had oportunitie to enter the Imperiall Palace in safety: and there finding none to resist their furie, they took both the Emperours and dispoyling them of their Imperial robes, vied the poore princes with all kinde of villany, as if they had been two theues; carrying them through the midst of the Citie towards their Camp: But hearing that the Almaines came to rescue them, they flew them upon the way; leaving their dead bodies in the streetes. And the yong GORDIANVS meeting them by chance (who, as we haue said before, at the request of the people was chosen CÆSAR) was by them hailed AVGVSTVS and Emperour. And they crying to the people said, that seeing those two Emperours were dead, which in despite of them were chosen by the Senate, they should now receiue GORDIANVS for Emperour, which they themselves had desired to be made CÆSAR; and so they went to their lodging leading the youth with them, who yet was not fully fourteen yeeres old.

The Almaines after they vnderstood of the death of PVPPIENVS and BALBINVS, seeing there was no hope to rescue them, returned to their lodgings, which was in the fields nere to Rome. And so these two good Emperours ended their liues, hauing reigned two yeeres: and in rewarde for pacifying the Empire and deliuering the same from the tyranny of MAXIMVS, these base rascalls murdered them, which PVPPIENVS (as saith IULIUS CAPITOLINVS) did before Prognosticate: for when they were chosen, he said to BALBINVS; Tell me BALBINVS, what good shall we reape, if we kill this accursed cruell beast MAXIMVS: BALBINVS answered; We shall win the loue of the Senat, & of the people of Rome, and generally of all the world. It is true quoth PVPPIENVS, but I feare me we shall incur the hatred of the men of warre, and that it will cost vs our liues. Which hapned as we haue declared, in the yeere of our Lord 242.

The Emperors Balbinus and Puppienus slain
by the Pretorian
souldiers.

Gordianus Nephew of the old Gordianus proclaimed Em-perour.

The words of Puppienus to Balbinus when they were chosen Emperours.

THE

THE LIFE OF GORDIANVS THE YONGER; SO CALLED, FOR THAT HE WAS NEPHEW TO THE OLD GORDIANVS, being onely of this name, and the eight and twentieth Emperour of Rome.

(*)

After the death of these two good Emperours PVPPIENVS and BALBINVS, GORDIANVS being chosen by the Pretorian souldiers (who in their life time was CÆSAR) the Senate and people of Rome, seeing no other remedie, willingly approued his election; for he was generally well beloued of all men for the deserts of his Vncle and grandfather: and through this election ensued concord and agreement between the souldiers and the citizens; and so he began his government in good order and had good successe. The first thing he did, was to make many feasts, games and shewes, and to giue many donatiues and rewards both to the citizens and souldiers; whereby he made himselfe exceedingly well beloued. This hapned, by reason that this yong Prince followed the counsell of wise men.

This Gordi-anus was Nephew of the old Gordianus
who died in Africa.

Presently in the beginning of his taigne a certain Captain named SABINIANVS rebelled in Africa; and it succeeded so well, that the Governor of Mauritanie by the commandement of GORDIANVS, comming against him; those which conspired with him, tooke him prisoner, and craving pardon for their offence, brought him to Carthage; and there deliuered him into the hands of GORDIANVS his Captaines. Who being freed from this care, there remained yet another, which was for the warres against the Persians, who (as we haue said) vsurped certaine Lands of the Empire; against which it was concluded that the Emperour GORDIANVS should goe himselfe in person: and notwithstanding that he was then very yong, hauing married the daughter of a most learned and eloquent Gentleman, whose name was MISTHEVS, whom he presently made Prefect, the authoritie and counsell of the father in law made the raigne of the yong Emperour GORDIANVS very fortunate, and much esteemed. For, notwithstanding that MISTHEVS was but of a meane parentage, yet he was a man of much vertue, and so discrete and considerate in all his actions, as, notwithstanding that GORDIANVS was but a childe and very yong, and somewhat inclined to vice and sensuality, yet he made him an excellent Prince and Gouernor, both in peace and warre. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that the principall and most necessary thing that appertaineth to any King or Prince to make him good, is, to haue good and wise men for his Counsellors, and that his Court be replenished with honest men, and of good conuersation: Which the same GORDIANVS apparently manifested in a letter written by him to his father in law, in answer to another written by him, wherein he had counselled him what he ought to doe, and had reproofed him for some thing that he had done, in this manner:

Mistheus father-in-law to Gordianus.

Q4

The.

A Letter written by Gordianus to his father in law Mithridates.

The Emperor GORDIANVS AYGVS TVS, to his Father, and Pretorian Prefect, greeting, If the Almighty Gods had not defended and protected the Roman Empire, I had truly by this time been deceived, and sold by these wicked and dishonest men: for I now know, and do very well comprehend, that I ought not to have given the charge of the Roman Cohorts to FALIX, neither to SERAPION of the fourth legion: And because I will not rectify all my errors, I acknowledge that I have done many things that I ought not. But thanks be to the Gods, that thou guiding and instructing me, which doth nothing for courtesies or reward, I have learned and understood many things, which being shut up in my palace with my servants, I should never have learned, neither was it possible for me to have known. For consider a little I pray thee what I could do, being blinded, and sold by MAYRVS, who was confederat with GORDIANVS, REVERENDVS and MONTANVS; so as whatsoever they commended or reproved, trusting to their iudgement, I presently accepted and allowed. The truth is, Father, That Prince is very unfortunate, who hath not about him those which may plainly tell him the truth: for, as the King cannot be among the people, neither can he know what passeth and what is said, of necessitie he is to understand it by the relation of those with whom he is conuerfant, and according to their information, good or euill, to gouerne and dispose of all matters. God giue thee health. By this letter is confirmed that which I said; and how that the good counsell of his father in law, was of great efficacie to make him a good Gouernor.

A great eclipse of the Sun.

A great earthquake.

Gordianus going to the wars against the Persians.

Gordianus his victory against Sapor King of Persia.

The death of Mithridates.

In the beginning of the reigne of this good Emperour, there were seene certaine signes and tokens in the aire, and vpon the earth, whereby many men did prognosticate that his reigne should not long continue. The first was so great an eclipse of the Sun, as the day seemed to be turned to night: so as euery where the people kindled lights, thereby to see to do their necessarie busines, so long as the Eclipse continued. And, about one yeere after, there was so great and terrible an earth-quake in a manner through all the prouinces of the Empire, that many cities and townes were destroyed, and some were swallowed vp by the earth, which did open in many places. This being past, and the losses repaired in the best manner that could bee, GORDIANVS departed from Rome towards the wars of Persia, with great prouision and infinite summes of money to pay the souldiers which he carried with him, which were many in number, and excellentlie well armed and trained: for he had as good an Armie as euer had any Emperour; and marching ouer land from Italy to passe the streight of Hellespont, he took his way through Asia, to stay the Gathes and other nations which came downe with intent to haue inhabited Thracia: against which he obtained some victories, and left those prouinces free from troubles, and in peace. Having past that streight, he marched with his Armie through Syria, and came to the citie of Antioch which the Persians had taken, and fought some battailies with the mightie Sapor King of Persia, who succeeded his brother ANTAXERXES in that kingdom; where obtaining some notable victories, he recovered the citie of Antioch. From thence he went further, and conquered the great cities of Carras, and Nisibe: for being terrified with the first battailies, Sapor was in so great feare, as notwithstanding that he had leued a very sufficient Armie, yet he not onely durst not fight with GORDIANVS, but leauing the said cities and others, he retired himselfe into his kingdom, abandoning the limis and confines of the Roman Empire. In this warre all things were gouerned and managed by the counsell and direction of MISTHVS, GORDIANVS his father in law, who was his Prefect and capitaine generall: who gouerned all things so well, that he failed not in any thing; and so by his counsell and valour GORDIANVS obtained many victories: and the Romane Armie proceeded, being excellentlie well instructed and trained, aswell in the discipline which apperteineth to souldiers, as in all other things which were requisite for the warres. The like happened in all other matters, which were expedient for the good government of the whole Empire: for he was so good and so wise a man, and therewith the good inclination and disposition of the Emperour did so concur, in whom wanted no sufficientie nor discretion for his age, that all the time of his reigne (which were fixe yeeres) the Roman Empire enioyed peace, rest, and all happines. And while as all things were in this estate, MISTHVS fell sick and died, IULIUS CAESAROLINVS writeth, that he was secretlie poisoned by PHILIP, who succeeded him in his charge, and was afterwards Emperour, and who also was the cause of the death and ruine of the Emperour GORDIANVS; who as soone as MISTHVS was dead, made PHILIP his Prefect and Capitaine generall, nothing suspecting him of treason. This PHILIP was borne in Arabia, of a base and dishonorable parentage; but a very valiant man, and bred vp in the warres in the Romane Armies, and had held many offices and governments. As soone as this this barbarian was aduanced by GORDIANVS to that high dignitie, he practised how he might obtaine the Empire for himselfe, and fought by all meanes to win the good will of the souldiers, and to make them enemies to GORDIANVS. It happened that in the Armie was great scarcitie of victuals, which was done by the secret practice of PHILIP: and the souldiers imagining the negligence of GORDIANVS to haue been the cause thereof, determined to make PHILIP equall with him in the Empire, and that he should bee as his tutor and gouernor: which the vertuous yong GORDIANVS patiently endured. For he could not withstand the audacious determination of the souldiers: and PHILIP, seeing himselfe equall with him, became presently so insolent and audacious towards GORDIANVS (by reason of his young yeeres, and the fauor of the Armie) as he began to command all, as though hee had been sole Emperour. But GORDIANVS being vnable to endure this disgrace (for great and Noble mindes can hardly suffer themselves to be despised and oppressed) assembling the Armie, complained openly to the Captaines and souldiers, of the pride and ingratitude of PHILIP, calling to minde the benefites which he had bestowed vpon him, and sought to perswade them to depose him from the Empire.

The wickedness and ingratitude of Philip, and the misery of Gordianus.

PHILIP seeing this, setting all shame apart, assembling together such as were of his faction, and seeking to get the good will of all men, brought his purpose to so good issue, as the miserable Emperour GORDIANVS being abandoned, was brought to such extremitie, as he sent to intreat PHILIP, that if he would not permit him to be his equall, yet at the least that he would be pleased to allowe him the dignitie of CESAR: which seeing he could not obtaine, he desired that he might be his Pretorian Prefect. Which being also denied, he requested him to doe him the fauour, that he might be one of his Captaines so long as he should liue. To this his last petition, his cruell minde seemed to yeeld: but afterwards considering how much GORDIANVS was beloved in Rome, in Africa, and in all the other Prouinces, as well for his naturall vertues, as for the nobilitie of the house from which he was descended, he commanded him to bee slaine. And this was the end of the Noble and worthy yong Emperour GORDIANVS; who reigned fix yeeres: foure alone, and two in the company of PVBIVS and BALBINVS, in the year of our Lord 247, and in the twentieth yeere of his age.

The death of Gordianus.

Ann. Dom. 247

GORDIANVS was of a pleasant and very Noble condition, of gentle behaviour, very studious, and giuen to learning; so as they write, that he had in his Library threecore and two thousand Books. He was infinitely beloved of the Senate and people of Rome, and generally of all nations of the Empire, and no lesse by the souldiers and men of war, who called him their son. Although in this short sodaine furié, after the mannere of beasts they murdered him by the procurement, practice and treason of PHILIP; yet their furie being past, they made him a sepulchre in the confines of Persia, whereupon they wrote this inscription in the Latine, Persian, Hebrew, and Egyptian tongues, to the end that of all men it might bee read and understood:

To the sacred GORDIANVS, whomersome the Persians, the Greeks, and the SAYMATES, extinguished the Roman Civil discords, and likewise subdued the Germanes, but not the Philippiens.

Which seemeth to be annexed thereto, for that in the Philippien fields he was put to the worke by the Alanes; and also for that he was commanded to be slaine by PHILIP.

THE LIFE OF PHILIP THE FIRST, AND NINE AND TWENTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

Philip made peace with the Persians.

By the subtlety and wicked practices (which we haue already before declared) this traitor PHILIP came to the Empire; and was sworne and obeyed by the whole Arme: he presently aduertised the Senate of his election, and of the death of GORDIANVS, concealing the manner thereof; alleaging that he died of a naturall infirmite. The Senate giuing credit to his letters, approved his election, and gaue him the name of AVOGUSTVS: which when he vnderstood, hauing a great desire to come to Rome, and to see himselfe Lord thereof, hee made a dishonourable peace with the Persians: and leaving vnto them the Prouince of Mesopotamia, and part of Syria, he came with his Arme, towards Rome. But first he desired to visit his countrie Arabia; wherein, for a memo: all of his name, he builded a Citie, which he called Philopolis, neere the place where he was borne, and made his sonne his companion in the Empire, whose name was also PHILIP, a child of six or seuen yeeres old: who (as AVRELIVS VICTOR, and EVROPIVS doe write) was naturally so fad and fowre, as he was neuer seene to laugh, neither could any man by any deuise prouoke him to laughter. PHILIP being come to Rome, although he was receiued as soveraigne Lord, yet was his comming nothing pleasing to the Senate nor Roman people, considering that he had giuen away the Prouince of Mesopotamia to the Persians. Which when he vnderstood, after that he had made a great donatiue, and distributed much money and other gifts among the people, thereby to get their good wils and loue; he sought occasion to make warre against the Persians, and proclaimed the same, with a resolution to recouer the honour which he had lost. But that warre ended before it began, without any breach of peace: for the Persians promised to restore the Prouinces without warre or any opposition.

Secular games, and why so called.

PHILIP hauing now raigned two yeeres (and a thousand yeeres being expired since that Rome was founded) he commanded certaine feasts and games to be made, which they called Secular, which was (as it were) to celebrate the birth day of Rome; which feasts were made in Rome euery hundred yeeres. Yet concerning the time there were many opinions; and some Emperors celebrated these feasts and shewes before their times, the Emperour CLAVDIVS before remembred. But the truth is, that they were called Secular, for that they could be made but once in a mans whole life time. Finally, they were the most sumptuous and solemne that were made in Rome: for so did OCTAVIVS make them, and CLAVDIVS also, as I haue said. And afterwards the Emperour DOMITIANVS, although he obserued not the iust computation of the yeeres, as did the Emperour CLAVDIVS, but followed the account of AVOGUSTVS

OCTAVVS CAESAR: and after that, SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS, and now this PHILIP celebrated the same, with the greatest pomp & magnificence that euer had bin seen before this time, as EVROPIVS recordeth, who saith, That in the place called Circus Maximus, were hunted and slaine an infinit number of wilde beasts; and there also fought two thousand sword-players, who (as we haue said) slew one another to giue delight to the beholders, in a furious manner as men now adaires vs to fight vpon challenges in single combats. It is also written, that in POMPEIUS Theatre were such shewes and games; that they lasted three daies and three nights continually; wherein were so great lights that men might see as well at midnight as at noone daies; whereof EVROPIVS and POMPOIVS also make mention. In these sports and about the end of them; as they were many, there being little heed taken, POMPEIUS Theatre took fire, and the greatest part of the timber worke was burnt, with other sumptuous buildings neere vnto it; which fire was hardly quenched. PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth, that this PHILIP was the first Christian Emperour that was truly baptized, and that belceued, and receiued the faith of CHRIST. Other authors affirme, that both hee, his mother and his sonne were christened; and that ORIGEN wrote certaine letters to him; wherein he perswaded him to belecue and to obserue the Christian faith. Others say, that he did but faine and dissemble it, thereby to make himselfe the stronger against DECIVS, through the helpe of the Christians, which DECIVS rebelled against him. But I rather beleue OCTAVIVS and EVROPIVS.

Philip baptized a Christian.

PHILIP and his sonne liuing thus in the quiet possession of the Empire, the Gothes, which in the time of GORDIANVS had infested Thracia, came now from Scythia with a very great Arme through Misia into Thracia, and did much hurt there, burning many cities and townes: against whome, the Emperour sent for Captaine one MARINVS, a man very expert in the warres, and very valiant of his person; who when he was settled in his charge, with the aide and fauour of the men of warre, whereof he before was Captaine, and of the ordinarie Legions of Illyricum, leaving the seruice wherein he was employed, resolved to rebell, and to make himselfe Emperour, holding it lawfull to betray him, that had been a traitor to another; and for such was presently sworne and proclaimed by the Arme.

Marinus rebelled against Philip.

When PHILIP vnderstood hereof, he was much troubled: and in great feare complained to the Senate of the ingratitude and presumption of MARINVS. Some write that DECIVS was there present: who being a man of great widom & experience, very Nobly defended, and was afterwards Emperour, did comfort and encourage him, and perswaded him not to be grieved therewith: for (quoth he) MARINVS his presumption will shortly cost him very deare, which happened so indeede: For, within fewe daies after, the same Arme which had chosen him, being discontented with the manner of his carriage toward them, were as ready to bereaue him of his life, as they were to make him Emperour; and accordingly slew him. Which newes being brought to PHILIP, and he remembering what DECIVS had said in the Senate, gaue him the charge and command of the Arme against the Gothes and Scythians, with a great encrease both of men and munition, and of all things necessary for such an enterprife. DECIVS as a man of experience and discretion, and sufficiently able to discharge that office, came to the Army: where within fewe daies all the souldiers, as well for the worthinesse of his person, as also for that they stood in feare of PHILIP for those matters lately past, resolved to make him Emperour: and so indeede by force and against his will they made him to take the ensignes, name and dignitie of Emperour.

Decius made Emperour by the souldiers
against his wil.

When DECIVS saw himselfe advanced to so high an estate, he practised a cunning policy, which was thus; He priuily sent a secret messenger to tell PHILIP that he had accepted the title of Emperour; being perforce constrained thereto, as was well knowne; but held no man for Emperour but PHILIP; and that he therefore should not be offended: for he did assure him, that as soone as he could possibly get any libertie, he would renounce the Empire. This he did to the end that PHILIP should take no care, nor make any such preparation against him, as reason required; and finally, to temporize vntill that he might encrease his power, and make himselfe able to defend his cause. But PHILIP (whether he gaue credit to his speeches or no) forslow not his businesse, but determined with himselfe to repose no trust in any other Captaine, but to goe against him himselfe in person; and to that end leuied many new troupes, and sent for the ordinarie legions out of sundry Prouinces, threatening and swearing that he would teare DECIVS and the rebellious legions which were with him in pieces; And so departed from Rome, commanding his men of warre with such choler and in such haue

Preparation made by Philip against Decius.

Philip slaine in Verona by his owne souldiers.

tic manner, as he became hatefull to all men; And they holding, DECIVS, more worthy of the Empire, before he went out of Italy, in the Citie of Verona proclaiming DECIVS Emperour, his owne souldiers slue him, cutting his head off, by the midst of his face, iust with the vpper row of his teeth.

When as the newes hereof came to Rome, the Pretorian souldiers killed his melancholicke sonne, who was neuer knowne to laugh; being (according to some writers,) about the fift yeer of his and his fathers raigne; and after some other writers, the seuenth: Which happened in the yeere of our Lord two hundred, fiftie and two, after EVSERIVS his computation.

Truly it was the iust judgement of God, that by the same meanes that he obtained the Empire, he lost the same: and the same souldiers by whose hands hee put his good liege Lord GORDIANVS to death, even the very same souldiers murdered him: and, as he was a traytor and disloyall to his soueraigne; so found he none faithfull to him being Lord.

THE LIFE OF DECIVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

PHILIP and his sonne being both dead (in such manner as before is exprested) DECIVS without any contradiction was confirmed Emperour: for the Senate presently chose him in his absence, and gaue him the title of AVGVSTVS, and so did all the Prouinces and the Armies. For, all writers affirme, that morally this DECIVS was an excellent man, and was endued with many vertues and sufficiencies: hee was very wife and discrete, and of great experience, and had held many offices and dignities before hee attained to the Empire; which he obtained not by fauor or any sinister meanes; but for his deserts and goodnesse: And so governed the same wisely and vprightly, with singular equitie and authority. The like he did in the Empire, during the small time he enioyed the same: and aboue all, he was a most politick, valiant and excellent Captaine; so as he might iustly haue been numbered among the good Emperours, if he had not (as an infidell) persecuted the Church of God, and all Christians, with most barbarous cruelty; such, as the like thereof had neuer been seene: the which (as some writers affirme) he did of malice, and for the hatred which he bare against his predecessor the Emperour PHILIP, for that he was a Christian: And so in his time the Church of God suffered the seventh persecution. In such sort he persecuted in his cruelty, staining therewith his other vertues, that he crowned many with martyrdome; leaving to vs examples of their holy and vertuous lives and endings endings. This Emperour was borne in a Citie called Cabali in the lower Pannonia, which wee call Hungarie, and (as we haue sayd) was of a very Noble and ancient Lineage. As soone as he saw himselfe an absolute Lord, through the desire he had to come to Rome, he made CORNELIVS LICINIUS VALERIANVS Generall of his mightie Armie, who was a wife man and of great experience: so as for his good conditions, and his age, being threecore and fixe yeeres old, hee was of great authoritie, and to all men seemed most to bee fitt for that charge.

The seventh persecution of the Church of God.

When DECIVS was come to Rome, he shewed himself in all things a very good Gouernor, and preferred the authority of the Senat; following their counsel in all matters of government. And among other things, he permitted them to chuse a Censor at their pleasure, which was an ancient Magistracy of great authority; for his office was to correct the manners and customes, and to reforme the abuses and disorders of the people, and therefore had supreme iurisdiction ouer all men: and this office, from the time that Rome came to be commanded by one head, the Emperours vsurped, and made themselves Censors. Whereupon the Senate chose the said VALERIANVS for Censor, notwithstanding that hee was absent; and, moreover, without any request made by DECIVS, they nominated his sonne (whose name was also DECIVS) CEASAR, and his Successor. And so he liued in the City about one yeer, governing all things with great wildome and equity, by the aduice and consent of the Senate, to the great contentment of all the Roman people, excepting the Christian Common-wealth: against which, hee (as a blinde man) made general edicts and decrees; whereby he commanded them to bee slaine and persecuted, as EVSERIVS writeth. And whereas the Goths, at this time inuading Thracia and Misia, had subdued the greatest part of those Prouinces, DECIVS determined in person to make head against them; and, carrying his sonne with him, hee left the government in the hands of the Senate; and, leuying new forces, he marched against the Gothes; and, coming where his Legions were, within fewe daies after hee joined battell with them: in the which although it were very doubtfull, yet in the end hee had the victorie; and slue thirty thousand of them; constraining the rest to flee to the mountains and other places of hard access, not daring to come into the Plaines; and he brought them to such extremitie, as he had easily ruined them, if he had not bene betrayed, as you shall heare. For, the King of the Gothes sent him word, that if he would giue him leaue quietly to depart, he would abandon that Land, and returne to his countrie. But the Emperour hauing taken the passages, imagining that he might easily kill them, or take them prisoners, and so punish their breach of peace granted them in the time of BALDINVS, would not yeeld to the Kings request. Hauing brought them to such a streight as they could not escape out of his hands, he gaue the charge to a notable Captaine of his, whose name was TREBONIANVS GALLVS, being a Roman Gentleman & Gouernor of the frontiers of Misia, to keepe certaine passages, through which the Gothes might passe; and to that effect gaue him the command of a great number of souldiers. Who, hauing a desire to make himself Emperour by such means as then were vsed, not onely discharged his office wherein he was imploied, very ill; but gaue secret intelligence to the King of the Gothes, that he would let him passe, aduising him therewith to diuide his Army into two parts; the one half wherof he should lay in ambush, and with the other he should assault the Emperours Camp, who mistrusted no such matter; and that, faining fear, he should flee back, and draw the Emperour into his ambush, where he might in safety kill him. This contract being made, the effect followed, as writeth POMPONIUS LETVS: but IORNANDVS relateth it after another manner. Yet all Authors agree, that, through the treason of his Captain GALLVS, the Emperour DECIVS came to a battell with the Gothes, to their great aduantage: wherein notwithstanding that hee and his souldiers fought most valiantly, yet both himself and his sonne therein ended their liues. IORNANDVS writeth, that, before a man could well iudge of the victorie, the yong DECIVS was so mortally wounded with an arrow, that hee fell from his horse in fight of his father the Emperour: who with a loud voice called to his souldiers, willing them not to be dismayd: for, the death of one Knight would bee no hinderance to the Common-wealth, neither to the battell. But in the end foreseeing his ruine, and that the Gothes apparently had the victorie; to the end he would not fall into his enemies hands, he clapt his spurs to his horse, and (giuing him the head) leapt into a deep lake of water that was thereby; wherein, through the waight of his armour, he was soon drowned: so as his body was neuer found. The Gothes, following the victorie, made great slaughter in the Roman Army, which was put to rout; and those which escaped fled to the Legions with TREBONIANVS GALLVS commanded;

Valerianus made Censor by the Senate. The Senat chose yong Decius for Censor, and his fathers successor.

A battell between Decius and the Gothes.

Trebonianus Gallus betrayed Decius, and was the cause of his death.

A battell between Decius and the Gothes.

The yong Decius, seeing his son mortally wounded fell in the ground. The miserable death of Decius.

An. Dom. 154.

manded, who as a confederat with the Gothes, was in safety; and sought no reuenge for the death of the Emperor. And in this manner ended the life and raigne of the Emperor DECIVS, who had oftentimes deferred the same for the cruelties which he commanded to be executed vpon the Christians, which hapned in the yeere of our Sauour 254. and in the fiftith yeere of his age, when he had raigned but two yeeres. It is not knowne who was this Emperors wife, neither what his father and ancestors names were, or who they were; neither can we set downe any particularities, as we haue obserued in the liues of other Emperors, for that no author maketh any mention thereof, and all write very little of him. I say this, to the end that the reader may vnderstand, that I will not presume to write at large in a matter wherein I find such breuities vsed by authors: for I seeke rather briefly to set downe the naked truth, then to beautifie the Historie with fictions, as I haue scene some men doe. My purpose from the beginning hath been to be briefe: for I do not properly write an Historie, but the sum and an abbridgment of Histories, containing the liues of the Emperors, whereof we will write more largely when it shall seeme more expedient; although that in the times whereof we now write, Historiographers wrote so negligently, and obserued so little order, as a man can hardly draw that little out of their writings which we treat of.

THE LIFE OF TREBONIANVS GALLVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME,
AND ONE AND THIRTITH ROMANE EMPEROR.
(*)

A disonorable peace made by Gallus with the Goths.

THE Gothes hauing by the meanes aboue mentioned obtained this victorie, wherein both DECIVS and his son died, those souldiers which thence escaped recouering GALLVS his Camp, hailed him Emperor; knowing nothing of the treason which he had committed: and he which desired nothing more, accepted the same, and took the Ensignes of the Empire. When the newes of the death of DECIVS and of his sonne came to Rome, and of the slaughter made in the Roman Armie (before that GALLVS his treason was discovered) the Senate vnderstanding that the Armie had chosen him for Emperor, and that his companies had refused those which escaped from the battaile, confirmed his election, and gaue him the name and title of AUGVSTVS. But this GALLVS, notwithstanding that hee was a Gentleman and descended of an honourable house, was not contented with the treason which he had vied towards his Emperour and soueraigne Lord, but through a desire to com to Rome, made peace with the Gothes; the most shameful and dishonorable, that euer was made by any Roman since that Rome was first founded: for hee promised to pay them them yearly a great summe of money; making that people which was held for Loid of the world, and Subduer and Tamer of all other Nations, tributarie to the barbarous: so as, to the end he might be called Emperor, he made both himself and the Empire tributarie and subject to the Gothes. Such power hath ambition and desire to reign, that men thereby make themselves slaves to some, conditionally that they may command and haue authority ouer others. And hee prospered as ill therewith as hee had deferred: for, the Gothes afterwards brake the peace, and did more harm in his time than in any Age before, sacking and spoiling the Provinces of Thracia, Misia, Thessalia, Macedonia, and the Confinnes and Frontiers thereof: for all which he took little care. And, on the other side, the Perfians in Asia, seeing the good successe of the Gothes, entred with great power into the Countreies of Mesopotamia and Syria; which were provinces of the Empire: and afterwards, passing forwards, they subdued Armenia. But GALLVS, taking no care for these things, made his son BOLYSSANVS his companion in the Empire, who was a very childe. And afterwards he not onely permitted the persecution inflicted by DECIVS vpon the Christians, but increased the same.

There began also in his time a most cruell generall pestilence, whereof died an infinite number of people; which beganne in Ethiopia in the Confinnes of Egypt, and from thence infected all parts of the world, and continued ten yeeres. During which time (as PAVLEVS OROSIVS recounteth) there was no Prouince, no City, nor priuate house, which was not left in a manner desolate with this vniuersall plague; whereof hee compiled a Book, as EVSEBIVS and S. CYPRIAN bear record, who liued in those times. So as all the Raigne of this wicked Emperour was unfortunate and mournfull; as well for the Provinces which hee lost, as for the calamities before recited. Onely hee had one notable victory in the Prouince of Misia against the Gothes, vnder the leading of EMILIANVS a Captain of his: where he slew many thousands of them, and followed the execution for certain daies. This ouerthrowe was the ruine and total destruction of GALLVS: for, EMILIANVS, waxing proud for so great a victory, and returning from it with an imagination of that which afterwards ensued, gaue great gifts among his souldiers; and so, getting their loue and good will, was chosen and sworn Emperor. Which when GALLVS vnderstood, with all the haste hee could make hee parted from Rome with a great Army, leading his son with him. Against whom EMILIANVS boldly cam to a battell, and had the victory: wherein GALLVS and his son were both slain, and their souldiers went to serue EMILIANVS. This hapned in the yeere of our Lord 256; GALLVS being then (as testifieth AURELIVS VICTOR) at the age of seuen and forty yeeres, and in the second yeere of his most vnhappy Raigi.

The Goths broke the peace made with Gallus.

The Perfians entered the provinces of the empire

A vniuersall plague in the time of Decius

Emilianus
overthrowe the Goths in a battell.

Emilianus killed his father.

The Emperor Gallus and his son both slain in battell.

THE LIFE OF EMILIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND TWO AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.
(*)

EMILIANVS succeeded GALLVS in the Empire. Some Authors account him not in the number of the Emperours, and shew a reason for it, considering the small time that he held the same, which was rather in name than effect. But, seeing he was so, I haue thought good to make particular relation of him, for as much as EVETORIUS and other Authours haue done the like. I say then, that the Emperour GALLVS being ouerthrowne and slain; and EMILIANVS, remaining victorious; joyning both Armies in one, hee beganne to vie the name and authority which was giuen him. But, seeing the time of his Raigi was so short that it

R 2

The origin of Emilianus.

Large promise made by Emilianus.

Emilianus slain
by his fouldiers, & Valerianus
made Emperour.

it lasted not above foure moneths, there can no worthe thing be written : for as his time was very briefe, so doe authors briefly write. He was by birth an Africane, borne in the countrie of Mauritania, of base and obscure parentage, and from his youth was bred vp in the wars: and as he increased in yeeres, so did he in honor and offices. At length the Emperour DECIUS made him Captain General, and Gouernor of the frontiers and confines of Sarmatia; in which charge GALLVS left him, and there succeeded that which we haue recited, which was to obtaine a victorie against the Gothes, and to rebell against GALLVS; and afterwards to ouerthrow and kill both him & his son, and to make himself Emperour. When as these matters were ended he wrote with all speed to the Senat, giuing them to vnderstand of his victory and election, putting them also in mind of the negligence and euill gouernment of GALLVS, and of the Prouinces which the Roman Empire had lost in his times, promising very confidently to recover Thracia from the Gothes, and Mesopotamia & Armenia from the Persians, and to cleere all the confines of the Empire from their enemies : which his purpose as he would haue put it in execution, he was preuented; for the Army which was in the Alps (whereof VALERIANVS, a man of Noble birth and of great authority, was General) opposed, and in no case would allow the election of EMILIANVS, but rose against him, and chose their commander for Emperour. Which when EMILIANVS fouldiers vnderstood, moou'd with the reputation of VALERIANVS, which (as we will declare in his life) was very great, and to auoide ciuil wars, they resolu'd to confirm his election : and so in a manner by the Common consent of them all, EMILIANVS was slaine, being 40 yeeres old, when he had reigned little more then 3 moneths. All his troups went to serue VALERIANVS, to whom they iware, and obeyed him for their Lord and Emperour. And this was the end of the reigne of EMILIANVS, because his end should be answerable to his beginning. And in truth, writing this discourse, and considering of the estate & condition of things in those times, I was moued with great admiration and pitie, to think of the miseries of that age: for where there was such insolency and disorder, as fouldiers did daily murder their Emperours, and chose others as they pleased, and no man sought to punish them, or to reuenge the wrong; what shal a man think was done in particular prouinces: what robberies, what rapines and outrages were there vsed? What execution of iustice could that Emperour command to be done, which came to the Empire by treason, and killing his soueraigne Lord? It is easy to be beleued, that he would willingly pardon all Offences, ypon condition that he might be obeyed, especially such as were committed by powerfull and mightie men. And moreover, oftentimes the newes of the election of an Emperour was scarcely published, and his election confirmed, before that the like newes came, that he was slaine by those which had chosen him, or by some other personage of more power. And it may be that it happened so vnto them, for that they took no other care, nor busied themselves about ought else, but how they might support themselves in the Empire. And so the reader shall find that thirteene Emperours which preceded VALERIANVS, of which we will treat, died violent deaths; and none of them naturally, in his bed, beginning from the time of the good MARCVS AVRELIVS, vntill this man. And so the same VALERIANVS, together with his son, & other Emperours also died by the sword. In the time that this VALERIANVS & GALLIENVS reigned, there were thirte tyrants which vsurped the name of Emperour, who killing one another, or plotting it by some other means, none of them died his naturall death; so as, when one was proclaimed Emperour, he might be assured to com to an ill end; in such sort, that among all the miseries of those times, the greatest was, To be an Emperour : and the Emperours were such, and came to that dignity by such means, that by Gods iust iudgement they made such ends. And though in all estates there were disorders and confusion (and so it appears by the histories of those times) yet only the holy faith and Christian doctrine increased, as well in vertue and holiness of life, as in number of people; but they escaped not free from persecution. This I thought good to note & observe in this place, thereby to shew that men ought not so much to blame these times wherein we now liue, as some haue done; commending the customs of ancient times, diffaming and reprouing all that passeth in our time. I deny not but wee now are wicked and finners; but let the discreet Reader make a comparison of the order now obserued in all things, with the gouernment of those times; and he shall cleere perceiue the difference, and how farre this doth excell those times past. God grant that we may equall the good and happy times, in vertue.

THE

LIFE OF VALERIANVS ONLY OF THAT NAME AND THREE AND THIRTY THE EMPEROR OF ROME.

WE haue already declared, how that VALERIANVS was chosen Emperour, by the fouldiers whereof he was General; and how that EMILIANVS was afterwards slaine, by the hands of his owne fouldiers; and that all reduced themselves vnder the seruice of VALERIANVS; and that in this manner he was held for Emperour both in Rome, and abroad; with as great fauor and good liking of all nations, as eueryday had bene VALERIANVS when he was chosen Emperour, was of great age : for all authors which write of him affirme, that he was then fullie threescore and ten yeeres old; which time he had spent with great honor and fame both vnder good and bad Emperours, by meanes of his vertuous qualities and valour; and had attained to many dignities, and had held many magistracies and offices; among which, in the time of the Emperour DECIUS he was made Censor of Rome, and was highly honored by the same DECIUS, and by all the Senate; and was also of a very Noble and ancient house and familie. Finally, in all his life time before that he was Emperour, he was honored and happie in all his doings; and so there was great hope that he should haue repaired all the calamities and miseries of his time; which happened cleane contrary : for after his ioyfull beginning, in all the rest of his age he was miserable and vnfortunate. When he came to the Empire hee had two sonnes, the one called GALIENVS, and the other (as himselfe) VALERIANVS; which he had by several women. TREBELLIVS POLLEX and others say, that VALERIANVS was but his nephew. His victorie and election being knowne in Rome, and with great ioy and gladnes applauded; GALIENVS being there, was by the Senate and people chosen CÆSAR; and his fathers successor, as afterwards he was, as EVYRHOPIVS writeth : but SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR saith, that his father made him AVGVSTVS, which was his equall and companion with him in the Empire: both the one and the other might well be. His second sonne VALERIANVS (as some say) was made CÆSAR; and others name him not. VALERIANVS beginning to take vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, the first thing he did, was to nominate and appoint Capitaines (men of experience, and that had shewed themselves valiant) chosen among many Noble men, which had serued in the warres against the Parthians, the Persians, the Gothes, and other northerly nations : and so he determined to goe himself in person (and did so) to the warres of the East, against the Persians, which was most dangerous: for SAPOR K. of Persia had invaded & taken certain prouinces of the Empire. There was also then in the East, one CORIALVS, an audacious man, and of great account, who by the consent of SAPOR K. of Persia, proclaimed himself Emperour, seising on Cæsarea, Antioch & other cities and places in the borders; but his prosperitie soon ended: for his own people of malice & fearing VALERIANVS coming, slue him etc the Emperour arrived : who, EVSBEIVS saith, in the beginning

Valerianus fauoured of all men.

Galiens made Cæsar by the Senate.

Corialus chosen Emperour
by the consent of the King of Persia, and his death.

of his Raig was so milde, and so great a friend to the Christians, that he suffred not any wrong or violence to be done vnto them; but fauoured and honoured them in so high degree, that his Houle and Palace was as a Church and Habitable for them: but afterward, through the policie and perswasion of a Magician or Nigromancer (who was an Egyptian born, an arrant coferner, and a notable Master in forcerie and witchcraft) hee not onely desisted from fauouring them, but vied extreme cruelty in all places wherefoeuer he found any of them; so as in his time was the ninth persecution of the Catholick Church, whereof PAVLYS OKROIV in his Histories maketh particular mention. For which sin it was supposed, that God plagued him with the great miseries that befell him, which were; that He passing with a great Army into the East against Sapor King of Persia, Sapor, who was a man of great courage, and very mighty, came to encounter him; between whom it was supposed there would haue been a very great battell: but it happed otherwise. For, the Emperour through the negligence, as some say, of the Generall of his Army who conducted it; but, as others say, through the treason and deceit of the same Generall, was set in a place without any sufficient guard: where being compassed about by Sapor's men of war, all the passages were taken; in such sort, that, being vnable to make any resistance, he was taken prisoner by Sapor, who was a proud Barbarian: besides the other injuries which he vied to the poor old imprisoned Emperour, euery time he took hork he made him to stoop down; and he, setting his foot vpon his neck, mounted on horseback.

In this forrowfull bondage and misery liued this poor old man six or seuen yeeres: and his son GALIENVS took no care to procure his liberty; so the great shame and disgrace of the Imperiall Majesty.

This imprisonment of the Emperour was so much abhorred through the world, and Sapor was so much blamed for the exceffue cruelty which he vied towards him, that not onely those which were subject to the Roman Empire, but also the barbarous Kings which were friends to it, were greatly displeased therewith: so as presently, when they vnderstood thereof, they wrote their Letters vnto him, that he should freely without any ranfome set him at liberty: of which Letters, TREBELLIVS POLLIO translateth one, which I will set down verbatim; whereby it may appear, how much the power of the Romans then was by them esteemed.

BALSOLVS King of Kings, to King Sapor, greeting. If I were assured that the Romans might at any time be wholly overcome, I would reioice with thee for the victory which thou hast obtained against them; whereof thou makest such vaunts, accounting thy particular good to be profitable for vs all. But, seeing that through their fortune, or their force and vertue, that Nation is so mighty; consider and take good heed, that the taking of an old Emperour (and that through treacherie) redound not to the ruine of thy self and thy successors: and consider how many people and nations the Romans, of enemies, haue made subjects and vassals to their Empire; by which in former time they haue been overcome. We haue heard and knowe that in times past the Gaules overcame them, and that the great and mighty City of Rome was entred, yea and burned by them; and now it is manifest, that the same Gaules are subject to the Romans. And haue not the Africans ouerthrowne them sometimes? Yet at this day they are their subjects, and do serue them. I will not make mention of any more ancient and farther remote examples: onely I will say, that MYTRIDATES, King of Pontus, was Lord of all Asia; and yet in the end was ouerthrowne by them: and at this day all that part of Asia which he commanded, is subject to the Romans. If thou wilt follow my counsell, make benefit of the occasion which is offered thee, to obtain a perfect peace with them; which thou maist doo, by restoring VALERIANVS to his people. And so I conclude, that thou hast had great fortune: whereof I am glad if thou knowe how to vse it.

This is the contents of this Letter, and of others which he receiued from other Kings; which in effect do import the same. And the Bactrians, the Albanians, the Iberians, the Scythians of Mount Taurus, and other nations of the East, were so much displeased with the taking of VALERIANVS, that they would not receiue the Letters wherein Sapor wrote vnto them of his victory: and so they sent their Ambassadors to the Captains of the Romans, offering them their aid and assistance for the deliuey of the Emperour. But all auailed not to mitigate the pride and presumption of that cruell King: for, all the time that VALERIANVS liued in his power, he vied him worse than if hee had been the basest slave in the world; and in the end (as EUSEBIVS writeth) hauing commanded his eies to be pulled out, hee died of age and sorrow in prison. And ACOATHVS (an Author of no small authority) writeth, that before he died, Sapor caused him to be flayed aliue: such was the pride and cruelty of this barbarous King.

The ninth persecution of the Christians.

Valerianus taken prisoner by Sapor King of the Persians, and his escape.

A Letter from King Balisus to Sapor King of Persia.

The death of Valerianus.

VALERIANVS died in the eight yeere after that he was chosen Emperour: and because that the most of the time he liued in prison, the rest of his raigne they put to the account of his sonne GALIENVS; who was chosen Emperour at the same time with him.

THE LIFE OF GALIENVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRE AND THIRTITH ROMANE EMPEROR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

Valerianus being taken prisoner by the King of Persia, his sonne Galienus, in whose company he had reuled the Empire the space of seven yeeres, neither made any preparation to revenge the wrong done to his father, neither took any care to redeme him from imprisonment with money or any other means: and so seeing himselfe alone in the Empire, wholly forgetting his father, leading a life no lesse carelesse then dissolute; spending his time in banqueting, his things, lasciuiousnesse, and in beholding sometimes bloudie and cruell, and sometimes pleasant and ridiculous spectacles. This Emperour made so small account of his owne honoy, and was so carelesse of the Empire, as notwithstanding that he vnderstood of the rebellion of many Princes, and that many men were made Emperours; yet he seemed not to regard the same, alledging that he could liue well enough without them: In so much as a woman, Queene Zenobia, presumed to make head against him, and to defend her selfe against his Armies. Finally, going against Aureolus, who made himselfe prince of Slanonia, he was besieged in Milan, through the conspiracy of some which aspired to the Empire; and was slaine in battaile, when hee had reigned eight yeeres alone, and seuen together with his father: whose death, although it was displeasing to his soldiers, was not much lamented by the Romans; who vnder his government bad scene in a manner all the whole Empire ruined, together with his owne greatness.

When VALERIANVS was taken prisoner, his sonne GALIENVS was admitted for sole and absolute Emperour; although thasin his fathers time he was but AVOVSVS. I haue already declared how offensive the imprisonment of VALERIANVS was, and how that all the world surmised that GALIENVS would haue employed all his power, for the liberie of his father, and to haue been reuenged of the iniurie done vnto him: but he put no such matter in practice, for it was the least part of his thought; so as it is to be presumed, and many were then of opinion, that he was rather glad that his father was a slave to the King of Persia, then otherwise: for by that meanes he was sole Lord of the Empire; which he commanded fiftene yeeres: seuen yeeres in the life time of his father, although in prison; and the rest afterwards. The Historie of which Emperours, is the most confused and hardest to write, of all that euer I haue

In the time of Galenus were thrice Emperours in successive parts.

The authors except,

Macrinus came into the Empire
by force, and was the time of Galienus.

Great harvests done in sundry parts of the world in the time of Galienus, by Earthquakes and other strange things.

have read or heard of so long in the space of little fifteen years, there were more excellent men which rook upon them the name of Emperours; or were so, although tyrants, then with three hundred yeeres before, after that IULIUS CAESAR had oppressed the libertie of Rome. For, in the time of G A L I E N V S there were thirte Emperours chosen, and obeyed in diuerse places. Let the different reader then consider, that where there happened so many accidents, which often came together, what order can be obserued, but that there will be confusion and obscuritie in the Historie: especially considering the breuitie I am to observe, and having so little light from authors. For I say, that although many have treated of the life of this Emperour, yet no one hath written so plainly & distinctly as he ought to have done: and besides this, in some things he is one while cleane contrary to the other. Therefore I will, by my best endeavour, to bring this obscure and confused matter to light: where with let the Reader be satisfied, seeing I cannot possibly doe otherwise, except I should write the matter very much at large; which were to fill the whole, thereby to set one part in order. I say then, that in the reign and time of G A L I E N V S, there were greater waues and calamities, then the Romane Empire had euer endured. For VALENTIANVS (as PAVLVS OROSIVS noteth) having generally persecuted the Church in all places and parts vnder his subiection; it pleased God, as well in his owne person, as in his ministers and officers, and in all those which therein were confederates, to vnderstand and notable punishment in all parts, in the time of his sonne; and the greatest part thereof in his owne time, living in captiuitie. And notwithstanding that G A L I E N V S as soon as hee alone swaied the scepter of the Empire (as EVSEBIVS and OROSIVS testify) commanded the persecution inflicted vpon the Christians to cease, sending his letters and edicts to all parts: yet as hee did it as an Infidel, and for feare onely, so the diuine iustice ceased not to punish the excessive cruelties past, for a sained present amendment. So as during the whole life time of G A L I E N V S, the Empire was vltured by diuers tyrants, which were called Emperours: onely Italy and Rome continued firme to him.

And in that time also, strange Nations entred and invaded the Empire with fire and sword; of one side the Germanes came downe into Italy, and passing the Alpes came as farre as RAVENNA: The Gothes robbed and spoiled all POMIS, and a great part of Asia the lesse; and in Europe all GRACIA, MACEDONIA, and their confines: The Sarmates subdued and robbed Austria and Hungary. The Germans passing through France entred Spaine, to the citie of Tarragona, which they ruined. The Persians and Parthians, already possessing Mesopotamia, seized vpon the greatest part of Syria. So as in confusion all things went so to wracke, as all writers affirme, that the Romane Empire had then ended and come to confusion; had not those tyrants, which in many places rose and called themselves Emperours (some of which were very valiant and worthie men) holpen to defend and plucke the Empire out of the hands of those strange Nations, as wee will declare. And the Emperour to whom it belonged to provide for all things, although that in the beginning hee made some good shew of himselfe, performing some things as a valiant Capitaine, and outscame and slew INNOCENTIVS a wife and valiant Knight, which rebelled and was called Emperour, being Capitaine and gouernour of Hungary and Austria; and also fought a battaile wherein hee ouercame the Gothes, in which victories he vsed incredible crueltie, so as in one citie hee left no man living, of what age soeuer: Yet afterwards hee gaue himselfe so much to vice and sensuality, that when as the world was infested with wars and combusions, he continued the most part in Rome, taking his pleasure among whores and bawdes, compassed about with roses and flowers, seeking new delights; oftentimes bathing himselfe; studying how hee might keepe figges and other fruites greene all the yeere, and how they might last two or three yeeres, hauing ordinarily at his table most exquisite and delicate meates, and of great cost. And in such manner hee passed his time, that nothing troubled him, neither took he any care for the losse which daily enlied in the territories of his Empire. It is strange, To consider, that the Romane Empire at that time was not onely molested with warres and persecutions by men, but euen the very heauens and elements did seeme to conspire, and to plague it: for TREBELLIVS POLLIO writeth, that the heauens were darkened in such sort, that for many daies space, they neuer saw the Sunne; and therewithall the earth did oftentimes shake in Rome, in all Italy, in Africa, and other countries: and with those Earthquakes, many great buildings fell downe, and shew an infinite number of people. Principally in Asia many cities were destroyed, and the earth opened in many places; and shewed great vaults and caues; and there sprang out at them great streames of salt water. And there were heard thundrings and torings in the bowels of the earth, without any thunder in the aire, as is vsuall: whereat many were so amazed, as they did

died with feare. The Sea exceeded the bownds, and ouerflowed and drowned many cities; and many prodigious and wonderfull things happened. After this followed the most cruell pestilence that euer was heard or written of: so as in Rome there died in one day thereof full chouldan persons. For all which accidents G A L I E N V S took so little care, as though there had been no such matter. And when it was told him that the whole kingdom of Egypt rebelled against him, he answered; And what then? Cannot we live without the linnen cloth of Egypt? Being advertised of the spoile and losse of other provinces, he answered so scornfully, that he seemed not to care for any thing: which was the occasion that so many tyrants made themselves Lords and Emperours in his time. Of which it shall not be amisse to say something, seeing that we haue shewed the life and conditions of G A L I E N V S, and of his raigne; to the end that his historie may be the better vnderstood. If I should speak of them all at large, and describe their parentage, and all their acts, it would bee an endlesse worke: for (as I said) they were in all, thirte. But let the reader vnderstand, that all the accidents and occurrences cannot bee set downe in order as they passed: for they were so many, and happened in so many places, and many of them at one instant, that it would bee impossible to bee well vnderstood, if I should observe the order of the time, wherein euery thing happened: for to speake of one matter I must leaue another, so as the historie would be abrupt and very confused. And therefore we will begin with those matters which happened in the East; and when we haue briefly giuen notice thereof, wee will passe to other parts. Wherefore let him that shall read it vnderstand, that many of these things came to passe at one instant; and sometime before those which are treated of.

VALENTIANVS then (as we said in the beginning) being taken prisoner, and his sonne vnging no industrie to set his father at libertie, the souldiers and Capitaines which remained in the East, went disperfed and scattered with great sorrow for the disgrace they had receiued; greatly offended with the carelessness of G A L I E N V S. Wherefore BALISTA, who was Prefect and Generall of VALENTIANVS Armie, an excellent man of warre, very sufficient, and diligent in making prouision for the Armie, and in all other things requisite for the warres; and another singular Capitaine of great experience and age, who was of greatest estimation of any man of his time, whose name was MACRINVS, assembling the Romane Legions and cohorts together; with the consent and good liking of them all, they agreed to chuse an Emperour, to defend and preserve the bounds of the Empire, to recouer what was lost, and to set VALENTIANVS (if possible) at libertie; seeing that G A L I E N V S took no care thereof. And after long consultation betwene BALISTA and MACRINVS, in the end MACRINVS was chosen and obeyed for Emperour; and with him his two sonnes, the one named MACRINVS, and the other QVINTVS, were made his companions in the Empire: and hee presently made BALISTA Prefect or Generall of his Armie. When MACRINVS saw himselfe an Emperour and mightie by reason of the Armies in the East, which hee speedily drew together and put in good order; he marched with them to the confines of Persia, and in some battailes staid their insolenies by reason of their former victories. But standing in feare of a valiant Capitaine whose name was VALERVS, who was Proconsul in the prouince of Achaia in Gracia; hee sent against him a great Armie vnder the command of PISO, who had bin Consul, and was a Noble and valiant gentleman, to seize on that countrie, and thence to passe into Italy. When VALERVS vnderstood thereof, to the end he might be of greater authoritie and power, he caused himselfe to be chosen Emperour, and took the ornaments and ensignes of the Empire: wherewith hee drew so many men vnto him, that PISO was driven to retire with his troups into Thessalia, and there was ouerthrowne and slaine by such as VALERVS sent against him; PISO hauing first proclaimed himselfe Emperour, vnging the same policie which his enemye had done. But VALERVS did not long enioy this victorie; for within few daies after, hee himselfe was slain by his owne souldiers. And MACRINVS, who reigned Emperour in the East, hauing notice what had passed concerning VALERVS and PISO, not contenting himselfe with that which he held, determined with a great Armie to goe to Rome, to tunc the Emperour G A L I E N V S (if hee were able) and other tyrants which rebelled; leaving behind him QVINTVS one of his sonnes, and with him BALISTA, with certaine troups of his best souldiers, for feare of ODEBATES, of whom we will speake hereafter. He began his journey with five and fortie thousand good men of warre: and marching ouer land through Asia the lesse, passing the streights of Constantinople, he entred into Thracia. But before all this, there arose another tyrant in Slavonia and Dalmatia, whose name was AVREOLIUS, and was commander of those men.

Macrinus made Emperour in the East, together with his two sonnes.

Valens made himselfe to be chosen Emperour.

Piso slaine by Valens his souldiers.

Valens slaine by his owne souldiers.

8f

Aureolus Em-perour in Dalmatia.

A battaile betweene Macri-nus and Au-reolus, wherein Macrinus was slaine.

A peace made by Galienus with Aureolus.
Posthumus Emperour in France.

Odenatus tak-eth the name of Emperour.

The prowess of Odenatus.

Odenatus decreed by Ga-lienus for his companion in
the Empire.

of warre, which for the Empire were in those quarters, who (as some say) against his will, was constrained by his souldiers to take upon him the state and ensignes of the Empire. So as it appeareth that in that small time, every one held himselfe sufficient to be an Emperour; and that Armie which made none, was held to be of little worth and of no reputation but truly the world paid them their due, for none of them died of their naturall death, and most of them were slaine by those which chose them. MACRINVS being to passe with his Armie through those countries which were in subiection to AVRRVLVS; as both of them fought to be foueraigne Lords, they fell at variance, and MACRINVS fought a battaile with AVRRVLVS his forces, whereof an excellent man called DOMICIANVS was General; wherein MACRINVS and his sonne were overcome and slaine, there ending their high designs and great power; But before he fought this battaile (in his way passing through the prouince of Arabia) he ouerthrew the Goths, who had made great spoile and slaughter in the lands of the Empire: whereupon they retried, and a little withdrew themselves. And of MACRINVS his souldiers which escaped from the battaile, 30000. went ouer to AVRRVLVS; and so where AVRRVLVS thought he should haue lost, from thence arose his gaine. Which newes when the lawfull Emperour GALIENVS vnderstood in Rome, finding himselfe too weak to subdue AVRRVLVS, he made with him a kinde of league and peace, thereby to end the warres which he had begun against POSTHVMVS, another great Captaine who rebelled in France, and was called Emperour: of whom (although this be his place) we will speake hereafter, first to make an end of the troubles in the East, notwithstanding that in all parts of the Empire there were tyrants; neither can we make an end of AVRRVLVS, because he outliued GALIENVS, and died in the time of his successor CLAVDIVS. I say then, that in the East there was an excellent man, whose name was ODNATVS, who was Prince and Captaine of a certaine people called Palmerini, inhabiting a prouince in Syria, who seeing all things out of order (as all the rest did) fought to make himselfe absolute, and in the beginning (as writeth TREBELLIVS POLIIO) had the title of a King: but afterwards things succeeding prosperously, he took upon him the name and state of an Emperour, imparting the title and dignitie with HERODVS the eldest of three sonnes which he had by his first wife. This his tyrannie was both honorable and profitable to the Romane Empire: for he performed many notable exploits against SAPHOR King of Persia, who held VALENTINVS prisoner: so as sauing the setting of his person at libertie (for that could not be done) in all the rest he gat sufficient satisfaction for that which was lost, and recovered what SAPHOR had vnruly. For, raising many troupes of excellent good souldiers; he gaue him many battailes, in which he gat the victorie, recovered all Mesopotamia, and the noble cities of Nisibe and Garrus, and compelled King SAPHOR to flye (having first ouerthrowne him) and taking his wiues, his treasure and riches, he marched to the citie of Typhonie, and had other great adventures and victories. But for asmuch as his chiefest purpose was against MACRINVS and his sonnes, he sent a great present of the jewels and prisoners which he had taken from the Persians, to the Emperour GALIENVS; and GALIENVS was so inconstant and so base minded, as he not onely accepted the presents, but confirmed his election, giuing him the name of AVGVSTVS and his companion in the Empire, and he triumphed in Rome for the victorie which the other had obtained in Asia. While as ODNATVS gat these victories in the East, other great multitudes of Goths (besides those which were alreadye entered by Thracia into Gracia and into Europe) came downe into Asia the lesse, and so in Bithynia, burning and spoiling the countries.

When ODNATVS vnderstood of the death of MACRINVS and of his sonne, (as I haue declared) he presently resolved to march against QVINTVS, who was his other sonne, whom he had left in the East with BALISTA the Prefect of his Armie, when he was proclaimed Emperour. And this iourne proving so prosperous to ODNATVS as the rest had done, with little difficulty he gat QVINTVS into his power, and caused him to be slaine, and afterwards did the like to BALISTA. And although that some say, BALISTA was consenting to the death of QVINTVS, and that afterwards he attempted to make himselfe Emperour, yet all agree that he was put to death by ODNATVS: and in this manner remained he without any contradiction Lord of all the Prouinces of the East, and valiantly warred against the Persians. Hee had two other sonnes, the one called HERENNIVS, and the other TIMOAVS by his second wife ZENOBIA, the most manly and valiant woman that euer was in the World.

ODNATVS living in this prosperity feared of all the Princes of the world, it happened that that a colen germane of his, whose name was MIONIVS, practised his death in hope to haue had the Empire of the East after him, and used such means that ODNATVS and HERODVS, his eldest sonne (who by his fathers order was also called Emperour) were both found dead: and MIONIVS the traitor and murderier, as he was wickedly moued to kill ODNATVS, so he pleased God to permit him to be slaine in the like manner, who was within few daies after put to death by the same souldiers which help him to execute his treason; being a man which no way deserued the Empire, except by being of kin to ODNATVS: for he was a most vile and wicked man. ZENOBIA, ODNATVS wife, remaining with her two young sonnes a widow (seeming rather to haue neede of a tutor and gouernour, than to bee able to rule and gouerne others) with courage and iudgement more then manly beganne to rule, and carried herselfe therein with such wisdom and valour, as is incredible: and to the great disgrace of GALIENVS in his life time, and of CLAVDIVS his successor, she possessed the Empire of the East many yeeres, on the one side making warre against the Persians, and on the other defending herselfe against the Romane Emperours. The vertues and noble acts of this woman were so many, that I would I had longer time to describe them: but because they require a particular historie, we will with our wonted pace hold on our way; wherein of force we must retume to meet with her, because that she liued in her prosperitie vntill the time of the Emperour AVRELIVS, of whom we are to treat hereafter, where we will speake of her fall and end, if God permit. But to the end that the excellencies and vertues of this woman may be the better knowne, seeing we recite not her acts, I say first that ZENOBIA was of an excellent good constitution of bodie, and was exceedingly faire and beautifull, not very white, but somewhat browne. Her eies were great and black, very cleere and bright, and in all parts of her body she was proportionable. And as she was verie beautifull and amiable, so had she an honest countenance, and had such white and bright teeth, that they rather resembled pearles then teeth. Her voice was cleere, but sounding deepe more like a man then a woman. Herewith she was most honest and continent, and would neuer ly with her husband after that she was conceiued with childe; neither twile, vntill that by naturall signes she knew whether she had conceiued or no. She was very wise, and learned, and spake the Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian tongues perfectly, and was very liberrall and temperate in all things; somewhat seuer, and yet pitifull. In her diet she was most temperate: but yet when she invited any guests, she would a little exceede, more to please others, then for any naturall desire. She was serued very ceremoniously, and with great honour, after the custome of the Kings of Persia.

When she made any speech to her soldiers, or fate in counsell among them, she came armed with a caske vpon her head, and rode in the like manner. She delighted much in hunting, and did other things shewing strength and courage, as though she had bin a valiant and gallant Knight. She vaunted much that she descended from CLYOPATRA, and from the PTOLOMYES, Kings of Egypt; and she said, that she also descended by another line from great SEMIRAMIS Queene of Babylon. By means of this her prowess and valour, she held the Empire of the East, and was callid AVGVSTA, the space of many yeeres. As for her two sonnes HERENNIVS and TIMOLAVS, I find not written what their end was, but onely that they had the habit and ensignes of Emperours, and are reckoned in the number of the tyrants of those times. TREBELLIVS POLIIO writeth, that the Emperour AVRELIVS caused them to be slaine. Others affirme, they died of their naturall death. When as the Emperour GALIENVS (being in Rome) vnderstood of the death of ODNATVS, thinking to make a better hand against ZENOBIA, he commanded souldiers to be leui'd, and to be sent into the East against her and the Persians, and sent with them a Captaine whose name was HERACLIVS, who with his troupes was ouerthrowne by ZENOBIA'S forces. The Goths also in those times made another incursion into Asia the lesse, sailing through the sea called Mare Euxinum, and were overcome by ATHENVS and CLEOPHANTVS, Captaines sent by GALIENVS; yet for all that, they made great spoile in those coasts, and were also againe overcome by sea, by another Captaine callid VERNERIVS; and so that nation did much harme in the confines of the Empire, although that sometime they were ouerthrowne. About this time there was in the kingdom of Egypt another Captaine of certaine companies of Romanes, whose name was EMILIANVS, who after some tumults which happened there did as he saw others do, and proclaimed himselfe Emperour, and with great courage and audacie seized on that most auncient kingdom. But as these buildings had but weak foundations, so small force and a little foule weather ouerthrew them, which was in this manner. GALIENVS (notwithstand-

Odenatus and his eldest sonne brought to their end through the treason of his cousin germane Mionius.

The valour of Zenobia.

The stature and beauty of Zenobia.

The chastitie of Zenobia.

Her learning.

Her moderation in her diet.

Zenobia destroyed by her husband.

Herennius and Timolavus called Emperours.

Heracles overthrown by Zenobias forces.

ding that he was carelesse and negligent) sent from Rome against him a Capitaine called THEODATVS; who took such a couer, that EMILIANVS friends failing him, hee was apprehended by THEODATVS, and afterwards put to death in prison.

I presume, that the Reader will imagine me to be very tedious in writing the life of this Emperor, seeing he was so remisse and negligent; hauing briefly written the liues of others which were good and excellent. But, if he shall consider, that in this History are comprehended the liues of thirty Tyrants (whereof many did better deserue to haue been Emperours, than GALIENVS) he shall haue greater reason to accuse me of breuitie, than of being too tedious. But, to auoid the breach of order, I will be as brief as possibly I may.

While matters passed in the East in this manner, the other Prouinces of the Empire were neither in rest nor peace: but rather there was no way of them wherein were not wars, battels, and tyrants which called themselves Emperours; the right Emperor GALIENVS solacing himself in Rome, contented with Italie, which onely obeyed him in peace. The rest sometimes obeyed him, and sometimes they denied him their obedience: and hee, taking no care to finde any redresse, sent onely certain Captains which did something; whereof we will say somewhat. In this general combustion Africa forbore not to make some alteration, although not so much as other Prouinces did: for, at that time there was for Captain-generall thereof, a Rome Knight called FABIVS POMPONIANVS; and for Proconsul and Gouernor, another, whose name was VIVVS PASSIENVS; who, for that they would haue an Emperour of their owne making, agreed to chuse and nominate a Tribune whose name was CELVVS, a man much esteemed and commended as well for his excellent good carriage, as for his vertue and justice, and also for his personage: for, he was exceeding tall of stature, and of an excellent good constitution. Hauing effected their purpose, the poor mans majesty lasted but seven daies: for, he was put to death by the order of a woman dwelling in those Countries, who was a kinde woman to the Emperor GALIENVS, whose name was GALIENA: and after he was dead, they shewed extreme cruelty to his body. After whom, I finde not that any man rebelled against GALIENVS in Africa: yet great and many scandals, and much trouble, ensued in that Country.

While these things passed in the places aforesaid, in Hungarie, and the marches thereof, there was a Capitaine of the Armies in Dalmatia and Slauonia, called REGILIANVS, which rebelled; and, with the consent and good will of the Inhabitants of those Prouinces, he was proclaimed Emperour: for, they were greatly incensed against GALIENVS for the cruelties by him vsed in those Countries, when he overcame EVGENIUS; who in the beginning (wee say) had rebelled in that Country, and been overthrowne and slain by GALIENVS. Truly, it is a troublesome peece of work, to make relation of all the Tyrants; and it is as strange a thing to consider, that of all the Captains that VALERIANVS, father to GALIENVS, made, there was not any one of them but in the time of GALIENVS was called Emperour; wherein they shewed little loyalty to their Country and their Lord: but it was growne to a custome so to do, so as they seemed to haue right of inheritance. Neuertheless, it argued the great judgement of VALERIANVS, in chusing for his Captains men of so great courage and valour. There were also, besides these Captains, others, who in this confusion of the Empire were called Emperours: among which was one TYTUS a worthy man, who in the time of MAXIMIANVS had been Tribune, but he continued with this title but six months; for, the same soldiery which had elected him, slue him. And in the same manner began and ended CENSORIUS; a man which had been Consul, and had held other offices and dignities. And another Captain, called TREBELLIANVS, was chosen and proclaimed Emperour by the Ysaui, which are a people inhabiting the mountains, bordering vpon Cilicia in Asia the lesse, who many times gouerned those Quarters: against whom, GALIENVS sent a Captain called GABRIOLVS, born in Egypt. Between which two was fought a terrible battell; wherein TREBELLIANVS was overthrowne and slain. Yet, for all this, the Ysaui continued not in peace; but rebelled many times afterwards, more for that their Country was of hard access, than for the valour or vertue of the Inhabitants. And, to make a conclusion, let vs write of those which in France, and the marches thereof, were called Emperours, from the time of the imprisonment of VALERIANVS, vntill the death of his son GALIENVS: which of purpose I haue left till the last, because in those wars GALIENVS employed himself, and finally therein ended his daies.

There was for Captain-generall of the Armies in the Prouinces of France, an excellent and valieasy.

The Authors

Celusus made Emperour in Africa, and put to death by a woman.

Regilius called Emperour in Hungary and Dalmatia.

Titus made Emperour by his soldiers, and slain by the same.

Censorinus began and ended in the same manner.

valiant man, whose name was POSTHVMVS; of whom (speaking of the Tyrant AVREOLIUS) wee made mention; which VALERIANVS did highly honour and esteem: and for that cause his sonne GALIENVS held him in great reputation, and as soone as he came to the Empire, he sent him his sonne SALONINVS, whom hee intitled CAESAR, to bee brought vp and instructed by him: But afterwards seeing the neglect and ill gouernment of his father GALIENVS (forgetting the loyalty which he ought to his soveraigne Lord) putting the sonne to death, he sought to get the Empire for himselfe: Yet others write, that hee was provoked and compelled by the inhabitants of that Countrey (which hee called GALLIA) to accept the name of Emperour; and that they slew SALONINVS, scornning to haue a boy for their Lord: But howsoever it was, POSTHVMVS with great courage and discretion made himselfe Lord of all France, and so gouerned the same for the space of seuen yeeres, defending it valiantly, and obtaining many great victories against the Barbarians and northern nations, which continually invaded it and made inuasions.

Against POSTHVMVS; GALIENVS leuied an Armie, for that he was looke to Italy; and notwithstanding that he was vicious and carelesse, yet he wanted not sufficient courage for the warres; if he would haue followed them, as he did his pleasures and ease. He went against POSTHVMVS, hauing with him for Generall of his Armie, a Noble man called THEODOTVS; and also another called CLAUDIUS; who was a man of great probitie and vertue, and was afterwards Emperour. Being come before a Citie wherein POSTHVMVS was, the Frenchmen did not onely defend him, and the Citie, shewing great courage and lustie; but the Emperor GALIENVS in a skirmish was wounded with an Arrow, by meanes whereof hee was constrained to rayse his siege. And holding this for a very doubtfull warre, he made peace with AVREOLVS, who at that time was called Emperour in Slauonia. But that was not sufficient to defeat POSTHVMVS; for he was supported by VICTORINVS, who was an excellent Capitaine, and a young man, whom POSTHVMVS made his companion in his Empire; with whose aide and diligence (although that most commonly his side was overthrowne) he defended himselfe and prolonged the warres many daies; hauing sometimes prosperous and sometimes aduerser fortune.

GALIENVS returning to Rome, as if he had left all in peace, entred in great triumph, giuing himselfe ouer to his old course of life and accustomed pleasures; whether daily newes were brought vnto him (besides the strange Nations which molested the Empire) of captaines and other notable men which intitled themselves Emperours: whereof his wickednesse was the occasion; being hated and scorned for his little care and stupidity, which are things which make wicked men audacious; and giue good men hope and meanes to seeke redresse.

POSTHVMVS living all this time (as I said) in great prosperitie, together with his sonne of his owne name whom he intitled CAESAR, and afterwards Emperour, and his companion in his Empire; he gouerned with great iustice and securitie. But the Frenchmen, desirous of innovations, rebelled against him and chose for Emperour a Captain whose name was LOLIANVS, a man of good fort, very valiant and of great experience: and these two, waiting one against the other, POSTHVMVS and his sonne were slaine by him and them; and so hee was paid for the treason which he committed against GALIENVS. And LOLIANVS, remaying Emperour in those parts, notwithstanding that he was very valiant and of great power, yet he could neuer attaine to that authoritie which POSTHVMVS had; as well for that he was not chosen by common consent, as for that VICTORINVS, whom (as we haue said) POSTHVMVS proclaimed Emperour and his companion, held a great part of the countrey and was called Emperour. This VICTORINVS was a womans sonne, whose name was VICTORIA or VICTORINA; which was so valiant and manly, and so desirous to raigne, that shee was therefore called mother of Armies, and VICTORINVS was altogether ruled by her counsell; and she afterwards after the death of her sonne, took vpon her to make an Emperour of her choosing: so great was her minde and policie.

VICTORINVS with the fauour and reputation of his mother, made resistance against LOLIANVS the new Emperour, which slew POSTHVMVS, so as VICTORIANVS obtained a victorie against LOLIANVS and slew him; and remained sole Lord, together with his mother whom he called AVGVSTA. To say the truth, VICTORINVS was an excellent and valiant Prince; yet luxurious, and therefore raigned but a little: for by the treason of a soldier (from whom he had taken his wife) he was slaine in the Citie of Agrippina, now called

Saloninus son of Galienus put to death by Posthumus
who also was called Emperour.

The French rebelled against Posthumus, or his place chose Lolians.
Posthumus &
his sonne slaine
in the warre against Lolians.

Tetricus chosen Emperour by the means of Victorinus.

Saturninus and Marius called Emperours, the one was slaine properly, and the other raised up by daies.

A conspiracie against Galienus.

Galienus and his brother Valerianus
slaine.

Colleine in Germanie: which when his mother vnderstood, with the aide and assistance of some of her friends she proclaimed her nephew VICTORINVS Emperour, who was the same VICTORINVS sonne. But the furie of the men of warre was such, as they presently slew the sonne as they had done the father. Yet for all this, VICTORINA gaue not over her desire to rule and command: for by the means of her friends and favourites, she perswaded TETRICVS, a Senator of Rome, who had a certaine government in France, to proclaim himselfe Emperour, and his sonne CÆSAR; which he did, and proved an excellent and valiant Prince; and made himselfe Lord of all France, and of the greatest part of Spaine, obtaining some victories against the Northern nations: whose reign continued long, even vntill the time of AVRELIVS. The right Emperour GALIENVS enioyed Rome and all Italy, which never forsooke him: and the other tyrants (by turnes) the one destroyed the other, or else were slaine by their owne souldiers. I ghesse that I have very neere treated of all the tyrants, except of one whose name was SATVRNINVS, and of another called MARIVS. OF SATVRNINVS, I say, that the souldiers which chose him, presently bereaved him of his life: and MARIVS his Empire lasted but seuen daies.

Through all parts and provinces of the Empire there were committed infinite murders, robberies, violencies, insolencies, and all kinde of cruelties, tyrannies and treasons, with famine, pestilence, and other miseries and calamities, seldom heard of, but in the time of this GALIENVS; and the greatest part thereof caused through his vice, crueltie, and negligence: and so it pleased God that hee had the like end as other euill Emperours had; which was complotted in this manner. A great Capitaine (whereof the warres produce abundance) called MARTIANVS, compounding with another called HERACLIANVS, and one other whose name was CÆRONIVS, determined to kill GALIENVS, to the end that one of them might have the Empire; either of them pretending that they did it for the general good of the Empire. And having laid their plot, they presently put it in execution: for it happened that GALIENVS went from Rome with a great Armie against AVREOLVS, who (as we have said) was called Emperour: and they two had been companions in the Empire. But afterwards falling at variance, AVREOLVS took the citie of Milan; and GALIENVS having besieged it, MARTIANVS and the other traitors, which had agreed with AVREOLVS, fained that the said AVREOLVS was making a fallie, and came to charge that place where GALIENVS was: whereupon he with greater haste then good speed, went from his lodging finally accompanied; but before that the rest of the Armie could come together, hee was slaine by those which came with him, together with a brother of his, whose name was VALERIANVS. And so GALIENVS ended both his life and raigne, when as the Empire was little lesse then rent in pieces and vsurped by forraine nations: for the Gothes and Scythians held a great part of Thracia, and of Macedonia in Europe, and some provinces in Asia. ZENOBIA reigned and ruled all in the East: and in France and part of Germanie, TETRICVS and VICTORINVS: and in Slawia and Illyricum, AVREOLVS, who was besieged in Milan; and so all the rest lived, part vnder the obedience of GALIENVS, and part vnder tyrants. The souldiers of his Armie were greatly offended with his death: for they hoped to have had the lacking and spoile of that citie, so as MARTIANVS and his companions were driven to satisfie them with readie money: but none of those conspirators could attaine to the desired title of Emperour. This happened in theyere of our Saviour IESVS CHRIST 271, after EVNERVS, in the fifteteenth yeere of the raign of GALIENVS.

THE

THE LIFE OF CLAVDIVS THE SECOND, AND FIVE AND THIR-TITH EMPEROR of ROME.
(*)

AM now freed from no small labour, having finish't howsoever the life of GALIENVS; whose history is confused and out of order, and by authors written obscurely, as it appeareth: which being ended, I come now to relate the life of CLAVDIVS the second, who was one of the most vertuous and valiant Princes that euer was in the world.

As soone as the Emperour GALIENVS was dead, the Souldiers of his Armie were so displeased, as neither MARTIANVS nor any of those which conspir'd with him in his treason, could or durst take vpon him the name of Emperour; but rather by the common consent of all men, CLAVDIVS who came thither with GALIENVS, one of the most excellent Captaines of them all, as well for his bountie and vertues, as for the worthinesse of his person, and the great and notable seruices which he had done in former times, was chosen Emperour. It cannot distinctly be set downe of what linage or countie he was: for some affirm, that he was born in Delmatia; and was descended of an ancient family: others say, that he was of Dardania, and descended from the bloud of the Troians: and some (as AVRELIVS VICTOR saith) affirmed, that he was the sonne of the Emperour GORDIANVS. He was a very tall man of person; his eyes were cleere and bright, and he had a great and full face; and was very strong and of marvellous force: so as in wrestling and other exercises, which young men did vs, he euer vantage the prize; he was also vertuous, and had excellent good parts. He was very chaste and continent; temperate, iust and vpright, both before that he was Emperour, and in the time of his raigne. He dearly loved his friends and kinsmen, and greatly honoured strangers. He hated the euill, and severely punished them; and was an extreme enemy to vnjust Iudges. He made excellent lawes and ordinances, and in very short time reformed the Common-wealth: so as when he died, it seemed to be another world. Before that he was Emperour, he did many noble feates of Armes in the seruice of GALIENVS, against POTHIMIUS in France, and against the Gothes in many parts, and likewise in other wars. Wherefore he was worthily chosen by all men to the dignitie of the Empire. For which occasion, as soone as his election was knowne in Rome, the ioy was great which was conceived thereat by all estates: and they confirmed his election, with great applauses and blessings of the Senate.

The picture strength of Clavdivs.

S 2

When

The victory of Claudius A. against Aureolus.

The death of Aureolus.

After sundrie arguments Claudius prepared himself to go against the Gothes.

How commends made by the Gothes.

Claudius his Letter to the Senate of Rome.

When CLAVDIVS was inuested in the Empire, he gouerned the same with so great wisdom and courage, as a good Prince was requisite. The first enterprize he had being Emperour, was against AVREOLVS, who (as we said) was in Milan. Who, vnderstand- ing the death of GALIENVS, fortified himselfe in such sort, as hee made account to haue remained sole and absolute Emperour. But CLAVDIVS, hauing reinforced his Armie, fought many battailes with him, amongst which, in one which was very famous, he obtained the victorie worthily, fighting therein most valiantly. Whereupon AVREOLVS retired into Milan, and from thence sought to come to some composition with CLAVDIVS, as he had done with GALIENVS: but CLAVDIVS, as a vertuous and victorious Prince, would not heare of any agreement with a tyrant, but answered, That such demands might well haue been made to GALIENVS, who could haue endured AVREOLVS his conditions, and stood in feare of him: but of him he was not to expect any vnjust or vnlawfull matter. AVREOLVS was afterwards slaine, as some say, by his owne fouldiers; and as others say, by CLAVDIVS his commandement, fighting at the foote of a bridge. But wherefoeuer, CLAVDIVS became Lord of his Armie, and of all the countries which he held: and going with this victorie to Rome, he was there receiued with great triumph and feasting, where he settled the affaires of the Empire in such sort, as could not be bettered: he did nothing without the consent of the Senate. And his goodness comming to be knowne, he was obied in all parts of the Empire, sauing in such as were vsurped by tyrants and barbarous nations. And as all his studie and care was, how he might restore the Empire to her former libertie, and to recover what was lost, exposing his person to all kinds of dangers, it was debated in the Senate, and that very doubtfully and with diuers opinions, what warre was first to be vndertaken, and whether he should goe against TETRACVS and VICTORINA, which held France and Spaine, or into the East against ZENOBIA, or else against the Gothes and other Nations, which also vsurped and infected sundrie parts of the Empire.

But the good Emperour CLAVDIVS, soone resolued them of that doubt, saying; That the first warre that he would vndertake should be against the Gothes, and other barbarous Nations, for they were enemies to the Common-wealth, but as for the Tyrants they were enemies to him only: wherefore, he was bound to reuenge a publike wrong before a priuate intestine. This his resolution being approved by the Senate and people of Rome, he with all possible diligence raised the greatest Armie that euer was leied by any Emperour for such a warre, and truly hee could not well haue had any lesse, considering the present necessity: for the Gothes (as IORNANDVS in the Acts of the Gothes, and PAVLVS OROSIUS, and others doe write) had for the space of fifteene yeeres vsurped many parts of the Empire, and had destroyed many Cities, amongst which some were very great, and of speciall note. And notwithstanding that by MACRINVS, and by CORNELIVS AVITVS, and in one place by the same CLAVDIVS in the time of GALIENVS, they had been sometimes defeated and ouerthrowne; yet neuertheless they still held all Thracia, and in a manner all Macedonia and other prouinces.

At such time as CLAVDIVS resolued to make warre against the Gothes, they through their greedy desire of spoile and booty, and for reuenge of some battailes which they had lost, beleeuing that CLAVDIVS would be sufficiently busied in warring against TETRACVS and other Tyrants, moued many northerly people and Nations to come against the Romans. Whereupon they ioined themselves with the Heruli, Truagii, Virungi, and other Nations, exceeding, in all, the number of three hundred thousand fighting men besides seruants and disarmed people: and taking their way through Hungarie, and downe the Danubie, they freighted two thousand Barks and Ships with men and munition. Some are of opinion (as I say) that this Fleet came downe the Danubie; and others affirme, that this was a Fleet that the Gothes had by Sea: ancient Authors wrote it so confusedly, as I continue of my first opinion, that the Gothes were neuer mighty by Sea; neither then, nor at any time before. In conclusion, they brought so many men, and so great store of Armes and victuals, as they made the whole Empire to quake for feare; only the invincible Emperour was not dismayed, but with a gallant Army marched against them: and being ready to come to blowes with them, he wrote a briefe Letter to the Senate, wherein he shewed the great difficultie and danger wherein he was; and yet wanted not courage to assault his enemies, the effect whereof was this:

Fathers conscripe, I do giue you to vnderstand, and hold it for certaine, that into the boundes of the Romane Empire are entred three hundred and twentie thousand men of warre,

I goe

I goe to fight with them; if I ouercome them, it is reason that you giue me such thanks and reward as such a deede shall deserue. But if it happen otherwise, consider I pray you that I fight after that GALIENVS hath reigned, the commonwealth being rent in peeces, and almost ruinate, and that I shall fight after the tyrannies and rebellions of EYBENVS, REGILIANVS, LOLIANVS, POSTHYMVS, CELVS, and many others, which in contempt of GALIENVS rebelled against their country and commonwealth. And wee may well say that we now haue neither whole sword nor lance: for France and Spaine which are the sinewes and strength of the Empire, are vsurped by TETRACVS, and the crossebowes and archers (although it be a shame to speake it) ZENOBIA hath them all: so as hauing such want of all things necessarie, whatsoever small matter shall be vs performed, is to be reputed great.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, CLAVDIVS led with him an excellent and well gouerned Army: and by his wisdom and good direction, comming to a battaile, the Gothes were ouerthrowne, and an incredible slaughter made of them. This was one of the most noble victories that euer was gotten, wherein there was a great number of enemies slaine and taken prisoners, and great abundance of spoile taken by the soldiers. Inasmuch as the same CLAVDIVS in a letter (extant to this day) sent by him to LVDIVS BROCHVS, writeth, that he had slaine, taken, and put to flight three hundred thousand men, and taken two thousand ships: so as the houses were filled (almost to the tops) with swords, lances, shields and targets of the subdued: and the banks of riuers, the sea-shore and the fields were full of bones, and the wayes covered with the dead carcases of the enemies. For this victorie there was conceived great ioy in Rome: and for that cause they made many vowes and supplications to their gods. In this battaile were taken many barbarous Kings, and other men of great account; and there were so many prisoners, as there was neither prouince nor citie wherein were not many slaues of that nation.

After this victorie in Thracia neere to Constantinople, and in Macedonia neere to the citie of Thessalonica, CLAVDIVS his Captaines fought sundrie battailes with the Gothes which were possessed of those cities in all which, through his good fortune, his enemies were ouercome, in such sort, as he restored to the Romane Empire all that which they had vsurped: so as the Gothes were wholly driuen out, and in long time after durst not hold vp their heads. Likewise this most valiant Prince (as EVROPEVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR report) had another very notable victorie against the Germanes, neere to a Lake called Venacum (now Garda): the enemy being little lesse then two hundred thousand strong: so as hauing freed the Empire from frangers, and meaning to haue gone against TETRACVS and ZENOBIA, or against some other tyrants remaining, it happened that the good Emperour fell sick in such sort, that as TABELLIVS POETIO saith) within few daies after he died of his naturall death; a thing which I most desire to see in an Emperour, which seldom happeneth but in such as are good and iust, as this Emperour was. When he died he had reigned only two yeeres (and for his death (except TETRACVS and ZENOBIA) all were very sorry) which happened in the yeere of our Lord 279; and by a decree made by the Senate, he was honoured with all kind of honours and placed in the number of the gods. His body made of gold was set vp in the Capitol, and his target of gold was set in the Senate. Truly they did in with great reason, for considering his high attempts in the beginning, without all doubt, it had pleased God to haue given him longer life, CLAVDIVS had wholie defeated all the tyrants of the Empire, and had againe set it in perfect libertie.

A most noble victorie obtained by Claudius against the Gothes.

Claudius his victorie against the Ger-manes.

The death of Claudius.

His body made of gold.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROVR QVINTILIVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND SIXE AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

THE Emperour CLAVDIVS had a brother whose name was QVINTILIVS: who as he was his brother by nature; so was he in behaviour, condition, and vertue: for he was very wise, and as expert in the warres as in ciuill gouernement: by reason whereof he was much esteemed and beloued, and was left with certaine Legions to guard Italy, when his brother went to the warres against the Gothes. The death of CLAVDIVS being published, the little Armie which QVINTILIVS commanded, moued thereto by his deserts and vertues, chose him Emperour; and his election was approved by the Senate of Rome being aduertised thereof, and they gaue him the name of AVRELIVS, after EVTROPEVS, and he hauing accepted the Empire, and beginning to make a good show of his valour; hauing taigned onely seuentene daies, newes was brought him that the victorious armie which his brother had with him, as soone as he was dead had made choise of a Noble man called AVRELIVS, for Emperour; of whom we will presentlie discourse. Wherefore QVINTILIVS bring our of hope to be able to make his partie good against him, as well for that he was a man of great valour, and courage; as for that his Army was the whole power of the Roman Empire, desiring to die in his estate rather then to live deuided thereof, hauing first sounded the will of his souldiers, and finding no hope in them, he called his veins to be opened, and so died voluntarily bleeding; hauing reigned as some say, twentie daies; and as others say, foure monethes.

The death of Quintilius.

THE

THE LIFE OF AVRELIVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SEVEN AND THIRTITH EMPEROR of ROME.

(*)

AFTER QVINTILIVS, AVRELIVS succeeded in the Empire, or to say better, after CLAVDIVS: for as loon CLAVDIVS was dead, in the same manner as the Army in Italy chose QVINTILIVS, the other great Armie which CLAVDIVS led, chose AVRELIVS, and he remained Emperour; and was one of the most mightie that euer reigned in Rome; and is by Historiographers compared in his feates of Armes with the two greatest and best Captaines of the world, which were ALEXANDER the Great, and IVLIVS CÆSAR, for the great victories which he obtained in the small time of his reigne, and the Prouinces which he subdued with incredible celeritie, marching from one to another, as we will briefly declare; although that in his condition he was neither equal to them, neither did he any way imitate them; chiefly, he did much differ from CÆSAR in clemency, for he was cruell and bloudie: wherefore it was said of him, that he was necessarie for the Empire, but yet he was ill beloued by the greatest part. Others said, that AVRELIVS was fit to be a Captaine, but not to be an Emperour; and so he is neither accounted among the good Princes, nor amongst the euill: for, of the one side, he set the Empire at libertie, by destroying all the tyrants; and of the other, he vfed much crueltie. Some say, that he was borne in Dacia, and others say, in Misia, the truth whereof is vncertaine: and so FLAVIVS VOPISCVS, who doth most copiously and particularly write his life, leaue it in doubt; but all agree that he was of a meane familie, and of poore parentage. He was tall of stature, and of great strength, and had a gracious and pleasing countenance; and with his faire aspect hee seemed to be a perfect man. In his diet he did somewhat exceede ordinary. From his infancy he was inclined to the warres and militarie discipline, and in obseruing it, and making it to be obserued, he was most seuer. He was of great courage and singular strength, and exceedingly desirous to come to blowes with his enemies. Being a private souldier, he euer affected battailes, assaults, skirmishes and encounters: and for that there was another in the Armie whose name was also AVRELIVS, so distinguish the one from the other, they called this, AVRELIVS with his hand vpon his sword: for vpon all occasions he was in a readinesse with pike or sword in his hand, desiring to be doing. With which readinesse and valour hee made himselfe famous wherefoeuer he came, and performed notable matters in his owne person. In so much that THEOPHILVS and FLAVIVS VOPISCVS report of him, that in the warres of Sarmatia he hapned in one day to kill fortie of his enemies with his owne hands, and at fouerall times aboue nine hundred men: which made him so much esteemed among the Romanes,

The disposition of Aurelianus.

The valour
of Aurelianus.

as in their dancings which they vsed in those times, among certaine sonnets and catches sung by the dancer, they vsed to pronounce this verse:

*A thousand and a thousand,
one alone hath killed a thousand.
A thousand yeeres and a thousand line he, alone which killed a thousand.*

He did other things, which although they seeme to be but meane and of small importance, yet they demonstrate the valour and fortitude of this man; whereby he was preferred to great offices and commands in the warres. He was many times Capitaine and Tribune, and aboue forty times was Lieutenant to other Captaines and Tribunes. In which offices hee did so severely punish souldiers for their infolencies, and did so strictly observe the discipline of the warres, that he was much feared of them: and did likewise many notable things in battailes and skirmishes; and principally in the warres which his predecesor CLAVDIVS had with the Gothes, hee wonne more honour then any other Capitaine did; hee being General of the horse.

Which his doings were the occasion, that, CLAVDIVS being dead, he was by the general consent of the whole Armie chollén and made Emperor. And, QVINTILIUS being dead, who was obiecd in Rome, the Senate and people of Rome approovd his election, and held him for Emperor. Having accepted the Empire, without any longer stay hee marched with his victorious Army against the Suevians and Sarmates, northerly nations, which had invaded the bounds of the Empire. With whom he came to a battell, and obtained a most honourable victory: but therein befell him one mishap, whereof many inconveniences ensued; which was, that heeing busied in this warre, the Marcomanni, and other most fierce Nations of Germany, came down into Italie, and made great spoil and slaughter in that part which is now called Lombardie, and in the marches of Milan; whereof they were in so great fear in Rome, as they thought they should have been wholly lost: which put all into combustion, every man speaking ill of AVRELIANVS. But, when as he heard the newes, hee was greatly grieved, and came with all speed to the rescue of Italie. And this was so dangerous a war, that never vnto Placentia there wanted but a little, that the Emperor had not been wholly overthrowne: for, joining battell with their whole powers on either side, they fought a whole day from Sun to Sun; and AVRELIANVS lost in that Fight the greatest part of all his troops: so cruell was the battell. But hee afterwards reinforcing his Armie (in three notable battels having the victorie) ended the warre, destroying the whole Armie of the Marcomanni; and from thence went to Rome, much displeased with those which had murmured and spoken ill of him: amongst which were some that had practised against him. And whereas he was very cruell (notwithstanding that hee was received with great feasting and solemnities) he vsed so cruell punishment for light offenses, and of so small importance, that any gentle or mercifull Prince would have dissembled, and made no reckoning thereof. But he would not do so; but, to the contrary, put many cruelly to death: for which cause he came to be extremely feared, and therefore generally hated. Hee enlarged the wals of Rome, and fortified the same, repairing that which was decayed; which was not lawfull for any Emperor to doo, but for such as had enlarged the Prouinces and Limits of the Roman Empire: for, by that title, AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, TRAIAN, and also NERO, enlarged the wals.

Cruelly vsed in Rome by Aurelianus, and the occasion thereof.

Aurelianus enlarged the wals of Rome.

Aurelianus departed from Rome into the East against Queen Zenobia.

Having settled all matters in Rome (his chief delight consisting in Arms) hee could stay but few daies there; but speedily departed towards the East against the great ZENOBIA, accounting it a shame that a woman should hold the East Empire; in disgrace of Rome and the Emperors thereof. And, passing through Slaunmia, and thence through Thracia, he had some conflicts against certain barbarous Nations which fought to resist him, and to haue stopped him in his journey. But, keeping his way, hee came to Byzantium, which is now called Constantinople; and so passed with all his Armie into Asia the lesse, which is now subject to the Turk: first pacifying the Prouince of Bithynia which then rebelled; all the nations yeelding themselves into his hands, without any battell or making resistance.

From thence hee marched into Cappadocia, where, forthat the City of Tiana (which in that Country was an ancient Colonie of the Greeks; being the Country also wherein the famous APOLLONIVS TIANYVS was born) made resistance and would not receive him; hee swate that he would punish the Inhabitants in such sort, that hee would not leaue a dog aliue among them: which his resolution hee afterwards altered and reuoked. For, by the illusion of the diuell (God permitting it for some vnknowne cause) there appeared vnto him in a dream (for it seemed vnto him that he saw a vision) one which told him that it was APOLLONIVS TIANYVS, which warned him to forbear to destroy his Countrey Tiana, and gaue him also further aduice. Which, as they write, was the occasion that hee not onely pardoned the Tianians, but from thenceforth he was not so cruell as formerly hee had been. So as in Tiana hee onely put HERACLAMON to death, who betrayed the City into his hands; which hee said he did, for that he which had been a traitor to his Countrey, could never bee faithfull to him. But his wealth which was very great he commanded to be giuen to his heirs, to the end that no man should think he had condemned him to bee executed for the desie of his goods. And to the souldiers, complaining that hee had not giuen them the spoil of the City, wherein hee had sworn that he would not leaue any liuing, no nor a dogge; hee answered, I promised that there should neuer a dog remain aliue in Tiana, and I giue you leaue to kill them all.

the

A just reward for treason.

When the Emperor had gotten this noble City, he from thence marched to Antioch, which bordereth vpon the Mount Taurus; where, granting a generall pardon, with one onely battell of small resistance, neer to a Wood called Daphne, hee scald vpon all that Prouince. And, leauing all those Countreies in peace, hee passed thence into Syria against ZENOBIA; who with another woman called Zavalla (in a manner as many as herselfe) attended his coming with a very great Army of singular good Souldiers and excellent Captains, trained vp with great experience in the warres with her husband ODENATVS; and afterwards in other wars against the Persians. The two Armies coming neer the one to the other, a most cruell warre beganne between them. For, ZENOBIA, not as a woman, but as though she had bin HANNIBAL, provided and performed whatfoeuer was fit against the Romans. Finally, after some encounters they came to a battell neer to the City of Emesa, which bordereth vpon the deserts of Palmyra, a Prouince in Syria; which was so bloody and doubtful, that AVRELIANVS was well neer overthrowne: for, his Cauallerie, being tired with fighting, began to retire, refusing the battell, and were ready to haue turned their backs, and to flee: but heeing detained by their Captains, and by the footmen constrained to stand firm, he obtained the victory, and ZENOBIA escaped by flight.

A cruell battell between Zenobia and Aurelianus.

Zenobia surrendred and was led to flight by Aurelianus.

When AVRELIANVS had obtained so noble a victory, he went into the City of Emesa, and from thence to the City of Palmyra, which is the Head of that Prouince, and ZENOBIA'S principall seat. In which way his souldiers endured many wants and difficulties, wrought by their enemies where they were to passe; and the City with such courage made resistance, that his souldiers were greatly distressed; and the Emperour himself in person incurred many great dangers: which plainly appeareth by a Letter written by him to a familiar friend of his. Whereupon AVRELIANVS, desiring to make an end of this war, thinking to induce ZENOBIA to yeeld herself into his power, sent her a Letter wherein he did assure her of her life, and that he would giue her all her treasure, her jewels and her money; and that shee should liue free and at liberty in any place of city where the Senate should appoint.

ZENOBIA, hauing received this Letter, in lieu of granting or requiring peace, became therewith more haughty and proud than before; answering him with another very proud Letter; which, NICOMACHVS, a Writer of those Times, translated out of the Syrian into the Greek Tongue; and FELIXVS VORTISEVS hath left it to vs in Latin: which I will sette down, to the end that the haughty presumptuous minde of this woman may be made knowne to the world, which faithly thus:

ZENOBIA, Queen of the East, to AVRELIANVS AVGVSTVS, greeting. No other Captain vntill this day, but thou; hath required by Letter that which thou demandst of mee: for, those things (AVRELIANVS) which are to be tried by warre, by Arms and force are to be demanded and determined. Thou requirest that I yeeld and giue my self into thy power, as if thou hadst neuer read that CLEOPATRA, Queen of Egypt (from whom I am descended) would rather kill herself, than liue in the power of OCTAVIANVS, in any dignity or liberty granted by him whatsoever. Let thee knowe, that I shall not want the relief of the Persians, which I expect. The Saracens will also come to my aid; and the Armenians fauour me. Thou dost well knowe, that the theecus of Syria were sufficient to overthrowe and disorder thy Army. If then the forces and succours which I expect shall come vnto mee, thou wilt abate the pride and presumption wherewith thou dost now command me to yeeld my self, as though I were absolutely overcome. And so she ended her Letter, glorying more in her valour, than in her eloquence.

A letter written by Zenobia to Aurelianus.

This

Zenobia takes prisoner by Aurelianus.

The emperor of Zenobia made to Aurelianus.

Aurelianus his Journies.

The Palmirins
rebelled.

The Egyptians
rebelled.

This Letter being receiued by AVRELIANVS, hee made no account thereof; but drew neer with his Armie, and commanded his Captains to besiege the City more straightly, and with such order and policy to assault the same, and to defend his Camp, that he failed not in any thing of the duty of an excellent Captain. For, upon the way coming to ZENOBIA, hee overthrew the succours which came from Persia, and did the like by certain companies of Saracens. And the forces which came from Armenia, what through fear and fair promises, hee drew to his service, and made them his friends; in such sort, that ZENOBIA, seeing herself overcome, in the best manner shee could fled from the City with Dromedaries, carrying such treasure with her as the shortnes of the time would permit: and, travelling towards Persia, shee was overtaken upon the way by certain horsemen which the Emperor sent after her. And so AVRELIANVS took her, and the City of Palmyra, and afterwards all the whole estate of the East. And although many counselled him, yet he would not put ZENOBIA to death, purposing to haue her alive in his triumph. But he put the Philosopher LONGINVS to death, for that it was said he had penned the Letter which ZENOBIA wrote unto him. TREBELLIVS POLLIO writeth, that when this valiant woman was brought into the presence of AVRELIANVS, he said unto her; Tell me, ZENOBIA, how durst thou presume to contemne Emperors, and to defend thy self against their power? Whereat she answered, excusing herself, and honouring him, saying: Only thee, AVRELIANVS, I acknowledge to be an Emperor, for that thou knowest how to overcome. But as for GALIENVS, AVREOLVS, and the rest, I never held them for Emperors nor Princes. In this manner (as I said) ended the power of ZENOBIA.

The Emperor AVRELIANVS having ended this warre, leaving order and forces in the East, returned into Europe the same way he went: and, coming into high Germanie, he subdued a certain people called Carpi, which were in Arms, and overthrew them in battell. Vpon this occasion he was in Rome called CARPICVS: whereat he was both angry and sorry, that for that only victory they should giue him a surname. And therefore caused himself to be called GOthicvs, SARMATICVS, ARMENICVS, PARTHICVS, ADIBENICVS, GERMANICVS, and SYRICVS, after the names of the Countries and Nations which he had subdued.

As matters stood vpon these rearmes, and he being to march against TETRICVS the tyrant of France; newes was brought him that the Palmirins which had bene under ZENOBIA were revolted, and did rebell, and had slaine SANDARIO whom he had left there for Captaine and gouernour of the Citie, with sixe hundred archers with him; and that they had made ARCHELAVS, who was of kinne to ZENOBIA, their Prince. When AVRELIANVS vnderstood thereof, with his accustomed courage and expedition (which was naturall unto him) he returned by great iournies into Asia: and being come into Syria, he made no stay until that he came to the Citie of Palmyra; which when he had taken, he inflicted most cruell punishment, by putting all sorts of people to death, men, women, old folkes and young children, without leaving any living creature therein. And afterwards he left the whole Citie desolate, and almost all the other Cities, which consented and conspired therewith in the rebellion. Without any long abode in Asia, in great haste he returned into Europe, where he happily pacified all matters; so as there remained no part, but all was in obedience. Neuerthelesse, for as much as the people were accustomed to the libertie and euill customes permitted vnder the gouernment of GALIENVS, a certaine Captaine called FIRMVS, who was in Egypt, arose, and made all that Kingdome to rebell; and, as some write, made himself Emperor: and, as others write, crying Liberty, hee promised to maintain the liberty and priuiledges of that Country. Which when this warlike Emperor vnderstood (who, for expedition in the wars, was a second IULIUS CÆSAR) he would put no man else but himself in trust, and returned the third time into Asia, and thence came into Egypt; and at his first entry with great difficulty hee recovered all that Kingdome, and left it in peace and quiet.

At that time (as AVRELIANVS VICTOR, and EUTHROBIUS report) there was a Captain in Dalmatia whose name was SERPTIMIVS, who also rebelled, and proclaimed himself Emperor. But AVRELIANVS needed not to come against him: for, the same legions and souldiers which chose him, conspired against him, and slue him. So as there rested nothing for AVRELIANVS to do, but to defeat TETRICVS, who held a great part of France and Spain with title of Emperor, as is before said. Whereof AVRELIANVS made great account, and came from Egypt with intent to go against him; this warre being in all mens opinion very doubtfull:

never-

neuerthelesse AVRELIANVS tooke so good order therein, as it was soone ended. The reason was, that TETRICVS being a tyrant, and no lawfull Emperour, the legions and men of warre vnder his command, became so dissolute and presumptuous, as he was no longer able to endure their insolencie and pride, but chose rather to live a subject to the Emperour AVRELIANVS, then to be an Emperour ouer such subjects, with vexation toile and reproach. Wherevpon hee secretly wrote to AVRELIANVS, and brought it so to passe, that hee voluntarily yielded himselfe; and so all became in peace and quiet, subject vnto AVRELIANVS.

Tetricus submitted himselfe
to Aurelianus.

And as at other times the legions had betrayed their Captains & Emperors: so now the Emperour to be rid of trouble deliuered vp his legions to another: which is a great example & proof of the miseries, ielousies, and troubles, into which they are involved, which vnjustly and tyrannously hold dominions; daily expecting and fearing death, and to be dispossest of their gouernments; whereof ancient Histories are full: and in our time we haue seene with our eyes, that although they escape for a time; yet there is no day wherein they are not vexed with the insolencies and dissoluteness of those, by whose aide they maintain their tyrannies: and most commonly they are by them brought into greatest danger. And so to keep themselves on foot, they vse great cruelty against their subjects, and shew themselves partiall, remisse, and humble to their fauorites and friends. And above all, the secret martyrdome and remorse of conscience doth torment them: whereof DIONYSIVS, MARIVS, SYLLA, and other famous tyrants which haue been, are sayre presidents: who, vpon their subjects, committed most horrible cruelties, and of their friends and companions endured incredible insolencies and intolerable audacious presumptions. Which TETRICVS knowing well, although he were not vnprouided nor destitute of power, courage or valour; yet he voluntarily yielded himselfe to AVRELIANVS, holding it for a more difficult thing to command with trouble, then to serue with quiet. Which discrete aduice may serue for a rule and admonition to flee and eschew a vanitie much vsed by those which in townes and common-wealths maintaine factions and discords, and will command and tyrannize ouer that which is none of their owne; who thereby vainly and foolishly make themselves seruile and slaves to very base fellows, flattering them and giuing what they will haue; because they will not endure the companie of those which are their equals: then which there can be no greater madnesse. It proued no euill counsell that TETRICVS tooke: for he liued many years after in great honour and peace, and ended his dayes as we will declare: whereas otherwise if he had persisted in his tyrannie, he had made such an end as all such had; which was eyther to have bene slaine by his enemies, or by his owne souldiers; and the time which he should haue liued, would have been full of continuall feare and ielousie.

AVRELIANVS having fully subdued and pacified all the Prouinces of the Empire, and reduced the same to the ancient power and reputation, by taming and subduing the tyrants, and by expelling the strange and barbarous Nations with force, felicitie, and admirable expedition, hee resolved to come to Rome to receiue the triumph for his victories: which was giuen him with the greatest solemnity and pompe that could be deuised, which in respect of my accustomed breuitie cannot particularly be recited. It may suffice to say in brieue, that it was one of the most stately triumphs that euer was made in Rome, wherein were led an infinite number of Prisoners and Captiues of diuers and sundry Nations, great variety of wild Beasts, as Tigres, Lions, Onces, Elephants, Dromedaries, Beares, and such like. There was also abundance of Armes taken from those which were overcome, and most rich and sumptuous chariots: one, which had bene of ODENATVS, ZENOBIA'S husband; another which she herselfe had made: and another which the King of Persia voluntarily sent to AVRELIANVS for a present.

A most stately triumph prepared for Aurelianus.

There went also in that triumph the great ZENOBIA, most richly attired, in cloth of great price set with pearle and stone, in manner of a prisoner bound with chaines of gold. There were in the number of them, of whom AVRELIANVS triumphed, TETRICVS and his sonne, whom the father had intitled Emperor. AVRELIANVS entred in another chariot, which had bene the Kings of the Goths, drawne by foure staggies; and after him came all the victorious legions both of foote and horse, most rich and gallantly armed, bearing boughes of lawrell or of palme in their hands: there were also many other things of great Pomp. And he in this manner went to the Capitoll to do his sacrifices according to the custom, & thence to his Palace, and the next day were made in Rome all kinds of sports and feasts, such as were wont to be made,

Prouinces giuen to Tacitus by Aurelianus.
His beauty to Zenobia.

made, with addition of many things above ordinary, and more than other Emperors had done. He likewise gave many gifts to the people, as the custome was at such times. TACITVS he made Governor of Lucania, Calabria, Puglia, and Campania, with other Prouinces of Italie; and did him great honour together with his sonne. To Zenobia he gave lands and possessions, the rents whereof sufficed to maintain her honourably: and so he lived and died, being highly honoured and commended of all men; still preserving her antient reputation, and the honour of her person.

The tenth persecution of the primitive church

AVRELIANVS being victorious, and in this prosperity (as his chiefest delight was in the warre, and to bear Arms) resolved to leuie a choice and selected Armie, and therewith to goe into the East to make warre against the Persians, in revenge of the injurie done to the Empire by the imprisonment of the Emperor VALERIANVS; and within short space he marched thitherwards. And as he was valiant, wise, and a most excellent Captain; so had he without doubt performed great matters, had not death (through the secret judgement of God) by the way made frustrate his high attempts and designs: which (as OROSIUS and EUSEBIUS testify) God permitted for a punishment of his wickednes. For, having reigned six yeeres, favouring, or at leastwise tolerating the Christians to live free and at liberty, he suffered not the Catholick Church to be molested or persecuted: wherefore, notwithstanding that he was an Infidel, our Lord God (who leaueth no desert vnrewarded) gave him so many victories, and so good successe in all his actions. But in the end, deluded by the Diuell, and the counsell of wicked men, he determined to persecute the Christians, and sent abroad his Letters and Edicts to that effect; which was the tenth persecution of the Church. But, being ready to signe the same, there suddenly fell a thunderbolt from heauen so neer vnto him, that all men thought hee had been slain: yet, besides this signe and warning giuen him to desist from his wicked resolution, God permitted his death; and that his owne seruants, in whom hee reposed most trust, should kill him, which was thus: As he was euer cruell, and had put many to death for light occasions, his principall Secretarie, who managed his most secret affairs (whose name was MENESTRVS) being in fear of his life, for that AVRELIANVS had threatened him for a matter of small importance, resolved to practise the death of his Lord: which to effect, hee presently wrote a forged memoriall, wherein it seemed that AVRELIANVS had set down the names of certain persons which he would cause to be slain: among which he wrote his owne name; and shewed this memoriall to all those (or to the greatest part of them) which were contained therein: many of which were odious to the Emperor; which made the matter the more likely to bee true. And as the Secretary was of great credit by reason of the place hee held, and they knowing the Emperors cruelty, presumed as much, and thoroughly beleueed it: whereupon, they speedily agreed to make an end of the Emperor, for fear that hee otherwise would haue done the like by them. And, hauing resolved vpon the manner, they slue him as he went one day with a small guard from Heraclea in Thracia (for, many Cities are so called) towards Byzantium, now Constantinople.

The death of Aurelianus.

Menestheus procured the death of Aure-lianus.

The death of Aurelianus.

He died (according to EUSEBIUS computation) in the yeer of our Lord 278, and in the sixt yeer of his Reigne; a small time truly, considering his great and noble acts. He left neither sonne nor nephew, but one onely daughter. The Senate was very forrie for his death; but the people, much more: for, they liued in greater security, and without danger of his cruelty. And for his noble acts they canonized him, and numbred him among their holy Emperors. When the treasure of MENESTRVS was discovered, they draue a stake through him, and did cast out his body to the dogs, and to bee deuoured by wilde beasts. It is not written that the rest were punished, because peraduenture they were prime men; and so great, that no man durst procure their punishment.

THE LIFE OF TACITVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND EIGHT AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

HE was like and invincible Emperor AVRELIANVS being dead, as we haue said, who with such valour brought all the Prouinces of the Empire to peace and tranquillity; and in so short a time, that it seems the fear and reuerence which they bare him in his life time, held the same authority euen after his death [For, no man attempted to make himselfe Emperor in any of the Prouinces wherein Legions lay in garrison, as at other times they were wont to doo; neither durst the Armie which was with him chuse an Emperor, he had in such manner tamed the Prouinces and the pride of the people: And the Captains which then were with him were also better aduised, and took warning by the death and confusion of those which in the time of GALIENVS had usurped the name of Emperors] Therefore, for that they deemed none worthy of the Empire, they desiring to auoid the like inconueniences as befell in times past, and to the end that a good Emperor might be chosen, who with his authority might preferre and maintain the present estate, the men of warre of AVRELIANVS his Armie sent word to the Senate, that (as reason was) they should chuse and name an Emperor; and that they would obey him, and confirm his election.

The Senate, knowing that the Armie was not wont to bee contented with a Prince of their chusing, made answer, that they should name and make choice of one, and that the Senate would approue their doings. In this straining of courtesies, six moneths passed (which may serue for a wonder to him that hath read the former Histories); in which the world was without an Emperor, and the Empire was gouerned by the Senate, and such Officers as AVRELIANVS had left. At the end of which time, ouercome by the entreaties and Ambassages from the Armies, the Senate made choice of TACITVS, a Noble man, who had been Consul, and was a good man, and of great age, who earnestly refused the same; so as there were many complements between them about the matter. But in the end he accepted thereof, to the great my of the Senate and Roman people, and also of the Pretorian Cohorts which ordinarily lay neer to Rome. And so he performed the solemnities, donatives, and gifts which the new Emperors were accustomed to make. TACITVS was very old when hee came to the Empire; but of great experience in magistracies and offices of charge, and had euer liued a vertuous life. Hee was very temperate in all things, milde and kinde, and a louer of iustice and equity.

When as TACITVS had taken vpon him the government of the Empire (as a good Prince free from ambition) he did all things by the aduice and counsell of the Senate; and held such a course in all his actions, that the whole Empire was in peace and tranquillity, and justice was euerly where administered with quietnes: and to that end he made excellent lawes and ordinances, abolishing certain abuses and euill customes in Rome. But, for any notable matters which Readers commonly desire in Histories (as, wars, battels, great adventures and accidents) there

The Armie sent to the Senate to chuse an Emperor.

Tacitus chos'n Emperor.

THE

were none in his time, as well for that he found all in peace and in good order, as for that hee reigned but a small time which was but six moneths, and those not fully expired. What death hee died, the Authors doo not certainly set down. Some say, that his owne souldiers slue him vpon the way travelling towards Asia, whither he was going with an Army to make war against the Persians: but Sextus Aurelius Victor and others write, that hee died of a burning Feuer in the City of Tharsus; which seemeth most likely to be true: for, he was a zealous man, and much beloved. Among his other vertues, hee was very temperate in his diet, and in all other things; so as hee would not allow his wife the Emperesse to wear any precious stones or jewels of any great price: and he much honoured the memory of good Emperours, His country or linage I finde not written. He left no son, either naturall or adoptiue.

In those times sprang the famous Hereticks of the Manichees; whose Originall and Maister was a wicked man called MANE: who with his Followers were so wicked and such Infidels, that they presumed to say, that there were two Gods, the one good, the other euill; adding thereto, that the one was the Originall of all goodnes, and the other, of all euill. And this horrible and diuillish Heresie lasted in some wicked men about two hundred yeers: against which, Saint Augustine and other holy Doctors opposed themselves. The life of this Tacitus is written by Flavius Vopiscus, whom I haue followed, and the other Authors about named.

The death of Tacitus.

The originall of the heresie of the Manichees.

THE LIFE OF FLORIANVS. ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND NINE AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

SOON as Tacitus was dead, a brother of his named FLORIANVS, trusting in the needesse of blood to the last Emperor, without any authority or election took vpon him the name of Emperor: which hee did through the fauour of part of the Armie, and of certain principall men which were with him. But his estate continued but a small time: for, when the Armies in the East vnderstood of the death of his brother Tacitus, they made choice of PROBUS, of whom we will speak hereafter, who was a man of such authority, and so well beloved, that FLORIANVS vpon the newes thereof held himself forlorn. And, knowing that all the martiall men would abandon him (as, many of them already had done) he made his veins to be opened (imitating Quintus, who, as we haue said, did the like); and so he died (as the other did) bleeding, about two months after hee had taken vpon him the name and title of Emperor. Wherefore, he could doo no such notable matters might be worthy writing. He was a man very like his brother Tacitus; as well in condition and goodnes of life, as in the shortnes of the time he held the Empire. He died in the yeer of our Lord 279.

The death of Florianus.

THE

THE LIFE OF PROBUS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FORTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

ALTHOUGH Probus were of no very Noble Family, he was so honest a man and so vertuous, that, in consideration of his vertuous deeds, he was thily deserved to be chosen Emperor. After that he was confirmed in that dignity, he shewed himself to be so affeeted to the people, and so kind and loving to the Senate, that by common consent and a publicke decree hee was called Pater patriae: and so him moreover were granted all the titles and dignities that might enable and make him famous. In his time arose infinite wars and troubles, so as hee spent all his life time in managing of Arms: wherein being victorious, hee entered Rome in triumph, having tamed and vanquished the Frenchmen and the Germans, and subdued some which would haue made themselves Emperors: amongst which was one Saturinius, a valiant and politic man. And, seeing that all the Empire was in peace and order, hee was used to say, that within a while there would be no need of martiall men: which when they vnderstood, they began to murmure and to conspire against him: principally, because he would not permit them to line in their accustomed liberty. And going with great preparation towards the wars against the Parthians, he was slain by them upon the way. His death was greatly lamented in Rome, and generally through the whole Empire; missing such a father as in many respects did worthily deserve to be called Probus.

PROBUS succeeded FLORIANVS (or rather Tacitus) in the Roman Empire, who was chosen Emperor by the Legions & the Armie in the East, presently when as they vnderstood of the death of Tacitus, to the end they would not stay for one to be chosen at the pleasure of the Senate. But this PROBUS was so valiant a man, and so excellent a Captain, and so held and reputed for such by all men, that the Senate and people of Rome presently confirmed his election.

There hapned, in the time of this excellent Prince, such and so many wars, as well against tyrants as strangers, and he obtained so many victories, that hee might very well be compared to Aurelianus; of whom a little before we haue written: and in like manner wee may parallell him with Hannibal, with Cæsar, or with any other great and famous Captain of ancient time; whose acts seem greater than the acts of this Prince, by reason they were so fortunate, as to haue them registred by those eloquent and excellent Writers which celebrated the same. Which ornament failed in those which wrote the liues of the Emperors of these times, and a hundred yeers before: and in long time after there were not found any so eloquent; or rather, neuer since. And although they write the truth of the History, yet oft times it is written so abrupt, and so brief, as it makes their acts to seem less than they were. But the discreet Reader, considering the acts of some of those Emperors which we haue already written, and which we are to write hereafter, shall certainly knowe, that the deeds and prowesse of Probus of these Princes, were no way inferiour to theirs which were so famous; but in some sort might rather seeme greater, if they well consider what nations and people they were, against which they fought. Which as they were no lesse valiant or fierce, then those of ancient times; so were they more expert and of greater skill in the warres, and in aught else that was requisite.

The origin of Probus.

But to returne to our good Emperour PROBVS: he was borne in Hungary in a citie called Sirmia, of noble parentage, principally by his mothers side. His fathers name was MAXIMVS, a man very famous, and one which followed the wars, and had had the leading of martiall men; and being Tribune, died in Egypt; His wife liuing after him, with this sonne and one daughter, which was his sister. This young PROBVS prouoed to be so vertuous and so valiant a young man, as the Emperour VALENTIANVS who died prisoner in Persia, made him a Tribune, being so young as hee then had no signe of any beard. He performed in the time of VALENTIANVS, and of his sonne GALENVS, and of AVRELIANVS, and CLAVDIVS (wherein happened great warres, with many battailes and conflicts) such notable seruices, both as a fouldier and a Tribune, and afterwards when he was a Captaine; that he was held and reputed for a most valiant man, and make men now to admire him, which reade his doings. In giuing assaunts to cities, he was many times the first man vpon the scaling ladders, and the first that entred the enemies camp or fortresses. He was victorious in many single combats, man to man, and in battailes freed many Romane citizens from death: wherefore according to his deserts, there were giuen to him many ciuill crownes, collars, bracelets, launces and banners, with other ensignes, deuices and martiall priuiledges. And afterwards being a Captaine of Legions, and Generall gouernour of prouinces; there was almost no nation but was subdued by him, in the infinite warres which were in those times.

In Asia hee subdued a people called Marmarides, and ouerthrew some mightie tyrants and rebels. In Egypt being a captaine, he fought against the Palmyrines, who would haue vsurped that countie and kingdom; but he brought them to quietnes with great part of the East, in the seruice of AVRELIANVS. In the time of CLAVDIVS, he ouercame the Gothes in many battailes; and in the time of AVRELIANVS, the Sarmates and Germanes; and often was victorious in many other parts. And with these victories and noble acts, with the goodnes of life and behaviour hee made the discipline and knowledge of Armes equall: So as he was in all, a good and a valiant Souldier, Captaine, and Emperour.

Many letters (recited by FLAVIUS VOPISCVS) written by GALENVS, CLAVDIVS, AVRELIANVS, TACITVS, and other Emperours and Princes of that time, beare record of that which is said of him, in which they extoll the vertues, valour, and excellencie of this man: wherefore he was infinitely beloued, and honored generally. Which plainly appeareth by the manner of his election: for the Armie which was in the East desiring to make haste in choosing an Emperour, being aduertised of the death of TACITVS; the Capitaines, and Coronels drew their souldiers into the field: and without any former request, practice or agreement, they began to shew vnto them, that it was requisite to make choise of an Emperour, a man which should be valiant, honest, religious, good, pitifull, wise, and adorned with all vertuous qualities: which speech they vied in sundrie squadrons and parts of the Armie. The souldiers without any priuate conference cried out with one voice, Let PROBVS be Emperour. AVGVSTVS, God keepe and preserue thee PROBVS, and with such other words and applauses, shewing the great loue and affection they bare vnto him.

Probus proclaimed
Emperour.

When PROBVS had accepted of the Empire, he presentlie wrote a brieue letter to the Senate, but yet with great honour and respect, approving what was done the last yeere in the election of his predecessor. TACITVS: and excusing himselfe for hauing accepted of the Empire, without the knowledge and confirmation of the Senate, he laid all the fault vpon FLORIANVS, who for that he had taken vpon him the name of Emperour; the Armie was therefore forced to make choise of him. His letters being read, there was made great shew of ioy, and they applauded his election with many blessings, and gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS, Father of the countrey, and they also made him high Priest, and gaue him tribunall power and authoritie. When PROBVS had receiued this decree from the Senate, he was very glad: and taking good order for all things, and leaving sufficient garrison in the East, he came into Europe; where he was receiued by the Armes, which sware to be faithfull vnto him. The first thing he did after his coming, was, to leaue the greatest Armie hee could; wherewith hee went into France, which euer after the death of AVRELIANVS was subject to the Germans, who made themselves Lords and masters of all the chiefe Cities of that countrie. After that he came into

to his enemies countie (whose number was infinite) there began a most cruel and bloudie war: for the souldiers of either side were very valiant and expert. There passed (as saith VOPISCVS) many bloudie battailes betweene them, whereof one continued two daies together: so as euenly the darkness of the night parted the fight, the victorie seeming to incline sometimes to the Romanes, and sometimes to the Germanes, which is found written in the ancient Chronicles of Germany; as witnesseth HANNIUS, a moderne writer: but in the end, through the good prouision, and direction of PROBVS, he prevailed after that he had obtained many victories against the Germanes, wherein died 400,000 of the men, and a great number of the Romane Army. He wrested out of their possession sixtie principall cities, and draue them out of all that which they had vsurped: and passing forwards he took other cities, and his Armie made great spoile and hauckes. Being thus ouercome, they yielded obedience, and became assailes to the Empire: which without my particular relation will plainly appeare by a letter written by PROBVS to the Senate, which saith thus: I giue thanks (fathers conscript) to the immortal Gods, seeing they haue approved your iudgement of me, shewing it to be reasonable and true. For know that I haue conquered, and subdued all Germany, and that nine Kings of sundrie Nations and Prouinces haue prostrated and humbled themselves at my feete, or to say more rightly, at yours; and are now become subjects, and fight in our armie against other barbarous Nations more northerly. You shall (saith he) conscript) make your accustomed prayers unto the Gods, seeing that we haue slaine foure hundred thousand of your enemies, and sixteen thousand men very well armed haue yielded themselves vnto us; and we haue recovered threescore Cities which they held, and all the Prouinces of France. All the Crownes of gold which the French Cities gaue unto me for presents, I send vnto you, to the end that by your hands they may be consecrated, and offered to the most good and mightie IVPITER, and to the rest of the immortal Gods. The prey that we haue taken is greater then all the harmes that they haue done vnto us. The fields in France are ploughed and tilled with Oxen taken from the barbarous; &c.

A civill battail fought between Probus and the Germanes.

A Letter written by Probus to the Senate.

And so in his letter he proceedeth, signifying vnto them his victories for which, in Rome, was made great ioy, feasting, and supplications to their gods, according to their rites and customes. After this conquest, he came with his forces into the Prouinces of Slavonia, invaded by the Sarmates, which are the inhabitants of Russia, Polonia, and others as is aforesaid, and had the same in possession, which warre was no lesse dangerous then the last, for the great multitude and fiercenes of those Nations with which he fought certain battailes: Wherein he shewed himselfe a most prudent, hardie, and valiant Captaine; and hauing wholly subdued them, he forced them to flie out of the bounds and confines of the Empire, the greatest part of them being either slaine or taken. And from thence with great expedition hee marched with his Armie into Thracia, which with therest is now called Gracia, wherein is the great Citie Constantinople; and marched farther towards the North, with a resolution to make warre against the Gothes in their owne countrey, and whollie to subvert that Nation for reuenge of the harmes and spoiles which they in time past had done in the Empire. He was of such reputation, and all Nations stood in such feare of him, that where soeuer he came, hee found no resistance: for they sent to yeelde their obedience, and bound themselves to be confederats, and friends to the Empire. Whereupon leaving European peace, he went into Asia, with an intention to haue made warre against the Persians and ARABVS, who then was King of Persia and Parthia; and passing so through Asia the lesse he invaded the Province of Sauria, which is apart thereof, bordering vpon Cilicia, which (asin the life of GALENVS we said) is mountainous, craggy, and hard to be assaulted, ill to be conquered, and easy to defend, wherein were many theenes and tyrants which sought to make themselves Lords of that Countrey; all which the valiant Emperour subdued, not without great toile and danger: for the inhabitants being fortified by the naturall situation of that countrey, defended themselves courageously; so as there passed dangerous battailes and conflicts betweene them, but PROBVS in short space pacified all. And they say, that entring the countrey he desired to see the naturall and artificiall fortifications thereof: which he much mervailed at, and said, that the countrie was hard to be wonne, and easy to be defended. He divided the fields which he there took from the tyrants, among his old souldiers, and such as had borne themselves valiantly in that seruice. After that he had pacified all that region, he marched into Soria, and into the Eastern parts; but first he went against a certaine people which they called Blemij, which came out of Ethiopia, and had taken part of Arabia, of Palesina, of India, and the Cities of Belotania, and Ioppa, now called Iopla.

Probus drave
the Sarmates
out of Slavonia.

Narcissus King of Persia yielded to Probvs.

Iapha, which was then a famous citie. And hauing ended this journey, he marched towards Persia against NARCISSVS King of the Persians and Parthians; who was the most powerful King of the world, and whose predecessors and successors euer troubled the Roman Empire. But PROBVS (of whom we now treat) was so much feared and esteemed, as NARCISSVS durst not oppose against him; but by all means procured peace, restored what he had vnrped, gaue him other great gifts, and yielded to such conditions as PROBVS required. So as hauing no enemies against whom he might wage warre, he returned againe into Europe, leaving the whole state of the East in peace and vnder good gouernment. Coming into Thracia, which countie was dispeopled, through the warres and spoile which the Gothes, Sarmates and other barbarous nations had made; and for that many nations which were wont to be enemies, had now submitted themselves to do him seruice, and desired him to giue them som land to inhabit, where they might be his subjects; he gaue vnto them the prouince of Thracia and the marches thereof, diuiding fields by lottes amongst them, where they should inhabit and till the earth. These were of many Tribes and nations, as Vandals, Gothes, Guntanes, and other people, whose number was infinit. But this counsell proued afterwards very dangerous, and prejudiciall, as hereafter you shall heare.

In this time was a generall peace through the whole Empire, and there was no King of forraine nation, that durst attempt any alteration. But as mens hearts are commonly (euen from their infancy) more inclined to euill then good through the corruption of our nature, wanting forraigne enemies, there arose some domesticall combustions; and those which were wont to make head against forraigne enemies, made themselves enemies.

There was in the East parts a Capitaine whose name was SATVRNINVS, who was both valiant, expert in the wars, discrete and of great iudgement, and in the time of AURELIANVS had been Generall of those frontiers, being by birth a French-man. This man coming to Alexandria in Egypt about some matters of importance which wee know not; without his knowledge or imagination, the Egyptians, as they were euer vnquiet, rebellious and desirous of innovations; by a common and general consent, hailed him Emperor, and called vpon his name with so great obstinacie as he durst not refuse it, neither forbear to say that he consented thereto. But imagining that through his absence this tumult would haue bin pacified, he departed from Egypt and came into Palesina. But they neuer giuing ouer what they had begun, and as those troups whereof he had the command, did not onely consent thereto, but were very glad thereof. He himselfe standing in feare of PROBVS, clad himselfe in purple, which was the imperiall colour (but some say crimson; which was the colour of the imperiall robe) accounting it the safest way. But it is written, that when his Capitaines and souldiers came to sweare obedience, and to doe him such honour as was accustomed in such actions; SATVRNINVS entertained them weeping, saying vnto them, Let it not my brethren and companions in Armes be imputed vnto me for pride and presumption; what I now shall say vnto you; for this day doth the common-wealth lose in me a necessitie member; for I was the chiefest man in restoring France. I being a free Capitaine recovered Africa from the Moores. I pacified Spain, and did other things to the honour of the Empire; but what auailed it to haue done all this; for with this daies worke all is lost. And as his Capitaines and Coronels encouraged and entreated him to be merrie; this wise man, who well knew what it was to raigne with tyrannie, answered them, saying, My friends, you know not what it is to raigne. But I will make you vnderstand it in my selfe: for from henceforth there will daily hang ouer my head, threatening me and putting me in feare of my life, swordes, gleaues, shields; and on euery side I see my selfe assaulted with halberts, lances, and other weapons; and I begin to stand in feare of those which haue the garde of me, and to suspect those which keepe me companie. I shall not eate any thing that shall taste well, neither without suspition. I can traualle no way in safetie. I shall not vndertake any warre to my owne liking, neither shall I beare Armes for exercise, but forced: and although I did assure my selfe to the contrarie, yet truly it is impossible for any Emperour to please and content all his subjects. For if he be an old prince, they will say that he is insufficient and an vnprofitable dord: if he be young, they will say, he is rash and furious, and hath not wittenough to be a soveraigne; And so there will neuer want imputations to blemish him. Beleeue me my friends, in that you make me Emperour, you binde me to death. But one thing doth some thing recomfort me; which is, that I shall not die alone. But seeing that you will haue it so, I pray to the Gods that the time come not wherein you will be as forrie for what you haue done, as I am at this present. These speeches are recited by FLAVIUS VOPISCVS who writeth

Saturninus
made Emperour against his will.

The miserable condition of tyrants.

writeth that he vnderstood them by the report of his Grandfather, who was present when they were spoken.

SATVRNINVS, although (as a wise man) he knew and foresaw into how great danger he thrust himselfe (seeing he could not desist) was nothing dismayed, but with great courage provided all things necessary for the preserving of the estate which he had taken vpon him. And notwithstanding that he was made a Tyrant against his will, yet he desired rather to overcome, then to leade to be. But as the Emperour PROBVS was no lesse wise and valiant then himselfe; so when he was aduertised what had passed, with the greatest Forces he was able to leuie, he returned into Asia, ordering all things after a new manner with great care, being very cautious of this warre; in respect of the quality of the Capitaine and Souldiers. Both Armies being come into one Countrey; they made of either side cruell warre, and the battailes were verie fierce and bloudie; yet the Emperour PROBVS fought to haue come to some composition with SATVRNINVS, promising to pardon him, and to intreate him well. And it is supposed, that SATVRNINVS would willingly haue accepted thereof, but his souldiers would neuer yeeld thereto; holding themselves thereby to be in no security, seeing they had forced him to take vpon him the name of Emperour. But in the end, SATVRNINVS being apparently overcome, he was besieged in a Castle, and there was slaine by the Souldiers against the Emperors will, who would rather haue forgiven him.

After this Victorie, which was held so doubtfull, PROBVS returned into Europe, and the Souldiers & Legions remained so quiet, and in such obedience, as it grew to be a common by-word; that the Mice did not dare to gnaw for feare of PROBVS. But as he was busie in this action (the successe whereof was doubtfull); in France and Germanie were two Capitaines, the one called BONOSVS, who was the chiefe; and the other PROCLVS: who raising mightie Armies in France and in Britannie (where PROBVS was ill beloued, for the Victories which he had obtained there) and hauing also some Spaniards, besides the ordinarie Legions of their gouernments; they both tooke vpon them the name of Emperors, and the purple Robe. But for that it would be a long Storie, particularly to recount all that passed, it shall suffice to know; that PROBVS neuer rested: so as according to the small time of his raigne, which was but fixe yeeres, it may seeme a wonderfull thing to consider the warres and voyages which he made. But in the end, he found out these Tyrants, and inuaded them both; of which, the warre against BONOSVS (as they write) was very dangerous and lasted long: but in the end PROBVS had the victory, and BONOSVS falling into despair hung himselfe. PROCLVS being likewise overcome, fled into the Countrey, where the Germanes (thereby to winne PROBVS loue) deliuered him: and so he had an entire and compleat Victorie ouer all.

This PROCLVS was borne in a place amongst the Alpes neere to Genoua, and BONOSVS was a Britaine, bred vp in Spain; of whom they write, that he would drinke so much wine, as tenne great drinkers could not drinke so much; and that therewith he had two wonderful properties: the one was, that how much soeuer he dranke, he was neuer drunke; the other that when it pleased him, he could pisse as fast as he did drinke, without containing any iot within his bodie: wherefore the Emperour AURELIANVS was wont to say of him, that BONOSVS was not borne to lue, but to drinke.

After that PROBVS had defeated these two great Capitains and Tyrants, it might haue bin held reasonable, that Arms should haue giuen him leaue to haue reposed himselfe in Rome; for now his yeeres and traualles required no lesse: but it hapned otherwise, for the Nations and people which he left (as we haue sayd) to inhabit Thracia, notwithstanding that the Bastarni remained in peace and quiet: yet the Vandales and other Nations seeing the Emperour pesterred in the warres (trusting in their strength and multitude) resolved to make no longer abode there, but to inuade all the Prouinces of the Empire, robbing and stealing all they could lay hands vpon: and their number was so great, that no City or Countrey could make head against them, but they spoiled and burned all where soeuer they came. Which, when the Emperour had well considered, imagining that what soeuer he had formerly done for the good and liberty of the Empire, was to no effect or purpose if he suffered this plague to goe on, hee resolved to put himself in hazard, and to go in person into all those parts which these people inuaded. And for that (by reason of their multitudes) they could not march together, he fought with them in sundry places: wherein many were slaine of either side, and the Emperour himselfe was sometime wounded, and in danger of death. But in the end he overcame them all, and

Warlike Saturninus of Probvs.

Bonolus and Proculus called Emperors.

Bonolus in despair hung himselfe.

Proculus was killed by his owne Souldiers.

strange quality
was.

Probus warred against the Barbarians.

Probus came into Rome in triumph.

A comparison between Probus and Julius Cæsar.

took such order, that he compelled those which by flight escaped from the battels, to flee our of the confines and frontiers of the Empire. And, very joyfull and victorious, finding now no resistance in the world, hee came to Rome; whereinto hee entered in triumph which truly was well deserved: for in Rome there was a law, that the triumph should not be granted but for great victories obtained. Which being so, I see not that either CÆSAR or POMPEY could or did better deserve it, than PROBUS. For, if we consider the number of battels, and victories (although they be not at large described) which he fought, and wanne before that he was Emperor, and those also after, I knowe not when we should make an end of reciting them. There was neuer a Province in the Empire when it was first first extended, which was not conquered atew, or pacified, and brought into subjection by him. CÆSAR was much commended for expedition, surprising his enemies suddenly, and vnprovided: PROBUS was no less diligent and active than CÆSAR; and although his enemies were provided for him, yet he overthrew them and put them to flight. It is said, that CÆSAR slue in diuerse battails above a million of men: and PROBUS, in the first warre, hee made being Emperor, slue foure hundred thousand; and FRANCE (wherein CÆSAR made warre ten years before he could subdue it) PROBUS conquered in one year. As for the other battels which he fought when hee was but a Commander, I hold the number of those which were slain therein, as innumerable as the wars were dangerous and desperate. But if we come to the ciuill wars which CÆSAR made against the Romans; I conceiue those which PROBUS maintained against three tyrants with their ould Legions, to be no way inferior. So as I knowe no reason why wee should not as much extoll the actions of some of those Emperors, as of POMPEY or CÆSAR. But not to swaue from the common opinion, against which we may not contend, giuing to CÆSAR and such excellent men the first place; yet it is reason we should also make an honourable mention of those which were vertuous and valiant, and that we should preferre the memoriall of them for an example to posterity. Which wanted no other thing (as I said in the beginning) but Writers; who might eloquently, and in a good stile, haue particularly written their acts, which the others had: for, if of PROBUS, and of some others of whom we haue already treated, and are to treat hereafter, there had been any which had eloquently written the Histories, relating all their acts and vallant deeds in particular (their bold attempts, their counsels, their orations, their aduertisements, their wonderfull policies, stratagems, and other matters of importance) which doubtlesse hapned without number in such and so great enterprises and battels; wee should not onely bee content to giue vnto these men the second place, but peraduenture wee should contend for the first, considering, they were no lesse excellent in vertue and bountie, than in Arms and valour.

Probus his triumph in Rome.

But, leauing this disputation apait (for, in the end, the world will giue Sentence in the behalfe of CÆSAR, and of those famous men of ancient times) our PROBUS entered Rome, triumphing of the Germans, of the Blemij, and of many other Nations and Tyrants. His triumph was most solemn; and his men of warre entered with him; among which were Germans, Spaniards, and other Nations which had serued him in the warres, as well as the Romans. There were also some excellent and great Captains: of which the most noble were, LEONIDES, DIOCESTANVS, CARVS, CONSTANTINVS, ANABALLIANVS, MAXIMIANVS, PISONIANVS, HARCYLEVS, CECROPIVS, and others; whereof some were afterwards Emperors.

This triumph being ended, the next day (according to the ancient custome) began the feasts, games and sports; wherein were huntings of sauage beasts; more, and more strange, than euer before that time were seen in Rome: for which purpose he caused, in a place called Circulus Maximus, a great Grove of wood and a Mountain to bee made, full of very great trees; set in this sort, that they seemed naturally to haue growne there. The place was so capable and so large, that therein were hunted a thousand Ostriches, a thousand Stags, a thousand mountain Goats, a thousand wilde Boars, a thousand fallow Deer, and other kinds of beasts: and the people were permitted, to kill and take thereof at their pleasure. Afterwards there were killed with Lances three hundred Bears; and, in a manner, as many Lions, of those of Libya and of Syria; which was a spectacle representing more maiesty and greatnes, than delight or pleasure.

The next day came three hundred Sword-plaiers; which were men (as wee haue already said) who slue one another to make the people sport; and those which furnished, gained reward and liberty.

These feasts being ended, the Emperor made certain laws, and took care for the good gouernment

ment of the Empire; and all men liued in such peace and quietnes, that PROBUS vsed to say, that he would speedily take such a course, that there should be no more neede of any men of war. Wherefore, as also for that he would neuer suffer his soldiers to be idle, but imploid them in labours and necessarie edifices, they began to hate him and to wish his death; as men which had been accustomed to robbe and steale, and to liue licentiously. And hauing taken order for all matters concerning a peaceable gouernment, he determined to goe into the East, to subdue and wholly to subuert the kingdom of the Persians and Parthians: for there now remained no other power that he needed to care for, to confirme that peace which hee resolved to settle through the Empire. And vndertaking this enterprife, with greater preparation, then euer was made in any other (for now nothing letted him) it seeming to his souldiers that it was not good to haue a Prince so valiant, in whose time they were compelled to liue in such subjection and were punished, and could not follow their old course and former libertie; they resolved to kill him; and in secret many of them conspired against him. So as when hee passed through Silmonia, they murdered him by treason; when he had reigned (after EVTROPIVS) fixe yeeres and foure moneths, which (as I said of AVRELIANVS) was a very short space, for the accomplishing of such and so great acts and enterprises, as his were. And some authors write that he reigned not so long. His death was much lamented in Rome, both by the Senate and Roman people. The armie stood not vpon the punishing of the offenders, for no man durst attempt the same: but they erected to this inuincible Emperor a most honorable Sepulchre, whereon was engrauen this Epitaphic.

Here lieth the Emperor PROBUS, iustly for his goodnesse called PROBUS; of all the barbarous nations and tyrants a Conqueror.

This passed (as EVSEBIUS testifieth) in the yeere of our Lord 285. He left neither sonne nor kinsman that durst make challenge to the Empire: and so there remained not any man that fought to eternize the memorie of so great and excellent a man.

Probus slaine
by his owne soldiers.

THE LIFE OF CARVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND ONE and forth Emperor of Rome. And of CARI- NVS and NUMERIANVS, his sonnes, which were also called AVGVSTI.

(*)

NOW were the souldiers againe in possession of authority to chuse Emperors. For, as it appeareth by the proceffe of this Historie, they euer hated that Emperour which was chosen by the Senat. And although that in diuers parts of the Empire there were Armes and ordinary Legions; yet that Armie wherein the Emperour was at the time of his death euer pretended to haue greatest right; and he that was chosen by them, seemed to haue the best title, and was held for right Emperour. And for as much as PROBUS was dead and buried, as we haue said, the souldiers began to consult about the election of a new Emperour: and they all desired to make choise of such a man as might seeme to deserve the same;

The men of war
euer hated those Emperors, which were chosen by the Senate.

Carus chosen Emperer.

so as neither the Senate nor other Armies should haue any iust cause to except at his election. And in the opinion of the greatest part, CARVS (whom PROBUS had made Pretorian Prefect) was thought very sufficient, as well for that he was a man of great worth, as for that he was of great experience in gouernment; by reason of the charge and offices which he had held; and finally they chose him Emperour, and swore obedience vnto him, to the great good liking of the whole Armie.

When his election was published in Rome, the Senate was nothing pleased therewith: not in respect of himselfe; for of his good conditions and vertues they were very well assured; but for that he had two sonnes, the eldest of which expected to be his successor, whose name was CARINVS, who was a wicked and most vicious man: but they durst not deny their obedience, and so approved his election, through the desire they had to preserve the peace and quiescence wherein PROBUS had then left them. Whence, or of what countrie this Emperour CARVS was, I finde not written in any author. FABIVS CRECILIANVS, which wrote the Historie of his time (as VOPISCVS reporteth) saith, that he was borne in Slauonia, but by descent he was an African. ONESIMVS saith, that he was borne in Rome, and that his father was a Slauon; neuertheless, he was held for a Roman: which he sheweth in some letters that are by VOPISCVS mentioned. But AVRELIVS VICTOR, EVSEBIVS, and PAVLVS OROSYVS make him a Frenchman, borne in Arles. It little importeth whence he was: but as soone as he was chosen Emperour, hee made his two sonnes CÆSARS, CARINVS and NVMERIANVS, with the name and authoritie of AVGVSTI, and hee received them as his companions in the Empire. NVMERIANVS was valiant, wise, learned, a great Musician, and a Poet: But CARINVS was wicked, dishonest, insolent, and giuen to all kinde of vice.

Hauing ended these things, he presently began to make most diligent search for those which had murdered PROBUS, whom he severely punished: which, together with the loue which PROBUS in his lifetime did shew him, took away the suspition which some conceived that he had been consenting to his death. Hauing done iustice, and written his ordinary letters to the Senate, he marched with his Armie to make warre against the Sarmates, who as soone as they vnderstood that PROBUS was dead, came with great furie into Pannonia, and with such pride, as they threatened all Italy, and the rest of the Empire: where, after some conflicts, he came to a battaile, wherein he had the victorie, slue of them fixteene thousand, took twentie thousand prisoners, and put the rest to flight.

After this victorie, he vnderstood that in the East, the Persians made some alterations. Wherefore, to effect what PROBUS had intended, he resolved to march presently thither, leaving to his eldest sonne CARINVS the gouernment of France and Spaine, and NVMERIANVS; he took with himselfe, and went with such power and so great an Armie, as he presently took all the countrie of Mesopotamia, meeting not any man to make defence or head against him. And passing further, he belieged the Citie of Thesiphonia, where the Persians sallied forth to encounter him with a sufficient Armie, between which (as EUTROPIVS writeth) was a most cruell battaile, wherein CARVS overthrew them; and following his victorie, hee took by force the famous Cities of Selucia and Thesiphonia. And as he was of a great spirit, and experience in the warres (if death had not surprised him) it was then conceived, that he would haue wholly ruined the power of the Persians: for at that time they were at ciuill warres among themselves. But coming with his Armie to the banks of the riuier Tigris, through his trauell and heate, he fell extremely sick. Wherewith being much oppressed, there happened one day a great tempest of thunder and lightning, and there fell a thunderbolt into the Emperours tent, wherewith some of those which were about him were slaine, and among them the Emperour himselfe, having reigned but two yeares, which hee spent in continuall traualle and warres, in the yeere of our Lord 287, in the beginning thereof. Notwithstanding that CARVS was a great and mighty Prince, yet the thunderbolt had no respect of him; and I see, that those good Princes had as ill fortune as the most base and wicked. I haue read the Chronicles of Kings, and of other great Princes of many Kingdomes and Provinces: but I neuer heard nor read, that the like deaths ever happened unto any as to the Roman Emperours, at least so commonly: for it is certaine, that no kinde of death, how vile or strange soeuer, but hath bin inflicted upon some Roman Emperour. For amongst them, some haue bin slaine by treason, and commonly by the sword: some by thunderbolts from heauen, as CARVS: some were burnt with fire, as we will tell you of VALENTIUS: Others were hanged, as before we told you of

BON-

BONOSVS, who was called Emperour in the time of PROBUS; and before him, old GORDIANVS in Africa: others tormented and dragged along the ground, as we told you of HILARIANVS and VITELLIVS: others were poisoned, as some before named: others Captiues and throwne into prison, like most base and vile slaues, and so VALERIANVS dyed: others opened their veines and bled to death, as QUINTILLIVS and FLORIANVS: Others were drowned, as DECIVS; and to others hapned other kinds of death. So as hauing not written the liues of about forty or forty one Emperours, it seemeth that death hath made experience in them, that there be as many conditions of death, as of dead men: among which may be numbered the deaths of CARINVS and NVMERIANVS, sonnes to the Emperour CARVS, who were called AVGVSTI: from whose life we will presently begin; and the proceesse of the history will shew others no lesse strange and fearefull.

Of CARVS his two sonnes, which he made CÆSARS with power and authority of AVGVSTI; the yonger, whose name was NVMERIANVS, was with his father when hee dyed: who as well for the worth and deserts of his father, as for his owne, was much beloued of all the Armie and Romane people: wherefore by common consent, as soone as his father was dead, he was chosen Emperour, and for such was generally obeyed. He was married to the daughter of a rich and mightie man, whose name was ARRIVS APER. This new Emperour greatly lamenting the death of his father, and imagining that in that warre at that time there was no more to be done, raised his Camp, and began to retire: and for that he was discaied in his eies, and could not endure the light, he made himselfe to be caried in a close Litter, so as he could not be seene. But as the desire to raigne is the most violent of all other passions, so his father in law ARRIVS APER forgetting the dutie which he ought to his soueraigne Lord, and the loue to his daughter and sonne in law, resolved to kill him, and by means of his great wealth and friends to procure the Empire for himselfe: which he might easily bring to passe, for that he was allowed to come to him when he pleased: so as by his hand (or some other mans by his direction) NVMERIANVS was slaine in his Litter; and to the end it should not be reuealed, they left him therein: and giuing it out that hee could not indure to see any man, they caried him dead two or three daies, practising in the meane time what they had plotted; but as the dead bodie began to smell, the treason was discovered sooner then ARRIVS would; and there was so great a confusion and sorrow in the whole Armie, that euery man took Armes and said, that they would choose an Emperour which should punish so great a treason. But first of all ARRIVS APER was brought prisoner before the Imperiall Iudgement seat: for it was presently knowne that he had committed this murder.

The Armie being in this confusion and tumult, by the common consent of all men DIOCLESIANVS was chosen and saluted Emperour, who was the chief man in the Armie, and one of the most excellent Captaines in the time of PROBUS: he was (as it were) the Emperours steward, and had the rule and gouernment of his household. He was borne in Dalmatia of obscure parentage, in so much as some say that his father was a Notarie: and others say, that he was the sonne of a bondman. But he was a man of a great courage, very wise, a great defender and louer of the common wealth, of a quick wit and vnderstanding to make prouision for any occasion that might be offered, according to the time and season: and was of great experience in affaires and charges of importance. He was also a man of high conceits, which he put in execution, but with great wisdom and discretion.

DIOCLESIANVS seeing himselfe called by all men Emperour, with great courage accepted the Empire: and clothing himselfe with the Imperiall robe, he set him in the tribunall seate; and being saluted AVGVSTVS, the first thing hee did, was to make inquirie, how NVMERIANVS came to his death, notwithstanding that hee already knew the same. The treason and practice being discovered vnto him, he made the wicked ARRIVS APER to be brought before him; and with his owne sword slew him; so much was he displeased therewith: And afterwards he made those which were his complices and partakers to be slaine. In this manner was the death of the good Emperour NVMERIANVS reuenged, CARINVS the other brother, who was left CÆSAR and was gouernour of France and Spaine, was very unlike vnto him: for as this was noble, vertuous and giuen to all vertuous actions and exercises, and besides all his other excellencies, we read, he was the best poet of his time, and an excellent Orator: so was CARINVS dishonest, luxurious, an adulterer, and giuen to all kinde of vice: wherefore, he was generally abhorred of all men, in so much that his own father hated him, and being aduertised of his behauiour, said, he held him not his sonne, purposing to depriue him of the Empire.

Hee

Numerianus chosen Empe-
rour.

Numerianus
slaine by his father in law

Dioclesianus chosen Empe-
rour.

Arrius Aper
slaine by Dio-clesianus.

Carus his victory against the Sarmites.

Carus surrounds the Persians.

Carus slain with a thunderbolt.

Several kindes of death befall the Roman Emperors.

Cælius overthrown and slain.

Hethen remaining in France, hauing put from him all the good and vertuous men which his father left with him, conuersing altogether with such as himselfe vnderstood of the death of his father, and of his brother, and also of DIOCLESIANVS his election. And as (although wicked and vitiuous) he was valiant and of great courage, without amending any of his euill conditions, but rather with his libery encreasing the same; so he leuiued the greatest forces he was able, and with great diligence made prouision to make head against DIOCLESIANVS, hoping to remaine sole Emperor. Whereof when DIOCLESIANVS was aduertised, he with great expedition came out of the East into France against him. And as of either side there was both great power and courage; so they had sundry skirmishes, which were very fierce and cruell; but in the end, each of them setting vp his rest, they came to a battell, which was the last and most cruell; wherein CARINVS was justly ouerthrowne and slain. And in this manner remained DIOCLESIANVS at that time sole Lord and Emperor, which was in the year of our Lord 288.

THE LIFE OF DIOCLESIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND OF MAXIMINIANVS, THE TWO AND FOR-TITH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

(*)

Dioctlesianus, for his vertue, desired the dignitie of the Romane Empire: to whom the gnomment seeming heauie and burthensome, he took for his assistant and companion Maximinianus, who carried himselfe with such lone, loyaltie and so much reuerence towards him, and he towards Maximinianus, as they seemed to be rather two most loving brothers than Emperors. He made Constance and Galerius Armentarius, Cæsars; to which hee gave the charge of managing/indrie warres, which he could not himselfe follow in person: and having obtained many victories, and triumphed together with his Cæsars and his Augustus; in the end he refused to leaue the Empire, being growne old, and he perswaded Maximinianus to doe the like: wherewith he was well content, and neuer after could be induced againe to accept of that dignitie and government; notwithstanding that he was by many men much entreated. He was very cruell against the Christians, and destroyed many of their Churches, because they should not haue conuenient meanes and places to assemble together. In the end being very old, it is said that he killed himselfe with poison, for feare to be put to some shamefull death, and unworthily truly of his glorious life.

HE original of DIOCLESIANVS, and the manner of his election we haue aboue expressed; together with his wisdom and valour: It remaineth now to declare the successe of his life, and acts, in such manner, as PAVLVS OROSIVS, EYRROPVS, and other ancient authors haue left it in writing. Before which I will tell you one thing of DIOCLESIANVS, which I doe not vfe to obseue in the liues of other Emperours, for that I hold it a vaine thing; although recorded by those authors which I follow in this Historie: which was, the augurie or forewarning that each of them had, that he should be Emperor before he was so. Which I will set down for that it seemeth pleasing, and a little to withdraw the readers minde from too much thinking of serious matters, of greater importance. FLAVIVS VOPISCVS writeth in

in the life of NUMERIANVS, sonneto to the Emperor CARVS; that DIOCLESIANVS being a poore fouldier, and in his youth serving in the warres of France, was lodged in a womans house which was a Magician or Southfayer; or as wel say, a cunning woman, one of those which by the French-men were called Druides; Which woman was his hostesse and did dresse his meate. And making his reckoning with her for his diet (which he did euerie day) as he was very sparing of his purse, this woman said vnto him; Thou art very sparing with me DIOCLESIANVS, and truly art too very a niggard. DIOCLESIANVS in iest answered her; Pardon me in that I am so sparing in my expences, for I am but a poore fouldier: but I promise thee, that when I am an Emperor, I will be very liberrall vnto thee. Quoth this woman vnto him; Doe not iest with me: for thou shalt be Emperor when thou shalt slaine a Boare. DIOCLESIANVS took this for a iest; and as he was of a very haucie mind, he neuer forgot these speeches: and although that he alwaies followed the warres, yet he gaue himselfe much to hunting, and to kill wilde Boares; moued thereto by her words. Afterwards in proceesse of time, AVRELIANVS, PROBUS, TACITVS and CARVS came to be Emperors, and he had already killed and daily did kill wilde Boares, but others eate the fish. At the last, when with his own hands he had slaine the father in law to NUMERIANVS, whose name was APRVS, which signifieth a Boare; it is writen that he then said, Now is my prophcie expired and accomplished: for I haue killed the Boare which did prognosticate to me the Empire: and so he held the Druids prophcie fulfilled. It is said, that he came downe from his throne of purpose to kill APRVS APRVS with his owne hand: although it seemed not fitting his greatnes to do so vile a dede, yet he did it to confirm the prophcie. It is so writen by these authors: and although I thinke not but that it happened so; yet I hold it but a iest: for this Southfayer did not know what the said, and this which hapned was but by chance; and so much the more, for that DIOCLESIANVS was not made Emperor when he had killed one Boare, but after that he had slaine many; and in the end he was made Emperor when he had slain a man whose name was APRVS, which in English signifieth a Boare. And for that all the prophcies which I finde writen of these Emperors are after this manner, I forbear to write them: for that they bring no fruit with them, but rather hurt and danger, inciting Christians to haue regard to Southsayings, a thing truly very pernicious, which the infidels obserued through the instigation of the diuell. As soone as DIOCLESIANVS saw himselfe free from the warres of CARINVS, beginning to take the gouernment of the Empire into his hands, an infinite number of people which were laborers and pezants, rebelled in France, in manner of a communitie; the captaines were men fitting their humors, whose names were AMANDVS and HELIVS; wherfore accounting that war vnworthy of himselfe, he sent thither MAXIMINIANVS, whom he had already made CÆSAR, for that hee was a man of much worth and very valiant in Armes, who (although with great danger) put to flight and slew a great number of them, so as all places there were in peace and quietnes. But other wars and tyrants rising, holding himselfe alone insufficient for so great a charge, he now made MAXIMINIANVS (whom before he had made CÆSAR) AVGVSTVS, Emperor his companion and equall with himselfe in the Empire; as some other Emperors had done the like. And truly it was a wonderfull matter to see, that they agreed so well together: for MAXIMINVS was not only a good and loyall companion in the Empire, but there was neuer any son more obedient vnto his father, then he was to DIOCLESIANVS; and so in loue and concord they gouerned the Empire a great space, and obtained many noble victories against their enemies. When DIOCLESIANVS had made this choise, he took his way towards the East, for that there was a certain Captayn in Egypt, whose name was ACHILLEVS, who had seised on that kingdom, and was called Emperor, being mighty and of very great power: and MAXIMINIANVS went also into Africa, where all the legions and old foldiers were drawn together in a mutinie; and so other nations which their Captains very orderly rose with the countries, and enjoyed therents and tributes; and these for their continuance were called QUINGENTIARI or QUINQA GENARI. These two enterprises were held to be most important, wherein they had good successe, as we will presently declare. But before those wars began, there hapned other of no lesse importance: for a principall captain called CRAVSIVS, or (as others say) CNARVS, rebelled in Britanny, possessed himself of that Iland, and was called Emperor. And NARSIVS King of Persia and Armenia, taking the benefit of the time, began to war against the Empire, and invaded Mesopotamia. One IVLIANVS also in Italy rebelled, and would haue made himselfe Emperor: But seeing how small meanes he had to maintaine the same, he

A Druid tells Dioctlesian
that he should be Emperor.

Dioctlesian chose Maximianus for his companion in the Empire.

Achilleus called Emperor in Egypt.

Cnæus rebelled in Britanny.

Julianus, rebelling in Italy, but killed.

Constantius Chlorus made Caesar by Maximianus.

Alexandria taken by Dioclesian, and Achillius was sent to the East.

Maximianus called Hercules

Constantius made peace with Carausius in Britain.

Constantius in great danger was overthrown and overcome both in one day.

stabbed himselfe with his poinlard, and fell into a fire, as AURELIUS VICTOR reporteth. For which occasions the two Emperours agreed that each of them should name one to be CÆSAR and his successor, which should be such a man, as should be of qualitie able to helpe to preferue and defend the Empire, which they did: and DIOCLESIAN chose one GALERIUS MAXIMINUS, who by his surname was called ARMENTARIUS. This man was of so base a linage, that they report him to be the sonne of a Cowheard, and born in Dacia; but was a most valiant man, very wise, and an excellent Captain; yet very seuer, and of a churlish disposition. MAXIMINIANVS named another called CONSTANTIUS, and by his surname CLORVS, a man very vertuous, wise, a valiant Captain, and a Roman Gentleman, born of high and Noble parentage. His fathers name was EUTHYPIVS, and his mothers CLAUDIA; Neece to the Emperour CLAUDIUS who had the great victory against the Goths: and, to see the better assured of them, they caused them to put away the wiues they had, and to marrie others. CONSTANTIUS did put away HELEN, by whom hee had already one sonne called CONSTANTINE, who afterwards was an excellent Emperour; and he married with THEODOSTA, the daughter-in-law of MAXIMINIANVS.

When they had made this provision, diuided the Empire among them, and leuied their Armies, the Emperour MAXIMINIANVS went into Africa; and DIOCLESIAN into Egypt, against ACHILLEVS. GALERIUS ARMENTARIUS went into the East against the Persians. CONSTANTIUS CLORVS CÆSAR remained in France, to make head against CARAVIUS, who called himself Emperour in Britannie; and against the incursions of the Northern Nations. Which warres, although some of them hapned at one instant and together; I will relate in such manner as shall seem most expedient. And to begin with the Emperours: I say, that DIOCLESIAN being arrived in Egypt, ACHILLEVS attended his coming with a great and mighty Armie: and joyning battell (notwithstanding that ACHILLEVS fought very valiantly) DIOCLESIAN had the victory; and ACHILLEVS, slaying himself by sight, recovered the City of Alexandria: where, seeking to repair his forces, he was besieged by DIOCLESIAN; and in the time of eight moneths (for, so long the siege lasted) there hapned many battels, skirmishes, and encounters: but in the end the City was taken by force, and ACHILLEVS by DIOCLESIAN'S commandment was cast to be deuoured by Lions and other wilde Beasts. And so in all that Kingdom he vied cruell & extreme punishments, putting to death many thousands of men; but principally of those which had bin leaders and motiues of this rebellion, or had consented thereto.

MAXIMINIANVS the other Emperour, who went into Africa against the Quingentiani, in the beginning warred very doubtfully, and with great difficulty: but the greatest part of that people fighting with his power, he vanquished, and constrained the rest to sue for peace; and afterwards went into diuerse parts, destroying the tyrants and theces which were in those Countries: wherefore he was called MAXIMINIANVS HERCVLEVS, for that HERCVLES trauelled many parts of the world, doing the like. And DIOCLESIAN by a new surname was called IOVIUS, of IYPIVIR, who, they said, did overcome and kill the Giants. And so hee and his companions (in his name) overcame and slew the tyrants. The other wars made by the CÆSARS proved not so well at first: for, CONSTANTIUS CLORVS, who was left to make head against CARAVIUS; as CARAVIUS was valiant and wily, and possessed of all Britannie, so could he no way preuaile against him, but was rather forced by the Germans that came down against him, to conclude a peace with CARAVIUS. And so CARAVIUS remained peaceable Lord of Britannie 7 yeeres. Yet afterwards his companion and familiar friend called AECYVS, slew him, and took the rule of the countrey to himself, which he held 3 yeeres. But he at last was overthrown and slain by ASCLEPIDOTVS, or ASCLEPIVS DOTVS, a Pretorian Prefect: and so Britannie was again recovered, after it had bin vsurped by rebels to yeeres. When CONSTANTIUS made peace with CARAVIUS, hee had a dangerous war with the Germans & barbarous nations: with whom, among other battels, he fought one very memorable; wherein, in one same day, he was overthrown, and Conqueror; which hapned thus: Coming to a battell with them in the morning, neere a city of the Ligons or Cigones in Gallia Belgica, part whereof is now called Flanders; his troops fought so ill, as they were constrained to turn their backs, and to retire to the City: and CONSTANTIUS CLORVS was forced to do the like. But when he came to the gates of the City, he found them fast locked; and was in such a streight, that if they had not let downe a rope, wherewith hee was drawn ouer the wall into the City, he had then been slain by the enimie. When he was within the

the city he call'd the souldiers together, and made such a speech vnto them, as they were greatly alhamed at their dishonor: so as in the evening within fife houres after the first fight (the enemy mistrusting no such matter) he commanded all the gates to be opened, and sallied out suddenly, setting upon his enemies with such courage, that after a long fight they were ouerthrown and cut in peeces; being fewe lesse then 6000 men.

In like manner hapned many great accidents to CONSTANTIUS in those parts. And whileas DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMINIAN Emperours, and CONSTANTIUS CÆSAR followed these warres, GALERIUS began a warre no lesse dangerous, against NARSVS King of Persia: against whom (as we haue said) he went. For, besides that it continued long, there were many men slaine on eyther side, without any aduantage or hope of victory to either party, untill at the last they came with their whole power to a set battaille neere to the city of Carras; into which GALERIUS CÆSAR entred with lesser forces then hee ought to haue done or was requisite: and fighting with greater courage then discretion, hee was overthrown, and losing almost his whole Armie, he escaped by flight. Whereat the Emperour DIOCLESIAN was so much grieved; that GALERIUS coming to his presence into Meſopotamia, meeting him vpon the way alighted from his horse, and came to the litter wherein the Emperour was, to do him honor: but DIOCLESIAN suffered him to go a great while ouer the fields on foote, without staying or willing him to take his horse; blaming him, that he had with so little discretion suffered himselfe to be overthrowne in battaille. In the end, he gaue him leave to depart, inoyning him to leuie a new Armie, and to endeuer to recouer his lost honor, and to defend his prouince. Which GALERIUS (paring from him much alhamed) with all diligence put in execution, DIOCLESIAN remaining with his troops in Meſopotamia in the meane time, to the end the Persians should not invade it. And so GALERIUS with all speede went into Europe to leuie souldiers; and bringing with him the legions of Slauonia, Dacia, and Misia, he returned into Asia, and went into the greater Armenia, whither NARSVS the King of the Persians, by whom he had been overthrowne, was already come, with whom hee beganne the warre againe in very good order, with good aduice, and no lesse courage. The two Armies came to neere the one to the other, as by a mutual consent of their Generals they toynd battaille: The one presuming on the victorie past, and to preserve the honor which they had gotten; and the other to recouer their losses. And so the souldiers for these reasons, fought with incredible courage and resolution; which made the battaille very cruell and bloudie: But the Romane Armie consisting of more choise men, and better trained, obtained the victorie; but not without great difficultie and danger. The King escaped by flight, and GALERIUS following the execution entred his camp; where he found great riches, and tooke his wiues, his children, his sisters, and many Noble and principall men of the Kingdome of Persia. And marching forwards with his forces, he invaded his countrey, and did great spoile therein, not finding any man that durst to make resistance against him. And from thence he went into Meſopotamia to see DIOCLESIAN, where he was receiued as in a triumph: and DIOCLESIAN himselfe went to meete him, and entertained and embraced him cheerefully, doing him great honor.

All matters in the East being pacified, and the Persians & Parthians overthrown, hauing therin spent many yeers, they returned into Europe, where MAXIMINIANVS, called HERCVLEVS, Emperour and his companion, and CONSTANTIUS CÆSAR were, who were buſied in the wars before recited; all being (in truth) gouerned and directed by the wisdom of DIOCLESIAN: whose valour, policie, and courage was such, as there was not any that durst disobay him, no not his equall MAXIMINIANVS; so as they all seemed to be his sons and his Captains, rather then Emperours and his companions.

These men held the Empire in peace in three parts, to wit, East, West, and South; but the Northern parts could neuer be thoroughly subdued, as well for their fiercenes, courage, and valor, as for that when they were overthrown and put to flight, they withdrew themselves into most cold, barren, and inaccessible places, which they could well indure being born vnder that climate: so as the Roman Captains held it impossible to passe any further with their Armies, contenting themselves to haue chased them out of the bounds of the Empire; but they would afterwards retume again with more furie then at the first, and were euier troublesome and feared. Now the Scythians, the Goths, the Sarmates, the Alans, the Carpi, the Catti, the Quades, and other nations in great numbers assembling themselves, with a desire to rob and steale, and to inhabit some more fertile soile, began to make war and did great spoile in the territories of the Empire

Galerius was forced by Dioclesian.

A second battell between Galerius and the Persians.

Galerius his victorie against the Persians.

Barbarous nations rose against the Empire.

Empire; against whom the Emperors and their two CÆSARS marched with their Armies: and dispersing themselves into sundrie parts they followed the wars, although not without losse and great difficultie, the one helping and assisting the other. In the end they all obtained victorie, and the barbarous nations were repulged, and many thousands of them were taken prisoners: and afterwards being set at libertie, certain Prisoners, which by the wars were dispeopled were given them to inhabit. DIOCLESIAN having obtained this victorie and many other, and having settled peace in the Empire by the industrie of himself, of MAXIMIANVS his companion in the Empire, and of GALERIVS & CONSTANTIVS who were CÆSARS; now willing to enioy the accustomed reward of victories, he came to Rome, where he entered in triumph together with the Emperor MAXIMIANVS, and the two CÆSARS: afore said, where was made vnto them one of the most stately triumphs that euer was seene in Rome, wherein was an infinite masse of treasure of the spoile of the East, of Egypt, and of other nations by them subdued: there were chariots full of arms, and of vessels of gold, and silver; and there also were led prisoners the wife and children of the King of Persia, with many other Kings and Captaines of sundrie armies of the Alanes, of the Catti and others, which was in the eighteenth year of the reign of DIOCLESIAN: for so long was the time that he had been busied in the wars, and in providing and giuing order for such things as were done therein. This DIOCLESIAN was so wife, so politick and so valiant in the gouernment of the Empire, as no Emperor either before or after him, held the Empire in the like subiection: for MAXIMIANVS obeyed him as his father, and GALERIVS & CONSTANTIVS as their Lord, and so he was honored and reuerenced more like a King, then an Emperor; and he would haue his subjects adore him, and do him reuerence kneeling vpon the ground, after the manner of the Kings of Persia. And as the custome of the Emperors in former time was, when they were intreated by any eminent men to giue them their hands to kisse, they raising them vp, gaue them peace with their lips on the cheek, and meane men vied to kisse their knees: but DIOCLESIAN commanded by a publike edict, that without any difference all men should kisse his foote prostrate vpon the earth; and for the greater reuerence, he made his shoes to be set with pearle and stone of great worth: And in the top of this his great prosperity, by the instigation of the Diuel, he resolved to persecute the Christians, and this was the 11th generally persecution of the primitive Church after NERO, and cruellst of them all, and lasted longer then any other, for it continued 10 yeeres. The Christians had liued in rest and libertie many yeeres after the persecution of AURELIANVS, and thenumber of them and of their Churches was now so great, that in all the cities of the Empire and out of it there was a great concourse of people, and their Churches were much frequented: with which rest and tranquillitie (as EVSEBIVS, who was a christian author of those times reporteth) the ceremonies and discipline of the Church began to bee corrupt, and feruent deuotion began to wax cold, enuie and contention growing between the Bishops. There was such discord among them, that (as he conceiueth) God did justly suffer the persecution which then happened, which in truth was so cruell, as no tongue is able to expresse the same: Wherefore well saith the same EVSEBIVS, who was present and saw the same, that hee cannot thoroughly expresse with wordes all that which hee saw with his eyes. And both hee and PAVLVS OROSIVS write such things, which were of that qualitie, as there can be no heart so hard, but will haue compassion, and be grieved to heare what they haue written: So as it is wonderfull to consider of the patience and constancie of the persecuted, and of the rage and crueltie of those which persecuted them.

In generally, DIOCLESIAN endeouored to destroy all the Churches and Temples of the Christians, to the end they should not assemble to pray and to vse diuine seruice, and hee burnt all the bookes he could get of the holy scriptures, and would not permit that any man of what condition soeuer, if he were a Christian, should hold any office or Magistracy: and if he were already aduanced to any, he should be deprived and held for infamous, if he elaped with his life. The souldiers and men of warre, being Christians, which would not renounce their faith, were castrated, and deprived of all military honour, and some of their liues. The Bishops and Prelates were spoiled of that which they had, and many of them flaine and martyred, and a flauie which was a Christian could by no means obtaine his freedom. This was common in all the prouinces of the Empire: but particularly in some of them was committed very great crueltie, as in Phrygia, in Egypt, in Syria, and in other parts. Some were sleied alieue, others were torne with iron combs: and so their skins being rent, they were returned to the prisons,

Dioclesians wreath.

The ciuilitie Persecution.

Horrible cruelty vsed by Dio-clesian against the Christians.

prisons, where they were lodged vpon tile stones, and the sheards of broken pots, to the end that their rest should be more cruell and terrible then their martyrdom. Honest and delicate women, built strong and constant in Faith, were hanged vp by the secte as naked as they were borne, to the end that their life should continue for a space with shame and double torment. Others had their eares, noses, lips, hands, fingers, and feete cut off, hauing onely their eyes left, for a greater torment, and martyrdom vnto them: For others, they with great force bowed downe great armes and boughs of Trees, and fastned the one leg to one bough, and the other leg to another; and then letting loose the said boughs with the force thereof the bodies were rent in sunder. Betwene the nails of the fingers and toes, which are very sensible and tender parts, they thrust thornes and splinters of Canes. Vpon other men, being naked, they cast melted lead and tinne, wherewith they indured most cruell torments. Finally, there were vsed against the Christians such torments and cruelties, as the like had neuer been seen nor imagined: and the number of the murthered (during the time of this persecution) was infinite.

As DIOCLESIAN was in the height of this felicitie obeyed and feared of all the World, he resolved to doe a notable act, the like whereof was neuer obserued in any other Emperor before his time: which was, to renounce the Empire and to liue a priuate life; considering (as some write) like a wife man, the mutabilitie of all things in this life, which neuer continue in one estate; but when they are growne to their height, naturally decline and fall; Taking example by the great POMPEY, MARCVS ANTONIVS, HANNIBAL, and other great Captains and princes, who hauing attained to the highest of all felicitie and prosperitie, were afterwards throwne downe and brought low. Accounting himself also insufficient for so great a charge, by reason of his decrepit old age, and fearing to fall into contempt, he would first contemn all dominion and rule, with so many cares and troubles, and so leade a quiet life in meane estate without care or disturbance. And he was not contented to leaue the Empire himselfe, but he perswaded, and (as we may say) in a manner compelled the Emperor MAXIMIANVS to do the like. Which between them was concluded and agreed vpon by letters and Embassies, in such sort, that both of them vpon one day, hauing gouerned the Empire the space of twentie yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and seuen, MAXIMIANVS being in Milan, and DIOCLESIAN in Nicomedia, renounced the Empire; and putting off their imperial robes and ensignes, they came downe from the thrones where they sat, and made themselves equal with other particular and priuate men. First nominating and chusing for Emperors and AVGVSTI, CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, and GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS, who before were CÆSARS. Which, DIOCLESIAN did so willingly and so vnfaignedly, as he afterwards vsed to say, that he then began to liue, and saw the beautie of the sunne. And it seemeth to be true: for after that these two had left the Empire, as we haue said, he would neuer intermeddle with any matter of gouernment whatsoever. But all his care was to plant and ser a garden, and an orchard which he had in Solonia a citie in Dalmatia, where hee was borne, and whither he retired himselfe. And afterwards in proceesse of time being required by his companion MAXIMIANVS and his son in law GALERIVS, who then was Emperor, vpon some vrgent occasions which happened, againe to receiue the Empire, alleging that it was necessarie and expedient for the common good: he would not accept thereof; but answered, that if they had scene and enioyed such quietnes and rest as he had, and the hearbs and trees which he possessed in his countrie, they would not haue sent to haue made any such request vnto him: for he had already trauailed and done enough for the common wealth; and that now God had giuen him time to trauaile and to liue to himselfe; and that he could not put to account that he had euer liued, but since that he liued in peace and rest in his own countrie. They replying, that he ought to haue respect vnto the great acts which he had done, and not to lose the reputation of the victories which hee might haue in his owne time: He answered, That hauing settled his felicitie in the gifts of the minde, it was no vile or base thing, neither ought he to be adiu'dged to contemne temporall riches and rule; and to professe an honest poore life; agreeing with the discipline and examples of the sage and ancient Philosophers: and so finally he would not alter his determination. It cannot be said, but that this wise Prince, did well vnderstand how little worldly dominion and command is to be esteemed; seeing that with it, it bringeth so much trouble, anguish and vexation. And I doo partly beleue, that for some good deed which hee had done, it pleased God (who leaueh no merit vnrwarded) to giue him that rest and iudgement in this world; seeing that in the other life, as a cruell Infidell,

Dioclesian renounced the Empire.

Constantius Clorus and Galerius Ar-mentarius made Emperors
by Dioclesian.

The death of Dioclesian.

he was to pay for the cruelties which he had committed against the Primitive Church; and in the end gaue him such a death as he had deserued. Some say, that he poisoned himself for fear of LYCINIUS and of CONSTANTINE, who afterwards were Emperours; who in their Letters had threatened him, for that he would not come to their nuptials. Others say, that he died mad, after that he had liued (as saith AVRELIUS VICTOR) seventy and eight yeers. What death his companion MAXIMIANVS died, I will tell you in the liues of his Successors. Of two wiues which DIOCLESIAN had, I finde not that there remained any other sonne or daughter but VALERIA, whom he married to GALERIUS ARMENTARIUS when he made him CÆSAR. Of MAXIMIANVS remained one son, whose name was MAXENTIVS; who afterwards took the name of Emperor; whom hee had by a woman of SORIA, called EVTROPIA; and one daughter named FAYSTA, whom he married to CONSTANTINE, son of CONSTANTIVS CÆSAR, who afterwards was Emperôr.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND OF GALERIUS ARMENTARIUS, THE THREE AND FORTITH
EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

Constantius
Clorus & Galerius Arment-arius made Emperors.

Resently after that DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMIAN had resigned the Empire, CONSTANTIVS and GALERIUS without any contradiction were obeyed and accepted for Emperors, accordingly as the others had ordained; they being, as we may say, sons-in-law to the two last Emperors: for, GALERIUS was married to DIOCLESIAN's daughter; and CONSTANTIVS, to THEODORA the daughter-in-law of MAXIMIANVS.

This CONSTANTIVS was a very Noble, vertuous, courteous and valiant Gentleman, both of condition and blood: And GALERIUS although he were but of a base stock and lineage, yet was hee neuertheless valiant, and a singular good Captain; but therewith cruell, terrible, churlish, incontinent; but well proportioned, and (as AVRELIUS VICTOR saith) of a comely and goodly constitution of body. Notwithstanding that in conditions there was great difference betwixt them, yet DIOCLESIAN through his great wisdom made them to liue in peace and concord; so as they no way disagreed. But, he being dead, they (as wise men) for fear to fall out, agreed by lot to diuide the Prouinces of the Empire between them. To CONSTANTIVS befall Italie, Sicilia, and Africa, with all the Prouinces thereof, together with France, Spain, Germanie and Britannie; and to GALERIUS was allotted Slauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Thessalia; all the Prouinces of Gracia, of Asia, of Egypt, of Soria, and all the East, and the Ilands therein.

The Empire diuided between Constantius
and Galerius.

This

This diuision being made, it seemed a great charge and a burden to the milde condition of CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, To haue the government of so many Prouinces as fell to his share: for, he rather desired to gouern well, than to gouern much; and therefore renounced to GALERIUS the Prouinces of Africa; and of Italie, contenting himself with France, Spain, and the Iles of Britannie. Truly he had reason, seeing that one of these Kings at this day is held for one of the most mighty Potentates of the world: so as that part which CONSTANTIVS did hold for the small time he liued, he gouerned very wisely and vprightly, to the great good and content of the subjects; and was so highly esteemed and beloued, that in his time there was not any warre or rebellion in any of those Prouinces. He did much honour and fauour the Christians, and would not consent that any violence or displeasure should be done vnto any of them. He died in England of sickness, after that he had been (as witnesseth EUSEBIUS) sixteen yeers CÆSAR, and two yeers Emperor. And in his place his sonne CONSTANTINE (whom he had by his first wife called HELENA, from whom he was divorced to marrie with the Emperor MAXIMIANVS daughter-in-law) was chosen Emperor. The said CONSTANTINE was also married to FAYSTA, the daughter of MAXIMIANVS. And this was the end of CONSTANTIVS. But his companion GALERIUS hauing accepted that which he desired not (which was Italie and Africa) and considering also that one man alone could hardly rule and gouern so great an estate well; to the end therefore that he might be assisted in the wars, and in all other accidents that might befall him, he made two CÆSARS, which were almost equal in dignity to himself: the one was called SEVERVS, whom hee set in the gouernment of Italie and Africa; and to the other, whose name was MAXIMINVS, being (as saith AVRELIUS VICTOR) his sisters sonne, hee gaue the gouernment of the East; houlding to himself the Prouinces of Slauonia, and of Gracia, with supreme powr, as soveraign Emperor about the CÆSARS: so as by four heads the world was gouerned: which were CONSTANTINVS and GALERIUS, Emperors; and SEVERVS and MAXIMINVS, CÆSARS.

The Emperor
Constantius Clorus died in England.
Constantine chosen Emperor in his fathers place.

Seuerus and Maximinius made Cæsar
by Galetius.

After that DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMIAN had renounced the Empire; the Pretorian souldiers, who (as hath been often said) remained neer to Rome, discontented with the gouernment of SEVERVS which ruled it (he being farre absent from thence, going into Slauonia to see the Emperor GALERIUS) assembling themselves in a great tumult, chose MAXENTIVS for Emperor, who (as is said) was MAXIMIANVS's his sonne, who renounced the Empire; whom hee had by a base woman of Soria, called EVTROPIA: the which bred a great confusion in the Empire, being then in peace; and there ensued so great troubles, as can hardly be described. When the Emperor GALERIUS vnderstood hereof, hee commanded SEVERVS CÆSAR with all speed to take his way towards Rome, where the new Tyrant MAXENTIVS was. Being incamped neer to the City, the greatest part of his Armie (for, nouelties are euer most pleasing) went ouerto MAXENTIVS: which his father MAXIMIANVS, being then in Lucania, after he had renounced the Empire, vnderstanding, through desire to rule, came in great haste to Rome, vnder pretext to counsell and assist his son in the gouernment; and sent to DIOCLESIAN, desiring him to do the like; who (as wee haue said) would not accept of his counsell, but liued in peace.

The Pretorian
souldiers dissent with the gouernment of Seuerus, made Maxentius
their Emperôr.

MAXIMIANVS hauing receiued his answer, and finding himself to be much esteemed, reloued to repossesse the Empire, and to dispossesse his sonne; furnishing, that he being in possession of Rome, and that his sonne-in-law CONSTANTINE reigning in Britannie, Spain and France, all would yeeld obedience to him. But his imaginations had so ill successe, that hee not onely mist of his purpose, but was so hardly dealt withall by the Pretorian Cohorts (his sonne permitting the same) that he was glad to flee out of Italie into France, where his sonne in law the good CONSTANTINE had the gouernment; who very honourably receiued him, as his father in law, and as a man which had bene Emperor. But he which had set his thoughts only vpon the Empire, and sought by all means how he might attaine thereto, like a wicked and disloyal father in law purposed to haue slaine his sonne in law CONSTANTINE: but it pleased God to discouer his treason, to the end that he should receiue punishment for the cruetie which he had vsed against the Christians: for flying from CONSTANTINE's Court he was ouertaken at Marfeilles; where hee sought to haue embarked himself, and there was slain: and so MAXIMIANVS made an vnforgotten end, his sonne MAXENTIVS remaining Emperor and Tyrant in Rome, as is aforesaid.

Maximianus
who had renouced the Empire came to Rome
vnder colour to give counsell to his son in the go-uernment of the Empire.

Maximianus
perished the death of his son in law Constantine.
The Emperor
Maximianus
slain in Marfeilles.

When GALERIUS ARMENTARIUS, who was the right Emperor, vnderstood of the ill successe and death of SEVERVS CÆSAR, whom he had sent against MAXENTIVS; he resolved in person to go against him with the greatest power hee was able to make: and, to the end he might leave a good guard in the Prouinces of Slauonia, hee made an excellent Captain called LICINIVS, CÆSAR, who was a man of mean condition and base parentage, being but the sonne of a poor Labourer of Dacia, but very wise, and an excellent Captain in the warres.

This being done, and having taken such order as was requisite, hee departed with his Armie towards Italie, directing his journey for Rome: but by the way he was aduertised, that his owne souldiers did treat among themselves of abandoning him, and of going ouer to MAXENTIVS; and that certain companies of souldiers in Italie, which vntill then had held for him, had done the like. Whereupon, fearing to be ouerthrowne, he returned to the place where he left LICINIVS; repenting also that he had made him CÆSAR, for that he saw he was of greater power and authority than he desired he should haue bin. GALERIIVS, being so returned, there grew in his flank an impostume; so noisome and pestilent, that no medicines or remedies whatsoeuer were of force to cure it: and it became so corrupt, that there fell a number of worms from it: which did put him to such intolerable pain, that he was ready in despair to haue killed himself. Seeing himself to dy in this manner, he made some of his Physicians which had him in cure, to bee slain, because they could not cure him. And now at the last, without any true repentance, he beganne to think that this hapned vnto him for persecuting the Christians: and therefore in great haste, consulting with CONSTANTINE who reigned in Britannie, France, and Spain, he commanded all lawes and edicts whatsoeuer made against them, to cease, and to bee abolished; and to that effect sent his Letters and Decrees into all the Prouinces of Gracia, and of the East, where MAXIMINVS (who was CÆSAR for him) gouerned; which, EVSEBIVS (an Author of great truth, and an ey-witness) sets down verbatim. And, besides this, he made many Christians to be brought into his presence, whom hee desired and intreated to pray to God for his bodily health; for, hee remembered not the health of his soule, but would haue continued an Infidell still. Wherefore either they would not make so vnjust a supplication to God for him, or else it pleased not God to hear their prayers: for, within few daies after, he died of that his incurable disease; yet some Authors say, that he killed himself.

This his death hapned in the year of our Lord 312, he hauing reigned six yeeres; the first two in companie with CONSTANTINVS, and the rest with the CÆSARS. Being dead, all things remained in this estate: MAXENTIVS, who tyrannously was called Emperor, held Rome and all Italie. CONSTANTINVS, who indeed was Emperor, held France, Spain, Britannie, and part of Germanie. LICINIVS, whom GALERIIVS had made CÆSAR, remained in possession of Slauonia, and of the Prouinces of Gracia, and presently made himself to be called Emperor: and MAXIMINVS enjoyed all the East, with the dignity and name of CÆSAR. Among all which, onely CONSTANTINE seemed to haue just title, for that he was the sonne of CONSTANTINVS, and had married the daughter of MAXIMINIANVS; both which had been Emperors.

THE

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE
THE GREAT, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FORTY FOVRTH ROMAN Emperor; And of MAXENTIVS, and of MARCVS LICINIVS, which in his time were called EMPERORS.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Empire was diuided among diuers Princes, and each gouerned his part with equall authority: but Maxentius reigning in Rome as a Tyrant, behaued himselfe in such sort, that Constantine bare Armes against him notwithstanding that he was allied vnto him, and ioined battle with him, lesse confident in the force of his Armie, then in the vision which he had seene, that vnder the signe of the Crosse he should overcome, which hee after bore for his denice. He likewise overcame Marcus Licinius, who also gouerned a part of the Empire. Hee greatly fauoured the Christians: and while hee liued, the persecution of the Christians ceased, and the Prelates of the Church were had in great veneration, and made rich. Hee did put a stoppe of his owne to death, whose name was Crispus, by the insiguation of his wife Faulla, whom hee afterwards also slew, being grievously reprobated by his mother Helena for the death of his sonne. He would haue rooted out the heresie of Arius: but death intercepted him, which took him out of this life when hee was very old: he died a Christian, as he had Christianlike liued, leaving the Church in great honour and rich, whereto hee had of his bounty giuen many great and rich gifts.

Am of opinion, and do verely beleue, that it cannot be otherwise, but that the Reader shall see himselfe in a great confusion, and will not without some trouble comprehend the subiect of this Historie; by reason of the multitude of Emperours and CÆSARS, which concurre at one instant: so as if it be a hard matter to remember their names only, how much more then will it be to vnderstand the actions of euery of them particularly? It is true, that the Romane Empire was then so great, as no one man alone was able to gouerne the same; neither was it possible that many should rule it: for in raigne and command (as I haue elsewhere sayd) equality and company cannot be indured. And from hence arose so much discord, murder, and other strange accidents, which then could not thoroughly be vnderstood, neither can now be so clearly described, as they may be distinctly conceiued as they pass. Wherefore, it shall be needfull that the curious Reader remember well what is past, to the end he may the better comprehend that which followeth.

The Tyrant MAXENTIVS being as Emperour in Rome, CONSTANTINE in France, LICINIVS in Slauonia and Gracia, who also called himselfe Emperour, and MAXIMINVS CÆSAR in the East; The life and behaviour of MAXENTIVS in Rome was such, as hee was therefore extremely hated of all men: for he was a cruell homicide and a murder of Noble-men, libidinous, an adulterer, dishonest, couetous, and aboute all a persecuter and destroy-er of the Church of God. Finally, in all his actions he was a Tyrant, a great Sorcerer, and a friend to Southsayers, Enchanters, Charmers, and such like. For which the veruous and most noble CONSTANTINE (being in France) was very sorie: and being called by the Senators

The greatness
of the Romane Empire.

What sort the Romane Empire was diuided.

Maxentius a great churche-
man.

of Rome and other Noblemen, he refused to leuie an Armie against MAXENTIVS, notwithstanding that he was brother to his wife FAVSTA, as I haue sayd. But the better to preserve his owne Empire, he made MARCVS LICINIVS, who commanded Illyria and the other prouinces aforesaid, his friend, giuing to him his sister CONSTANCE to wife, in the citie of Milan, where they too met for that purpose, and made great feasting. Whicher was invited (but would not come) the old Emperour DIOCLESIAN, who yet liued in his voluntarie pouertie. Wherewith CONSTANTINE and LICINIVS being discontent, wrote vnto him shapen and threatening letters, alleging that he fauoured MAXENTIVS; wherefore (as some write) he took poison wherewith he killed himselfe; and others say that he died mad.

The death of
the Emperour Dioctian.

After the feasts were ended in Milan, the good CONSTANTINE coming with his Army into Italy against MAXENTIVS, who (although he were a wicked man) was both valiant and hardy; and raising also the greatest and best forces that he was able, went to meet him, trusting in the enchantments and charmes which he had made, and in the masters which he had with him, which for that purpose killed innocent children, making with their blood a thousand charmes and other vanities: wherewith he gaue the vnlearned and vbelieving people so amazed, that the greatest number of his friends gaue credit thereunto; and his enemies stood in feare to giue him battaile. Wherefore, and also for that in truth he had a great Armie and very expert, principally the Pretorian souldiers which first made choise of him; the warre grew to be very doubtfull, and there were some encounters and battailes betwene them, wherein for the most part CONSTANTINE had the victorie. But MAXENTIVS reinforcing his Armie, and vsing his diuclish arts, came finally to Rome, where he procured all possible fauour: and making greater preparation to offend his enemy; by the counsell of a Magician woman, or rather a witch, he refused to sallie forth and to giue CONSTANTINE battaile, who with his forces was come neerer to Rome. Who vnderstanding what MAXENTIVS meant to put in execution; considering the great losse that might ensue, and standing in feare and doubt of the issue of the battaile, as well for the great number of the enemies, as for MAXENTIVS' enchauntments wherewith he amazed the world; he was in great care and perplexitie: And as he gaue great credit to the Christians, and was their protector and defender (notwithstanding that yet he was not baptized) but had a firme and stedfast hope in IESVS CHRIST; EVSEBIVS, CASSIODORVS, and others write, that there appeared vnto him one of the greatest miracles that euer was seen in the world; which was, That he saw in the heauens a great crosse, of the colour of fire, like vnto that whereupon our Saviour suffered his passion; and therewith he heard this voice, In hoc signo vinces. By vertue of this signe thou shalt overcome. By means of which signe and miracle, God gaue him so great confidence, as he presently assured himselfe of victorie; and therefore caused the signe of the crosse to be made in his imperiall standard; and euer after vsed to beare it wrought in some iewel or otherwise in his right hand, and on his forehead: and finally, from thenceforth his deuise was continually the crosse, and he made it to be set in all his ensignes.

A miracle appeared to Constantine when he prepared to fight with Maxentius.

CONSTANTINVS then putting his hope and trust in the voice which he heard from heauen, and MAXENTIVS his belife and confidence in his diuels and enchauntments, ioyned battaile neere to a bridge ouer the riuer Tiber, called Pons Aelius, which was somewhat more than a mile from Rome; whither MAXENTIVS very courageously came in the forward of all his Armie. The fight being begun, and he overcharged by CONSTANTINVS vauntgard, before which was carried the crosse, he fled; and entring vpon the bridge which he had commanded to be made vpon Barkes and Boates neere to the other, both he and his horse fell into the riuer, where he was drowned: which bridge he himselfe had caused to be made, to the end there-with to haue decieued his enemy. Wherefore to him may be well applied the saying of the Psalmist, Lacum aperuit, & effudit eum, & incidit in foveam quam ipse fecit.

A fight betweene Constantine and Maxentius.

Maxentius dying was drowned in the riuer Tiber.

Constantine accompanied into Rome by the senate and whole Roman people with great ioy and gladiati.

CONSTANTINE hauing obtained this victorie in the seventh yeere of his raigne (accounting from the death of his father) without any losse or slaughter of his people, the Senators and people of Rome, with their wiues and children came forth to receiue him, as the Prince who had freed them from seruitude; and they gaue him the title of Father of the countrie, and restorer of peace and libertie. In this manner was he attended into Rome, with incredible ioy and feasting, euerie one singing his praises; yeelding generally, fundrie congratulations, with mirth and gladnes. But he attributed nothing to his owne power or policie, but all to God onely. And in the right hand of all the Statues and Images, which in Rome by decree of the Senate were erected to his honour for his victorie against MAXENTIVS, he caused to be en-

grauen

grauen the signe of the crosse, with the words which hee heard from heauen, In hoc signo vinces. And then hee commanded by publike edict that no man should be condemned to the death of the crosse: which vntill his time was vsed and held for an ignominious death. Setting all matters in good order and peace in Rome, making holy and iust lawes and statutes, and to shew himselfe grateful for the benefits which hee had receiued, hee did much good to the Christians, bestowing many fauours and gifts vpon them, building them Churches and houses of prayer, endowing them with rents and necessarie means for the maintenance of the Priests and Ministers thereof, with ornaments and necessaries for diuine seruice. And he and his brother in law LICINIVS, the other Emperour, by common consent sent their general edicts and decrees through all the prouinces and cities subiect to the Empire, commanding that the Christians should be eased from all grieuances, made free, and receiued into honours and offices of dignitie and authoritie, in which decrees were contained the great praises of our Lord, reciting the victories which CONSTANTINE had obtained vnder his banner with the signe of the crosse. Which decrees being sent into the East, where MAXIMINVS CAESAR bare the sway, were obeyed by him, as the Emperours commandement, but much against his will: for hee was wicked and a most cruell enemy to the Catholike Church; and so although hee contained himselfe for a season, yet afterward hee returned to his diuclish disposition.

Decrees made by Constantine in fauour of the Christians.

CONSTANTINE living in this felicitie, being Lord of all the prouinces of Africa (I meane of that part which was subiect to the Empire) of France, Spain, Germanie, and also Italy, with the Ilands of Britannie and Sicilie, in all which countries he maintained peace and iustice (for the wisdom and police of this prince was exceeding great, and no lesse was his courage and valour) in such fort that as he was most valiant and venturous in Armes, so was hee very wise and politic in peace; and made new lawes, against the new flanders and inuentions of the wicked. He also took great care and paine to reduce all Arts and Sciences to their ancient perfection, greatly honouring such masters as were excellent, who then were greatly decayed and diminished, and hee gaue them more honor: hee also exercised himselfe in most honourable exercises, reading, writing, and inditing, and in hearing the Embassies and complaints which were brought to him from sundrie prouinces; and to all men was affable, milde, courteous and liberall; preserving in all things the bountie and sinceritie of his minde.

Being in Rome, as some reckon in the yeere of Lord 314. and as other say 316. some say more, some lesse (for which computation I take no great care, seeing it little importeth the truth of the historie) he was there instructed by Pope SYLVESTER in all matters concerning the Christian faith: which hee (as some writers affirme) receiued with great feruencie; and with his son CRISPVS, whom hee in the beginning of his raigne had made CAESAR, was baptized in Rome, hauing first made for that purpose a most sumptuous Font, which (as PLATINA affirmeth) is at this day there to be seene: yet some others affirme, that hee was baptized but a little before his death. But whensoever, it hath greatest apparence that it was solemnized in Rome. But wee will leaue this controuersie vntill another time. Hee liuing thus in quiet in Rome, MAXIMINVS CAESAR, who ruled in the East, seeing himselfe rich and mightie, held it for a disgrace to be inferior to LICINIVS or to CONSTANTINE; and therefore taking vpon him the name of AVGVSTVS and Emperour, and reuoking the priuiledges giuen to the Christians, he began to declare himselfe an enemy, especially to LICINIVS, who commanded nereest vnto him: and knowing that LICINIVS provided for him; trusting in the multitude of his men of warre, he marched towards LICINIVS: but before they fought any generall battaile, they made most cruell warre both by sea and land in many parts: and after many conflicts, at the last they came to fight, Armie against Armie, wherein MAXIMINVS was overthrowne: and the battaile was so cruell, as the greatest part of his men were slaine, and those which escaped yeelded themselves to LICINIVS. MAXIMINVS himselfe escaping by flight, changed his habit, to the end that he would not be discouered, vntill he might come to some place of safetie. And (as EVSEBIVS writeth) imagining himselfe to be deluded by his Magicians, and the false Priests of his diuclish gods, he put many of them to death, and began to intreate the Christians very well; and sent abroad his decrees, wherein he commanded that they should be suffered to liue at libertie, and to build Temples, and to doe what they thought good. Which this wicked man did, more for that he hoped that God would therefore giue him victorie, and so he might be reuenged of his enemies, then for any beleefe he had in him: for what hee did was not willingly, but with a dissembling heart, and through desire of reuenge: for this wicked man thought that Christ should assist him with his mercie, who vpon the crosse

Constantine
instructed in the Christian faith
by Pope Sylvester.

Maximian calling himselfe Emperour, re-uoked the pri-uiledges giuen to the Christians.

A battaile betweene Maximinus and Li-cinius.

pray-

prayed to his father to forgive them which had nailed him thereon. Having once againe leuied the greatest and best forces he could; with an intent to retorne to fight with LICINIUS, he pleaded God to frustrate his purposes by his death, afflicting him first with the most cruel and grievous disease that euer was heard of; wherein through the intolerable paine which he felt in his guts and intrailles, he did bite his owne hands, and did cast himselfe desperately from his bed to the ground; and this torment continuing many daies, so as hee could neither eate, drinke, nor sleepe: at length his eyes started out of his head; and so he died mad and in despair. Through his death the Christians enioyed an absolute peace and quietnes through all the prouinces of the Empire: and CONSTANTINE and LICINIUS remained absolute Lordes and Emperours, and so continued in great peace and tranquillitie for a season: LICINIUS went presently into the East, where he slew VALENS, a Capitaine whom the Armie there had made Emperour after the death of MAXIMINUS: and that tyrant being slaine, and he in possession of the countie; he punished the Sorcerers, the Inchaunters, and the ministers of MAXIMINUS cruelties; and he also cauled his sonnes to be slaine whom hee had made CESARS. EVSEBIUS, who was an eye witness, reiteth, what great libertie the Christians obtained through the death of MAXIMINUS; and how they built Churches and beautified the same, and in how great account and reuerence CONSTANTINE held the Bishops and Prelates; And likewise the gifts, rewards, and reuenues which hee bestowed vpon them.

The Empire being gouerned in this manner; in those times one ALEXANDER a Capitaine in Africa rebelled and vsurped the name and title of Emperour; against whom CONSTANTINE sent from Rome an Armie: which coming to a battell, ALEXANDER was overcome and slaine. So as all remained vnder the command of CONSTANTINE and LICINIUS onely. And although their dignitie and Empire was equall, yet was the authoritie and valour of CONSTANTINE farre greater, and he much more esteemed and better beloued of all men then LICINIUS, and for the most part remained in Rome, doing iustice to all men indifferently; particularlie honoring and enriching the Church of God, hearing and reading the holie scriptures, and in this manner remained in rest for a space. But the Deuill, who neuer ceaseth to induce men to do euill, and to sow discord and enmitie amongst them, made LICINIUS to alter his mind, who in his hart fauoured not the Christians, and drew him to persecute them. The first thing hee did, was to cast out of his house and seruice, and so, out of all offices and places of charge, any one whatsoever that was a Christian; and afterwards hee committed such cruelties against them as had felde been seene: which hee did (as some write) thereby to pick occasion of discord and war with CONSTANTINE, whom hee enuied for his great authoritie and goodness. He also sought many meanes to make him away either by poison or treason; wherein failing of his will, hee resolved openlie to fall out with him: whereto CONSTANTINE suffered himselfe to be induced, more as a true Christian, for the defence of the Christian faith, then for his owne particular honor or interest: for LICINIUS, now ruined the temples and churches which hee himselfe had before commanded to be built; and without either feare or shame, commanded all those Christians to be slaine which would not commit idolatrie, and adore his idols: whereupon many being weak and inconstant renounced their faith, and others ioyfullie received the crowne of Martyrdome.

Each of these two Emperours mustering vp his souldiers and men of warre, they hauing reigned twelue yeeres in peace together, there began very cruell warres betweene them: and as CONSTANTINE cuer bare the crosse in his ensigne and standard, it pleased God that most commonlie his people preuailed. And both these Emperours coming into Hungarie with his forces, there drew neere one to the other, the good CONSTANTINE hauing a fit opportunity (for LICINIUS, was encamped neere to the side of a lake) in the night gaue him a carnizado: and notwithstanding that LICINIUS fought very well and made great resistance, yet in the end his forces were overthrowne, and his camp was entred; and hee escaping by flight, came to the citie of Bizantium, which ere long after was called Constantinople. Where to rescue himselfe and to recover greater authoritie, hee made one of his Captaines whose name was MARTIANVS, CESAR, who was maister of his offices, or high steward of his house; and raising the greatest power that he was able both of foote and horse, hee prepared himselfe for a second battaile: But in the meane season CONSTANTINE seised on the prouinces of Dacia, Misia, Macedonia, and others which were vnder LICINIUS his gouernment.

LICINIUS hauing gathered his Armie to a head, againe renewed the warre, which (as EVTROPIVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR write in his life) was very variable and cruell, vntill

The death of Maximinus.

Valens slain
by Licinius.

Alexander rebelled, and taking the name of Emperour, was overthrowne
and slain by Constantines forces.

Licinius persecuted the Christians.

Licinius made ships to be raue which would not admitt idolatrie.

Licinius was throwne and put to flight by Constantine.

vntill that by the intercession of CONSTANTIA sister to CONSTANTINE, and wife to LICINIUS, there was some truce and peace taken betweene them: but through the enuie and malice of LICINIUS it held not long; and they both againe returned to Armes, warring with greater malice and power both by sea and land then before. And both these Emperours coming againe to a battaile, in the prouince of Bithynia, in Asia the lesse, whither LICINIUS had withdrawne himselfe (hauing lost all that he held in Europe) it was extremely bloudie and cruell; but in the end CONSTANTINE had the victorie, and LICINIUS escaped by flight: And yet afterwards through the intreatie of his sister CONSTANTIA, wife to LICINIUS, CONSTANTINE granted him his life, he yielding himselfe into his power; but hee confined him to the citie of Byzomeidia in the same prouince: where afterwards fearing he should rebell againe as MAXIMIANVS had done, or as some thinke, for that LICINIUS began to practice with some to take Armes, he was put to death by CONSTANTINES command, and with him MARTIANVS whom hee had made CESAR, in the fiftieth yeere of his raigne, and the threescore of his age, and in the yeere of our Saviour Christ three hundred and seven and twentieth.

Licinius the second time
overthrowne.

Licinius put to death by Constantines commandment.

This Emperour LICINIUS was of a most wicked and cruell disposition, beeing dishonest, incontinent, couetous, and also most ignorant, as hee who had no Learning; and (which is worse) did abhorre and detest it, affirming that Learning was a publicke plague: whereas to the contrarie (to whom it is not euident) that without Learning, or learned Councell, there neuer was yet any King that either did or could rightly gouerne and minister Iustice: Neuerthelesse, hee was very valiant, and followed the warres all his whole life time.

The whole Empire remaining vnder the command of the good and Christian Emperour CONSTANTINE alone, the world enioyed a most happy time: for so great was his goodness and wisdom, that generally euery where hee ministred iustice mixed with clemency; so as there was vniuersall peace and quietnesse. And by all his subjects hee was beloued, and much honored, and by barbarous and strange Nations greatly feared: and aboute all the Christian faith was held in great reuerence, and embraced euery where. It is wonderful what EVSEBIUS doth write in the end of his Ecclesiasticall historie, and SOCRATES in his Tripartite Historie, of the fauors, graces, priuiledges, benefits, and gifts, which CONSTANTINE bestowed vpon Bishops and the Churches, and generally vpon all christian people, abolishing all the laws which his predecessors had made against their libertie: and hee commanded by publicke edict, that there should no more temples be built to the honour of the false gods and idols which the Romanes adored. But hee commanded through all the Prouinces of the Empire: that the Bishops commandments should be obeyed; and that to those which had not whereof to liue, there should be assigned goods and rents to maintain them during their liues. And hee not only tooke care for the Christians which liued in Countries subject to the Empire: but vnderstanding that to those Christians which liued in other Prouinces subject to the King of Persia was vsed force and oppression, hee sent his Ambassadors to that King, requiring him to command that fault to be amended: perswading him to honour and beleue in IESVS CHRIST: So as by his meanes CHRIST was adored, and the Gospell freely preached through the whole world; and vnder this good Emperour the Christians indured not any oppression, or suffered persecution: and so there were many holy and learned Doctors.

CONSTANTINE living in this great power and prosperity, was worthily sumamed the Great, and in all Historie hee is called CONSTANTINE the Great. Besides this, other honourable names and titles were giuen him by the Senate of Rome: as, the restorer of mankind, the enlarger of the Romane Empire, the founder and preferer of perpetual peace and safety, and so hee was generally honoured and beloued of all men, as much as possibly a man could be.

Some Authours write, among which EVTROPIVS is one, that CONSTANTINE through his great power and prosperity blemished his vertues, waxing proud and cruell; and they tax him also for being too desirous of glory and honor: wherof AVRELIVS VICTOR also maketh mention, and proueth the same by the death of his sonne CRISPVS, whom hee had made CESAR, and of his wife FAVSTA, who as we haue sayd, was MAXENTIVS sister; and of many other noble and eminent men. But it cannot certainly be said how it fell out, thereby to condemne or excuse this Emperour: for as a man, hee might fall into such sinnes; and

Titles of honour giuen to Constantine.

and yet afterwards acknowledging his error, might aske mercie at Gods hands for his offences.

Constantine
did put his wife his sonne, and his N. plew to death.

True it is, some say, that he put his son CRISPVS to death, because that his wife FAVSTA, and mother in law to his said sonne, had complained to him that he would haue rauished her; whereas to the contrarie she had dishonestly fought it of him, procuring his loue and dishonest companie; whereto, he as a yollay and dutifull childe would not consent. The truth whereof being afterwards knowne, CONSTANTINE caused her to be slaine: which he did with great reason, although hee were deceived in the death of his sonne. Others say that she as a mother in law, pradzied the death of CRISPVS, because he should not be preferred before the other sonnes which she had by CONSTANTINE. But I am of opinion that these execrations were not but for some offences and iust causes which moued him thereto, although they were not published and made knowne to the world.

Warres against the Sarmates.

PAVLVS OROSIVS reciting the deaths of his wife, of his sonne, and of his Nephew, saith that the causes were secret and vnknowne, which moued him. And truly a man can presume no other wife, considering how wise and how good a Christian this Prince was. And SOZOMENVS doth excuse him, asrelateth CASSIODORVS in his Tripartite Historie. EVSSEBIVS and RUFINVS in their writings, and the same CASSIODORVS, onely declare his virtues, and blame him in nothing. Saint GRAEGORIE calleth him Emperour, of holy memorie. Saint AMBROSIVS speaking of the death of THEODORVS saith, that CONSTANTINE was worthe of great praise, who with the Empire left the Christian faith for inheritance to his successors: So as what such men commend, I dare not reprehend or condemne. Holding it then for certain, that he was a good man, returning to his Historie, I say, that after that he reigned alone, their failed nor warres: for the Sarmates invaded the Empire, and he in person with a mighty Armie marched against them; and ouerthrowing them in a battaille, he forced them to obey, and to be quiet. The like he afterwards did by the Gothes, and other barbarous nations. Which when he had performed, and hauing made his three sonnes CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, and CONSTANS, CÆSARS, and also his Nephew DALMATIVS: for some reasonable considerations, holding it more conuenient for matters of the East and to be nere at hand, which was his greatest care; he determined to transport his imperial throne and seat from Rome into Bithynia in Asia, or into some other part of that countrie; and hauing considered thereof, and thought vpon sundrie fit places; he resolved in the end to redifie the citie of BYZANTIIVM, which is in Thracia; and meaning to call it new Rome, he beautified it with edifices, priuiledges, and other riches, more then any other citie of the world. And as Saint IBROM saith in his additions to EVSSEBIVS, he enriched and adorned that citie with the spoiles of all the rest. For all the wortheie and notable monuments which were in Rome, as statues, pillars, colosses, and all other things which were singular and excellent, of gold stone or metall, he made to be taken from Rome and to be carried to that citie: Whereto notwithstanding that he gaue the name of new Rome, yet was it then, and now to this day is called Constantinople, after his name: and so it became one of the greatest and most noble cities of the world: and he went thither, and there setled his imperial throne and state, leauing his sonnes in France, Spaine, and Italy, which prouinces he had giuen them to gouerne.

The signal of the Arrian heresie.

The Empire being in this prosperitie, the heresie of the Arrians, through the suggestion of the diuell arose in the City of Alexandria in Egypt, which denied the eternitie of the son of God with the Father, alleaging that he was not of the same substance with him. This heresie did then, and a long time after, trouble the quiet estate of the Church. The head and inuentor of this heresie, was one ARRIVS a Priest in the said citie of Alexandria, who was a man which outwardly made great shew of holinesse, and liued morally well. At the same time was Bishop of Alexandria one ALEXANDER, a man of great holinesse & learning: But as he was gentle and of a mild condition, so he endeouored in the beginning to haue cured ARRIVS of that heretical infirmity, with soft and gentle medicaments; praying and admonishing him to leaue his error and misbeliefe, with holy speeches and exhortations; but being proud and insolent, persisting in his heresie, he induced many others to follow his errors; and this pestilence increased and extended it selfe so far, that many were infected therewith: and all the possible diligence that ALEXANDER could vse, did nothing auaile to suppress the same; notwithstanding that ARRIVS was by him communicate out of the Church. Whereupon ALEXANDER aduertised the Emperour thereof: and the mischief grew to be so great, as it required a great remedy; and so by order of the same Emperour, a generall Councell was called in the City of Nicea, which is

The Nicene council.

in the prouince of Bithynia in Asia, where ther assembled three hundred and eightene Bishops. And CONSTANTINE himselfe in person was present in the same councell: finally, ARRIVS, and his wicked sect, was therein condemned by all the Bishops, excepting seuentene which held with him, Wherof eleuen afterwards (as saith RUFINVS) made shew of recantation: and ARRIVS together with the other fixe were excommunicated and banished; to all which the Emperour consented and approved the same, submitting himselfe to the iudgement of the holy councell. And so the opinion of ARRIVS was held for a wicked heresie: but he persisted in his error, and had disciples and followers. And notwithstanding that the Emperour took great paines to redresse it, yet he could not by any means effect the same. This euill did a long time trouble the Church, and extended it selfe euen into Spain and other prouinces; in somuch as it seemed impossible to finde any redresse for so great a mischief: but afterwards in proceesse of time, it pleased our Lord of his infinite goodnesse and mercie, to cure the same.

Among many other things which CONSTANTINE did in this councell, one was very notable. As among so many Bishops, although many of them were holy and good men; so their wanted not enuie and contention among those which were not such: for some held erroneous opinions; and others which were in sute and at debate, accused one another to the Emperour: exhibiting their complaints and informations vnto him in writing, entreating him to punish the offenders; The Emperour received the accusations, & concealed the same, so as no man saw them: afterwards calling those Bishops which thus complained before him, he made a brieue speech, saying; Fathers, Bishops and Prelates, it hath pleased God to ordaine you for Prelates and Priests, and hath giuen you power to iudge of me, and I may iustly and orderly be iudged by you, but you cannot be iudged by me: wherefore I referre your suites and debates to the diuine iudgement, and to the iudgement of the Church and councell. And seeing that you are set before vs in the place of God, it is not fit that I iudge of you, but should leaue you to the iudgement of God, of whom it is written, Deus stetit in synagoga deorum, in medio autem deus discernit; God stood in the synagogue of the Gods, and God alone among them is iudge. Wherefore setting apart all this malice, discord and contention, apply your selues diligently to that which appertaineth to the Christian faith, and to the Church, and for Gods sake forget these rancors and priuate injuries. These speeches are written by RUFINVS and CASSIODORVS, and are also scene in the Decrees, wherewith the good Emperour exhorted those Bishops to concord and friendship, without interposing himselfe betweene them as their iudge; and so was that most holy & Christian councell dissolved. About the same time or little after it, the holy woman HELENA, mother to the same Emperour CONSTANTINE, went to Ierusalem (I meane to that which is new builded: for of the old Ierusalem there remaineth not one stone vpon another) to seeke the crosse whercon our Saviour CHRIST suffered his passion. And commanding a Temple to be throwne downe, which by the Gentiles was builded in that same place to the Goddesse VENVS, there were found three crosses, but not in such manner as that it might bee well perceived which was the crosse of CHRIST: for the superscription was taken away, or else the letters could not be read, and the one was like the other. And HELENA being in this confusion, and with her MACARIVS, which at that time was Bishop of Ierusalem, they caried the three crosses to the house of a great Ladie, which in that citie was then at the point of death, sick of a great and incurable disease; where (as it is written) the right crosse was miraculously discovered. SOZOMENVS in his Tripartite historie writeth wonders, concerning the same. The feast of the finding of the crosse is celebrated by the Church of Rome with great solemnitie, vpon the third day of May. And HELENA, hauing found what she so earnestly sought, caused in the same place where it was found, a most rich and sumptuous Temple to be builded: and taking the crosse asunder, the one halfe shee left there inclosed in a silver chest, and the other halfe shee caried with her to Constantinople, where it was kept by CONSTANTINE with great reuerence. Shee caried vnto him also the nails wherewith CHRIST was nailed to the crosse, the one of which hee alwaies wore in his helmet or caske; and of another hee made a bit for his horse, against such times as hee should enter into any fight or battaille; and the other hee threw into the sea to assuage the tempest. How true or false I will not argue. This historie and the finding of the crosse, besides RUFINVS and CASSIODORVS already alleaged, Saint AMBROSIVS writeth at large in the oration by him made to the honour of the Emperour THEODOSIVS.

The finding of the crosse.

Helena caused a Temple to be build in the same place where the crosse was found.

CONSTANTINE having now happily reigned about thirtie yeeres, in the later time whereof hee wholly applied himselfe to roote Idolatrie out of the world; and to builde Churches, which he dedicated to CHRIST IESVS and his Saints; and to extirpate ARRIUS his heresie, which yet had some roote: but in the end he was forced to leaue an Arme to go against the Persians and their king, which invaded the Empire. And marching thitherwards, in the 66. yeere of his age, and the thirtieth of his raigne (although that herein is some small difference among authors) he was taken with a grievous sickness; and to the end he might recover health, he caused himselfe to be caried from Constantinople, with intent to goe to Nicomedia, which is a citie in Bithynia, to certaine Bathes of hot water: but before he could come thither, his disease so increased as he died, humbly recommending his soule to IESVS CHRIST, in whom he constantly beleueed. And so holily died this holy and great Emperor; leaving behind him three sons, CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, and CONSTANS; whom he constituted and ordained for his heires and successors in the Empire, together with his nephew DALMATIVS; and two daughters, the one named HELENA, which was afterwards married to VLIVIANVS who was Emperor: and the other CONSTANTIA who married with GALVVS. Some suspected that CONSTANTINE was poisoned. He died in the yeere of our Lord 342.

Although that we shall somewhat exceed ordinarie in this discourse, yet I account it time well spent to treat of some doubts, which grow in the life of CONSTANTINE. The first is, for that some say this holy Emperour was not baptized, vntill a little before his death; and that he was then baptized by EVERBIVS, Bishop of Nicomedia; and that all the rest of his time he liued without baptisme: alleging a reason why he did so, for that he hoped to haue been baptized in the river Jordan, wherein our Saviour CHRIST was baptized by S. IOHN. But I account the opinion of those to be most certaine, which write that he was baptized in Rome by the hand of Pope SYLVESTER, after the death of MAXENTIVS. For it is hardly to be beleueed, that there could be such deuotion found (as CONSTANTINE shewed in his works) in a man which was not baptized; and therefore it carrieth no colour of truth. Writers doe also proue, that he was baptized with his sonne CRISPVS, and that he caused his sonne to be slain long before he died, as by vs hath been already declared: so as it appeareth that he could not be baptized with his sonne, being already dead. And whereas it is written in a little booke, that CONSTANTINE was infected with a leprosie, and that he was cured with the blood of certaine little children which he caused to be slain for that purpose; PLATINA holdeth this for a fable and a forgerie: and none of the ancient writers neither moderne that are of any credit, write any such matter. Some also write, that CONSTANTINE was baptized in his later daies, and that he seemed to be inclined to the Arrian heresie. But he was deceived which wrote so: for that was his his sonnes error, who was also called CONSTANTINE: and that which was written of his sonne (being deceived through the name) was imputed to the father, of whose true faith, life and death there ought no doubt to be made; neither in their histories treating of his life, do they make any doubt, as OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, S. GREGORIVS, RUFINVS, and CASSIODORVS testifie: Of which S. GREGORIE calleth him, of holy memorie, S. AMBROSE in an oration which he made at the death of THEODORVS, giueth him the title of holie, and highly extolleth him because he left the Christian faith, for an inheritance, with the Empire. And the Greek Church doth celebrate his feast as a Saint, vpon the twentieth day of Aprill. And so doe also defend his faith and holinesse both in life and in death, ANTONIVS SABELLICVS in his Enceades; PLATINA in the life of Pope MARCVS; POMPONIVS LEYVS in his abridgement of the Roman historie; and BAPTISTA IGNATIVS in his epitome of the Emperours; and S. ANTONIVS in his Historials: and generally all the moderne authors, besides the auncient already named. And whereas it is written that he recalled ARRIUS from exile, if he did so as some write, yet according to the same authors, he was induced thereto by a certaine Priest, and at the entreatie of his sister, but principally through a writing sent to him by ARRIUS, wherein he declared what opinion he held concerning the faith; seeming by his words to be conformable to the decree of the Councell, and the Emperour not comprehending his deceit in those words, released him from banishment. Neuertheless he referred the examination of the cause to a new councell of Bishops, which was then assembled about the building of the Temple at Ierusalem; without approving his opinion in any respect. And it happened that ARRIUS died in this demand, according as his finnes and heresie had deserved: for it pleased God that he died suddenly, and

The death of Constantine the Great.

The opinion of the Author touching the baptizing of Constantine.

Constantine
was really taxed to be a Lepre.

The error of some becaus
Constantine
the Great and Constantine
his sonne touching the faith.

The death of Atricius and how.

and his bowels came forth at his lower parts. Many of these Authors affirme, that this hapned in the time of the Emperour CONSTANTINE the sonne, and not of the father. They being both of one name causeth this confusion and doubt in the Historie. So as it may be set downe & auouched for certain, that the Emperour CONSTANTINE at what time sooner he was baptized, sure it was in Rome many yeeres before his death: And he died holding and beleueing the holy Catholike faith. And as an holy and true Christian he neuer consented vnto, nor beleueed any point of ARRIUS his heresie, as some charge him, being deceived by the name of his sonne, who was infected with the venome of that wicked heresie.

Now concerning the donation, which some say that CONSTANTINE made to Pope SYLVESTER and to his successors, of the Citie of Rome and of all Italy, when hee went to Constantinople; notwithstanding that all authors agree that he gaue great gifts, and builded many Temples; yet of this so notable donation, I find not that any author of that age doth testifie or auerit any such matter. PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, S. IEROME, or THEODORETVS which liued nere to that time, and wrote the rest, make no mention thereof. Wherefore it is to be doubted, whether there were any such donation.

It is true that there is a text in the decree, which reciteth this said donation of Rome and of Italy and other orientall Prouinces: But that text is held for Apocrypha; neither is it found in GRAYANS ancient originals. But finally, this is a question which I cannot determine, and therefore I will not thrust my sickle into another mans harrest, neither will I be iudge herein, seeing that I am but onely an Historiographer. Yet to one thing I will not forbear to make answer, in some sort to satisfie the malice of our times. I say, that they haue no reason to taxe the Emperour CONSTANTINE, as some haue done, pretending that hee hath been the cause of much euill, in that he enriched the Bishoppes, Prelates and Priests, for that before his time they followed the true rule and forme of a Christian life; all liuing in the perfection of the Gospell, imitating the pouerty of CHRIST and of his disciples: To the first, let it be that this were true; the good and holy meaning of CONSTANTINE was much to be commended, and therein he did well and acceptably before God. To the other, it is not certaine that before the time of CONSTANTINE the Clergie had no temporall goods: for it seemeth to the contrary in the Chapter Videntes 12. questione 1. wherein it is expressed that the ancient Fathers, considering that it was not so profitable to sell the goods and to distribute the money in commune, as the Christians did in the beginning; as it was to keepe those heritages and possessions, to the end that by meanes of the fruites thereof, the Ministers then being might be maintained, and their successors might doe the like after them: And comming to the ground of the matter, although that our Lord IESVS CHRIST and his holy Apostles and Disciples, commended pouertie, preferring it before riches, as chastitie before wedlock, for the full perfection of the holy life which he had chosen; it doth not therefore follow that he would that Bishops, Priests and Ministers should haue no temporall goods of their owne: for if he had meant so, it is to be presumed that he would haue ordained it, and so it should haue been obserued euen to this day. And if they shal say to me, that before the time of CONSTANTINE, they liued without rents or reuenues, and yet there were many holy Bishops, as CLEMENT, LINVS, CLEVS, IGNATIVS, POLICARPVS, MARCELLVS, and such others which liued in pouerty, contenting themselves with a little in holy exercises: I answer, that all these holy men were not altogether without goods, but that they and their Churches had some possessions. And I also affirme that it is certaine, in the beginning, about the first propagation of the Gospell, as the name of Christian was odious and hateful to the Emperours and Princes of those times, principally the Bishops and Priests: so it behoued them of necessity to be contented with that which they had, and to maintain themselves as they were able. And whereas it appeareth that commonly they then liued more deuout, more holy, and in greater humility, then after that the Emperour CONSTANTINE became Christian, and the Church obtained libertie, and that the authoritie thereof was confirmed with riches: Yet it is certaine, that after that time there were also very many holy men. And although that afterwards there was not generally so great sincerity and holinesse of life, as before: yet neither the Emperour, nor the riches he gaue were to be blamed, but the euill disposition and conditions of those which had the vse thereof, and did abuse the same. For it is not to be beleueed, that those ancient holie men in the beginning of the Primitive Church, would, by reason of riches, forbear to haue been holy and deuout; neither am I assured that those which afterwards were proud and insolent, would have been holy and deuout, notwithstanding that they had been poore: It is true, and I acknowledge the same, that voluntarie pouertie is a state of great perfection, and that great riches oftentimes minister occasion of pride and wickednesse: but heretofore men themselves are the cause; for we are naturally inclined to euill: but to put the same in execution, the rich haue greater power then the poore. Therefore neither riches nor pouerty are the occasion: for neither are all rich men wicked, neither are all poore men good: which would be so, if riches only be the occasion thereof. For neither riches nor pouertie in their owne nature are good or euill: but rather, as saith S. PAVL: All things are cleane to the cleane. Neither ought riches to be condemned, because that some wicked man doth abuse his wealth: For, if that Argument were of force, so were likewise to bee condemned and despised the strength of the bodie, beautie of countenance, sharpnesse of wit, and quicknesse of vnderstanding; and a man should desire to be vgly, feeble, dull, ignorant and of little discretion: for those which be strong, faire, beautifull, quick-witted, and of great capacite and vnderstanding, may doe more harme and vse greater deceit, then the deformed, decrepit and ignorant. And if a man shall iudge according to the occasion only; pouerty bringeth with it little care, and great distrust, and therewith men become enuious, greedily couetous, malefactors, coueting and stealing other mens goods: yet I will not denie, but that in riches is the greater danger. But in both, the fault is in vs, and not in the goods, which of themselves are neither good nor euill, but are as is he who hath the vse of them. And so not to swaue any further from our History, I conclude and say; Let vs forbear to blame CONSTANTINE, and blame those which haue abused and mispent the goods which were given by CONSTANTINE. And let those which are so zealous of the generall reformation of the Church, reforme their owne Consciences, and amend their owne liues and abuses; and let them with teares pray vnto God to amend the rest. For if every man in particular would doe thus and amend one, all would presently be amended. But truly most men take care for the gouernement of Empires and States, euen at home in their houses: but of their owne houses and Consciences they take little care. And to the end that they thinke not, that all the mischief consisteth in the Church goods, let them know that after that the Churches were rich, and that the Prelates were of great power and authority, there were therein: a S. LEO, a Pope, a S. GREGORY, S. AMBROSIO, S. IEROME, S. AVOUSTINE, S. BERNARD, and an infinite number of other Bishops which possessed riches, and despising them were poore in spirit, which is acceptable before God.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIUS, AND CONSTANS,

Brethren, Sonnes of the Emperour CONSTANTINE the Great, and sue and forthwith Emperour of ROME.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Emperour Constantine being dead, the government of the Empire remained in the hands of his sons Constantius, Constans, and Constantinus: But as commonly it happeneth in matters of State, so after that the Prouinces were diuided, they imagining them to be vnequally shared, fell together by the eares among themselves: and two of them being dead, the government of the Empire rested wholly in Constantinus, who had no lesse to doe to defend himselfe against domesticall tyrants, which sought to ouerthrow his estate, then to defend send forraine Princes, thereby to preserve the Romane Empire. After many accidents of warre, he overcame Magnentius, and the last battaile betweene them was so bloodie, and the execution so great, that in a manner he weakened the forces of the whole Empire: but finally, Magnentius was driven to such extremity that he slue himselfe. He made his Cousin-Germane Gallus, Cæsar, giving him his sister Constantina to wife, who behaued himselfe so wickedly in his government, that Constantius was forced to cause him to be slaine: in whose place he made his brother Iulianus, Cæsar, who going into Germany against the high Dutch, had so good success in all his enterprises in the warres, that the souldiers of France constrained him perforce to take the Engle and name of Emperour. Which when Constantius vnderstood (who then was in war against the Persians) he ordered that war in the best manner he could, and came with a mightie Army against Iulianus: but falling grievously sick by the way, he died, and made Iulianus his successor, leaving the Empire to him, whom he was going to deprive.

HOW necessarie and good the raigne of the Emperour CONSTANTINE was, and how great his bountie and valour was, plainly appeareth, seeing that immediately with his death the vniuersall quiet and peace was disturbed, the fauor and respect of the Church was diminished, and the administration of justice was likewise peruerced and troubled. The good Emperour CONSTANTINE left behinde him when he died three sonnes, and two daughters. His sonnes names were CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIUS, and CONSTANS; his daughters were called HELINA, and CONSTANTIA. The sons presently after the death of their father were Emperours: for in his life time he had made them CÆSARS, together with his nephew DALMATIUS; and he also left them by his testament heires to the Empire. The daughters were afterwards married to Emperours; as in the proceesse of this Historie we will declare: which in truth is very abrupt, as well for the varietie and difference among authors, as for the great discord and warres which grew betweene these three brethren, and through the tyrants and vsurping Emperours which arose in their time. Let the Reader endeavour to reade attentiuely: For I will doe my best to write it as plainly and cleerely as I shall be able.

These three Brethren diuided the Roman Empire among them in this manner: To CONSTANTINE, who was the eldest Brother, was allotted Spain, Britanny, France, and that part of Germany which was subject to the Romans. To CONSTANS, the second Brother, there fell Italy, and all Africa, with the Iland Sicillia, and the rest between them, together with Sclanonia, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Achaia, Morea, and all Grecia. The third Brother, which was CONSTANTINVS, possessed the Prouince of Thracia where the City of Constantinople stands, with all the East Prouinces of Asia the lesse, Soria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. And in the dominion of this CONSTANTINVS, by his consent and accord, his cousin DALMATIUS gouerned as CÆSAR. SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR saith, that he reigned also in Armenia, and in the borders thereof, and that ANNIBALLINVS was therein established CÆSAR.

And so in this manner began the Empire to be gouerned by three Emperours, and one CÆSAR which was DALMATIUS: whereof ensued great discord and warre, for that either of them would take place before other, and be Lord of the whole. And, on the other side, the Roman Empire was so great, that no one man could well gouern it alone; and so very few held the whole in quiet possession: and therefore it declined, as all kingdoms and dominions which are farre extended and enlarged, will doo: for, neither mans life, force, nor humane policy, are able to manage and gouern that which is of too great an extent.

In the beginning of their Raigne these Brethren liued in peace, for joy to see themselves so great Lords: and DALMATIUS, who in the East assisted CONSTANTINVS, began to make shew of himselfe to be a most excellent Prince, in his actions & vertues imitating CONSTANTINE the Great: wherefore by the good he was much beloued; but feared of the wicked, and enuied by CONSTANTINVS himself, who was the cause of his death. CONSTANTINVS permitting it, or being accessory thereto, hee was upon a day in a mutinie slaine by the souldiers which he had leuied against the King of Persia: and so the Empire remain'd absolutely betwixt the three Brethren.

Soon after this, CONSTANTINE (who was the elder Brother) beganne to finde himselfe grieved, alleging that he had the least part in the diuision of the Prouinces: for, hee possessed

X 4

Constantine
his children.

Constantine
his three sonnes
diuided the Empire betweene them.

Dalmatius was slaine
by the souldiers through the practice
of Constantine.

but

but France, Spain, part of Germany, England, and Scotland, his other Brethren houlding so many Prouinces. And therefore hee sent Ambassadors vnto them, requiring a new diuision: and as their parts seemed to them to be but little, they would not yeeld to his request. Whereupon he mustered vp his men and leuied an Armie, resolving to take that perforce, which they would not allow him by their free will, and with a great power invaded the Frontiers of his brother CONSTANS his Empire, to whom befell Italy and Africa. At that time CONSTANS was in Dacia (which is Transilvania and Walachia) making warre vpon the Gothes and Sarmates, who had made incursions into the limits of the Romane Empire: and he understanding what his brother did, sent a Captaine with men of war into Italy, who with such power as he was able to raise, made Head against CONSTANTINE, nere to the City of Aquileia. But CONSTANTINE, little regarding his brothers forces, vnadvisedly resolved to fight: and being entrapped in an ambush laid by his enemies, fighting vnknowne, his horse being killed vnder him, and he falling to the earth was slaine, having enioyed his Empire but three yeeres, being of the age of 25. yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord, 343. Which as some imagine happned vnto him for his finnes: for they write of him, that he fauoured the heresie of ARRIUS. And CASSIODORVS, RUFINVS, and THEODORETVS in their Ecclesiasticall histories write, that vpon the death of CONSTANTINE the Great, father of these young men, those which were infected with the heresie of ARRIUS, tooke courage audaciously to maintaine the same, contrary to the decree of the holy Councell: to which their illusions they perswaded CONSTANTINE thereto, who ruled in the East parts, and many Arrian Bishops fought to suppress and dispossesse the Catholikes, against whom CONSTANS the other Emperour and brother made great resistance, who was of the Catholikes opinion. And particularly the holy Bishop ATHANASIVS was persecuted, who was the chiefe man in the Nicene Councell, and in that persecution were sent into exile, both he and others, which suffered great iniurie and infamie. There were also many counells and assemblies held by the Heretikes, and others by the Catholikes, wherein were many contentions. Finally, the Catholikes were greatly troubled and molested, by reason that many reuolted from the faith, and ioined with the heretikes: which I forbear to write, because it requireth much time to relate the same, and also, for that I rather write the liues of Emperors, then any Ecclesiasticall Historie, whereof I must of necessity make often mention hereafter.

CONSTANTINE the elder brother being slaine by his brother CONSTANS his souldiers, CONSTANS took possession of all the Countries his deceased brother was seased of: and so he became Lord of all the West, and of Africa, whereof already he was in possession. After this, presently ensued another dangerous war against a kinde of people cald Franques, a people of Germany, inhabiting neer the riuer of Rhine (as CASSIUS writes): which Franques rebelled, and seised on a great part of Gallia; from which the Frenchmen vaunt themselves to be descended; and of Galli were called Franci; and Gallia, Francia. And, to make their originall seem to be of greater antiquity, they allege that those Franques descended from those which escap't from Troy, and that they came to inhabit Germany with one of HECTOR's sons, whose name was FRANCVS: but heereof we will speak more hereafter. These Franques came to blowes with CONSTANS; and, after cruell wars and much slaughter between them, they were vanquished, and made subject to the Empire. And although CONSTANS were much troubled with these wars, yet afterwards he liued some yeeres in peace and prosperity; but very weak and impotent of body, both in his feet and hands, by reason of the gout wherewith he was oftentimes much afflicted. His gouernment in the beginning was good and pleasing to all his subjects: but afterwards he became vitious and negligent in the execution of justice, and by means of his infirmity grew vnwieldy and ill disposed; and therefore ill-beloued by the Provincials and Subjects of the Empire: so as certain wicked men, making benefit of this occasion, praised his death. The chief authors of this treason were CRESSIVS & MARCELLINVS, his own captains, who agreed to make MAGNENTIVS Emperour, a man of base condition and mean parentage, although through his courage and valour in the wars he won great reputation: and they found the souldiers very willing and ready thereto; for, they hated CONSTANS; and, giuing the imperiall robe to MAGNENTIVS, they sent to kill CONSTANS, who misstrusted no such matter. In the manner of his death Authors varie: but in conclusion hee was slaine in a certain place called Helena, neer to the Pirenean mountains which diuide France from Spain, in the 13th yeer of his Reign, and the thirtieth of his age, in the yeer of our Lord 353, according to S. IEROM's computation.

Whilſt

Whilſt matters passed in the West after this manner, in the East with the third brother and Emperour CONSTANTIVS, who ruled all that part of the Empire, things prospered not so well, especially in the warres: for he had great and dangerous warres with the King of Persia: and having fought with him nine severall times, he was at every time overthrowne, with the losse of many of his people. In the end, they fought one most cruell battaile: and the victorie being apparant of the Emperours side, his souldiers used the matter so ill, as those which were held for conquered, became conquerors: and so CONSTANTIVS lost this battaile also, as he had done many others, in such sort that the King of Persia recovered certain great Cities in Mesopotamia. Moreover in the same parts of the East, there happened many earth-quakes wherewith certain Cities were destroyed, and swallowed into the earth: which by true Christian authors was attributed to the iust iudgement of God, for that this Emperour did maintaine the heresie of ARRIUS, and persecuted the true Christians. But returning to our new Emperour MAGNENTIVS, it happened in this manner: that having murdered CONSTANS, as we haue declared, the Armie which was in France obeyed and receiued him gladly, and all Spain presently did the like, together with Italy and Africa in like manner: whither he determining to come, made his sonne whose name was DECENCIUS, CÆSAR; to leaue him in the gouernment of France and Spain with their confines. But in Hungarie, Austria, Slavonia, Dalmatia, and part of Græcia, the ordinary legions which were in those places, chose an old and valiant Captain for Emperour, whose name was BRITANNIO or VETRANIO; who was a man highly beloued of the souldiers, for his great wisdom and valour in the warres; and for the victories which he had obtained in the defence of those Prouinces against the barbarous Nations. Of BRITANNIO you shall heare more hereafter.

About the same time, when it was knowne in Rome that CONSTANS was dead, NEPOTIANVS presuming on his nearnesse of blood to the deceased Emperour (for, he was the Emperour CONSTANTINE's sisters son) assembling together a company of Fencers, Sword-placers, and such others, proclaimed himself Emperour. But as his beginning had no found foundation; so had he an vnluckie end: for, within twenty nine daies after that hee had with great difficulty enjoyed the title of Emperour, he was slaine by MAGNENTIVS his Captains. And so MAGNENTIVS remained Emperour (although a Tyrant) of Italy, Africa, France, and Spain, in concurrence and disgrace of CONSTANTIVS in the East, who in truth by just title was sole Emperour.

CONSTANTIVS, being aduertised of the death of his Brother CONSTANS, and of the successe of MAGNENTIVS, was greatly perplexed, seeing himself oppressed with warre against the Persians; and, on the other side, bound to reuenge the death of his Brother, and to root out so mighty an enemy as MAGNENTIVS, who grew great in a very short time; and BRITANNIO also, who was not slightly to be regarded. But, after many consultations, it was concluded to settle all matters of the East in the best order hee might, and to passe into Europe against MAGNENTIVS. Whereupon he determined to make his cosen germane GALLVS, CÆSAR; who was brother to IVLIANVS, of whom we shall speak hereafter: Both which were sons to a brother of CONSTANTINE the Great, named CONSTANTIUS; whom his father CONSTANTIVS had by a second wife; and, the better to be assured of this new CÆSAR, he married him to one of his owne sisters, whose name was CONSTANTIA. And leauing this GALLVS in the East, having first concluded a kinde of truce or peace with the King of Persia, he came into Europe against MAGNENTIVS, with the greatest power he was able to leuie; and by the way purposed to haue fought with the old Captain BRITANNIO, whom we said to be called Emperour in Austria, Hungarie, and Slavonia. But BRITANNIO would not make any resistance: for, laying aside his imperiall robes, hee came into Thracia to meet him; and, humbling himself before CONSTANTIVS, said vnto him, that he renouncing the Empire, yielded himself into his hands; to the end he should dispose of him at his pleasure. CONSTANTIVS very joyfully accepted his humility; and, lifting him vp from ground, imbraced and honoured him much in speeches; and, calling him Father, let him at his owne table: and they two slept that night together. And, being informed of all matters by BRITANNIO concerning MAGNENTIVS, he kept on his journey; and sent BRITANNIO to a City in Bithynia in Asia, and gaue him rents & reuenues sufficient for the maintenance of his estate: whither he retired himself with many his friends and Familiars, and liued there six yeeres after in great rest and tranquillity.

CONSTANTIVS, passing forwards, drew neer to Italy; where MAGNENTIVS lay in wait

Constantius overthrewen in 9 severall battails by the Persians.

Constantius overthrewen in the tenth battail by the Persians, for that he knew not how to use the victory. Great earthquake in the East in the time of Constantius.

Decencius made Cæsar by Magnencius.

Nepotianus, taking the title of Emperour, was slaine by Magnencius his captaine.

Gallus made Cæsar by Constantius.

Britannio yielded himself to Constantius.

Constantius accepted Britannio for his friend and called him father.

Constantine was married against his brother Constantians.

Constantine slain in Italy.

From whence the French are from to have their originall. Constantius made the French subject to the Empire.

Magnentius chosen Emperour.

The death of the Emperour Constantians.

waite for him : and the warre began betweene them, not onely with great power and numbers of men; but also with great hatred and malice : for besides that they both fought for the Empire, they had sent letters and messages the one to the other, which had much incensed them both. And so the warres began to be very cruell, and there ensued some battailes wherein fortune shewed herself variable; MAGNENTIVS having sometimes the victorie, and sometimes CONSTANTIVS, as CASSIODORVS reporteth in his Tripartite History. But, after many conflicts, each of them setting vp his rest, they fought a great battell near the City of Mursa in Spain, which was one of the most cruell and bloody that hath been seen; and the Roman Empire lost therein the best men of all the ordinary Legions: for, it continued the greatest part of all the day, and part of the night. There were slain of both sides foure and fifty thousand men, all valiant old souldiers; wherein CONSTANTIVS obtained the victory, and MAGNENTIVS escaped by flight.

It is very strange what some Authors write concerning this battell; that MAGNENTIVS Armie did consist but of thirty and odde thousand men, and CONSTANTIVS had in his Army threecore and ten thousand; and of those which were overcom, there died four and twenty thousand; and of them which overcame, thirty thousand. Whereby it appeareth, with what resolution, force or obstinacy, MAGNENTIVS and his men did fight, who slue as many of their enemies as they themselves were in number: and there remained but six thousand of them living.

MAGNENTIVS being overthrowne fled into Italie (as EUTROPIVS and AVRELIUS VICTOR doo write): where reünforcing himself the best he could, he resolved to have returned again to try his fortune, and once again to fight with CONSTANTIVS; having first in vain sought to come to some composition of peace, seeming to bee contented if CONSTANTIVS would suffer him to possesse but Thracia onely. Finally, coming to another encounter, he was again overthrowne; and, fleeing from the battell, shut himself vp in the City of Lions in France: where, being aduertised that his souldiers practised to deliuer him alieue into the hands of CONSTANTIVS, he slue himself with his owne poiniard, leaning against a wall (as saith AVRELIUS VICTOR) and so ended his Empire which he had tyrannically vsurped, together with his life; being of the age of fifty yeeres.

When his sonne DECENCIVS (whom he had made CÆSAR, and Gouverner of France) vnderstood of his death, being out of hope to make head against CONSTANTIVS, and to defend his gouernment, hee hung himself. CONSTANTIVS having happily ended so dangerous a warre, all the Prouinces which had held for MAGNENTIVS (without any resistance) submitted themselves to his will: and hee being very joyfull came triumphing to the City of Milan; where for a certain space he made his abode.

Whil'st these matters befell CONSTANTIVS in the West, his cosen GALLVS (whom he left for CÆSAR, and Gouverner generall of the Prouinces in the East) administered no point of justice, neither defended that estate with such valour as hee ought to have done. For, it is written, that Sapor King of Persia overthrowne him in battell, and in the rest hee vsed extreme cruelty: And Writers particularly affirm, that in the City of Antioch hee did put to death the greatest part of all the Nobility there. And of the Iewes of Iudea, and of Palestina, for that they had attempted to rebell, he most cruellly made many thousands of either sex, and of all ages, to be slain. He commanded the Cities of Tiberias, Diapolis, Cæsarea, and others, to bee set on fire; which, Saint IEROME doth report in his additions to EUSEBIUS. When CONSTANTIVS vnderstood of these and other matters (which, AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS recites at large, being an ey-witnes: which Author wrote the life of CONSTANTIVS, IVLIANVS and COVIANVS, Emperors of those times, very truly and distinctly; but with the most ragged stile that euer I read in any Latin Author: yet it was great pity that so many of his Works were lost) hee, being desirous to prevent the disorders whereof I haue made mention, and standing already in some fear of GALLVS, sent some secretly to kill him; which was easily effected, having first sought some other remedies. And so for that time CONSTANTIVS remained sole Emperor without any CÆSAR or companion in all the Roman Empire: and from Milan hee provided and sent Captains and Gouverners to all parts. And, because he was of light beleef, and took pleasure in factions (an ill thing in any man, but in Princes most dangerous) and to commit cruelties, and to inflict punishments, there were daily offered new occasions: by reason whereof, he vsed great cruelty, and put many to death; which, MARCELLINVS describes at large.

A.

Among other accidents, a valiantould Captain, whose namé was SILVANVS, who at that time was Generall against the Germans, was accused to haue practised some matters against his Imperiall Majesty. Which accusation (all Writers affirm) was through the enuy which they bare him for his victories and good successe: and this credulous Emperor, as it seems, did also enuy him, and intended to cause him to be slain. Whereof SILVANVS being aduertised (as he was very much honoured for his age and bounty, and for the great honour which he had wonne in sundry warres and battels, but principally in the warres of CONSTANTINE the Great, against LYCINIUS) and finding no means to assure his life, forced more through fear than his own voluntary choice, hee resolved to rebell, and to take vpon him the title of Emperor. Which hee did, shewing first to his souldiers his disgrace, and how he was odious to CONSTANTIVS; and how that for the seruice which hee and they had done, hee had commanded him to be slain. Which being vnderstood, they all with one voice hailed him Emperor, swearing and promising to protect and defend him. These newes did greatly trouble CONSTANTIVS, who was yet in Milane: and at the very instant that he was aduertised hereof, without discovering it to any man, making shew as though he knew nothing, hee compounded with a certain subtille and valiant Capitaine, named VRSCINVS: who besides his familiars and necessarie seruants tooke with him tenne Companions extraordinary men and very valiant; with which hee vnderooke to kill SILVANVS, vnder this pretext and policie:

CONSTANTIVS wrote certaine Letters vnto SILVANVS, wherein making no shewe to haue vnderstood ought of his rebellion, hee fained hee would depart from Milane and haue him with him, with many honourable words willing him to repaire to him and to deliuer vp the charge which he held, to the Captain whom hee had sent. VRSCINVS made great haste on his way, to the end, that through the shortnesse of the time, it might be the better beleued, that all his proceedings had been vknowne to CONSTANTIVS. As hee with his companions came neer to the Army, among which one was MARCELLINVS the writer of this History, SILVANVS thinking no other but that this man was sent to be his successeur, and then being no time to debate the matter, made no account thereof. VRSCINVS seeming careless and simple, so cunningly handled the matter, conferring with certain captains his friends, and others which were discontented with SILVANVS, that by means of some gifts which he gave, and great promises which he made, they resolved to kill poor SILVANVS. Whereupon, assembling together a good number of souldiers, they went one morning to his Palace; where killing his guard, they entered perforce; and SILVANVS, fleeing into a Church of the Christians, was therein found and slain. And in this manner ended his Empire with his life, having vsurped the same onely 30 daies.

This plot being ended to the good liking of CONSTANTIVS, there followed other troubles and combustions: For the barbarous Nations of high Germanie came down to make warre in the Empire: and as all things were yet very much out of order, by reason of the death of SILVANVS, they did much harme by taking certain Cities, and by robbing and spoiling the Countrey. Which when CONSTANTIVS vnderstood, considering with himself that if he went thither in person, the whole Empire was without any defence; and imagining also that a Generall was not to be trusted with that warre, hee resolved to choosethis cosen germane IVLIANVS, and to make him CÆSAR, who was brother to GALLVS, of whom wee haue spoken heretofore, and had been CÆSAR in the East, and slain by his commandment; both which were the sons of CONSTANTIVS, brother to CONSTANTINE the Great, before spoken of.

This IVLIANVS was a yong man of whom there was great hope: for hee was of a good constitution of body, of an excellent wit, inclined and giuen to studie, and therewith very well learned. IVLIANVS was made CÆSAR and adopted by CONSTANTIVS, with great solemnity in the City of Milane, where CONSTANTIVS then made his abode: yet some say, that it was at Athens, in Gracia: and the better to confirme the friendship and alliance: he married him to his sister HELENA. Other matters also passing, which for breuiety I omit, IVLIANVS went towards the Army which was in Germanie: where all things succeeded to well with him, that hee not onely recovered the losses receiued, but also made great spoil and slaughter of his enemies.

CONSTANTIVS, leauing the West in charge with IVLIANVS, resolved to passe into the East, where there was no lesse danger and need of his presence: for, the Persians, being anti-

A cruell battell
betweene Magnentius and Constantius.

Magnentius, being overthrowne the second time, slue himself.

Decencius, being overthrowne the first time, hung himself.

Constantius
made his cosen Gallus to be Cæsar.

Silvanus chofe Emperor by his souldiers.

A stratagem vsed by Vrscinus, whereby hee slew Silvanus.

Silvanus slain in a Church of the Christians.

Tullianus made Cæsar by Constantius.

cient and daily enemies to the Romans, as the off-spring and successors of the Parthians, neuer ceased from invading and making warre vpon the frontiers of the Romans; robbing and spoiling the Territories of the Empire. And in his way he purposed to go to Rome, where hee was received with great ioy and magnificence. But he could not stay there about thirty daies: for, besides other newes from the East, he vnderstood that the Sarmates, a fierce and barbarous nation (which were the Russians, Muscovites, Polonians, and some others) had entred and runne through Misia (now called Bulgaria and Serua) and with other nations were comm into Hungary. Wherefore hee presently departed, and committed the charge of the Sarmatian warres to MARCELLVS PBERVS, an excellent Captain of great experience, and himselfe passed through Slaunia towards the East. And notwithstanding that he had a great Armie, yet he was not free from fear: for, as this Emperor euer preuailed in all his ciuill warres, and against Tyrants; so against the Persians he was euer vnfortunate: wherefore he practised to come to some composition of peace with SATOR (the second of that name) King of Persia; who then reigned, and refused not to giue care to an Ambassador which motioned the same. Whereof SATOR, growing beyond all measure proud, wrote a most haucie Letter to CONSTANTIVS; which, with the answer thereto, MARCELLINVS setts down. Wherein he required, if the Emperor should haue any peace with him, that he should first resign into his hands the Prouinces of Mesopotamia and Armenia, which had been subiect to his Ancestors (so great was the power and presumption of the Kings of Persia, that they would not grant peace and truce to a Roman Emperour, except he would giue them two of the best Prouinces of the world).

To this Letter, CONSTANTIVS sent him another for answer; which was a notable Letter and very discreet, which for breuitie I do not insert. Wherein he held the grauity and maiesty of a Roman Emperour; and, reprehending SATOR for his pride and ambition, he not onely denied what the other required, but did also put him clean out of all hope to haue any peace with him: and so afterwards there began a very cruell war.

At such time as these matters passed in the East, IULIANVS, who remained in France, CESAR, and Generall against the Germans, after some other victories subdued his enemies in a very great and bloody battell: and, hauing obtained this notable victory, by a generall consent of the whole Armie he was called Emperour and AVGVSTVS; and they made him equall with CONSTANTIVS.

These newes within fewe daies were brought to CONSTANTIVS in the East; wherewith he was so much disquieted, that he was once resolu'd to haue abandoned the warres there, and to haue marched with all his Legions against IULIANVS. But, afterwards altering his determination, he resolu'd to send Ambassadors vnto him; and, thinking with good words to win him, he sent to perswade him to content himself with the title and dignity of CESAR, and to renounce the name of Emperour and AVGVSTVS. With this ambassage he sent a chief man, whose name was LEONAS; who, for that he came from CONSTANTIVS, was honourably receiued in the Army, and audience was giuen him. He hauing deliuered his Ambassage, and the Emperours Letters being read, the Armie not onely refused to yeeld thereto, but they all with one voice confirmed what they had done, calling IULIANVS Emperour and AVGVSTVS: onely they obeyed CONSTANTIVS in putting FLORENTINVS out of the office of Pretorian Prefect, which was giuen to NABRIDIVS. Touching the rest, IULIANVS answered CONSTANTIVS in humble manner, with the best words hee could, promising to be to him a loyall and an obedient companion; desiring him that hee would not depose him from his dignity, seeing that he had accepted thereof against his will, being thereto compelled by the Armie. And heerwith he returned to make war against the Germans with greater force and circumspection than before. And foreseeing it was very requisite to tame and subdue those nations, imagining that he should haue war (which he could not auoid) with CONSTANTIVS, he aduised his Captains and Troops to make haste, and to assail their enemies before they were by them assailed: whereupon there ensued between him and the Germans some notable battails and encounters; which I cannot relate without altering my ordinarie course of breuitie.

After that CONSTANTIVS vnderstood that his Ambassadors could not obtain what hee required, he resolu'd to make war against IULIANVS, presuming on his great power, and the good fortune which he had euer had against other Tyrants. Wherefore hee sought meanes to confirm the peace and friendship, which then was in question between him and ARSACES King of Armenia, and other Kings of the East; to the end they should not ioine in league and confederacy with the King of Persia, his chiefe enemy: against whom hee left such forces as he thought sufficient to defend the countrey, and to continue the war. After this he came into Europe; and, traueilling from Antioch in Syria to the City of Tharsus, by the way hee felt himself somewhat ill of a light Feuer: but yet notwithstanding he held on his journey, thinking that his excreie would haue holpen him by diuerting the humour; and therefore he caused himself to be carried in a Litter, making small iournies. But, coming to the foot of Mount Taurus, he felt himself much oppressed with his disease; the Feuer increasing vpon him in such sort, that hee seemed to be all on fire. And so, knowing his infirmity to be mortall, and that his death approached, he made his Will; wherein he nominated IULIANVS (his enemy, and a tyrant) for his heir and successor: so the man, whom in his lifetime he would not admit for a companion, at his death hee chose for his heir; hauing in this action (as a good Emperour) great regard to the common good and quiet of the Empire.

con-

This Emperour reigned foure and twenty yeers; seuen with his brethren, and seüenteen alone, although in contention with the tyrants aforesaid; and in his fathers time he was CESAR thirteen yeers: wherefore some say, that he reigned in all eight and thirty yeers. He was when hee died (as saith EVTROPIVS) five and forty yeers old: yet all Authors agree not hereupon. This Emperour was reckoned among the indifferent Emperours: for, notwithstanding that he was endowed with some singular gifts, yet was he not altogether free from vices. For, as he was courteous, milde, and of a pleading conuersation, liberrall and affable to his seruants, and very temperate in eating and drinking, and would take great pains, and delighted and desired much to speake well (yet naturally he was neither very sharp-witted, nor eloquent) and was an excellent Archer, and delighted greatly therein: so was hee otherwise very credulous, and delighted to hear men speake euill of others. Which moued him to commit many cruelties: for, he was by nature mistrustfull, and euer feared treason, and therefore trusted fewe men: so was he likewise much giuen to women.

With these vices and vertues he well preferred and defended the Roman Empire; and died, according to SIDERVS computation, in the year of our Lord 364.

THE LIFE OF IULIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, CALLED APOSTATA, AND SIX AND FORTITH EMPEROVR OF ROMA.

()

After the death of CONSTANTIVS, which hapned as is before declared, his cosen germane IULIANVS remained sole Emperour of the whole Roman Empire, who in the others life time enjoyed the title of AVGVSTVS. This IULIANVS was by birth such as we haue specified in the life of CONSTANTIVS; and in valour and sufficiency was one of the best Emperours that euer was; as presently we will make manifest. All which good graces he corrupted and defaced, by renouncing the Christian faith wherof he had before made profession, and by turning to the idolatry of the Gentils: wherefore he was commonly called

IULIANVS APOSTATA: whereof, some Authors say, one LIBANVS an Idolater &c. a

Y

fa-

Marcellus Pberus sent by Constantius against the Sarmates.

Lib. 7. The tenor of a Letter written by Sapor King of Persia to the Emperour Constantius: and an answer thereto. The effect of Constantius letter to Sapor.

Iulianus was by the Armie made Emperour and Augustus.

Constantius sent an Ambassador to Iulianus.

Iulianus answer to Constantius.

Constantius left Will and testament.

The death of Constantius.

famous Rhetorician was the occasion. Which, besides the reasons which may bee heere annexed, is a notable example for all Princes, and men of all estates and conditions whatsoever, that they not only with all diligence seeke out masters for their sonnes, which may be expert in those sciences wherein they purpose to instruct them; but that principally they be vertuous, honest, and sound men in religion: for learning without vertue is little worth. And it is most certaine, that what children learne in their youth, is so imprinted in their vnderstandings, as they neuer forget the same. And those exercises & qualities wherein they are bred vp in their tender age, become proper and naturall, and are neuer left by them in their whole lifetime; whereof the masters which haue charge of the children are the principal cause. And although we might produce many good and fair examples, yet this present shall now suffice, returning to I V L I A N V S, in whom his masters infidelitie took so deep impression, that it well appeareth, what prejudice hee thereby receiued: for, in the rest hee was so compleat and so rare, that in goodnes, bounty and courtlesie, they compare him with T I T V S; in clemency, with A N T O N I N V S; in his fortunate stratagems at wars against the Germans, they make him equal to T R A I A N; in temperance and modestie, to M A R C V S A V A R E L I V S; and in knowledge and learning, to the ancient Philosophers. He was endued with a singular memory, and was very studious, and therefore learned in many Arts and Sciences; and was eloquent and well spoken, no lesse by the gift of nature then by Art. He was most temperate in his dyet and sleep: and most chaste and free from all fleshly passion and dishonestie. Hee was so valiant and hardie in Armes (although but of a small constitution of body, and delicately limmed) that hee was therefore noted and reprobud to be more hardy and aduenturous, than for a Generall or Emperour was fit or convenient. Of glory and renouue hee was greedily couetous; which is a vice wherein great spirits do oftentimes offend. With his friends he was very pleasant and bountifull, and loued to do iustice indifferently to all men; which he strictly obserued in the time that he was C A E S A R, and in the final time that he enjoyed the Empire. He was likewise adorned with many other vertues; which, E V T R O P I V S as an ey-witness, A V R E L I V S V I C T O R, and A M M I A N V S M A R C E L L I N V S, doorecord. But, with all this, hee was an Infidell, which was great pity; and his vnderstanding was blinded by the perswasion of his master L I Z A N I V S, who was a Gentile and an Idolater.

Those things which passed in the time that he was C A E S A R and Emperour, are very largely and particularly described by A M M I A N V S M A R C E L L I N V S, as by him which saw and vnderstood the same: for, they hapned in his time, and he also followed and serued him in the wars of Persia. But I will relate onely that which happened when hee was Emperour, and that briefly; for, he reigned onely two yeeres: wherefore, I hold it not fit in a Raig of so small continuance to spend much time.

Being aduertised of the death of C O N S T A N T I V S (which newes were brought to him in France, whence he was about to go to meet him; and the other, as we haue said, was comming towards him with the same resolution) in great haste hee marched to the City of Constantinople, which euer since the death of the Emperour C O N S T A N T I N E was the Head of the Empire; where, by all means possible he sought to win the loue & good will of the people of all nations; which the better to bring to passe, hee vsed this policie: First, hee caused the Temples of the Gentiles to be set open, and suffred them therein to commit their superstitious idolatry, and to adore their idols. And although hee abhorred, and was an enemy to the Christians, yet at that time he persecuted them not with deaths and tortures; and in contentions between the Christians and the Arrians he was neuter, shewing himself inclined to neither partie: wherefore he was not very hatefull to any; and the barbarous nations standing in fear of his great fame (for, by reason of the German wars he was growne very famous) abstained from making warre, or from troubling the Empire; and so sent their Ambassadors to him to treat of peace and friendship, which he granted.

In this manner hee began to gouern the Empire with as great prosperity and contentment of all men, as euer any man had done. But, when his heart hee was an Idolater; so hee resolved to finde some means to supplant the true Christian religion; induced thereto by the diuell and his owne wickednes: And, the better to effect the same, hee practised a means neuer before vsed by any other; which was, To shew himself pitifull and not cruell, perceiving that by means of torments inflicted vpon the Martyrs, the holy Christian faith was greatly increased: and therefore he determined to take a contrarie course (as R V P I N V S, S. I E R O M, and C A S T O R O V S, report) which was, to induce them by gifts, fauours, flatteries, and by bestowing on them offices offices and dignities, to the end they should renounce the Christian faith, and do sacrifice to his false gods. And as the same authors affirme, there were some, and they not a few, which being couetous and ambitious, through desire to grow rich and to be honoured, denied the christian faith.

And this was one of the greatest persecutions that euer the Church endured, as well in respect of those which abandoned the same, as for that I V L I A N V S perceived that by this means he could not throughlie accomplish his desire; although as is said, he put none to death, neither vsed any violence to any. He therefore made lawes and generall decrees, that no Christian should be master of any arts or sciences, neither should ther study in any Schooles but such as would adore his Idols, to the end that through the desire of learning, they should become Idolaters, or else at the least should remaine idiots, and without learning, and so be insufficient and vnable to preach the christian faith. He likewise ordeined that no Christian should haue any charge, or hold any office of iustice, neither should be a Captaine in the warres, neither enioy any other dignitie. Finally, he vsed all the inuentions and meanes he could deuise to make warre against I E S V S C H R I S T, without shedding any christian blood: which I hold to be the inuention and subtiltie of the Diuell, to take the crowne from the holie Martyrs, which they obtained through the persecution of the sword.

Vsing this pitifull crueltie against the Christians (as a man of courage and valiant in Armes) he resolved to make warre against the Persians, who onely had not shewed any humilitie, or acknowledged his superiortie. Wherefore he went into Asia with a great Army: with which and the ordinarie legions hauing passed through Asia the lesse and other prouinces, he entred Mesopotamia, which (as is said) was the Lady, for whom the Romanes and Persians did ordinarily contend: and after some light encounters and skirmishes, he seized vpon the citie of Cerasus which fauoured the Romanes and was enobled by the Emperour D I O C L E S I A N with wals and bulwarkes; and from thence he passed to Zaita, where he was aduertised that the King of Persia was neere at hand with his whole power: whereupon he marshalled his troupes, with a great desire to come with him to a battaile. But his enemie at that time durst not fight with him, but sent him many Ambassages, intreating pardon, and promising him a great part of his countries. To whom this valiant Emperour would giue no audience: but seeing that he refused the battaile, the more he prouoke him, he entred his country by sundrie waies, taking many cities in Syria, some by force, and others yeelded themselves without any resistance; committing great spoiles in all that country, vntill at last the Persians for very shame were forced to fight, which battaile was very cruell. Before which, this blind I V L I A N V S (as O R O S I V S and S. I E R O M recite) of very malice and hatred which he bare to the Christians, whom he called Galileans (as saith T H E O D O R E T V S in his historie) made a vow to his gods, that if he obtained the victory, he would do sacrifice to them in the blood of those Christians which would not worship idols. And it pleased God in his secret iudgement to giue him victorie at that time, thereby to reward him in this life for the morall vertues wherewith he was endued, to the end that perpetuallie he should be punished in the other world, for his damnable infidelitie.

Hefeing himselfe victorious, and finding no resistance, marched to the famous citie of Thessphonte, and finding no forces that durst stop his passage, he determined to returne to winter in Mesopotamia: but vpon the way his people indured great penurie and want with thirst and hunger, as well for that his Armie was exceeding great, as also for that his enemies did often assault and molest them. And notwithstanding that the Persians would neuer come to any equal fight, but gaue camizadoes, with light skirmishes, sodainly charging, and then running away; after the manner of the Arabians in these daies; yet therewith his Armie was exceedingly much toiled and tired. And in this manner it pleased God (who with his death would stop the execution of so many innocents which he purposed to haue sacrificed) that a Persian fugitiue, who was the guide to his Army, trecheroullie led him and his Armie into a place where many of his enemies lay in ambush; where being charged, he was constrained to fight, and in the fight fell mell being vnkowne was striken with a saunce through the arme into the bodie: with which wound losing his senses, he fell vpon his horses necke, and so his people took him, and caried him into a tent, wherein with some medicines which they applied vnto him, he came againe to himselfe, and recouering strength, he called for his horse and Armes: for he would againe returne to the battaile. But afterwards feeling his force to falle him, they wote, that with extreme pride he vsed these words against our Saviour C H R I S T, k sufficeth that thou C H R I S T of Galilea hast ouercome, for so he was accustomed to call

A new deuise found out by Iulianus to pervert the Church.

Decrees made by Iulianus against the Christians.

Iulian his intention against the Persians.

Iulianus his vow to the gods.

Iulianus dead, by wounded.

The proud speeches vttered by Iulianus a little before his death.

call him. After this, seeing that all those which were about him began to weep, hee reprehended them, saying; You do ill to weep for that Prince which dies in the fauour of the gods: and so he discoursed of the immortality of the soule as long as hee was able to speake, untill that his bloud being wholly spent, he died; which in truth was great pity, that there should be such accursed blindness in a man in whom there was so great valour, and so many good and vertuous parts. Hee died in the seventh yeer after he was made CÆSAR, and in the third yeer of his Empire, being 31 yeeres old, in the yeer of our Lord (according to Saint IEROME) 366.

THE LIFE OF IOVIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND SEVEN AND FORTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

(*)

367
MUCH was the death of IULIANVS lamented by the whole Armie: for, hee was much beloued by all his men of war. But the Church and all Christians rendred thanks to our Lord God, who in his mercy had deliuered them from the yoke of so great a seruitude. There was so great a consultation in the Camp by reason of the death of this Emperor, that they were in danger to haue bin ouerthrowne by the Persians: besides that, they were much distressed through want of victuals. And the enemy, vnderstanding of the death of the Emperor, neuer left to molest them on euery side with such continuall sudden assaults and alarms, that they were not able to endure them. Wherefore, the chief Commanders of the Army assembled themselves together to chuse an Emperor which might gouern them. After much contention and diuersity of opinions, they agreed to chuse one (as saith EUTROPIVS) whose name was MARCELLINVS. But finally they concluded to name a very famous man called IOVIANVS, who was the sonne of a Noble-man called VARRONIANVS, an Hungarian, or an Inhabitant of Hungary: who, leauing the warres which hee had long followed, and to auoid the tumults and troubles which he saw in the Empire, retired, and gaue himself to his rest and quiet in certain possessions which he held in Hungary. But his sonne IOVIANVS came to the Emperor CONSTANTINVS Court, and followed the warres: who, for that he was valiant, and a goodly Personage, was greatly esteemed by IULIANVS; and, whilst he was CÆSAR and afterwards Emperour, this man was the chief Commander of the ordinarie Troops which went with the Emperor.

This IOVIANVS was of an excellent witte and found judgement, giuen to studie, and therewith well learned. He was tall of stature, and well proportioned, and a faithfull Christian; in so much that when IULIANVS commanded, that no Christian should be a Captain, neither should haue any charge or office in the warres; IOVIANVS pleasantly said, that hee made greater account of the faith whereof he made profession, than of any dignity or honour that he enjoyed; and so gaue vp his charge. Being afterwards chosen Emperour, RVFFINVS

Praise of Iouianus.

Iouianus his profession.

and THEODORETUS write, that seeing IULIANVS had drawne the men of warre of his Armie to commit idolatry, and to doo sacrifice to his gods; he in a publicke Oration which he made to them, said, that he (although he might) would not (being a Christian) be an Emperour of Infidels. And so hee refused, and absolutely refused the Empire. But all men were so well pleased with his election, that, after they had approved the same, they cried out aloud, saying; We are all Christians. And for his sake those which were not so, resolved to become Christians, vpon condition that he would accept the Empire.

Iouianus chose Emperour.

In this manner, with incredible joy and gladnes, they sware obedience vnto him, and gaue him the Imperiall Ensignes. Whereupon hee presently ordered and re-inforced the Armie; which could not be done without great difficulty: for, Sapor vnderstanding of the death of IULIANVS (who, for his noble acts and great courage, was generally feared of all men) made small account of this new Emperour; but, gathering together the greatest forces hee was able, gaue so fierce a charge in the Emperours Armie, that the Romans were likely to haue bin wholly defeated: and the Persians apparently had the better. IOVIANVS marching with great trouble and danger, for that the waies were craggie and mountainous; The first day he followed his journey: and, making an Alt in a vallye, his Armie was presently compassed about on euery side by the Persians, who assailed and skirmished with them after their manner.

The next day he came to the City of Carras, where IOVIANVS and his souldiers remembering that in ancient time MARCVS CRASSVS was in that coast overthrowne and slain by the Parthians; holding it for an ominous preface, they accounted themselves lost, if the enemy euer gaue them battell. The principall cause of which feare was by reason of their weaknes through the hunger which they had endured, and at that instant did endure, through want of victuals: for, as two so great Armies marched so neer together, no provision could be made that could suffice to sustain them. But in all these extremities IOVIANVS neuer fainted or was discouraged, neither omitted to vse all diligence in guiding, defending and animating his souldiers, till they came to the riuer Tigris, their dangers still increasing: where King Sapor sent him Ambassadors, giuing him to vnderstand, that, considering the weaknes of his Army and his owne force, he was most assured of victory; yet, if hee would render him the Prouinces hee required (which were many) he would be content to hold perpetual peace with the Empire.

IOVIANVS, seeing the present necessity wherein hee was, took counsell heerupon with the chieft men in his Army: and, after 3 or 4 daies consultation, a peace was concluded for thirty yeers; IOVIANVS leauing to King Sapor all the Prouinces beyond the riuer Tigris, and some Cities in Mesopotamia; with further condition, that the Emperour should not aid or assist ARSACES King of Armenia; which peace or truce (as EUTROPIVS writes, whose historie ends with the life of this Emperour; and many other Writers) was held for very shamefull and dishonorable to the greatnes of the Roman Empire, for voluntarily giuing to the enemy part of the Prouinces thereto belonging, and for decreasing the bounds and limits thereof. But, for that Princes actions are euer diuersly judged of, PAVLVS OROSIUS and other Writers excuse him; alleaging, he made such a peace as was requisite, considering the time; and albeit it were not honorable, yet at least it was profitable and needfull: for, he was in manifest danger to haue lost his whole Armie, and the greatest part of the Prouinces that he rendered. Heerof euery man may judge after his phantasie; but thus it was: IOVIANVS, hauing concluded this peace, went into Syria; where he commanded by publicke proclamation, that all those Bishops which were exiled for resisting and contradicting the heresie of ARIUS, or any other vnlawfull occasion, should be recalld and restored; and principally the great ATHANASIUS. He likewise reuoked and made void all the prohibitions and decrees made by IULIANVS against the Christians; and ordained that they should be admitted to any dignity, office, charge, magistracy or study, as they were wont to be in the time of the Emperour CONSTANTINE the Great. He likewise caused to be paid to the Churches those rents of corn and other things that CONSTANTINE had giuen them, and which by the commandement of IULIANVS were sequestred; which is written by THEODORETUS and RVFFINVS. IOVIANVS, hauing laid godly a foundation to his Empire concerning the Christian faith, giuing in all things good signes of a good and iust Prince, and providing for all matters in the East as to him seemed most needfull, began his journey towards Constaninople, shewing himself euery where as he passed in all his actions a iust and a gracious Prince; so as all men conceiuid great good hope of him. But this, and all his noble resolutions, and other Christianlike purposes, were interrupted by death: for, the iniquity of the people deserued not so good a Prince; which hapned thus: He coming

A peace made betweene the Persians and the Romans for 30 yeers.

The Emperour
Iouianus smothered in his bed with smoke.

to a place which was called Dudaſſana, in the confines of Bithynia, and Galatia, in Asia the left, the weather being very cold (for it was in the winter) they did ſet in the chamber where the Emperour ſhould lie that night, a great panne with kindled coales, which coales were wet: and as the officers of his chamber were gon to take their reſt, the chamber dore being lockt, and he aſleepe, the vapour of the fire waxing groſſe and thicke, and filling euery thing with ſmoke, and finding no place to euaporate, ſtopped the Emperours breath, in ſuch ſort as he was ſmothered ſleeping, and in the morning was found dead; all men imagining this to be the cauſe of his death. Yet ſome were of opinion that he died by eating of Muſhrumpes, which are held venomous. And others coniectured that he ate ſo much meate at ſupper, as his naturall heate could not digeſt the ſame, and ſo through the cruditie thereof he was ſuffocated. But howſoeuer it was, all men were very ſorrowfull for his death, he having held the ſcepter of the Empire only eight moneths; being, according to ſome writers, of the age of fortie yeeres: and after ſome other, thirtie and odd.

Whoſo deſireth to know more of this Emperour, as well in warre as in peace, let him read the authors aboue named, and particularly AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS, who was with him in all his aduentures; and the Tripartite Hiſtorie of CAſſiodorus in his ſeuenth booke, and RUFFINVS in the tenth booke of his eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie: and EVTROPIVS, although he be briefe was an eie-witneſſe. And here endeth his Hiſtorie. Many things may be gathered of the life of this Emperour, by reading the firſt booke of the epiſtles of Saint ANBROS, and the fourth booke of THEODORVS.

THE LIFE OF VALENTINIANVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND OF HIS BROTHER VALENS, THE Eight and Fortiſh Romane Emperour.

THE ARGUMENT.

Valentinianus being the ſonne of a rope-maker, for his vertues deſerued to be made an Emperour; when at his fathers mouement from making of ropes to the higheſt martiall dignitie. He hauing taken vpon him the imperiall dignitie, choſe his brother Valens for his companion, and ſhortly after made his ſonne Gratianus, Cæſar. In their time the world was troubled, with ſo many prodigious earth-quake, removing of the ſea, ſtranger raiues, and ſo much warre as ſer hath ſeldome been read of the like. Neither theſe, theſe wife Emperours promiſed excellently for all theſe troubles and dangers; and not onely ouercome barbarous Kings and ſtranger which were their enemies; but alſo ſubdued domeſtick tyrants, among which was one whoſe name was Procopius, a kinſman to Iulianus the Apoſtata, who taking the enſignes of Emperours; was ſo reſolute as to come to fight with Valens. Valentinianus was a great friend to the Chriſtians, yet Valens was to the contrary; and being earlieſt giue anſwere to certaine Ambaſſadors; he was taken with an Apoplexie which bereaued him of the uſe of his tongue; ſo cleaning at his other ſenſes (ſound whereof within ſhort ſpace he died). Whereupon Valens remanuing in the Empire, with his Nephew Gratian, as the manner of Phocas is, he began to make ſmall account of his Nephew; and ſauouring the ſect of the Arians, gave him liſe to incontinencies, nigromancies, to perſecute the Chriſtians, and to marrye many of them. For which his wickednes God puniſhed him; for he coming againſt the Goths (to whom he had done good) in a victorie of ſeruiſe, was by them overthrowne; and ſlying wounded into a farmer; kniſe in the couerſe, the blow was ſtreight by them; and he turning therein, made ſuch an end as his euill liſe deſerued, receiving ſuch puniſhment as Gods hand, at ſuch abſolute thetheries are worthy of.

It pleaſed God of his goodnes, to giue to the Chriſtian and vertuous Emperour IOVIANVS, a ſuccellor (although he left neither ſonne nor kinſman) which was like vnto him in faith, goodnes, and vertuous conditions; and this was VALENTINIANVS; who although that hee were burſ of a meane Parentage, and came of a poore father, yet he was a faithful Chriſtian, and endued with excellent vertues. His fathers name was GRATIANVS; borne and bred in Hungarie, in a Citie of the Cimbales, a man of meane Parentage, as ſayth

The deſcent of Valentinianus.

ſayth AVRELIVS VICTOR; and as he and PAVLVS DIACONVS affirme, was very poore, and by his trade a rope-maker: But he was of ſo great ſtrength, as vpon a day five ſouldiers ſtriving with all their might to take one of thoſe ropes which he ſold, out of his hands, they were not able to doe it. Wherefore ſeeming to be ſtrong and a very able man for the warres, he was counſelled to follow the ſame, which he did: and hauing no leſſe courage of minde then force of body, he profited ſo much in Armes, through the notable exploits which he performed therein, as offices were beſtowed vpon him; and ſo aſcending by degrees, he became Pretorian Prefect.

By theſe means his ſon VALENTINIANVS, of whom we purpoſe to treat, came to be bred vp in the wars, and therein wan great honour. Being Captaine of the companies called Scutarii, which were targettiers, ſo called, for that no others did beare targets, but they; IVLIANVS the Apoſtata commanded him to doe ſacrifice to his gods, or otherwiſe to giue vp the office which he held (as he did by others, and as we ſaid by IOVIANVS): but hee as a good Catholike and not as a fained Chriſtian, voluntarily ſurrendered his office and Captainſhippe, to continue in the Faith of CHRIST. And the good and Chriſtian IOVIANVS coming to the Empire, drew vnto him all ſay, as he was; by means whereof VALENTINIANVS was in his ſeruiſe when he died, in the ſame place and office which he forſooke in the time of IVLIANVS. As ſoone as IOVIANVS was dead, the firſt and chiefeſt care that VALENTINIANVS took, was, to prepare his body to be ſent to Conſtantinople to be buried; and the ſecond and next was, to conſult who ſhould be the next Emperour. The chiefe commanders marched with the Armie to the Citie of Nica, which is the head and Metropolitane of the Province of Bithynia: where determining to nominate an Emperour, there were ſome which made account to haue been ſo; and among many, one was named, which was a Tribune called EQVITIVS; who (as MARCELLINVS reporteth) was afterwards for his curiſh and harſh conditions depoſed. But finally after long conſultations, VALENTINIANVS was choſen, by reaſon of his goodneſſe and valour, being at that time abſent, hauing remained certain daies journey behinde the whole Armie; and being ſent for, and come, they all ſware obedience vnto him, with great ioy and contentment. For truly he was (as all men wike) a goodly perſonage, very valiant, and magnanimous; very wiſe and temperate, a lover of juſtice, eloquent, and of a good grace, honorable and vertuous, and a man who knew how to make himſelfe beloved and reſpected of all men. Hauing accepted the Empire, and beginning to provide for ſuch things as might be needefull for the good gouernement thereof, it ſeemed good to the captaines and ſouldiers of the Armie to giue him a companion and an equall in the Empire, to be an aſſiſtant to him in the gouernment; which the Emperours of their own accord did often vſe to doe. VALENTINIANVS being aduerted hereof, commanded the Armie to be called together, and with a bold and ſuddaine reſolution, among other matters ſpake vnto them in this manner:

Gentlemen and Souldiers, it was in your hands and at your pleaſure, when I was not Emperour, to giue me the gouernment and command of the Empire; but now that I haue the gouernment and am in poſſeſſion thereof, it is no part of your charge, neither ought you to entermeddle therein: for that is my charge only, and the care thereof appertaineth to me to command and gouerne the common-wealth. And as for a companion, when neede ſhall require, I will take care for one. Theſe ſpeeches are written by THEODORVS and other Authors makemention thereof: which made ſuch an impreſſion in the ſouldiers hearts, as from thenceforth they all tooke care to obey his commandements, not daring to ſpeake a word concerning any ſuch matter. But when he came to the Citie of Conſtantinople, which euer ſince the time of the Emperour CONSTANTINE, was the head of the Empire, imagining it to be a matter very requiſite, he made his brother VALENS his companion and equall with himſelfe in the Empire; which truly he ought not to haue done, for that he was infected with the Arrian hereſie, as hereafter we will declare. And hauing made this election, they diuided the Empire betweene them, ſo as VALENTINIANVS tooke charge of the Provinces in the Weſt, and VALENS of thoſe in the Eaſt. And matters ſtanding vpon theſe tearmes, they both fell ſick of a burning fever, ſo grievouſly, as all men thought they would haue died; but afterwards recovering, there happened vnto theſe brethren ſo many iwarres and ſuch troubles, as they both had enough to doe. For the Saxons and Scots which are northerlie Nations, came in great troups to make a conqueſt of the Iſle of Britannie, and the Germans came againe downe into France: and the countries of Hungarie and Anſtria were inuaded by the Sarmates and the Catti:

Valentinianus
sent vp his brother Iouianus rather than he would doe for refuge to Iouianus.

Valentinianus
choſen Emperour.

A ſpeech vſed
by Valentinianus to the Army.

Valentinianus
made his brother Valens his companion in the Empire.

The Empire inſeſſed by ſerain Nations.

ti: Into Thracia came certaine companies of Gothes to robbe and steale. The King of Persia brake the truce, invaded Armenia, and afterwards Mesopotamia: Whereupon by reason of these combustions and others which were feared, and some already begun, VALENS took his way towards the East, and VALENTINIANVS towards Milan: And into Hungarie they sent SEVERIANVS, a valiant Captain; and so they prouided and placed in diuers parts excellent Captains and Governours. To recite all that past in particular, would be a long worke: but in summe it was thus; that in the first three yeeres of the raige of VALENTINIANVS, he had very cruel warres with the Saxons and Germanes: which in the end, after many batailles, he ouercame and subdued. In the third yeere of his raigne, he made his sonne GRATIANVS his companion, Emperour, and AVGVSTVS. And in Rome by reason of the death or deprivation of TVRCIVS APRONTIANVS (for the Historie declareth it not, or I am forgetfull) he placed a Noble man, named ORETHIVS. As a good Christian, he honoured and fauoured the Christians, their Temples and Churches: which his brother VALENS did not in the East, but lying for the most part in the citie of Amich, suffred the idolatries and superstitions of the Gentiles, and likewise the rites and ceremonies of the Jewes. But the Ariians and Hereticks he extremely fauoured, only he molested and was enemie to the true Christians: and aboute all, gaue himselfe to diuinations, forceries, and prohibited Astrologie; which CASSIODORVS, IOANNES MONACVS, otherwife called ZONARAS, and RVFFINVS treat of at large.

These two brethren governing the Empire, although after diuers manners, making head against the incursions of strange and barbarous nations, which infected the same; a Noble man called PROCOPIVS, borne in Scythia, and neere kinsman to IULIANVS Apostata (who beginning by meane degrees, came to be Capitaine generall of the Imperiall Armies in the East) rebelled in Constantinople; and with the fauour and assistance of certaine Captaines, and some other men of warre (taking the Imperiall ensignes) he proclaimed himselfe Emperour; which greatly troubled the two Emperours: for they knew that he daily grew greater, and that his forces continually increased, and that he had sent for succours to the Gothes, and other strange nations.

The Empire being thus troubled, there also followed in those daies so general and terrible an earth-quake, that an infinite number of houses, and sundrie cities fell downe. For in Scythia and in many other llands, whose countries perished, and the sea ouerwhelmed and drowned many townes and cities, overflowing the naturall bounds and limits; and aboute all, it was most terrible in the prouince of Bithynia, in Asia; so as the citie of Nicea was therewith whollie ruined. And in many other prouinces bordering vpon the sea, the sea altering his course, in some places discovered and left dry land, where before was nothing but sea; and in some other places made sea, where before were greene fields and pastures; as PAVLVS OROSIVS and other authors write, principallie MARCELLINVS, who was an eie witnes, and S. IEROME also. Whereof the Cosmographers of our times should take notice, and not so much blame and maruell at the auncient, if they find not described and set downe in their bookes the sea-coasts, the capes, points, hauens, and entrees into the sea, to be such as they described them then to be: for these and many other naturall changes haue been the cause thereof; besides the error which may be in the letter and painting of the bookes, or in the phrase, through their fault: which wrote and translated them. A little while after this earth-quake (S. IEROME writeth) that there rained from heauen, like as at other times it vseth to snow, an infinite quantitie of wooll, as perfect and as fine wooll as the sheepe beareth. But returning to our historie, This attempt of PROCOPIVS so much troubled VALENTINIANVS and VALENS, that VALENTINIANVS was in doubt whether he should go against him in person, or leaue it to VALENS; whom it seemed more to concerne, as well for the neernes to him, as for that those parts were vnder his iurisdiction. And being resolu'd to go in person, he was constrained to alter his resolution, for that certaine strange nations made new innasions in the Empire, as well in Germany as in Britannie, and the cities and prouinces in these parts by their Ambassadors required succour. Whereupon he determined rather to relieue those which were friends to the whole Empire, and to the common estate, then his owne in particular: and publishing his intent, he returned to make warre against the strangers, sending an excellent Capitaine with a very good Armie against PROCOPIVS, to make head against him, and not to suffer his power to increase: and he himselfe went to the warres of Germany, wherein he did many worthy deeds of Armes against the Saxons, the Burgonians, and other nations: whose force was so great, that although Valentinianus made his sonne Emperour and Augustus.

Valens permitting idolatries, and the ceremonies of the Jewes, was an enemie to the Christians.

Procopius was called Emperour.

An immense fall earth-quake.

The citie of Nicea destroyed by an earth-quake.

wooll fell from heauen like snow.

although they were overcome by him, and reduced to his obedience, yet vntill this day the remembrance of them continueth, and they inhabit those parts. On the other side, VALENS, as a man which had the lesser charge, marched towards PROCOPIVS, and he came to meete him in Asia the lesse, or in Phrygia, neere to a Citie called Natolia, where they fought, and PROCOPIVS was ouerthrownd and fled. But before this bataile, VALENS had sent a Capitaine whose name was IVLIVS, with a very good Armie, against those Gothes which came to the aide of PROCOPIVS, he having spread a rumor that VALENTINIANVS was dead in France, and those Gothes were ouerthrowne by IVLIVS. PROCOPIVS, as is aforesaid, escaping from the bataile, vied all possible meanes to reinforce his Armie, that hee might returne againe to fight: but he not only failed of his purpose, but was by his owne Capitaines which fled with him, thereby to obtaine pardon and grace with VALENS, apprehended and deliuered into his hands.

Some write, that VALENS as soone as he had taken his head to be stricken off: and others say, that bowing downe two trees by force, one leg was bound to the one Tree, and another to the other, and the Trees being let loose, he was torne in pieces: and so ended he his life, parted and diuided in two parts, who had caused so great parts-taking and diuision in the Empire. PROCOPIVS when he died, was of the age of 41 yeeres, he was of a great courage and goodly constitution, but that he went somewhat slooping. It is reported of him that he was euer very sad, and was neuer seene to laugh, and that he alwaies did meditate on melancholy matters; and so had an vnfortunate end, as one which was disloyall, and a Traytor to his soveraigne Lord.

After that VALENS had obtained this victorie, he severely punished those that had fauored and assisted PROCOPIVS: and because that Chalcedonia, which is a Citie in Asia the lesse, ouer against Constantinople, had taken part with him, he caused all the towne walles to be throwndowne, and made euen with the ground, which before were very faire. When PROCOPIVS was dead, a Capitaine and neere kinsman of his, named MARCELLVS, being in the Citie of Nicea with certaine companies with him, and with 3000 Gothes which he had caused to come thither, tooke vpon him the name of Emperour: but he was soone set vpon, taken and slaine by another Capitaine, whose name was EVCICIVS, Gouernor of Slauonia. This so important an enterprife being by VALENS brought to a happy end, he then endeouored himselfe to perforce the remainder of those souldiers, and to provide for other accidents in the East: which, for that they were many and of lesse importance, I will omit. But in matters concerning our religion, as an Heretick and a wicked man, he committed so many outrages, exiled so many, and did so great harme, as it would require a long time to describe. His brother VALENTINIANVS following the wars aforesaid, obtained sundrie victories, some in his owne person, and some vnder the leading of his Capitaines. In great Britannie, by a Capitaine of whose name was VALENTINE, he ouercame and subdued the Picts and the Scots, from whom the Scots at this day are defended, and the Kingdome of Scotland in that lland tooke name.

THEODOSIVS, of whom wee will speake hereafter, obtainted some other notable victories in Germany, whom VALENTINIANVS sent also into Africa: for therein rebelled a mightie Capitaine whose name was TRIMVS, whom THEODOSIVS ouerthrew in bataile, and tooke prisoner, leauing the country in quiet. But notwithstanding that hee had so good and happie successe, yet the Roman Empire was so odious and hateful to all strange Nations, as they neuer desisted as long as they had any oportunitie to invade and molest the same. Whereupon the Sarmates, a barbarous people, of whom we haue often made mention heretofore, rebelled and entred Hungary: against whom VALENTINIANVS (being greatly offended) went himselfe in person; and hauing ouerthrowne them in bataile they sent their Ambassadors vnto him: and the Emperour being in an earnest discourse with them, it is reported that he was so moued, and cried out so loud, as with the force thereof the blood gushed out at his mouth in such abundance, that he died within fewe daies after. Others write, that he was taken with an Apoplexy, wherewith he lost his speech only, all his other senses remaining perfect. Finally, of the one, or other, hee died within a short space, nothing auailing any Physick that could be administered vnto him, hee being of the age of fiftie yeeres, in the twelfth yeere of his Raigne, and according to S. IEROME his computation in the yeere of our Lord 379.

This Emperour is accounted among the good and vertuous Emperours, and with great reason

Procopius was overthrown.

The death of Procopius.

Valens razed the walle of Chalcedonia.

The Picts and Scots.

The victories of Valentinian.

Valentinianus against the Sarmates.

son: for besides his valour and sufficiencie, he was a very iust Prince, and a great enemy and a punisher of vice, especially of bribery and couerousnes. When he died he left two sonnes, and three daughters, which he had by two women. His eldest sonnes name was GRATIAN, whom he had by his lawfull wife, named SEVERA; him before his death he made Emperour AVGVSTVS. His other sonnes name was VALENTINIANVS, who afterwards was Emperour also. And his three daughters, IVSTA, GRATA, and GALLA, he had by a Gentlewoman called IVSTINA: of which one, which was GALLA, was afterwards married to THEODOSIVS, who in proceesse of time came to be Emperour. It is written, that this IVSTINA, mother to these three sisters, was the fairest woman of complexion, of the most excellent constitution of bodie, the comeliest personage, and was endowed with more commendable parts, then any woman then to be found in the world; so as she was brought to the Emperours Palace to his wife the Emperesse for a miracle in beautie, where he had by her these three children, as PAVLVS DIACONVS reporteth, by the consent and permission of his wife the Emperesse.

VVe have related the chiefe of all that passed in the time of VALENTINIANVS, Emperour in the West, and of his brother VALENS in the East. VALENTINIANVS dying in such manner, as we sayd, he left his sonne GRATIANVS for Emperour of all that which he possessed, and made him Emperour in his lifetime. And VALENS seeing himselfe freed, and at liberty, from the respect and dutie which he ought to his brother VALENTINIAN, making small account of his sonne GRATIAN, began to fauour and support the Arians, and to persecute and oppress the true Christians. Amongst other things, St. IEROME writeth, that he commanded all the Monks and Hermits in Egypt, and other parts, that (leaving their Monasticall life) they should become Souldiers, and follow the warres: but before that he could bring them to it, hee put many thousands of them to death, and did many other cruell deeds, for which God gaue him such an end as he deserved. To the contrary, his Nephew GRATIAN was a good Christian, and was likewise a good Poet, and an Oratour, a very virtuous, temperate, honest and courteous Prince, and indued with many noble qualities, but he was condemned to be very remiss in matters of government. But concerning the Christian Religion, hee fauoured: and supported the Christian Churches in Phoenicia, and other Prouinces in the East, as his father had done before him. By means of whose death the high Dutch took heart and courage to come downe, and make warre within the bounds of the Empire, with great multitudes of men: and he with a farre lesser number went to fight with them, neere to a Citie called Argentine or Coloine; where recommending himselfe to IESVS CHRIST, he fought a most cruell battell, and obtained the victory: and as PAVLVS OROSIVS reporteth slew of them about 40000. men. S. IEROME sayth 30000. When the young Emperour GRATIAN had obtained this victorie, he resolved to make his brother VALENTINIAN his companion in the Empire, who was his brother by the father, and sonne to the faire IVSTINA, which he performed with great solemnity.

The Empire being in this estate, VALENS liuing in Antioch in Syria, and GRATIAN and this his young brother VALENTINIAN in France, VALENS as he was giuen to diuinations, enchantments, nigromancies and such other like vanities, made certaine figures to bee cald, and the diuell willing to shew him that after him there should raigne one, whose name began with this Greeke letter, θ, which in Latine is th, he therefore caused to be slaine that most excellent Captaine THEODOSIVS, and others whose names began in that manner.

These things being past, as God in his secret iudgement had ordeined that the Romane Empire should generally decline (as not long after it did) it pleased him in his diuine wisdom to permit that there should first happen some great and particular calamities, which should be as signes and forewarnings presaging the great and general miseries which afterwards ensued, and continue euen vntill this day. For a beginning, and foretelling of the commune and general calamitie, which in proceesse of time afterwards followed, it pleased God to permit (for VALENS his infidelitie) that in those daies in the Northerly parts of Scythia, betwene a people called Hunnes, bordering vpon the Rifene mountaines, and the Gothes which with them diuided their frontiers, and were their neere neighbours (both most valiant and fierce nations, as in this historie hereafter shall appeare) great warres arose: and after many batailles and slaughters betwene them (which make nothing to our purpose) all beginning about the parting of fields and diuiding their bounds and limits, and other ancient quarrels, as vially happen betwene nations which are so neere neighbours; in these controuersies,

the

the Gothes were finally ouerthrowne in a great bataille by the Hunnes, and drinen out of their owne cuntry by force: and being a huge multitude of people (compelled through necessitie, as ouercome, and desiring to liue in peace) they sent to intreate the Emperour VALENS by their Ambassadors, that it might please him to receiue them for his seruants and vassalls, and to giue them some lands, which they might till and inhabit. The Emperour simply granted their request, assigning vnto them a great cuntry beyond the riuier Danubius, and certaine fields in the Prouince of Misia, which at this time is called Bulgaria and Serua (as PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS and others doe report) and there for a certaintime they remained in peace and rest: and it was thought they would so haue continued, had not two of the Emperours Captaines (which diuided the fields amongst them, and remained there as their guard and ouersers) begun to vse them cruelly, like tyrants, doing them daily great wrongs and injuries, as though they had been rather slaues then subjects. Whereupon they conuerted their obedience and humility into rebellion and deperation; resolving to beare Armes, and to take perforce that which those men denied them. And so raunging themselves in good order (leaving that which was appointed for them) they marched forwards, destroying, robbing and spoiling all wherefoeuer they came.

Entering into Thracia, they tooke some strong holds and Cities, vntill they came neere to Constantinople, where VALENS then was: for as soone as these troubles began, he was aduertised thereof: and departing from the Citie of Antioch, he came by great iourneys to Constantinople, out of which he afterwards sallied with a great and very well ordered Armie, to make head against the Gothes, which from ancient time had been euer much feared, and were still famous. And although they vnderstood of the Emperours coming, yet they were therewith nothing dismayd, nor doubted to meete him, but rather sought to fight with him. Which VALENS refused not; so as there was a cruell bataille betwene the two Armies, wherein, at the first encounter, the Romane horsemen behaued themselves so ill, that disbanding, they left the squadrons of footemen naked without any defence; which the Gothes horsemen perceiuing, charged the Romane Infantry; and compassing them about on euery side with an infinite multitude of Archers, brake through them, and constrained them to flie: and so the Gothes had an entire victorie, and did great execution in the Imperiall Armie. VALENS, flying thence wounded with an Arrow, would haue hidden himselfe in a Farmers house neere to that place: but being found, the Gothes set the house on fire, wherein he was burnt. Some write that he died fighting, and that seeing the horsemen flie, he alighted, and putting off his Imperiall robes, placed himselfe in a Squadron of footemen, and there being vnknewne, was slaine. But I hold the first opinion for most certaine, for so doe the most and best Authors affirme. One of which is Saint IEROME, in whose time these things happened: so as he died a death conformable to the course of his life.

The Gothes hauing obtained this victorie, marched forwards, and besieged the Imperiall Citie of Constantinople, where ensued that which we will hereafter declare. The Emperour VALENS died in the sixtith year of his age, and the sixtenth of his raigne; of which, hee had reigned about eleuen in the companie of his brother, and the rest with his nephew GRATIANVS, which was in the yeere of our Lord IESVS CHRIST, three hundred, fourescore and two, after S. IEROMES computation, who in that year ended his Historie, which PAVLVS afterwards prosecuted. I haue not read that this Emperour left any children behinde him.

THE

Gratianus remained Emperour in the place of his father.

Valens fauoured the Arians.

Valens made the Monks and Hermits to leave their cels, and become souldiers.

A great victorie obtained by Gratian against the Gothes.

Valens gave great credit to diuinations and sorceries.

Couriers assigned by Valens to fetch Goths to inhabit.

A bataille betweene Valens and the Gothes.

The death of the emperor Valens.

THE LIFE OF GRATIANVS. ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND OF HIS BROTHER VALENTINIAN THE SECOND, AND NINE AND FORTITH ROMANE
Emperour.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE whole burthen of the Empire resting upon Gratianus, he was advertised that the Goths daily increased their power, and were growne so audacious as to assault the Citie of Constantinople: wherefore he made provision to goe against them, and made one Theodosius a Spaniard Generall of his Army, who overthrew and subdued them, and reduced the Empire to the ancient dignitie. Wherefore Gratianus made him his companion in the Empire, assigning unto him the East part: and he remaining in France, purchased the euill will of his men of war, by shewing himselfe too much afflicted to the Alans; and so other strange Nations, whose factions in attire he often used to wear, in which time one Maximus, rebelling in Britanny, made himselfe a tyrant; and Gratianus, seeing himselfe forsaken by his Legions, returned into Italy in which journey Maximus by a stratagem, caused him to be slain. He had bene a very vertuous and good Emperour, if he had applied himselfe to the government of the Empire: for otherwise he was endued with many good parts, and lived little more then 28. yeeres.

Constantinople
besieged by the Goths.

After the death of VALENS which was so ill and vnfortunate, as we haue declared, the government of the whole Empire, East and West, remained in his nephew GRATIANVS, his brother VALENTINIANS sonne, who before ruled the Western Empire, and in his brother, yong VALENTINIAN, whom he had made Emperour; although by reason of his yonger no great account was made of him. The Gothes following the victorie which they had obtained against the Emperour VALENS; without any stay, became masters of all the countrie round about, and (as I said) besieged the imperiall Citie of Constantinople, wherein was the Emperesse DOMINICA, wife of the vnfortunate VALENS; and they assaulted it with great furie and very resolutely, burning all the suburbs which were very great. And so they inuested the Citie, vntill that the widow Emperesse (as writeth CASSIODORVS) vsed such diligence in encouraging and animating the souldiers which were within it, with good words, gifts, and readie money, which shee distributed amongst them, as they fought so valiantly, that the Gothes recieued great losse &c. could not enter the Citie; and so it was defended by the diligence of this woman, and the valour of the besieged. The Gothes, diuiding themselves into severall troupes, became Lords of the Provinces of Thracia, Dacia, and their confines. Here historiographers make large descriptions of the originall and countrie of these Gothes, and by what meanes, and when they came forth of their

their countrie; wherein they are so tedious and so contrarie in opinions, the one to the other; that I purpose to eschew that labour, for that it little importeth; neither can the truth be fully set downe. But it is true, they were a people which came out of Scythia in Europe, according to most writers; but whether they were borne there or came from some other countrie (as some say they did) it importeth not much: neither the difference in their names in calling them Ostrogothes or Visigothes; for herein is no greater difference, but that the Ostrogothes were more easterly, and the Visigothes more westerly: but generally both the one, and other were called Gothes, and so I purpose to call them, as often as I shall haue occasion to mention them, which will be very often: for in truth the greatest wound, and chiefe loss the Roman Empire received, and the beginning of the fall thereof, was through their occasion. Wherefore these people may justly be held and esteemed for the most valiant in Armes of all other Nations in the world; seeing that they (although with much toyle and by fighting many battles) were able to tame and subdue that people and Empire, which was the tamer and subduer of all other Nations.

The Gothes, and whence they came.

The occasion of the fall of the Empire was through the Goths.

GRATIAN vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle VALENS, and of all the accidents which ensued; and being also advertised of the power of the Gothes, and how they daily became Lords of more lands of the Empire; and how that following their example, other northerly Nations called Hunnes and Alans, no lesse valiant in Armes then the Gothes (as it was reported) made preparation to enter the Roman Empire, and to doe the like: he resolved with the greatest Army he was able to raise, to goe into Hungary to stop their passage. And forasmuch as in so great an extremitie, in his owne person he was not able to provide for all occasions; he determined to make choise of the most sufficient man that he might finde to be Generall of his Armie, to whom he might commit the charge and care of the war against the Gothes; which was both of great importance and very dangerous. There liued at that time in his countrie in Spain, one THEODOSIUS, the son of a noble Captaine whose name was also THEODOSIUS; whom, as we haue told you, VALENS caused to be slaine. This THEODOSIUS after the death of his father, holding himselfe to be in danger, retired himselfe into his countrie; being as well for the noblenesse of his ancestors, and his fathers name and worthiness, as for his owne valour, and his exploits in Armes, the most renowned and of greatest account of any man in his time. Whereupon the Emperour GRATIAN, in great haste sent for him, and wrote his letters vnto him, wherein he made him Captain generall of all the Empire; and within a little while after, Emperour AVGVSTVS, and his equall in the Empire, he being of the age of three and thirtie yeeres.

Theodosius made generall of the Imperiall Army.

PAVLVS OROSIVS; and PAVLVS DIACONVS say, that this Emperour did wisely in choosing a Spanish Captaine, to free the Empire from seruitude; as in former times they had bene preferred from the like danger, hauing followed the same counsell: as the Emperour NERVA elected the good TRAIANVS who after him was Emperour, seeing himselfe old, and the Maiesty of the Empire in contempt. And the said Authors write, that he did it with great reason; for that the said TRAIANVS did extend the bounds of the Empire more then any other. This THEODOSIUS did wholly vanquish the Gothes, and recovered from them, all the Countrie which had bene lost. And during his life time hee made them serue as vassalls, and the Romane Empire stood free and recovered her reputation by him, though with much toyle and danger; so as the Romane Empire was neuer more honoured, nor better defended then when Spaniards were Emperors. And if men will giue me credit to bookes, let them looke into the present estate of the Empire, and they shall see that for these 200 yeeres it was not in that authoritie and greatnesse as it is now that CHARLES King of Spain is Emperour. But you must vnderstand that MELIAX was a Spaniard borne.

When THEODOSIUS had received the Emperors letters, and accepted of the charge offered vnto him; with the greatest speed he could, hee went into those countries wherein the Gothes were; who knowing of his coming gathered themselves together to fight with him. And THEODOSIUS being very desirous thereof, hauing first leued a sufficient Army; and taken such order, and made such provision as was most requisite, with great care and circumspection drew neere vnto them: And after that he had tried his souldiers in some skirmishes and encounters, he came to giue them battaile; which was one of the most cruell and bloody that euer was. But THEODOSIUS carried himselfe so discretely and valiantly, as well in fighting, as in encouraging and directing his men, that he obtained the victory, and made an incredible slaughter of the enemy; and afterwards of the remainder which escaped, vntill that he had driuen them all out of that Prouince; so as there remained not any enemy there. Leaving his Armie in good order, he went to doe his dutie to the Emperor GRATIAN in Hungary, where he then lay, in the Citie of Sirmie. Who for so noble a victorie (after that hee had well considered of his vertues and worthinesse) made him Emperor and AUGUSTVS, and his equall and companion. Yet some say, that he did this in the beginning, before the battaile. But howsoeuer, he shared the Empire with him; giuing to THEODOSIUS, Constantinople and Thracia, with all the Prouinces of the East, in like manner as VALENS held the same; reseruing to himselfe Italie, and all westwards, wherein also reigned his young brother VALENTINIANVS.

incredi-

This being ended, GRATIAN presently returned into Italie, and from thence into France; and THEODOSIUS went to make an end of his wars against the most feared and redoubted nations of all the world, which were the aforesaid Goths, the Alanes, and the Hunnes; all people of Scythia. We read that ALEXANDER the Great, would not go to make any conquest of these people: for they were feared of all the world.

The Alanes tooke their name of a riuer in Scythia called Alane. AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS saith, that these were called in ancient time Massagetes. The Hunnes are also Scythians of Scythia in Europe, inhabiting beyond the bogges of Media, all which were most fierce Nations: and although that all the northerly nations were such, yet were these more then any of the rest; as in this Historie hereafter will appear: And these (they say) are those which at this day are called Tartarians. This people being againe entred into Hungary, THEODOSIUS went to fight with them, sometimes with one Nation and sometimes with another. All authors write, that he fought many cruell battailes with them, and in them all had the vpper hand: so as he slew an infinite number of them: and those which escaped the sword, hee made to flee out of the confines of the Empire. And to the end hee would not ouertire his men of warre, being humbly required of peace by ATHANARICVS King of the Goths, offering himselfe and his people to doe him seruice, hee granted it. And coming victorious to the Citie of Constantinople, which was his imperiall seate, hee brought ATHANARICVS with him; and was receiued with great solemnity, ioy and triumph. Where (they write) that ATHANARICVS did so much wonder to see the power of the Emperour, the solemnity and greatnes of his court, the sumptuousnes and magnificence of the buildings of the Citie, and the riches of the furniture of his house and seruice, as he said, that truly the Roman Emperour was god of the earth, and represented the God of heauen; against whom no man ought to be so hardy, as to lift vp his hand, or heart, except he would presently be condemned to death.

Within few daies after that this valiant King ATHANARICVS came to Constantinople, hee was taken with a grievous sicknes, wherof he died, after that he had been tormented therewith, the space of 3 moneths; whom THEODOSIUS sumptuously buried and bestowed great cost vpon his obsequies. Some Authors, as IOHANNES and others, say, that this peace with the Goths, was made by GRATIANVS; for THEODOSIUS fell so grievously sick, that al men thought he would haue died, and that in this season the peace was granted to ATHANARICVS more for feare then for any good will: and that THEODOSIUS, recouering health, would not breake what GRATIANVS had concluded. AVRELIVS VICTOR, PAVLVS OROSIUS; and others report it after the first manner; but this difference is of small importance. The Goths which serued ATHANARICVS in his house and army, hauing had triall of the goodnes and bounty of THEODOSIUS, desired to continue in his seruice; and afterwards serued him faithfully and valiantly, in such warres as happened. In this time, through the grace and mercy of God, GRATIANVS and THEODOSIUS being true Christians, the Catholike Church was fauored and protected by them. Yersome write, that THEODOSIUS was baptized after that he was Emperour: But before that time hee did reuerence and beleue the Christian faith. SOMOMENVS, after CASSIODORVS, affirmeth it so, which to me seemeth hardly to be beleueed. But howsoeuer it was, THEODORIVS writeth, that as soone as he came to Constantinople, hauing overcome and subdued all the barbarous nations; he applied himselfe to the reformation of the Church; and to the subseruion and rooting out of the Arian heresie, which was dispersed ouer all the East parts: And vpon this occasion hee vied meanes to assemble a great number of Bishops at Constantinople; and although that the euill was not thoroughly cured thereby, yet that which hee did, was very profitable. CASSIODORVS sets

Athanasius
King of the Goths, fled to Theodosius
for peace.
Athanasius
his coming to Constantinople,
and his speech concerning the Roman Empire.

The death of A.
thanasius.

downt

downe THEODOSIUS decree, wherein he professed and protested that hee beleueed the same faith, which was preached by the holy Apostles; and which was published in the Nicene Council. He setteth down also, how that THEODOSIUS banished certaine Bishops from Constantinople, for that they were of the diuellish and abominable sect of the Arrians. In the West, there was no neede of any such care or diligence; for this Arian pestilence had not so much infected those parts: as we haue already declared in the liues of the three sonnes of CONSTANTINE the Great. CONSTANS which reigned in that part, tooke great care to preferre and defend the auncient Catholike faith; and after him IOVIANVS and VALENTINIANVS. So as, aswell in matters concerning Religion, as also the warres and ciuill government, THEODOSIUS shewed himselfe a worthe Prince, and was so much feared and honoured by all Nations, as the King of Persia (notwithstanding that hee had slaine the Emperour IVLIANVS, and obtained so many victories) in great humilitie, sent his Ambassadors to Constantinople, entreating a perpetuall league and peace with THEODOSIUS: And hee seeing with how great submission that King sued for peace, granted it.

THEODOSIUS, liuing in this prosperitie, the better to assure the succession of the Empire to his posterity, made one of his sonnes whose name was ARCADIUS, his equall and companion: notwithstanding that he was but a childe, and very young. In this meane while liued GRATIAN in France, from thence making prouision and sending direction to all parts, as into Africa, Spain, Britanny and Germany: and as he was a man very remisse and soft spirited (as the most part doe write of him) he waxed much more, after that hee had taken THEODOSIUS for his companion; depending much vpon his diligence and valour: so as he became ill beloued of his souldiers. And this dislike increased, for that hee (seeing that THEODOSIUS had entertained the Goths which serued ATHANARICVS into his pay and wages) drew to his seruice certaine companies of Alanes, and respected and honored them so much, as he sometimes appalled himselfe after their fashion, and made them his guard; wherewith the Roman and Italian souldiers were much discontented.

In Rome and all Italie the Empire was of no absolute authoritie: for therein was the young VALENTINIAN, brother to GRATIANVS; who for that he was very young and of little discretion, a Noble man called PROBVS had the charge of the gouernement, who had been Consul, and was then Prefect of the Citie. These matters gaue occasion to the Legions which were in Britanny to presume to rebell, and to chuse an excellent Capitaine, whose name was MAXIMVS for Emperour; and as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, against the will of MAXIMVS. But afterwards hauing accepted the name, he refused to proceede: and so with all expedition possible, he went into France; and forasmuch as GRATIAN was ill beloued of his Armie, the greatest part of his men of warre forsooke him, and calling MAXIMVS Emperour, went to his campe. Whereupon GRATIANVS finding himselfe vnable to fight with him, purposed to retire into Italie, where his brother was. MAXIMVS being aduertised thereof, vied such meanes as GRATIANVS fell into his hands. Which was after this manner: Hee caused a rumor to be spread abroad, that GRATIANVS wife was coming to see her husband with a good troupe of souldiers, and to goe with him into Italy, and hee sent some messengers before with counterfeit letters, which aduertised him thereof. After this, he sent a valiant and subtle Capitaine called ANDRAGATHVS, to the end he should put himselfe in a horsefetter, with some chosen souldiers, and goe to meete GRATIAN, faining to be the Emperre, and so rake him and kill him.

This cunning Champion performed what his Lord had committed to his charge, and at Lions in France, in passing the riuer Rhodanus, he came to ioyne with him; some going before and telling him that the Emperre was neere at hand. The goodnesse and sincerity of GRATIANVS were the occasion that he suspected nothing, neither discovered the deceipt, vntill he came so neere, that he saw it with his eyes, where being compassed about with ANDRAGATHVS his souldiers, he was there by his commandement slaine. In this manner ended the life and reigne of the Emperour GRATIANVS, being of the age of nine and twenty yeeres; fiftene yeeres after that his father made him Emperour and his companion; wherof eight yeeres were in his fathers time, more in name then effect; and of the other seuen yeeres, three were with his Vncle VALENS who was slaine by the Goths; and the rest with THEODOSIUS whom he chose for his companion, and with his brother VALENTINIAN; who for that he was a childe was not regarded. He died (after PROBVS his computation) in the yeere of our Lord three hundred, fourescore and seuen. This Prince was endued with many excellent

The King of Persia, fled to Theodosius
for peace.

Gratianus ill beloued by his men of warre.

Maximus chosen Emperour by the legions in Britanny.

Gratianus
slain by Andra-gathus, through the procurement of Maximus.

excellent vertues: for he was valiant, noble and discret; and aboue all, a Catholike and a very deuout Christian: but he had a fault, which was, that he was too soft spirited, remisse, and negligent, taking little care for the government: which (as is said) was the principall cause of his ruine. And truly this is a great and dangerous fault in Kings and Princes: for as their principall charge and office is to gouerne and rule, and they therefore are called Rexes; failing to performe their office and dutie, they make themselves hateful, odious, and vnworthy the power and dignity which they enioy.

THE LIFE OF THEODOSIUS, THE FIRST OF THIS NAME, AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR OF ROME. (*)

THE ARGUMENT.

After that Gratianus was dead, the whole burthen and care both of peace and warre, appertaining to the Empire, rested vpon Theodosius. The first enterprise he undertooke, was in Italy, against the tyrant Maximus, who caused the Emperor Gratianus to be slaine. And besieging him in Aquileia, he made him die like a Traytor, together with a sonne of his. And having triumphed in Rome, he restored the Empire to Valentinian. Returning to Constantinople within short space after, he understood that Valentinian was slaine; and that only two (to wit) Arbogastes and Eugenius, usurped the Empire. Whereupon returning againe into Italy, he fought with these two tyrants, and overcame them both, more by miracle and by the speciall grace of God, then through his power or any humane wisdom. After this victory, the whole charge of the Empire, both East and West, rested vpon him alone; but he calling his sonne Honorius, invested him in the Empire of the West, and so Arcadius he left the Empire of the East. But because they were both children, and very little, he gaue them two tutors, men no lesse valiant in Armes then politike in peace. After this, happening to be excommunicate and absolved by S. Ambrose Bishop of Milan, for certain cruelties committed in Theffaliamia, falling grievously sick, he dyed at the age of fiftie yeeres.

SIX yeeres reigned THEODOSIUS in companie with GRATIANVS, when he was slaine by the commandement of MAXIMVS, who as a tyrant and vsurper proclaimed himselfe Emperour: And by reason of GRATIANVS death, all the care and trouble both for warre and peace rested vpon THEODOSIUS, who was very sufficient, and well able to support the same. For although that young VALENTINIAN was in Italy, yet hee had neither power nor courage to reuenge the death of his brother, GRATIANVS; but knowing that MAXIMVS came with a great Armie, and was already entred Italy, he abandoned it, and went to Constantinople to increase ayde of THEODOSIUS: Who taking compassion of the two brethren, the one slaine by treason, and the other wrongfully disposessed of his Empire, of his natural and accustomed valour, resolved to goe into Italy to reuenge the death of the one, and to restore the other to his estate, by pursuing and destroying this new & mighty tyrant. Whereupon leaving his son ARCADIVS in Constantinople, taking VALENTINIAN with him, he prepared for his departure, raising the greatest and best forces he was able, and began to march through Gallia Cisalpina, which is now called Lombardie, where MAXIMVS alreadye was in the citie of Aquileia, hauing made ANDROGATHVS Generall of his Armie to make head against THEODOSIUS.

This ANDROGATHVS was a politick and a valiant man in the warres, and he which slue the Emperor GRATIANVS; who with great care and diligence had taken all the streights, rivers, bridges and passages, whereby THEODOSIUS might passe: and afterwards changing his minde, thinking that THEODOSIUS peraduenture would haue passed his Armie by sea, he drew his forces from the mountains, and from those places which hee had left them in guard, and embarked them aboard a great number of ships and barks, purposing to ouerthrow him, and to take him prisoner vpon the water. The valiant THEODOSIUS, being advertised heerof, marched by great Iournies; and, finding the passages open, entred with his troops into the Plains of Lombardie, and besieged the City of Aquileia, where the vsurping Emperour was, before ANDROGATHVS could ouertake him: and compassing the City round about, those which were within it, of meeer fear hauing guilty consciences, deliuered him into the hands of THEODOSIUS, without staying for any assault or fight; and he iustly caused him (as a Traytor and Rebel to his Prince) to be put to death. The like was afterwards done by a sonne of his whose name was VICTOR, whom his father had created Emperour, to auoid the perils and troubles that might ensue. When ANDROGATHVS who was his Generall, being vpon the sea with a very mighty naue, vnderstood of the taking and death of MAXIMVS, hee was so ouercomn with sorrow and despair, that hee cast himself ouer-board out of his Galley, and there was drowned; and his people, wanting a Leader, yeelded themselves to THEODOSIUS. And so, without either death or blood-shed, God gaue him a very great victory; and from France, Britannie, Germanie, and Spain, came Ambassadors vnto him, yeelding him their obedience, with great humility and deuotion.

Having performed this enterprise, he went with yong VALENTINIAN to Rome, the principall Head of the Empire; where they were receiued with a solemn triumph (as RUFENVS and CASSIODORVS report) whither he sent for his yong son ARCADIVS from Caesarsburg, where he left him to the end he might be knowne and honoured in Rome: where he continued certain daies, reforming the abuses and disorders there; and hee inflicted great punishments, and did great iustice vpon certain euill and wicked persons. And, as he was a deuout and good Christian, so he took great care to reform the abuses of the Church. And, finally, setting all things in good order, he returned to Constantinople to gouern the Empire of the East; and to VALENTINIAN he left all the West, leaving him an Armie and power sufficient to defend the same: which is no small argument of his goodness and loyalty, that being of power, able (if he had desired to haue made himself onely Monarch and Lord of the whole) yet he held it for greater honour To reconquer the Empire, and to restore it to him to whom in right it appertained, than to hold the same himself. THEODOSIUS being returned to Constantinople, VALENTINIAN went for France, that he might be neerer at hand if any occasion should be offered: where liuing in prosperity and void of care, a Captain of his, called ARBOGASTVS, practised his death; who was a man of a haucie courage, politick, venturous, and of great power by reason of the place and authority which he held neerer about the Emperour; whom PAVLVS OROSIVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS call Comes or Earle: for in those times wee finde that name and dignity, and before that also; and these were those which were Gouernours and Captains of Provinces, and sometimes were the Emperours companions, to whom were committed matters of greatest importance: In like manner as the ancient Consuls, when they went to make a conquest of any Country, had with them Legats, which is as much as Lieutenants. This ARBOGASTVS resolved with himself to kill VALENTINIAN, thereby to aduance an Emperour of his making, although it prospered ill; not daring to vsurp it himself, for that hee was of base parentage, a stranger born, and an Infidel, and for other causes which in the Historie are not mentioned. Finally, he practised with one EVGENIVS, who of a Grammarian and a Rhetorician (being for that cause well beloued and esteemed) came to bear Arms, and to follow the Court, and was now highly regarded and of great account, promising him to kill VALENTINIAN, and to make him Emperour, giuing him to vnderstand, that it was a matter possible, and easie to be done. EVGENIVS accepted what this wicked man offered; and ARBOGASTVS vsed such means, that he corrupted the Eunuchs that waited in VALENTINIANs chamber, and agreed with them to strangle him in the night, and giue it out in speech that they found him dead in the morning; and they did so. VALENTINIAN being in the city of Vienna in France,

Maximus and his son Victor put to death by Theodosius.

Androgastus drowned himself in the sea.

Theodosius triumphed in Roma.

Arbogastes practised to kill the Emperor Valentinian.

Valentinian
strangled by his Eunuchs.

sleeping in his bed, was by these Eunuchs strangled; and they published abroad, that hee had hanged himself, eighteen yeeres after that his brother had nominated him Emperor. The manner of his death was kept so secret, that it was bruited abroad that he had hanged himself; so as PROSPERVS, in the addition which he made to EVSEBIVS book of Times, writing his death, saith, that he died in that manner.

Eugenius made Emperor by Ambrogius.

Presently, when as his death was knowne, before the treason was discovered, ARBOGASTVS nominated and made EVSEBIVS Emperor. What these two men did, being of greatest authority, was generally approved by all men; and by means of their reputation, and thorough their cunning, large promises, and great gifts, they leuied a great number of men of war, as well Barbarians as Romans, and so became Lords of all the Prouinces: And although EVSEBIVS bare the name of Emperor, yet all was ordered and disposed accordingly as it pleased ARBOGASTVS.

Within short space THEODOSIUS was aduertised of this fact; for which hee was very forrie, and therewith much troubled, seeing how dangerous a warre lay before him: but, accounting it a great dishonour and a shame to suffer such an action to passe unpunished, with the greatest expedition and diligence that could bee hee mustred vp his men of warre, and with all possible speed departed from Constantinople, leaving his sonne ARCADIVS there; and HONORIUS also, whom he then made Emperor, appointing him to bee equall and companion with his brother. But, as a good and deuout Christian, the first prouision hee made, was, To fast and pray, that it might please God to giue him victorie against those Infidels and Tyrants, recommending himself to the prayers of a Monk which was accounted a very holy man, whose name was IOHN, dwelling in the City of Thebes in Egypt: who sent him word that hee should haue the victory, but should dy in Italie, and neuer return to Constantinople.

THEODOSIUS being comen to the confines of Italie, the Tyrants had so great forces, and had taken so good order for all matters concerning the warres, that all passages were stoped in the Alps, and at the foot thereof EVSEBIUS and ARBOGASTVS attended with their whole Armie; so as THEODOSIUS was much troubled and distressed, as well after hee had passed those passages and mountains, as when he was entred into Lombardie, where hee found himself inclosed about with enemies, which on euery side stoped the coming of any victuals to his camp; they hauing, besides this, a greater number of men than hee had, and no lesse experienced and valiant in the warres than his were. But the valiant Emperor, vsing the best means hee could in all things, as a faithfull Christian expected and hoped for his best relief from God, to whom with tears he made his continuall supplications. Truly, the danger and extremity wherein he was, and the multitude of his enemies was so great, that all Writers affirm he had been vtterly lost, if God in a battell that ensued had not shewed a manifest and apparant miracle. The night before the battell he spent altogether in praier, without either eating or sleeping; and the next day, seeing himself charged on euery side, he set his men in very good order to fight; and with great courage and resolution attended the coming of his enemies; where presently in the beginning a Captain of theirs called ARBICIVS came ouer to his side with his whole charge, which was a good signe of his good successe; and the battell beginning, where Romans fought against Romans, they fought at euery hand, most cruelly killing and wounding one another. The other battalions and squadrons, which were auxiliaries of sundry nations, being of THEODOSIUS's side, had the worse; so as at the first chargetenne thousand Goths which were in his pay were slain: which when he saw, he lifted vp his eyes to heauen; and, with a true faith and stedfast hope shedding many tears, prayed to the Lord that he might not be ouerthrowne in so iusta cause.

A miraculous tempest.

At that Instant a Captain of his, called BARBARIUS, with a great troop of souldiers came to the rescue of certain Squadrons which in they were ouerthrowne; and hee came with such courage; that they which were in a manner vanquished recovered strength and heart; in such manner, that without retiring they fought most valiantly for the victory: but the enemies were so many, that it seemed impossible for them to defend themselves. At that Instant it pleased God to send them succor from heauen; which was, that suddenly there arose so violent a wind and tempest, as the like thereof had neuer been seen by any man then liuing; which, without annoyance to the Emperours people, did beat in their enemies faces with such force, that it bereaued them of their sight; so as they were not able to march forwards: and the wind was so strong and forcible, that all the arrowes, stones, darts and lances, which they shot and huled, were thereby born back again; and they which threw them were therewith wounded, in such manner, that it most plainly appeared to be miraculous, and the especiall gift of God. Which the most Christian Emperor perceiuing, rendering thanks to God for the same, encouraged and animated his people, so as within short space he obtained a compleate victorie. For his enemies souldiers took no other care, but how they might saue themselves by flight: but EVSEBIUS persisting obstinate in his treason, was taken fighting, and brought to THEODOSIUS, who commanded him to be slaine: yet some write that he killed him himselfe.

man.

Agreat victory
obtained by Theodosius.

Eugenius slaine in the presence of Theodosius.

Arbogastes dictates his owne thoate with his owne sword.

All writers affirme, that ARBOGASTVS, seeing himselfe ouerthrowne, fled from the battail, and finding no certaine place of refuge, with his owne sword cut his owne throate. So as THEODOSIUS obtained a most glorious victorie, followed the execution, and had the spoile of his enemies Campe. Of this battell and the strange accident that happened therein, we haue for testimonie, not onely Christian and godly authors, more then a few, as well such as liued at that time and neere vnto it, but also one CLAUDIANVS a Heathen Poet of that age, who reciteth the same in heroicall verse most excellently, in the third and fourth Consulship of HONORIUS the sonne of THEODOSIUS.

After THEODOSIUS had obtained this victorie, ther was no man either in the East or West that durst oppose himselfe against his power; so as all the Princes of the Empire sent him their Ambassadors to congratulate his victorie: and many barbarous nations did the like, and so hee became absolute and onely Lord of the whole Empire. And seeing himselfe free from warres, he came to Milan, whereof S. AMBROSIVS was Archbishop: where he remained all the rest of his life time, applying himselfe to ciuill gouernment; whereof in the warres he neuer left to haue all possible care. Being thus in Milan, acknowledging himselfe to be but mortall, and knowing how vnfound and diseased he was in bodie, he purposed to provide for matters to come: wherefore he sent to Constantinople for his sonne HONORIUS; to whom (by the assent and good will of all men) he assigned after his daies the Empire of Italy and of all the West; and to his other sonne ARCADIVS, the Empire of the East; and into Africa and the prouinces thereof, he sent a man of great wisdom and experience called GILDVVS to gouerne the same, and he himself took care and had the ouersight of the whole. With such prosperitie was the world gouerned (as PROSPERVS writeth) the space of three yeeres: for so long time liued THEODOSIUS in Milan, in companie with the great Doctor S. AMBROSIVS, with whom there happened a notable matter; which because it is an example of humilitie, I meane to declare in a more large manner then ordinarie, which is also written by THEODORETUS, PAYLVS DIACONVS, RVFFINVS, and CASSIODORVS.

Theodosius made law for Arcadius and Honorius King
perpetua.

THEODOSIUS being in Theffalonica, a very rich, populous and a Noble Citie in the prouince of Macedonia, there hapned a great tumult among the people, against the Magistrates and gouernours thereof; and their furie and presumption grew to be so great, as they slew the Iudges and all those which took part with the Emperour in the gouernment. Which when THEODOSIUS vnderstood, notwithstanding that he was very vertuous, yet did he much desire to execute his wrath against him, and not without iust cause: but he did therein so farre exceede the bounds of reason, as he made his souldiers put to death seuen thousand persons of the common sort, making no difference between the guiltie and innocent. Which punishment was held for rigorous and very cruell; although the offence were very great, chiefly against a Prince so iust and so much admired in all his actions. Amongst those which reprooued him for this fact, the holy Doctor S. AMBROSIVS then Bishop of Milan was one; and the Emperour afterwards comming to that citie, and being receiued as to his estate appertained, the next day he meant to haue gone to the Church to haue done his deuotion, and to pray, as of custome he vsed, nothing thinking of what he had done at Theffalonica, whereof it was thought he had long before repented. But S. AMBROSIVS, to the end that his punishment should be as publicke as his offence, with great authoritie and boldnes set himselfe in the Church doore, and told the Emperour that hee should not enter there; making a learned oration vnto him, wherein with the authoritie of a Bishop, he opened vnto him his fault and offence, excommunicating him, and forbidding him to come into the Church. All which speeches the Emperour heard with great patience, and returned to his palace, obeying the excommunication and prohibition, and so remained eight moneths without comming any more to the Church: at the end whereof, a priuate seruant and Captaine of his (whose name was RVFFINVS) finding the Emperour melancholike, and discontented for that he was so long excommunicated, offered to goe to S. AMBROSIVS to get him absolution, perswading him to come to the Church, and he would go before to obtaine his leave. The Emperour, although he much doubted thereof, did so. But RUFFINVS was not onely denied of his request, but was highly reprehended by the Bishop, as a minister and counsellor of the Emperours crueltie: which when he perceived, he sent to aduertise the Emperour thereof, and to aduise him not to come, for at that time he should by no means bee received. The Emperour met with the messenger vpon the way, and hearing what message hee brought, answered; Yet truly I will goe to see what penance my Pastor will lay vpon me for my offence. And so went forwards vntill he came to the Church doore, and went not in, but came where S. AMBROSIVS was: whom he requested to absolve him, and to permit him to come into the Church there to heare diuine seruice. When S. AMBROSIVS saw the Emperour, and heard what he said, imagining that he came of purpose to go into the Church, which he was resolu'd to withstand vntill he were absolved, or had done some open penance for the great crueltie which he had commanded to be done, he asked him wherefore he came so as a tyrant, contemning and violating the lawes? Whereunto the Emperour mildly answered: I come not to breake the lawes, neither thy commandement, neither will I passe ouer the threshold of this doore: but I come to request thee to loose the bands wherewith thou hast bound me, and that thou wilt pray to God to forgive me my finnes, and not shut the doores of his Church against me, which God openeth to all sinners which heartily repent. What repentance hast thou heere (quoth the Bishop) for so heinous an offence? and with what salue hast thou healed so mortall a wound? Thou (quoth the Emperour) art to instruct me, and to shew me what I ought to doe, and thou shalt see that I will accomplish what thou shalt prescribe. The Bishop seeing the Emperours mildnes, thinking it a sufficient penance for him to be excommunicated from the Church the space of eight moneths, with faire and charitable speeches said; Thy penance THEODOSIUS shall be this, that (seeing that to follow thy owne will, and to execute thy wrath, thou diddest commit so cruell a murder) thou shalt presently proclaim and establish a Lawe, that no man, whom thou shalt adiudge or condemn to dye, or any thy successors, shall be executed within thirtie dayes after that thou hast pronounced the sentence of death against him. At the end of which thirtie dayes, thou shalt be againe demanded, whether thou dost hold thy commandement for iust: for by that time being free from passion, thou wilt iudge of thy selfe whether thou hast iustly iudged or no. When THEODOSIUS heard this, he presently commanded that law to be written, and made it to be proclaimed: and he himselfe obserued it during his life, wherof much good ensued.

This law being made, the Emperour came into the Church, where making his prayers, and doing his deuotion, he receiued the Sacrament, and from thenceforth loued the Bishop very deere, and vsed his counsell in many matters: For as he was hasty and cholerick, this law was a bridle to restraine him from being too extreame in punishing offenders. THEODOSIUS reciteth one example therof: which was, that the Citizens of Antioch hauing committed a great offence, and made a great vprore in the Citie, THEODOSIUS commanded great punishment to be inflicted vpon the malefactors, which was not presently executed, by reason of this law: and afterwards he altered his opinion, which he attributed to the counsell of S. AMBROSIVS whom hee loued so much, that to enioy his companie and counsell, hee staid in Milan, and there made his abode the remainder of his life. From thence he sent to Constantinople for his sonne HONORIUS, who came to Milan. Soone after THEODOSIUS fell so extremely sicke, that after care taken for his soules health, he disposed of the Empire, ordaining his sonne HONORIUS to haue the government of Rome, and of all the prouinces of the West: and ARCADIVS to rule in Constantinople and the East. And for that these his two sonnes were very young, and not of fit yeeres to gouerne, he left with them as their tutors and gouernours, two very sufficient men both for warre and peace, the one called RUFFINVS, and the other STILICO; RUFFINVS to be with ARCADIVS in the East, and STILICO with HONORIUS in the West: and into Africa and the prouinces thereof he sent GILIVS, to gouerne the same as Lieutenant to the two Emperours, to whom he gaue that charge. After that he had set all things in order, his disease so much encreased, as he could not endure it any longer: wherefore recommending his soule to God, he departed out of this present life, as SIXTVS AURELIUS VICTOR saith, who here maketh an end of his historie, and the most part of other authors, in the fiftieth yeere of his age, and the eleuenth of his reigne; accounting from the death of GRATIANVS, reigning alone, and with GRATIANVS other six yeeres: so as in all hee reigned seuentene yeeres; and in the yeere of our Lord, three hundred, ninetie and seuen.

This Emperour, according to all authors that write of him, was of constitution of bodie, counte-countenance, and gesture, very like to the Emperour TRAIAN, as by TRAIAN'S statues and pictures, which in that time were remaining, might easily be conceiued, and might be imagined by that which was written both of the one and the other: And they write, that he was not onely like vnto him, and did resemble him in bodie and gesture; but that he did imitate and excell him in vertue and good conditions, and had the same qualities, and was naturally so inclined, sauing that if TRAIAN were spotted with any vice, THEODOSIUS was free from it. It is written that TRAIAN was a little too much giuen to the drinking of wine: but we reade that THEODOSIUS was most temperate, in eating and drinking. TRAIAN was very desirous of triumphs, glorie and honour; THEODOSIUS despised them and held them for things of no moment: but hee euer sought to obtaine the victorie, and in all battailes and skirmishes was both valiant and politicke, euer giuing thanks and honour vnto God as a good Christian. In conclusion, THEODOSIUS was of admirable valour, force and courage, very politicke and expert in the warres, of an excellent witte and iudgement in ciuill gouernment, a louer of iustice and equitie, mercifull, pitifull, and of a most noble inclination, although somewhat hasty and cholericke against malefactors; but he was presently pacified and easily entreated. And to moderate this passion, besides S. AMBROSIVS his law concerning matters of death, he vsed of custome (knowing his owne hasty disposition) not to determine of any thing, vntill that he had repeated ouer the foure and twentie letters of the Greeke Alphabet: for in that space his wrath would be tempered. He was much honoured and beloued by all men, especially by such as were honest. He was exceeding liberal, continent, and shamefast, very circumspect and careful, indifferently well learned and scene in historie. He much desired to know the acts of the ancient, and greatly honoured learned and wise men. He was well spoken, and of a pleasant and merrie conuersation, framing himselfe with great discretion to the qualitie of those persons with whom hee discoursed, maintaining the maiestie of his estate and the authoritie of his person, and had also other excellent vertues too long to recite. THEODOSIUS, when hee died left two sonnes (of which we haue already spoken) and one daughter. His sonnes ARCADIVS and HONORIUS were Emperours; both which hee had by his first wife whose name was FLACILLA, an excellent and a most religious woman; his daughters name was PLACIDIA GALLA, which hee had by his second wife, who was the daughter of the Emperour VALENTINIANVS the first.

Theodosius likened to Traiane.

Theodosius
his conditions and qualities.

Theodosius
his children.

THE LIFE OF ARCADIVS AND HONORIUS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THE ONE & FIFTITH

Romane EMPEROVS.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

HE Empire being under the government of Theodosius his two sonnes, and so under the Tutors ordained by him, that is, Rufinus and Stilico, which ought to haue taken care for the young men, and to haue gouerned them as fathers: they not only neglected the care of the young men committed to their charge (nothing caring they should be acknowledged for Emperours) seeking to make themselves absolute Princes: but they both came to an euill end. For Rufinus, who was Arcadius his Tutor in the East, his treason being discovered, had his head stricken off, and set ouer one of the gates of Constantinople. And Stilico, who was Honorius his Tutor in the West, notwithstanding that hee went against the Gothes, yet hee temporized, that hee might bring his treason to some effect, which being in the end discovered, he was slaine by Honorius his commandement.

Theodosius made Stilico and Rufinus tutors and counsellors to his two sonnes Honorius and Arcadius, and Stilico to be their Lieutenant in Africa.

ment: which was the beginning of the utter ruine of the Romane Empire, which was in a manner wholly destroyed by the Gothes. In which time, Arcadius, who had very peaceably enjoyed his Empire the space of certaine yeeres, dyed in Constantinople. But sundry barbarous Nations over-ran all Honorius his Empire, he lying in Ravenna, making small show to be an Emperour, being very negligent, when there was neede of great care and diligence. Nevertheless, taking charge of the warres to sundry of his Captaines, he freed his estate (except Spaine which was conquered by the Gothes, Vandals and other strange Nations). In which time he fell sick and dyed in Rome, without leaving any heirs of his body (for he had no children by any wife) when he had held the Empire in a manner eight and twentie yeeres.

Ruly I feare that such as shall reade this History, will reprove me for spending more time about the life of THEODOSIUS, then I use to do in writing the lives of other Emperours; but he that shall duly consider his vertues and excellencies, will iudge that I have been rather too brief, then otherwise. Wherefore holding the time and labour herein spent for well employed, let vs come to speake of his sonnes: in whose Historie I can use no greater breuitie, then in that of their father, considering the great and sundrie accidents which hapned in thirtie yeeres; for ARCADIVS reigned little lesse: and so likewise from henceforth we shall be constrained to write more at large, according to the alterations of estates and other matters, whereof we shall haue occasion to speake.

THEODOSIUS left the Empire in such subiection, so peaceable, and in such quiet to his sonnes ARCADIVS and HONORIUS, that if the wickednes of their tutors had not altered and troubled it, they might easily haue governed and supported the same. But they which were put in trust to see all well ordered, were the cause that the Empire was molested in such manner, as it plainly appeareth they were the occasion of the totall ruine of the Empire, or at the least, the beginning thereof. For as soone as THEODOSIUS was dead, GILDVS who was Governour of Africa, and of the Prouinces there, and RVFFINVS and STILICO in their governments, each of them practised to get the Empire for himselfe, and to dispossesse the sonnes of their foweraigne Lord; and each of them shewed his resolution, as soone as he had opportunity. ARCADIVS with his Governour RVFFINVS went to Constantinople, whither he commanded his fathers dead body to be brought to be buried with great solemnity. HONORIUS remained in Italie, with STILICO: and so they began to raigne without any contradiction or opposition, in the same order as their father had left them. As soone as GILDVS, governour of Africa, vnderstood that THEODOSIUS was dead, he tooke no longer care to conceal his intent, but presently shewed it openly in his actions; and beginning to make himselfe Lord of all that country, nor with the title of Comes or Earle, as vntill then he held it (which as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, was then given to Governours of Prouinces) but as absolute Lord thereof, without acknowledging any subiection or dutie to HONORIUS, or to ARCADIVS.

This GILDVS had a brother whose name was MASTELZERIVS, a very good and loyall Christian, who to the vitermost of his power resisted his brothers proceedings. But GILDVS was already so mightie and of such power, that MASTELZERIVS, whom some call MASTELZ was driven to flie into Italy, and so he remained sole and absolute Lord of all Africa. And GILDVS vnderstanding that his brother was gone to the Emperour (like a cruell tyrant) made two of his sonnes which were his Nephewes and left in Africa, to be slaine, nothing regarding how neere they were to him in blood. MASTELZERIVS came into Italie; and having relation to HONORIUS, or to say better, to STILICO, of what had hapned (whose wisdom and courage was very great, although grounded vpon disloyaltie) had an Army giuen him, and all things thereto needfull; and so was sent against his brother, as against a common enemy. And MASTELZERIVS aswell to performe his duty, as to be revenged of the death of his sonnes, with the greatest expedition he could make, departed towards Africa, although with small forces, trusting in the equitie of his cause, in the friendship he had in that Countrey, and aboue all, in the helpe and power of God, which he daily implored with teares, and most deuout prayers. And as PAVLVS OROSIVS reporteth, comming to an

Iland

Iland called Capraria, neere to Naples, he carried with him from thence certain deuout religious men which liued there; in whose prayers hee reposed greater trust than in the strength of his whole Armie: with which hee made so many fastings and prayers, that it seemed God heard him; for, hee prevailed without any battell or bloodshed, which hapned in this manner:

Coming vpon the Coast of Africa with the small Forces which he brought, with great courage hee went to Land, and entrenched his Armie, and fortified the same, and sent abroad to giue notice of his arrival, and of his power in all places; from whence hee thought his friends and souldiers would haue come to join with him: but his brother came against him with three-score and tenne thousand men, very well appointed. MASTELZERIVS, seeing himself in this distresse, was no way discouraged, neither made any doubt of the victory; assuring himself that to obtain the same it lay in the hand of God, and not in the multitude of men and horses. Having a resolution to passe by a certain Port, thereby to avoid his enemy and brother, but considering with himself how hardly it was to be performed (as PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth) hee made his prayers; and, praying, fell asleepe and dreamed; that within three daies hee should obtain the victory. Heerupon, MASTELZERIVS remained there vntill the third day; and then with inuincible courage sallied out of his trenches against his enemies; who thought of no such matter, but rather daily expected to haue had him in their hands; and, they coming forth against him, he went towards them before his troops, aduising and perswading them to yeeld obedience and not to bear Arms against him: for, he was sent thither by the Emperour, their foweraign Lord. And as an Ensign-bearer would haue charged him, and those that were with him, hee slew them; and, wounding him, smote his colours to the ground: with which onely blowe it pleased God that he subdued and pacified all the rest: for, there was not any one that made any resistance, but all the Ensign-bearers and ordinary souldiers came ouer to him, and yeelded their obedience; and the souldiers of that Countrey fled, and so did his brother: whereby he had the victory, as we may say, miraculously; for, so all men accounted the same.

This GILDVS, seeing himself abandoned by his souldiers, fled to the sea side; and, imbar-king himself aboard a ship, set sail, thinking to haue escaped: and, hauing failed some space, it pleased God that the winde came contrary, and hee for ought he could doo was driven to take Land; where he was taken, and by his brothers commandement had his head stricken off, in requitall of the cruelty which he had shewed to his sonnes, and for his treason against his Lords; MASTELZERIVS remaining without controulment victorious, and Master of his brothers Camp: But afterwards seeing himself mighty (as, of custome, in prosperity men growe insolent) hauing no such fear of God before his eyes as he ought to haue had, hee purposed and attempted to haue the Empire of Africa to himselfe, without any regard of the Emperour HONORIUS, who had sent him thither; which his disloyalty his Captains could not endure, and therefore they slue him. These two brethren being dead, Africa remained for a space in quiet subiection to the Emperours. These warres aforesaid are excellently well written in verse by CLAUDIANVS.

While these matters passed in Africa, ARCADIVS was not idle in Constantinople: for, his Gouerner RVFFINVS, vnwilling any longer to conceal his wicked purposes, fought by all means to bring ARCADIVS into some distresse, that he might vsurp the Empire; and to that end solicited the Goths and other Nations to war against the Empire: Which being discovered, ARCADIVS procuring it, though but a boy, he was slaine by some companies of Italian Souldiers; who, striking off his head, set it ouer one of the gates of Constantinople. This RVFFINVS, as some say, was born in Britannie. Others say, that he was a Frenchman; a man of great judgement, and an excellent Captain; but disloyall and ill disposed: His goods ARCADIVS gaue to an Eunuch of his called EVTROPIVS, who was very priuate with him. Against this RVFFINVS (declaring his doings) the aforesaid CLAUDIANVS wrote two books in heroricall verse; and by his death ARCADIVS remained at liberty, and Lord of his Empire in the East with greater quietnes than his brother HONORIUS: for, STILICO, who governed in the West, was farre more cunning and subtle than RVFFINVS, and was very valiant, and a most expert man of warre; and as he had as wicked or a worse intent, so hee knew better how to couer the same, as well by his wit, as the great power which he enjoyed. For, besides that he was HONORIUS his Gouerner or Tutor, he was twice his father-in-law: for, HONORIUS had his daughter to wife, hauing first been contracted to another daughter of his which died unmarried.

This

MASTELZERIVS victorious against his brother GIL-dus.

Gildus taken and beheaded
by his brother commanderment.

MASTELZERIVS
slain by his followers, and the cause.

Ruffinus, Ar-
cadus Tutor, solicited the Goths to invade
the Empire.

The death of Ruffinus.

Stilico, father in-law to Ho-norius.

97

Each of these men, which Theodosius left for tutors
over his sonnes, fought particularly to make himselfe an Emperour.

The title of Earle to whom is war-giuen.

Gildus put two of his brothers to death.

MASTELZERIVS
went with an Army against his brother Gildus.

Stilico's praefectus and treason against Honorius.

The Alans, and their Originals.

The Originals of the Vandals.

Alaricus King of the Gothes.

The wars of the Gothes.

Radagaisus, King of the Gothes.

The cruel wars which the Gothes made in the Ends of the Empire.

This STILICO was by birth a Vandal, and, having purposed to make a sonne of his called EUCHERIUS Emperor, by his great (although malicious) wit hee concealed the same, untill time of better opportunity: whereto he thought, that the best and most assured way was, To bring the Emperors into necessity, distress and danger, to the end that he onely might bee the mean to repair and recouer all losses. For, he had so proud a heart, and so great power, that he was perswaded, that as often as it pleased him he was able to redress all matters; and that the need which the Emperor should haue of him, would open the way to his purposes. And to that end, by deuices and secret practices, hee solicited many nations to make warres vpon the Empire; as, the Alanes, whose Original I think we haue described: which, according to PROLOMY, was of Germany; and, after MARCELLINVS and PLINY, was of Sarmatia in Europe, who at that time inhabited part of Germany; and the Sueuians, a most fierce people of the same Germany, and the Vandals born also therein; called Vandals, after the name of a Riuer so called in Scythia, from whence they first descended, as is aboue mentioned; which by PLINY and PROLOMY are called Vandalines: and those Burgundians, which were now call Burgonians, of which, CORNELIUS TACITVS saith, that they were of the same Vandals, and all one nation. They were called Burgundians; for that, in times past being driuen out of Germany by DRVSVS and TIBERIUS NERO in the time of AVGVSTVS CAESAR, they were constrained to dwell in the fields, and suburbs of cities called Burgi or Burghs, and therefore took their name of Burgunds or Burgundians; but they were very famous by many authors. He, having moued these nations, and procured them to make warre, sometimes by letters from certain persons which promised to aid and assist them, and sometimes by causing wrongs and violence to bee offered them, the more to incense them, vsed yet another policie; which was, that the Gothes, called Visigothes, which (as we haue said) for the space of 21 yeeres had seru'd in the Emperors pay, and had seru'd faithfully euer since that the Emperor THEODOSIUS had receiued them into his seruice, after the death of ATHANARICIUS their King; he found a meane to cossure them, and that they should be ill-intreated, and had in contempt. Which they took for such a disgrace, and in such scorn, that they presently determined to mutine; and, doing so, chose a Noble man of their owne nation for their King, whose name was ALARICVS, and began to invade the countries of Hungarie and Austria.

Matters standing in these terms, STILICO his drift was, that the Gothes, as men which knew, and had good experience in Italy, should go make a conquest thereof; and, as the other nations (as, Vandals, Alanes and Sueuians) should invade France, he should haue the charge to defend Italy: and HONORIUS, being thus distressed, should defend France in person; where he should be either slain or ouerthrowne, or at the least be so oppressed, that hee overcoming the Gothes, which hee held to bee easily done, would make himself Lord of Rome which was the head of the Empire, and afterwards would do the like by all the rest; which hapned not as he expected: but of his treason arose the destruction and totall decay of the whole Empire, and of himself also. Eight yeeres were expired since the death of THEODOSIUS, and that HONORIUS and ARCADIUS reigned, when STILICO and another Noble-man called AVRELIANVS, were chosen Consuls, and the Visigothes, which were put out of pay, began to make open wars in Hungary and Austria; and, this war in the beginning seeming to bee of small importance, their force and power in short space increased in such manner, that all the world stood in fear of them. For (as PAVLVS OROSIVS an Author of that time, PAVLVS DIACONVS, and others write) as soon as the Gothes were in a mutinie, a certain King, called ADAGASIVS, joynd with them, with two hundred thousand other Gothes; all, fierce men of war. But it is true, that they write not how or from whence came so great a number of men; neither what this King ADAGASIVS was. It seemeth that then it was a thing so publicly knowne, that no man was ignorant or stood in doubt thereof; and therefore needles to bee repeated, by reason whereof we are now ignorant thereof; but they most constantly affirm, the number of the men of war to be such as is already specified.

ALARICVS and ADAGASIVS coming together, without finding any resistance or force able to offend them, ouerran and spoiled all Thracia, Hungarie, Austria, Slauonia, Dalmatia, and the Frontiers thereof; in such sort, as it seemed that duels, and not men, had passed that way: for, they left nothing standing but the earth and the air; which, SILVIUS ROMVS, who liued in that time, writing to PAVLVS and EVSTACHIUS, plainly expresth in these words: The brute beasts haue also endured the wrath of the Lord in this warre; for, the cities being laid waste, and the people thereof put to the sword, the like is done by the very fields; so that they lie

lic bare, desolate, and deserte; whereof the Prouinces of Thracia and Slauonia; and the countrie wherein I was borne beare true record: whereby it seemeth that nothing remaineth but the earth, the aire, the bushes and the woods; for all the rest is spoiled and destroyed. After these inhumane spoils, ALARICVS & ADAGASIVS resolved to come into Italy, diuiding their Armies into sundry troupes: for it was impossible that so huge an Armie should be able to march together. When these newes were knowne in Rome, there fell so great a terror among the Citizens; and generally ouer all Italy, as they all held themselves for lost and dead men.

ADAGASIVS being arrived in Italy, and having passed the Apennine mountaines, came to the mountaines Rifole in Tuscanie. There came in the behalfe of the Empire, against ADAGASIVS, two Captaines which seru'd the Emperor HONORIUS: the one of which was called VLDIRIVS, and the other SARRA, with a great number of Gothes and Hunnes in the Emperors pay, which made head against ADAGASIVS, and stopped the passages in the mountaines against him; and cut off his victuals, whereof he stood in great want, considering the greatness of his Army. These Hunnes and Gothes which came to the aid of the Romans, PAVLVS OROSIVS, who, as we may say, was an eye witness, and also PAVLVS DIACONVS and others write of their coming: but they write not how, or from whence they came, although it be already declared from whence they were: but neuertheless they were a great defence of Italy, so that the Lord abated the pride of ADAGASIVS, through hunger, thirst, and the want of necessaries. But herein Authors disagree: for PROSPERVS saith, that ADAGASIVS was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, STILICO leading a great Armie against him. But PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS, after they haue spoken of the two Captains VLDIRIVS & SARRA, say that ADAGASIVS and his Army were ouerthrowne through pure hunger and thirst, without any battaile, and that they were taken prisoners like sheep. But howsoever it hapned, for it might be that there was a battaile also; the truth is, that he and his Army were ouerthrowne in this Iourney, and all taken prisoners by HONORIUS his Souldiers: in such sort, that S. AVGVSTINE who liued in that time, whose reports are to be beleueed, in his booke de Ciuitate Dei, affirmeth, that in one only day ADAGASIVS lost about one hundred thousand men; and all Authors affirm, that a great number of them dyed of hunger: and that there was not a Souldier among the Romans but had a droue of Captiues, as if they had been sheepe; and that they were so cheap, that for a peece of gold, which is now worth but a ducat, a man might haue bought a whole company of them. There fell so great a mortality and sickness amongst them, that within short space they in a manner all died. And their King & Captain ADAGASIVS was likewise taken prisoner and put to death by HONORIUS: whose vertue and valour is much commended in this action; by PAVLVS OROSIVS; but (as by the Histories it appeareth) he seemed to be of very little worth, a very negligent and carelesse Prince, chiefly in matters concerning the wars, and at that time lay in Ravenna where he held his Court, which in those daies was a great and principall Citie. His brother ARCADIUS lay in Constantinople, from whence he sent ayd and succours to his brother. This feare being past, within a little while after ALARICVS entred Italy, who was a man of greater iudgement and courage then ADAGASIVS, and his souldiers better trained, and of greater experience; against whom STILICO courageously opposed himselfe, and the warre began between them in the marches of Ravenna, where ALARICVS was ouerthrowne in battel by STILICO: for in those daies, STILICO for valour and policy in the wars, had not his equal in the world. But his purposes being such as we haue said, he would neuer wholly vanquish ALARICVS; but sometimes would make shew to be carelesse, and leaue open the waies for him to passe: so as ALARICVS perceived that STILICO had no meaning to ouerthrow him; and this war continued between them (as some Authors write) the space of three yeeres.

About the same time, the Alanes, Hunnes, Vandales and Burgonians entred the territories of the Empire, making way vpon the bankes sides of the Riuer of Rhine, whereof a new feare seized the hearts of the people. When ALARICVS vnderstood these newes, he sent to HONORIUS to haue peace, and some country in France, wherein he and his people might inhabit, promising to defend that province against those Nations, and therewith aduertising him that STILICO did cunningly prolong the wars against him. The Emperor beginning to be ialous of STILICO, and notwithstanding that he was also certified by others of his treason: yet for the present hee diffembled the matter, and agreed with ALARICVS, granting him his request; and taking security of him, sent him into France. Whereof it was imagined, that two great benefits would haue ensued, the one was, the peace and quiet of Italy through his absence; the other,

Radagaisus came into Italy.

Vldimis and Sarras Captaines for Honorius against Radagaisus.

The Hunnes aided the Romans.

Radagaisus & all his Host defeated.

A Passage and wonderfull accident.

The death of Radagaisus.

Ravenna.

Alaricus came into Italy.

Stilico the most excellent Captaine of his time.

The coming of the Alanes, Hunnes, Vandales and Burgonians.

Alaricus becometh Alaricus and Honorius the Emperor.

the defence of France, wherein the Vandales, Hunnes, Alanes and Burgonians were already entered; which all men affirmed to be about two hundred thousand men. But STILICO his treason spoiled all: for notwithstanding that he did that which HONORIUS commanded, in suffering ALARICVS and the Gothes to begin their journey in peace, and gave them such things as were needefull, accordingly as the Emperor had appointed; yet as a man which altogether repined against peace, and chiefly that to ALARICVS should be committed the defence of France, he resolved to breake and scatter all those troupes; and had such meanes to effect it, as I will tell you, whereof ensued his owne totall destruction, and the ruine of the whole Empire: which hapned in this manner.

ALARICVS, free from any suspicion (according to the agreement) went for France: but STILICO secretly practised with a Captaine in his Armie which was a Jew, whose name was SAVL, that he with his companie, faining some displeasure, or particular quarrell, vpon an Easter day (when the Gothes mistrusting nothing being Christians celebrated diuine service) should then set vpon them, and kill as many of them as he could: for by these meanes hee was assured that the wars would begin againe, and therewith would his power and authoritie also begin, which with the peace was at an end. The Jew put this secret practice in execution, and the Gothes being suddainly set vpon, receiued great losse: but he presently paid for it; for the Gothes, in great haste putting themselves in Armes, fought with him; and there was SAVL slaine with the greatest part of his souldiers. ALARICVS being herewith highly offended, returned against STILICO his Army: and STILICO faining to stand in great feare, made shew not to dare to fight, but sent to the Emperor for new succors; who being aduertised of what STILICO thought to bee most secret, and what had hapned concerning the Jew SAVL, and standing in great feare of STILICO, sent certaine persons to the Armie, who finding oportunitie should kill both him and his sonne: which was performed accordingly, and his treason was discouered, and the cause wherefore they were put to death. But herein, although the Emperor HONORIUS vsed a good policy, yet he was carelesse in providing for the rest: for he sent not any such General to command his Armie as the case required. So as King ALARICVS either beleueed that the iniurie which SAVL had done him, was by the Emperours consent, or else he knew and saw his time and oportunitie: and thereupon finding no resistance, marched directly with his whole Armie towards Rome, the head and Emprise of the world. And making most cruell warre by fire and sword, he drew neere vnto it, in the year one thousand, one hundred and threecore, after the foundation thereof: but the Romanes standing vpon their guard, he could not take it at the first assault; wherefore he besieged it, which siege continued two yeeres. Of the besieging of Rome, and how ALARICVS took it in the end, many authors write; but in what manner it was taken, and what exploits were done during the time of the siege, they write so bricfly as in a manner they say nothing thereof. But that it was taken; PAVLVS OROSIVS in his seventh booke, PAVLVS DIACONVS in the life of HONORIUS, IOHANNES in his Historie of the Gothes, S. AVGVSTINE in his booke De Civitate Dei, S. HIEROME in his epistle ad Principium, as a matter which hapned in his time, auerre the same: and so doth S. ISIDORE in his History of the Gothes. PROCOPIVS, a Greeke Authour, and others of later time, as I could gather out of their writings, say, that ALARICVS marching with his Army towards Rome, with a resolution to doe that which afterwards he did; as to a Christian, although fierce and cruell, there came a Monk which very boldly (ALARICVS giuing him audience) admonished and counselled him to desist from his enterprise, and to consider that he was a Christian, and that for the loue of God he should moderate his furie, and not seeme to reioyce in the slaughter of men, and the shedding of humane blood; and that that Rome had not done him any offence, he should not goe thither. To whom they say, that ALARICVS made this answer: I let thee vnderstand, man of God, that I goe not of my own will and desire against the great Citie of Rome: but I assure thee, that there daily appeareth vnto me a man, who doth vrge and importune me thereto, saying, Get thee to Rome and destroy it euen to the ground. Whereat the religious man being greatly amazed, durst say no more. This I finde written in the Annales of Constantinople annexed to the history of ETROPIVS: whereby it plainly appeareth, that the affliction of Rome was the especial punishment of God. PAVLVS OROSIVS affirmeth the same, saying, That as God drew iust Let out of Sodom, when he inflicted so great punishment on that City; so drew he Pope INNOCENT out of Rome when ALARICVS came to besiege it; who went to Rauenna to see the Emperor HONORIUS. Yet PLATINA writes, this misfortune hapned in the time of Pope ZOZIMVS: but but it may be that it began in the time of the one, and ended in the time of the other; S. HIEROME liued also in those daies out of Rome, being then gone to doe penance in Bethlehem.

But returning againe to the matter, ALARICVS held the citie of Rome, strictly besieged, where betweene the besieged, were many skirmishes, and many men were slaine in those two yeeres space; and the famine was so great in Rome, as they endured it with so great patience and constancie, that Saint HIEROME saith, that when the citie was taken; there were few men therein that could be slaine or taken prisoners, for that extreme hunger had consumed them; and had constrained them (in horrible manner) to eat the flesh the one of the other; so as the mother did not spare the child which she held at her breast, but through hunger, lodged the same againe in her wombe, from whence not long before it issued. These are the words of Saint HIEROME. But in what manner Rome was taken, authors agree not: for PROCOPIVS saith; that ALARICVS seeing he could not take it by force, resolved to vse some stratagem; and faining that he would raise the siege, made a kinde of truce, and secretly sent into Rome three hundred prisoners in which he reposed much trust, having first instructed them what they had to doe; setting them at libertie and promising them great rewards. The which one day at a certain hower, making shew as though they went to see the citie, mett together at a port according to their appointment, which port they took and held in despite of those which had the guard; and the Gothes running thither vpon a sodaine, entred there and surprised the citie. Others affirme, that by the commandment and policie of a woman, which was a great Ladie of that citie, a port was giuen to the Gothes, at which they entred. And that she did this of pittie, to see the great famine which raged within the citie, imagining that the enemies could not doe so great hurt in Rome, as the Romans did to themselves, as we haue said. Some authors there are, which say, that the citie of Rome was taken by force, for that those which were within it, were not able to man the walles, or to make any longer resistance. But howsoever it was, all authors affirm that ALARICVS before he entred the same, commanded on pain of death, that no man should be so hardie, as to touch any of those which had withdrawne themselves into the Churches and temples, chiefly of Saint PETER and Saint PAUL Apostles; which was afterwards duly obserued. But all theretof the citie was robbed and spoiled, and many thousands of people slaine, and many taken prisoners; among which was a sister of the Emperours, whose name was PLACIDIA, whom ATHAVALPHVS one of the principall men among the Gothes, and neere kinsman to King ALARICVS took, and had in his keeping; and afterwards married her. The next day after they had taken the citie, in disgrace and disdaine of the Empire, and to make themselves merrie, they chose one ATRIVS for Emperour of Rome; and the same day they carried him vp and downe the freeces in the habit of an Emperour; and the next day they made him serue like a slave. Three or fower daies the Gothes remained in Rome: which being past, setting fire in sundrie parts of the citie, their King ALARICVS and they departed.

All this while the Emperour HONORIUS was in Rauenna, so carelesse, that when the newes was sodainly brought to him that Rome was lost (nothing remembering the citie whereof he was Emperour) he thought that they had told him of a French-man, whom they called ROMA, which was one of those which were maintained by the Emperours to fight man to man, after the manner of Gladiators in Rome: whereat the Emperour greatly marvelled that hee should be so soone dead or taken; for it was but a little while since that he saw him fight with others: whereby it plainly appeareth how carelesse hee was. This was the first time that Rome, after that it grew to bee mightie, was taken by Barbarous Nations: for when the Gauls tooke it, it was of no such account; being in the beginning but of small strength and power.

After this time that ALARICVS tooke it, the Roman Empire daily declined, and the Citie of Rome was oftentimes taken and destroyed: whereof we will declare the most notable accidents, to the end that the Reader may know and iudge how weak, and of what small power the Empires and mighty Kingdomes of the World are; and how that Rome which was the Queene and Emperesse of the vniuersall World, in time became a slave to all the Nations thereof. ALARICVS departing from Rome would haue failed into Sicilia; but a tempest returned him into Italie, and hee dyed in the City of Cosenza; and the Gothes after that he was dead, chose ATHAVALPHVS for their King, who (as we sayd) married with PLACIDIA, the Emperour THODOSIVS his daughter. Which ATHAVALPHVS as soon as he was

Famine in Rome
in the time of the siege.

The taking of Rome.

Placidia sister
to the Emperour Honorius taken prisoner.

Rome set on fire
by the Gothes.

When the Roman Empire began to decline.

The death of Alaricus King of the Gothes.

Athavalphus made King of the Gothes in place of Alaricus.

Alaricus going for France.

The Treason of Stilico.

The death of Stilico.

Alaricus returned against Rome, besieged
it took it.

A vision appeared to Alaricus.

Athaulphus would have destroyed Rome, but forbore to oust the emperour of his wife Placidia.

King returned towards Rome, with a determination to have wholly destroyed the same, to have rooted out the name thereof, and to have left it desolate; which his cruell resolution he altered at his wives intercession, who with teares entreated the same. When A TH A V L P H V S departed with his Armie from Rome, it is not written whether he placed therein any gouernour, or left it at libertie to the Emperour. For his wife P L A C I D I A was a meane to bring H O N O R I V S and A TH A V L P H V S to some agreement, and concluded a truce between them. And A TH A V L P H V S consummating his nuptial rites with her, which vntill then were not solemnized, he went out of Italie: and marching with his Armie through France, to the citie of Barcelona in Spain, and taking the same and the territorie thereof, he staid there a certaine space. Whac end he made, you shall heare hereafter.

During the time of these troubles in Italie, A R C A D I V S liued in peace in Constantinople, and in the easterne parts free from troubles: for authors write not of any wars of importance which troubled him, or of any aduersitie that befell him; for it pleased God to lay his scourge vpon the prouinces of the West onely: and so hauing reigned thirteene yeeres, in the one and thirtieth of his age, he died in Constantinople. Others say, that he held the Empire a great while longer, alledging that he died after the taking of Rome: but P R O S P E R V S and others asseme, that he died before. Some say, that it was in the yeere of our Lord foure hundred and tenne: others say, foure hundred and thirteene. He seeing death neere at hand, and that he could not liue, and that his sonne T H E O D O S I V S whom he left behinde him for his heire, was but eight yeeres old, he tooke a dangerous course; but it proved very profitable, which was: That leaving his son C A S A R, and his succesor, he ordained by his last will H I S D I G R D V S King of Perfia and of Parthia for his tutor; who at that time was a friend and in league with the Empire; notwithstanding that the house of Perfia was euer a capitall enemy thereof. When the King of Perfia vnderstood what A R C A D I V S had ordained, he accepted of the gouernement and of the protection of the child, and speedily sent one A N T I O C H V S an excellent man, and a great soldier, to Constantinople: who with the good will and consent of H O N O R I V S, who was not a little glad of the friendship of Perfia, gouerned the Easterne Empire, with great fidelitie, and discretion; and so maintained the same in peace and iustice, vntill that young T H E O D O S I V S, sonne to the Emperour A R C A D I V S, came to age. A R C A D I V S being dead, whether before or after the sacke of Rome, the name of Emperour rested in H O N O R I V S, and in his Nepheue young T H E O D O S I V S.

A relation of what happened after the death of the Emperour A R C A D I V S.

ALL things being in such confusion, as the Gothes, Vandals, and other nations invaded and made a conquest of the territories of the Empire; and the Emperour H O N O R I V S lying in Caenenna, taking no good order for the same: In the Ile of Britannie also a great Lord borne in the same land, whose name was G R A T I A N V S rebelled, and took vpon him the title and enignes of Emperour, with the consent of some of the men of warre in the same land. But his presumption had an euill end: for within few daies after, the same men of warre slew him. And they setting all duties apart, determined to make an other souldier among themselves Emperour, whose name was C O N S T A N T I N E, who was a man of greater courage and of more witte, then G R A T I A N V S; who drawing all the Armie out of England, went into France, with a conceit to haue made himselfe Lord thereof; and to that end, made peace with the Vandales, Sueuians and Alanes, which alreadie were in France marching towards Spain: for the Burgonians made their abode in that part which is now called Burgundie.

This peace betweene C O N S T A N T I N E and these thre nations could not well be concluded: for C O N S T A N T I N E drew to him many souldiers of France; and growing mightie made a full account to become Lord of Spain also, before that those Barbarians should be able to come thither. Whereupon he sent certaine gouernours, with a competent number of souldiers thither, and many townes in Spain were resolu'd to obey his commandement, holding it better to serue him, then those nations which were marching thitherwards. But two Noble men, rich, and of great authoritie, whose names were (as saith P A V L V S D I A C O N V S) D I D I M V S and V E R R O D I A N V S borne in Valentia, wishtood them, and found meanes to driue them out of Spain. And thereupon with the aide of their kindred, friends, and acquaintance they went to the Pyrenean Mountaines, with a resolution not onely to defend the passages against C O N S T A N T I N E S Armie, but also against all the other nations before mentioned, vntill all meanes to retaine Spain in the obedience and seruite of the Emperour H O N O R I V S; which they continued a long time, although with great trouble, effusion of blood, and danger.

and

C O N S T A N T I N E, holding himselfe herewith greatly affronted, assembled together a certaine number of the most actiue and best tried souldiers that hee had, and made his sonne C O N S T A N S their Commander, who by some authors is called C O N S T A N T I V S; whom for this purpose, he took out of a Monasterie wherein he was a Monke, and making him C A S A R, sent him against the two brethren. His people were of such power and so expert in the warres, as they overthrew, and slue the two Spanish brethren, and entred Spain, which was the ruine thereof: for the men of warre which came with C O N S T A N S, after they had spoiled the countrie, and had vsed all kinde of hostilitie, returned to the Pyrenean Mountaines; and driuing the Spaniards from thence which garded the passages, took vpon them the defense thereof, and were well able to haue performed the same. But C O N S T A N S going to Arles a citie in France to speake with his father, who then lay there, those which had the garde in the Mountaines came to an agreement with the Vandales and the other strange nations, and sold to them the passages, suffering those Alanes, Sueuians, and Vandales to passe into Spain: who made such havoc and committed such spoiles, as can hardly be expressed: especially neere vnto the Pyrenean hills where they found greatest resistance. From thence they marched into the maine land to the citie of Valentia (against which they bare an old grudge) which citie they ruined, and the countrie round about it, and then went to the citie of Astorga, which they entred by force; and passing further made great spoile in all Galicia. Afterwards crossing through Castile, they came to the citie of Toledo, which by reason of the situation and naturall strength thereof, and the valour of the inhabitants, they could not take; notwithstanding that they besieged it for a certain space, but were constrained to raise their siege, with shame and dishonor, from that citie which for wars and feates of Armes hath euer been famous in that countrie. By whose example many townes in Spain continued their allegiance to H O N O R I V S; notwithstanding that hee sent neither souldiers, capitaines, nor reliefe. This people did much harme in the territorie of Tolosa and passing forwards they marched along the riuer Tagus, still spoyleing the countrie vntill they came to the citie of Lisbon, in Portugall, which in those daies also was very famous: and giuing an assault thereto, it was so well defended by the inhabitants, that they could not take it, but came to a composition: where they receiving a great quantitie of treasure they raised their siege, and returned the same way they came, making warre on euerie side. And by reason of a great famine and scarcitie in the countrie (as O R O S I V S writeth) they laid downe their Armes for a space, and fell to tilling of the land, as inhabitants of the countrie, diuiding what they had gotten amongst those nations, and their capitaines or Kings, being Vandales, Sueuians, and Alanes.

The Empire being in this estate, A TH A V L P H V S and the Gothes possessing Narbona, Barcelona, and the marches thereof, which in name were confederates with H O N O R I V S, the tyrant C O N S T A N T I N E and his sonnes enjoyed the rest of France. The young Emperour T H E O D O S I V S being a child, was bred vp in Constantinople, vnder the protection of the King of Perfia, and of Antiochus, whom he had sent. But of his house and person a very vertuous and honorable Noble man took charge, whose name was A N T H I M I V S, who was his Pretorian Prefect. This child was bred vp in all learning, and became a vertuous prince and a good Christian. His Uncle H O N O R I V S, who then lay in Caenenna, be thought himselfe how he might make the Western Empire, as free from the slauey of these tyrants and barbarous nations, as the East; and to that end he made a worthie man, whose name was C O N S T A N T I V S, Generall of his Armie against those tyrants and Barbarians. Which C O N S T A N T I V S vntill then was an Earle, borne in Rome, defended of the Noble and auncient Romanes; who like a perfect Roman, with a pickt and selected Armie, entred France, and fighting with the Emperour C O N S T A N T I N E the tyrant, overthrew him, and besieged him in the citie of Arles, and at length getting him into his hands, smote off his head. And it fell out so happily that within few daies after that the death of C O N S T A N T I N E was published, young C O N S T A N S the sonne of the said C O N S T A N T I N E, whom his father had made C A S A R, was slaine in the citie of Vienna in France, by the hands of a capitaine of his

A 3

Constantine made for foure Confians Cap. Ist, and sent him into Spain.

Strange nation ouerfished Spain.

Little

Anthemius was gouernour of the young Emperour Theodisius.

Honorius made Constantius generall of his Armie.

Constantine put the tyrant Constantine to death.

Acadivus made the King of Persia tutor of his son.

Antiochus a Persian, gouernour of the young Emperour Theododius.

Gratianus rebelled and took the title of Emperour in England.

The souldiers slew Gratianus and in his place made Constantine Emperour.

The Vandales, Sueuians, and Alanes took their way towards Spain.

Didimus and Verodiamus oppose themselves against Constantine.

his whose name was GERONCIUS. And the same GERONCIUS, who also sought to haue made himselfe a tyrant, and to haue created one MAXIMVS a friend of his Emperour, was also slaine by those fouldiers which in England rebelled with CONSTANTINE; with a resolution to returne to the service of HONORIVS. GERONCIUS being dead, they dispoiled MAXIMVS of his Imperiall robes, and sent him in exile into Spaine. In this manner was France freed from these tyrants, by this worthy man CONSTANTINE; and the Armie reduced to the service of the right Emperour HONORIVS. After this, HONORIVS speedily sent Captaines and souldiers into Britanny, which held for CONSTANTINE, from the first beginning of his tyranny, who reduced the same to obedience and subjection. In France, a man of great parentage and authority in that Countrey (as PAVLVS ROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS affirme) sought to make himselfe Emperour; but he was presently slaine: and in the like manner another brother of his, called SEBASTIAN; both which rebelled (as it seemed) without any occasion or reason, but only that they desired to die with the name and title of Emperors.

Constantius
his victories.

The designs of Aethulphus.

Attalus called Emperour.

Heraclianus overthrow and rooke Attalus prisoner.

Heraclianus
rebelled in Africa.

An incredible great Nauike by sea.

Heraclianus
came into Italy.

Heraclianus
his flamell light.

CONSTANTIVS Generall for the Emperour HONORIVS, being thus powerfull in France, ATHALPHVS King of the Gothes, who lay in Barcelona, and was Lord of all the countrey round about; and had there liued in peace and quiet the space of three yeeres; at the intreaty of PLACIDIA to whom he was married, which was HONORIVS' sister; began to stand in some feare of the power of the Emperour and of his Generall CONSTANTIVS, knowing that they had fortified the Alpes, to the end hee should no more returne into Italy: Whereupon he resolved to attempt to make himselfe Lord of all Spaine; and perswaded a Roman Captaine, whose name was ATTALVS, to take vpon him the name and title of Emperour; and to goe with a fleet which he would giue him, to seile vpon the Countrey of Andalusia, which was then called Beitica; and to do the like, if he should be able, in Africa; and hee would also make warre in his owne person. ATTALVS, very vnwisely, accepted his offer, and presently sent into Africa an Armie with Iudges and Gouernours, as though he had been the peaceable Emperour thereof; and began to make warre in Spaine. Against whom, HONORIVS sent a wife and a valiant Captaine called HERACLIVS: who, driving all ATTALVS his Iudges and Gouernours out of Africa, leauing the Countrey in peace, with a Naue came to seeke him himselfe; and, finding him, fought with him in a battaile by Sea, and ouercame him. And he, fleeing to the coast of Spaine, was taken by the Spaniards, and sent to CONSTANTIVS, who was Generall for HONORIVS, who was then in France; who presently sent him prisoner to HONORIVS, and HONORIVS made his hand to be stricken off, and sent him in exile into the Isle of Lipari, nere vnto Sicilia. To HERACLIVS for the victorie which he obtained against him, was giuen the Consulshippe and the Gouernement of Africa. But as in prosperity, pride and ambition increaseth, and men are then farre more insolent, then in time of aduersitie: So this HERACLIVS, seeing himselfe fauoured and in great authority, thought that he might also be an Emperour. And as he was in possession of Africa, PAVLVS ROSIVS writeth, that taking another Captaine for his sonne in law and companion in his rebellion, whose name was SABINVS, a most subtle fellow and very valiant, he assembled (to goe into Italy against HONORIVS and to make a conquest thereof) the greatest Naue of all manner of shippes that I euer read of. For ROSIVS affirmeth, that he gathered together (if there be no error in the figures) foure thousand and seuentie sailes of all sorts little and great; which without comparison was the greatest in number that euer was seen vpon the Sea: For we doe not read that XERXES or ALEXANDER euer armed so great a Naue.

With this great fleet, fraught with souldiers, armes and victuals, he came to the coast of Italy, and set his men on land, to march directly to Rome, being many in number, but not so well experienced and trained as were the Romans; who by HONORIVS his commandement attended their coming, led by a good Generall called MARINVS, with the title and dignity of an Earle: who had raunged his Romanes in very good order, with a resolution to die or to overcome, and not to suffer themselves to be besieged, as they were by ALARICVS. HERACLIVS, who thought to haue amazed the world with the name and number of his fleet, and that he should haue found no resistance, was so discouraged when he saw MARINVS his Armie, that he presently fled to the Sea; and embarking himselfe aboard one of his shippes, returned by flight into Africa with that only shippe; from whence he came with so many as is before said.

After

After that HERACLIVS was arrived, and his base cowardise discovered, the ordinary Garisons vpon a day mutined and slew him. And his sonne in law and companion SABINVS, altering his resolution, fled to Constantinople to entreate the yong Emperour THEODOSIVS, nephew to HONORIVS, to take compassion of him: from whence within a little while after he was brought to HONORIVS; and hauing his life graunted, was condemned to perpetual exile. So through the wisdom and good fortune of HONORIVS, all these tyrants were defeated which rebelled against him, the which we haue already related in as plain manner, as I could possibly; which truly was not without great toyle and difficultie: for matters which past both in the time of ARCADIVS & of HONORIVS were so many & so diuers; and oft so many accidents happened together, and Historiographers treat of them so confusedly; that in writing them, I am much troubled, as well in collecting and abbreviating them, as in relating them; in such sort as the readers may vnderstand and comprehend the same; and to recite them in order as they passed, one before another, which hath been my principall care from the beginning; and, by the grace of God, shall be, vntill I haue ended.

All the victories and aboue recited good fortunes of HONORIVS, after so many calamities and warres, which he had in his time, Authors attribute to the care which he had of the Christian faith and religion. For in those times through the diligence and endeuour of a Captaine of his called MARCELLINVS, with the assistance of his great Captaine CONSTANTIVS, he procured concord and vnitie in all the Churches of Africa, and of other Provinces wherein were many Schismes, and erroneous opinions concerning the Christian Faith. And truly S. AVGVSTINE was a good meane to bring this to passe, who at that time was Bishoppe of Hippo in Africa; which the Emperour CHARLES the first in his journey and conquest of Tunis took from the powerfull and cruell tyrant BARBAROSSA; but his sonne PHILIP the second within few yeeres after againe lost the same.

HONORIVS then seeing himselfe free from those tyrants, and the most part of the Provinces of his Empire in peace, and obedient, resolved to driue the strange and barbarous Nations out of those Countreies which they held in Spaine and France about Narbonne; thinking it best to begin with the Gothes, which were the most powerfull and warlike people of all the other Nations, and possessed such part of Spaine, as is aforesaid: for these being defeated, he held it an easie matter to make an end of the rest. King ATHALPHVS, as hee deereley loued his wife PLACIDIA, much desired peace with HONORIVS, and so by all meanes fought the same: Which when his souldiers perceived, whome of a farre contrary opinion, they so hated him that they slew him; but Authors set not downe in what manner. And they presently chose a great man among themselves for their King, whose name was SGERICVS; and for that they suspected him as they did ATHALPHVS, they handled him in the same manner, as they did their last King. Hauing slaine these two Kings, they chose one WALIA for their King, conceiuing that he would be a great enemy to the Romanes, with whom they desired to haue cruell warres; they hauing the Emperours sister PLACIDIA in their power who at that time was a Widow, whome they entreated very honourably and honestly.

This WALIA beginning to gouerne his kingdom he held it for necessary and found counsel to haue peace and friendshipp with HONORIVS: but taking warning by his predecessors (to satisfie his people) he rigged vp a great fleet, which he sent to make a conquest of Africa, which held for HONORIVS; and as it pleased God so to worke for HONORIVS, without his assistance, such a tempest tooke them vpon the Sea, that the whole fleet was in a manner lost and cast away. Which misfortune, together with the newes of the coming of CONSTANTIVS, Generall of the Emperours Armie with great power, did much temper the fiercenesse and furie of the Gothes; And WALIA tooke so good order with them, as of their owne accord and consent, a treaty of peace was made with HONORIVS, which was concluded vpon condition, that PLACIDIA should be rendred to the Emperour; and that WALIA and his forces should faithfully aide CONSTANTIVS, to driue the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueuians out of Spaine, who had already made themselves Lords of the greatest part thereof. This being concluded, hostages were giuen in the behalf of WALIA, and PLACIDIA was deliuered, whom HONORIVS afterwards gaue to wife to CONSTANTIVS, in reward of his seruices and victories obtained by him; and making him CÆSAR, he proclaimed him for his successor. And then began CONSTANTIVS his warres in Spaine against the Barbarians, King WALIA assilting & seruing there in with his Visigothes, as we wil presently declare.

A a 4

While

The death of Heraclianus.

The Gothes slew their King Aethulphus Sgericus King of the Gothes slain by his sonne Walia
King of the Gothes.

Honorius made peace with Walia King of the Gothes.

Constantius
made Cæsar and sent Genrall into Spain
against the Vandales.

Andalusia is called after the Vandals.

Constantinus
his victory against the Alanes

Honorius went to Constantinople.

Tartallus re-billed in Rome.

Attalus rebeld, and took upon him the name of Emperour.

Honorius and Constantinus
return into Italy

Attalus banish'd

Honorius made Constantinus his coadjutor in the Empire.

The death of Constantinus.

Ecivus made Generall in Spain against the Vandals, and the rest

While these things (whereof we have spoken) were a going, the Barbarians were in possession of the greatest part of Spain; especially the Vandals, who had conquered a great part of Belica; from whom that Countrey took the name of Vandalusia: and afterwards, in process of time, leaving out the letter V, it came to be called Andalusia. And the Suevians and Alanes held Merida; and a great part of Lusitania (which is now Extremadura) and part of Portugall; and in Galicia and Leon they had enjoyed a great part from the beginning, and had divided these Countreies among them by lot. CONSTANTIVS the Imperiall Generall being com into Spain, and with him the Gothes, according to the agreement, the first warre they made was against the Alanes, neer to the City of Merida; where was fought between them a very cruell battell: wherein the Alanes were overthrowne, and CONSTANTIVS had the victory; and the King of the Alanes, called ACHAC, was slain in battell. This victory obtained by CONSTANTIVS, strook so great a terror into the hearts of the rest of the barbarous Nations, that they presently in great humility sued for peace, and sent to intreat HONORIVS to grant them truce, and some place in Spain wherein they might live.

While these accidents hapned in Spain, HONORIVS went to Constantinople to visit the Eastern parts, where his Nephew the yong THEODOSIVS commanded, who was now com to riper yeers: and, being at liberty free from his Tutors, there fell out some controuersie between him and the King of Persia. And it hapned, that as CONSTANTIVS was buied in the wars of Spain, and HONORIVS out of Italy; an eminent man, born and inhabiting in Rome, being of the ancient Nobility, named TARTALLVS, assisted by a great part of the Romane people, and by many Towns in Italy, rebelled, and took the name and title of Emperour, and began to leuie souldiers: but the loyall Subjects which held with HONORIVS, fighting with him, he was by them overthrowne and slain. But, disloyalty and treachery was then so much in vife, that another whose name was ATTALVS did the like; who, putting on the Imperiall Robes, and taking the Ensignes, was called Emperour, and beganne to leuie great Forces in Italy.

When the Imperiall Generall CONSTANTIVS, being in Spain, heard these newes, after the victory aforesaid, putting the Vandals, Suevians, and Alanes in good hope to obtain what they desired, and giuing it out that he went into Italy to conferre thereof with the Emperour, the better to keep them in peace in his absence; he left Spain, and came into Italy: the like did the Emperour HONORIVS, who had been aduertised thereof in Constantinople. When the coming of HONORIVS and CONSTANTIVS was knowne in Rome, the people grew into a great fury; and, apprehending the Tyrant ATTALVS, sent him to Ravenna to the Emperour HONORIVS, whither CONSTANTIVS was already com with his wife PLACIDIA; where ATTALVS, by HONORIVS his commandement had his hand stricken off, and was banisht to Constantinople: wherein, HONORIVS in the opinion of the world shewed too great patience and clemency.

HONORIVS being in Ravenna, whither his brother-in-law CONSTANTIVS CESAR was already com, and having consideration of his worthy seruices, and how profitable he had been to the Empire, made him with very great solemnity to be called AVGVSTVS, Emperour, and his equall and companion in the Empire of the West, and made a long set Oration in praise of his vertues: and there the two Emperours by mutual consent, to the end that WALLA King of the Gothes should continue in their seruice, consigned vnto him the City of Tholose in the Kingdome of France, with all the Countrey neer adjacent, called Aquitania, which they then named Galcomia, and is now called Galcomia.

After the Feasts, and Coronation of CONSTANTIVS, HONORIVS went to Rome to pacifie some tumults which were there: and the new Emperour CONSTANTIVS, resolving to go into Spain to make an end of the warre which hee had begun, commanded souldiers to be mustered. Surely, the valour and wisdom of this excellent Captain and Emperour was such, that, if God had permitted him life, hee had freed Spain from those barbarous Nations: but death staied his journey, so as hee neuer came thither. Whereof when HONORIVS was aduertised, he was extremely sorry, and in his place sent into Spain a famous and valiant Captain called ECIVS, who took charge of the Armie which CONSTANTIVS had leuied; and, marching thitherwards, by the way hee overthrowne the Burgonians which attempted to haue entered France. The like hee did by the Franks, who afterwards entred and inhabited there. And being com into Spain, his principall care was to finde out the Alanes: which after their overthrowe by CONSTANTIVS, did not chuse them any King, but joynd with the Suevians, who

who were Lords of all the Countrie about Lisbon. But, as soon as they knew that CONSTANTIVS was dead, they returned to Merida; and the Vandals and Suevians were now grown so proud, that they would neither require nor accept of peace; but came to aid the Alanes, and began to make warre against such Cities as held for the Emperour. ECIVS being come into Spain, seeing that all made head against him, and hauing no sufficient Armie to encounter them, protracted the time for certain daies, and leuied more forces, which by HONORIVS (without reason) was imputed to him for cowardize, and he sent the Earl CASTIVS to bee Generall and his Successor, displacing ECIVS from his charge. But CASTIVS, perceiving how the world went, approved the judgement of ECIVS; and in the same manner prolonged the warres, vntill that BONIFACIVS, who was Gouerner of Africa (whom we reade, Saint AVGVSTINE for his vertue to haue much loved) came into Spain to his aid, bringing verie good troops with him: and they two together began the warre, and obtained many notable victories against the Barbarians; and so handled the matter, that it was held for certain that they would haue freed the Countrey. But this command is such a thing as can neuer be well shared: for, these two excellent Captains fell at such variance, that BONIFACIVS would not stay any longer, but returned to the gouernment of Africa (as PROSPERVVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS haue written; yet EVTHROPIVS differs from them) and CASTIVS remaining alone, the Emperours partie began to growe weak in Spain.

While these matters passed in the West, HONORIVS his nephew, THEODOSIVS, Emperour in the East, being now of sufficient age, was freed from his Tutors; and, as he was a good Christian, his chiefest care was for the seruice of God, and for the defence of his holy Church. Whereupon he fell at variance with BARRABANVS King of Persia, who succeeded ISDEGORDVS who had been his tutor (as is before said) for that he was giuen to vnderstand that BARRABANVS persecuted the Christians which lived in his dominions, whereof THEODOSIVS had admonished him, requiring reformation: but seeing he could not obtaine it, he sent ARDABVRVS an excellent Captaine against him, who fought a battaile with NASIVS Generall of the Persians, and therein overthrowne him, and made great slaughter of his men, and afterwards entred the Countrey, and did great harme and spoyle therein. And by another way THEODOSIVS sent another Captaine called GRATIANVS against AEMANDER King of the Sarazins, who came in aide of the King of Persia: this King was likewise overthrowne in battaile by GRATIANVS, and a very great multitude of his people slaine, and he himselfe escaped by flight. And in another place another Captaine called ARSOBIDA overthrowne the Persians also: so as this warre was made to the great aduantage of the Romanes, and with losse and preiudice of the Persians, vntill that BARRABANVS ceasing to persecute the Christians, a peace was treated and concluded betweene him and THEODOSIVS. This happened in the time that I told you that the Emperours partie began to waxe feeble and weak in Spain: which weakenesse increased by reason of the death of HONORIVS; who, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, died of an infirmity in Rome, hauing reigned sole Emperour of the West about fifteene yeeres after the death of his brother ARCADIVS, with whom he reigned about 12 yeeres; so as in all he reigned 28 yeeres, besides 2 with his father. HONORIVS left no heires of his bodie: for by two wiues which he had, which were the daughters of SYLICI, he had neuer any child. And a little before he died, he fell so farre at disension with his sister PLACIDIA, as he went to Constantinople to her Nephew the Emperour THEODOSIVS, with her two sonnes which he had by the Emperour CONSTANTIVS, of whom we haue already treated: her sonnes were named HONORIVS, and VALENTINIANVS: this VALENTINIANVS was afterwards Emperour: He died in the yeere of the Incarnation of our Sauour Christ 427.

HONORIVS (as before is mentioned) was a vertuous man and a very good Christian, very noble minded, and very pitifull. Hee did one notable thing, which was the part of a charitable and good Christian, which was, to abolish the Gladiators or Sword players, which (as it is written) did vie in Rome vpon pleasure most cruely to kill one another. He much loved his ease; and so we see, that in his owne person he neuer followed the warres; and in his gouernement was very negligent. But in the end by his Captaine hee so much prevailed, that excepting Spain, he brought all the rest of his Empire to quiet subiection in his life time, although after great rebellions, wars and troubles: A few yeets before his death died the great Doctor S. HIEROME, being of the age of fourescore and twelue yeers, in Behelem in Iewry, where Christ was born: who departing out of this life, went to enjoy the life euerslasting.

Castinus succeeded Ecivus in his charge.

Boniface came into Spain in aide of Castinus.

Wars betweene the Emperour Theodosius and Barrabanus King of Persia, Theodosius his victories.

The death of the Emperour Honorius.

Honorius put downe the Sword players called Gladiators.

The death of S. Hierome.

THE LIFE OF THEODOSIUS, THE SECOND OF THIS NAME, AND TWO AND FIFTITH ROMAN EMPEROR, and of his Cosen germane, VALENTINIAN
the Second.
(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

After the death of Honorius, Theodosius lawfully succeeded in the Empire who, perceiving that many went about to make themselves Tyrants of the Western Empire, resolved to make his cosen, Valentinian, Cæsar in those parts: who, within a small time after, making himself Lord of all Italie, was by the consent of Theodosius, and of the people, called Emperor. All the while these two Emperors lived, there were such cruell and bloody wars made by the Barbarians (as, Hungers, Gothes, Vandals, and such like nations) that the whole world seemed to have been turned upside down. But, above all other the wars of the Hunns was most dangerous, and of longest continuance: for they, having conquered Hungary, would have gone into France, Against whom, Valentinianus continually sent fresh supplies, under the leading of his General Ecius. But Theodosius his Empire in the East was in farre better rest and quiet. For, the Western Empire was continually infected with cruell warres: whether Theodosius never left to send new supplies of Captains and soldiers. By reason whereof, Attila King of the Gothes, thinking to invade the Empire of Constantinople unfurnished of men of warre to defend it, invaded the same: whereupon Theodosius recalled those Captains which hee had sent into Sicilia to the aid of Valentinianus, and encountered the Gothes, during the time of that warre, which on the Gothus side was managed very valdly, by reason of some suspitions and jealousies among themselves. Theodosius falling sick, died of the plague, when he had reigned 42. years: whose death was lamented by the whole Empire: for, hee was a vert good man, and much beloved in his life time.

Real in truth were the accidents and warres, as well prosperous as unfortunate, which have befallen in the Roman Empire in the space of four hundred yeeres (little more or lesse) whereof wee have written, as the Reader may easily judge. But notwithstanding that we have sometimes seen it in distresse, troubled, and in danger to have been lost in the whole, or in part; yet in the end, although those calamities continued for a space, wee have seen how it hath bin delivred from those dangers, repairing them by some means: so as we may say, that it hath bin cured of those infirmities where with it was oppressed, and recovered the losses which it sustained, untill the time where to wee are now come. But, through the sever judgement of God, from henceforth matters succeeded not so well; but the losses multiplied, and their forces diminished. And although that sometimes, through the valour of some excellent Emperours and their Captains, the Empire did strive to recouer her ancient Majesty, and was both honoured and feared; yet it could never attain to the former: and this also was very seldom. So as from henceforth, at sundry times, and by diverse accidents, the Emperors lost whole Provinces and Legions; and in them began Kingdoms, and par-

particular States; and of those Countries which the Empire lost, arose great and mightie Monarchies: and as Principalities and Kingdoms multiplied, so great and more strange were the accidents which hapned, which I cannot relate, neither am I bound thereto: for, my purpose and intent was, Not to write a generall History, but only of the Emperors, and that briefly. Wherefore, as briefly as I shall be able, I will lay open the ground-work, and hold on my way; writing such things as shall be of greatest importance in the History of the Emperours, leaving that of other Kings and Kingdoms, which in process of time shall present themselves to others, which either already have, or hereafter shall take that charge vpon them. For this which I have already taken in hand, will be enough for my small ability; which I pray God I may be able to bring to any reasonable good end, to the honest satisfaction of those which shall read the same.

By the death of HONORIUS, the whole Roman Empire did belong to his nephew THEODOSIUS, then sole Emperor; who at that Instant was in Constantinople, and held the Eastern Empire, as by that which is already said may easily be understood; although that in the time of HONORIUS there bee no notable mention made of his doings, aswell for his few yeeres, as for that the Empire of the East was in better rest and quiet than the Western, which then was infected and turmoiled.

When it was publicly knowne that HONORIUS was dead, from which meant to continue their allegiance, held for THEODOSIUS, as reason and duty required: but the greatest Potentates beganne to make themselves Lords of the Empire, or of part thereof. In Africa was BONIFACIUS (as we said) Gouverner of that Province; who in the beginning held himself Neuter. In Spain the Vandals, Sweuians and Alanes, thinking that CASTINVS (who was Generall for the Empire) should not be able to withstand them, began vpon a sudden to be discordant with that which they held; and so took Arms, and would have more. The Gothes, who were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, Tolosa, and all the Countries round about, by the leave and permission of HONORIUS, as his allies and friends, took the same resolution as the rest did. And the Burgundians in like manner which dwelt vpon the Rhines side, and the Franques which had been driven out of France, resolved to return thither again. The Hunnes also, a most fierce Nation, whose Originall was in Scythia, as that of the Gothes, desirous to leave their barren Countie, departed thence in great numbers, and came to the confines of Pannonia inferior, which now is called Hungary: so as into all those Nations, and into sundry others, the death of HONORIUS did put new thoughts and conceits, although they did not presently put them in execution: of all which, as it shall be most fit for my purpose, I will hereafter make particular mention.

The state standing in these tearms; as THEODOSIUS provided not suddenly for his coming into Italie, or to send some Noble Personage with his power and authority, there was an eminent man in Rome whose name was JOHN, who by means of his dignity and riches, was of great power: He, by the counsell and direction of CASTINVS (although in secret) who (as we have said) was an Earle and Generall in Spain, rebelled, and took the name of Emperor: and ECIUS, whom HONORIUS deposed from the government of Spain, was also of his counsell, and fauoured and assisted him in his proceedings.

This Tyrant JOHN having made himselfe Lord of Rome, and of the greatest part of Italy, a great part of France holding for him already, and all that part of Spaine which was vnder the command and gouernement of CASTINVS; the same ECIUS and CASTINVS, as they were both enemies to BONIFACE gouernour of Africa, seeing that hee tooke not part with JOHN, perswaded him to declare him for an enemy: yet they discouered not themselves as then, the better to bring the other to confusion. Wherefore CASTINVS fled from Spaine into Africa, with a great fleet and a great number of souldiers, spreading a rumour that hee fled thither for feare of the Vandales, from whom in no part of Spaine hee could liue in safetie. Vnder colour whereof, and writing very louing letters to BONIFACIUS, setting his men on land, he seized on many cities on the coast of Africa, and so liued for certaine daies in counterfeit peace and friendship with BONIFACIUS; yet BONIFACE was not free from jealousy. Heereof there are at this day epistles extant, written to him by S. AVGVSTINE, who then was Bishop of Hippo, and the answers thereto, discouering the suspicion. And CASTINVS afterwards manifesting his ill meaning, S. AVGVSTINE sought means to reconcile them: but his godly endeavour taking no effect, they fought a battaile, which although it were very cruell and bloodie, CASTINVS was overthrowne and fled to his ships, and with such of his

The Originall of the Kingdoms.

The alterations & changes that hapned through the death of Honorius.

The Hunnes tread Hungary.

Castinus came against Boniface in Africa.

Castinus overthrowne by Boniface.

his souldiers as hee could gather together; he returned with shame and dishonour into Sapine. Which when IOHN the vsurper Emperour vnderstood, hee sent for him with an intent to leaue him for his Lieutenant in Italy; and assembling together the old Captaines and souldiers which remained since the time of HONORIUS, with the greatest power that he was able to leuie; and a very great fleet, he made preparation to passe into Africa. Some authors write, that hee went thither in person, and that after many batailles he was slain by BONIFACIUS. So writeth B. LONDVS in his booke of the declining of the Romane Empire, and GVIDO of RAVENNA, and ANTONIVS SABELLIQVS in his Aeneades; and other modern authors: who in my opinion are deceived; or at the least, know not what ancient authors they follow therein. Whereof that which I finde written; is, that THEODOSIUS being aduertised of the great combutions in the Westerne Empire, and not daring to leaue the East, thought it his safest counsell to nominate his cousingermane VALENTINIAN, CÆSAR, who was the sonne of PLACIDIA, sister to the two Emperours ARCADIUS and HONORIUS, and wife to that worthie Captaine and Emperour CONSTANTINVS. After some accidents which happened, with such troups as hee thought good, hee sent him into Italy with his mother PLACIDIA, whose vertue and wisdom was sufficient to gouerne the whole, untill the young CÆSAR came to age fit for the government. Before this, the vsurper IOHN sent his Ambassadors to THEODOSIUS, requesting him to allow of his election, and to be pleased to accept him for his companion in the Empire. Where to THEODOSIUS answered was; To command his Ambassadors to be apprehended as Traitors and rebels. And he sent commandement to ARDBVRIVS of ANDABVRIVS, an excellent Captaine of his, that with the greatest power that he could, he should take his passage by Sea into Italy, before PLACIDIA and her sonne, and should seeke to defeat the tyrant IOHN. ARDBVRIVS presently put this charge in practice: but there befell him such a storme at the Sea, as his shippe was driven from the rest of the fleet, and arrived where he was taken and carried prisoner to RAVENNA. His sonne ASPA within few daies after being aduertised hereof (who also came in the same fleet) after that the tempest ceased, and that the Seas were calme, set his men on land; and vned such means, that passing through certaine lakes or boggs; which are, or were, neere to RAVENNA (where the vsurping Emperour IOHN then was, and held his father prisoner: Which was held for a matter impossible, and so it is written for a wonder he by force entred the Citie, which nothing suspected any such mishap; where he did not only let his father at libertie, but took the Emperour IOHN the vsurper prisoner, and smote off his head.

In this manner writeth Bishop PHILBY in his History of the death of the Tyrant IOHN, who wrote the same about seven hundred yeeres since; with whom PROCOPIVS agreeeth, an Author of about a thousand yeeres continuance; CASSIODORVS in his tripartite historie declareth it at large; and PROSPERVS and JORNANDES of little lesse antiquity; and also PAVLVS DIACONVS. And although they all briefly passe it over, yet they auerre that he died in Italy, and not in Africa. And PLATINA, CYSPINIANVS, and other diligent modern Authors, follow them therein: whereby it is to be presumed, that they were deceived which wrote that he was slain by BONIFACIUS in Africa; although it be not to be doubted, but that he went into Africa, and was there ouerthrowne. And, holding this for the most certain, let vs proceed to the rest, wherein in a manner all agree in the taking of RAVENNA; and that after they were entred, ASPA and his souldiers inflicted cruell punishments. Five yeeres did IOHN enjoy the name of Emperour before his death; and was commended for his vertue and good parts by some Authors; so as they condemn him not for any thing, but only for making himself a Tyrant in vsurping the Empire: whereof the greatest fault is laid vpon CONSTANTINVS and ECIVS, who perswaded him thereto.

This victory being obtained, within short space after came PEACIDIA with her sonne VALENTINIANVS then new made CÆSAR, into Italy; through whose coming, and the death of the aforesaid IOHN, in a short space there followed a great alteration: for, being come to RAVENNA, and vnderstanding that CASSTINVS came from Spain with such forces as hee was able, to put himself into Rome with ECIVS who held the same against VALENTINIAN, PLACIDIA sent ARDBVRIVS against him, or (after some others) BYRGVNDVS, and it may be both; who fighting a battell, CASSTINVS was ouerthrowne, and, escaping from the fury, his owne souldiers mutined, and deliuerd him to the Emperours General, who sent him to RAVENNA. The like hapned to ECIVS in Rome: for, the souldiers and citizens mutined, and apprehended him; and he was brought prisoner also to RAVENNA. This is that ECIVS whom some call call ECIVS, so much commended by the Writers of those Times for one of the best Captains in the world: and in truth so had he already shewed himself in all his actions; but hee performed more afterwards. And of no lesse esteem was BONIFACIUS, who gouerned Africa. ARDBVRIVS was very famous for his victories; as wee haue said, against the Persians; and so was CASSTINVS in like manner. These Captains being brought prisoners, and the need of such men in the Empire considered, as well in Spain against the Vandals and the rest, as in France against the Goths and Burgundians, who already inuaded that Kingdome, and against the Hunnes which were in Pannonia; After many allegations pro & contra, PLACIDIA vndertook to procure her son VALENTINIAN to pardon them their liues: and so CASSTINVS, after some few daies imprisonment, was banisht. And ECIVS, having put in security for his fidelity, was made General of the Army in France against the Goths, who took such order, that the Huns came no further forwards: for, he had great friendship among those nations, and was born in those parts; and, during his disgrace with HONORIUS, liued among them.

VALENTINIANVS, being in full possession of all Italy, was with the good will of all men; and by the consent of his cosen THEODOSIUS; called Emperour and AVGVSTVS, and for such obeyed and receiued by the Senate and people of Rome: and the Earl and General ECIVS, without delaying any time, vndertook his charge of General of the wars in France. And at that time when he came into France (as PROSPERVS and DIACONVS write) THEODORICVS, by the death of WALIA, was King of the Goths, and had besieged a principal Citie then called Archeilla, after the taking of many other towns. But as soon as ECIVS came with his Army, he began the wars in such manner, that to the losse of the Goths the Citie was relieved; and they, raising their siege, retired themselves into their Countries: and hee euery where made such head against them, that they could not take any other places either in France or Spain. In the same time in the Ile of Britannie, which then was vnfurnished of such garrisons as it was wont to haue, were great wars and combutions: for, the Scots, a fierce nation (of whom we haue already made mention, and after whose name part of Britannie is called the Kingdome of Scotland to this day) with other people called Picts or Pictanians, whose Originall was of Sarmatia in Europe, robbed and ouer-ran all the Land, and made themselves Lords of a great part thereof. Wherefore such of the Inhabitants of that Iland as continued subiect to the Empire, sent to ECIVS for succour; certifying him, that if relief came not within a short space; the whole Iland would fall into the hands of the enemy.

When ECIVS vnderstood those newes, hee presently sent one Legion of his Armie vnder the leading of a Captain whose name was GALLIO, into Britannie: and he, joyning with the Inhabitants which sent for aid, fought oftentimes with the Scots and Picts; and obtaining the victory, compelled them to leaue that country in peace and quiet: and so they continued, till that ECIVS (standing in need of succours to make head against the Burgundians who already had poss'd the Rhine, and began with great fury to inuade France, being feared to haue an intent to passe into Italy) drew that Legion out of Britannie, and left it in the borders of Paris in France, to guard that Country; and left another Legion neere to Tarragona in Spain, vnder the command of a Captain called SEBASTIAN, to defend the same against the Goths: and hee with the rest of his Army went to the wars against the Burgundians; with which hee oftentimes came to blowes, and ouer-came them in some battels. But the Britans, being abandoned by that Legion which ECIVS sent for out of that Iland, were so distressed, that if VALENTINIAN had not sent commandement to ECIVS to send back that legion which he had drawn out of Britannie, they had been in great distresse: but, that legion coming to their aid, they were sufficiently able for that time to defend and support themselves in the Emperours seruice.

While these things passed in Britannie, France and Italy, BONIFACE grew daily more mighty in Africa; who although that he yet shewed not himself to be against VALENTINIAN, but rather seemed to be of his party euer after that he was troubled by the vsurper IOHN; yet he seemed to be a friend, in such sort, that hee would not leaue any part of that which hee held. Which, VALENTINIAN and PLACIDIA perceiving, resolving to found his intent, they sent to command him to leaue his government to a Successor whom they would appoint, and to come to them: which, BONIFACE openly refused, and leuied souldiers to defend himself against the Emperour. It is true that some Authors write, that he was deluded by ECIVS; who sent him word, that if hee came into Italy VALENTINIAN would put him to death; whereof he aduertised him as a friend: and he likewise told PLACIDIA, that BONIFACE would not come, but would rebel; so as they affirm, that more for fear than for any ill intent,

B b

Ecivus made Generall against the Hunnes and Goths.

The wars there Ecivus made in France against the Gothes.

The coming of the Scots into Britannie.

Boniface rebelled in Africa.

Theodosius
made his cosen Valentinian,
Cæsar.

Theodosius sent Ambassadors to John the Tyrant.

Andaburius
taken prisoner by John the tyrant.

John the tyrant put to death by Aspice son of Andaburius.
Procopius
name a book 5, chap. 7, Procop.
book 4. of the wars of the Vandals.
Cassiodorus book 22. cha. 18

The coming of Placidia and Valentinian
into Italy.

he made himself a Tyrant; of which opinion is PROCOPIUS. But howsoever the matter went, VALENTINIAN sent presently two Captains against him, the one called MAHORCIVS or MASORCIVS, the other called GALLIO or GALBIO; hee, who (as I said) went to aid the Brittaines with a Legion: who being arrived in Africa with great power, BONIFACE, who was an excellent man of war, with a very good Army attended their coming, and, knowing where they landed, went to meet them: and seeing his power equal, they came to a battell; wherein BONIFACE through his great valour and policie got the victorie, and the Emperors Captains were overthrowne and slain, together with a great number of their soldiers: and so BONIFACE became mightier, and a greater Lord than before.

The losse of this battell, and of men of warre, greatly encreased the strength of the enemies to the Empire: for, first the Gothes followed the warres in Spain with greater force than before, as well against the Emperors subjects, as against the Vandals and other Nations inhabiting other parts of that Country. And the Burgonians began to make a more resolute resistance against ECIVS, than before they had done. And, above all, the Franks or Francons (a people of Germany) coming from Franconia (after some Authors) so called after their name, as truly writes AGATHIUS (although of their Originall there be many fabulous opinions) seeing that ECIVS had enough to do against the Burgonians and the Gothes, and that the Emperor VALENTINIAN had lost his Armie in Africa, and that his cosen THEODOSIUS was busied about matters of the East, they resolved to invade France: out of which a little before they had been expelled by the Vandals, Alanes and Suevians, in the time of the Emperors HONORIVS and ARCADIVS; and also by ECIVS, as we have said, when HONORIVS sent him into Spain. But now, taking the benefit of the time, they came with a very great power, and entered the Province called Senonensis, and the countries about Orleans and Paris, and presently took those countries: MARCOMYNDVS having been before this time their Leader; and afterwards his son FARRAMOND was the first King of the Franks: whom CLODIVS succeeded, who at that time was their King. And in proceesse of time their power increased so much, that Gallia from them took the name of France; and the King thereof is called King of the Franks or Frenchmen.

Of these Frenchmen (who in truth were a warlike and valiant Nation) some French Historiographers recite certain fables; saying, that they descended from the Trojanes, from one HECTOR'S son called FRANCVS, and that from him they took their name. Others say, they had this name for certain franchises, priuiledges and immunities they enioied in the time of VALENTINIAN the first. All which is fabulous and untrue: for, neither had HECTOR any such son, neither descended they from the Trojanes, neither is there any memorie of those Franks but from the time of the Emperor AVRILIANVS, who overthrowne them about the year of our Lord 260, little more or lesse. Neither obtained they this name in the time of the Emperor VALENTINIAN: for, hee reigned long afterwards, and they (as I said) were so cald 200 years before. But they were then a new people; of which, CÆSAR, STRABO, PLINY, CORNELIUS TACITVS, POMONIUS MELA, nor PTOLOMEY, made any mention; neither were they then of any name, or knowne: which if it had bin otherwise, it had bin impossible but some of those Authors, if not all, would have left some memoriall of them. The Franks might begin to be knowne a little before AVRILIANVS time: the rest is windy.

And it is to be understood, that the Kings which in our time reigned in France, are not descended from this people: for, in the House of France there have been two or three alterations and changes. The first was about the year of our Lord 750: at which time King CHILDERICVS or CHILPERICVS was depozed by Pope ZACHARY, that Kingdome having continued 330 years in the line of the Franks. And PERPIN, father to CHARLES the Great, being a Germane born, was chosen King: and so the Franks then lost the royall Scepter. And in King PERPIN'S posterity it afterwards continued 238 years, vntill the year of our Lord 990: at what time LEUVIS the son of LOTHARIUS then reigning was poisoned; and, for that hee had no sons, they fought to haue made his brother CHARLES Duke of Lorraine, their King. But a great and mighty man, whose name was HUGO CAPVTIVS, and born in that Country, hindered the same, and was of such power, that he took CHARLES prisoner, and enjoyed the Kingdome: and in his posterity the Kingdome continueth till this day, the next in blood inheriting for want of heirs males. So as we are not to hould the Kings of France to be of the line of the Franks, seeing they come not, neither are they descended from them. Heerein doo all good and true Authors agree.

But

But to returne to our historie, I say that the Frenchmen entred with such force and furie, as they tooke all that that they invaded: which ECIVS considering, and the warres which the Gothes made in Spain, notwithstanding that he had oftentimes overthrowne the Burgonians, and was in hope shortly whollie to haue subdued them, yet he resolved to grant them peace: which they humbly sued for, to be the better able to giue succours to other places where neede required, but especially to come against the French, for they were a mightie and valiant people.

In this time whilest that ECIVS was thus troubled to defend the Roman Empire against so many nations, the new Emperour VALENTINIAN, being still in hope to recover Africa, with a greater resolution then at any time before, commanded souldiers to be leuied in Italy and Sicilie; and with the aide of men and ships which his cosen the Emperor THEODOSIUS sent him from Constantinople, he sent an excellent Capitaine called SISYPHVS, against BONIFACE in Africa; who by PAVLVSDIACONVS is called SIGISVLVS. And he brought such an Armie and vsed such meanes, that taking land in Africa neere vnto Carthage, hee grew so strong in that countrie, as BONIFACE durst not abide his coming in Carthage, but went into Mauritania Cæsariensis, and the marches thereof, which now containeth the kingdome of Bugia, Argier and Oran, and the countries bordering vpon Spain. And yet not holding himselfe there in safetie, he sent to treat with GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, who then was in the province of Betica, called after their name Vandalusia, to the end he should come from Spain to relieue him, and he would giue him townes and cities to possesse, if he would helpe him to recover what he had lost.

This embassie came to GENSERICVS when he stood more in neede of helpe, then able to fend any: for the Gothes who had many times invaded Spain, taking the benefit of the time when as all things were turned vpside downe, THEODORICVS being their King and leader, and not contenting themselves with what they held, and was given them in Spain, entred, making a conquest of the countrie, with an intent to make warre particularly against the Vandales; wherewith GENSERICVS was so oppressed, as he was out of all hope to be able to defend himselfe. Whereupon, more of necessitie, then for any good will, he accepted the offer made by BONIFACE: and abandoning the province of Vandalusia, he passed the streights of Gibraltar, as well with his men of warre, as of peace, women, children, goods, and cattell, and sailed on the best part he could, of all Mauritania; and hauing entred vnder the name and title of succour, he made himselfe absolute Lord, robbing and spoiling the cities and townes with great crueltie. And this people thus abandoning Andalusia, was the occasion that THEODORICVS and his Gothes tooke a great part thereof, and so the Gothes continued Kings of Spain, vntill the time of the Emperour CHARLES. And although that at sundrie times they had wars and battailes with the Alanes, and Suevians, yet in the end the power of the Gothes prevailed: From this THEODORICVS the first, is descended the roote and stocke of the Kings of Spain vntill this day. The Vandales being barbarous and misbeleueers (for they were of the sect of the Arians) held not promise nor league with BONIFACE in Africa, who had drawne them thither; but taking the cities vpon the coast which he had given them, they entred and tooke the rest in despite of him: wherefore he was constrained through necessity, to become enemie to those which he had drawne thither for his succour and reliefe, seeing they tooke all. But as hee was hated by the Emperor VALENTINIAN, and could hope for no succours from anie where else, as wise and as valiant as he was, he was not able to make sufficient resistance against all; but, being too weak, was driuen to flee from place to place. But the Province of Carthage and all the countries thereabout, were valiantly defended by the Generall SISYPHVS, whom the Emperor VALENTINIAN sent thier against BONIFACE. GENSERICVS King of the Vandales being so mighty in Africa, and finding SISYPHVS of power able to make head against him, and fearing (as a wise man) the murability of Fortune, sent to entreat a peace with VALENTINIAN, vpon condition that hee should suffer him to enjoy that which he had taken from BONIFACE, seeing that he was not possessed thereof himselfe.

The Emperor VALENTINIAN considering that ECIVS was much troubled in France against the French, new inhabitants there, and that there was little assurance of the truce with the Burgonians; with a desire to recover that which was lost in Spain (for, hee was aduertised that his Generall SEBASTIAN, who was there in his seruice against the Alanes and Suevians, had obtained certain victories against them, and that they were ioyned with the Gothes, so as he was vnable alone to defend himselfe against all) he resolved to grant the Vandals in Africa that peace they required: and, taking security and great promises of their King GENSERICVS,

B b z

the Heere written near to the Burgonians

Valentinian
sent an armie against Boniface the tyrant in Africa.

The Vandales
abandon Spain;
and saile into Africa.

The Vandales made themselves Lords of great part of Africa.

Valentinian
craunth peace to the Vandales in Africa.

Mahorcus and Galbio, captains against Boniface.

A battell wherein the tyrant Boniface preuailed.

The coming of the Franks or Frenchmen into France.

The success of the French.

Gallia called France.

The antiquity of the French.

The Kings of France differed not from the Franks.

The changes which haue hapned in the royall house of France.

Valentinian
was ill advised.

Cenfericus,
king of the Vanda-les, violated the peace.

Cenfericus
slew Boniface,
the death of
S. Augustine.

The cruelties used by Cenfericus
King of the Vanda-
les against the true Christians.

Totila, King of the Huns.

The Britanes called the Saxons to their aid.

The Angles or Saxons took the Isle of Britannie.

Britannie called England.

Britannie in France why so called.

the peace was concluded between them: and VALENTINIAN, relying more on that peace than he ought to have done, sent for SISYLPHVS, commanding him to come into Italy with his Army, not leaving any garrison to keep Carthage or Africa. For, his meaning was, with his whole power to haue re-inforced ECIVS his Armie, and to haue driuen out those Nations which were entered France, and to haue recovered, or at least to haue preferred, that which he possessed in Spain. SISYLPHVS being arrived in Italy, GENSERICVS King of the Vandals, as an ambitious impudent Infidell, went presently to Carthage, and entered the same by force of Arms; five hundred, fourscore and five yeeres (as PROSPERVS reports) after that SCIPIO subdued it to the Roman Empire. The like he afterwards did by all the rest, and in the end came to the City of Hippo, wherein S. AVGVSTINE was Bishop, and therein also (as saith POSIDIVS, a Disciple and Familiar of S. AVGVSTINE) was BONIFACE, who had retired himself thither; and, houlding it besieged the space of 14 moneths (God hauing first taken away S. AVGVSTINE, being when he died of the age of 76 yeeres) hee took it, and put BONIFACE to death. Heerin PROCOPIVS differs from other Authors; who writes, that he raised his siege without taking the City: and, concerning BONIFACE, PROSPERVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS relate it after another manner; saying, that hee had his pardon, and went into Italy, where he died of a natural death.

After the taking of Hippo, the power of GENSERICVS daily increased, in such manner, that he made a full conquest of all Africa: and so the Vandals remained for a long time absolute Lords thereof. Wherein this cruel King committed so many cruelties against the Bishops and Priests which held the true faith, and would not become Arians as he was, as the like had seldom been seen; most cruelly putting many of them to death, and banishing others. The like he vied towards all kinde of people, committing incredible infolencies and robberies, as many credible Authors affirm; whereof VICTOR wrote a particular Book, which he intituled the Vandalical Persecution, whereto I referre the curious Reader: which Book is newly imprinted and annexed to EYSEBIVS his Chronicle, and to the tripartite History. After this accident happened in Africa, VALENTINIAN had daily aduertisements, that the Huns, who already were become Lords of Austria and Hungary with the marches thereof, made preparation to come down into France; and to that end had raised a great number of men of war (TOTILA a most fierce proud man being their King) against which their designes he daily sent new forces to ECIVS, who followed the ordinary wars of France; by means whereof, ECIVS could not send any succours to those of the Ile of Britanny, who newly had sent to him for aid against the Scots and Picts: for which cause the Romans and Britannes which inhabited Britanny, despairing of any other help, called to their aid, and solicited with fair promises, the Angles then called Saxons, a people of Germany, inhabiting neer to the sea-side: who being allured thereto, partly for pay, and partly through the fertility and fruitfulness of that Country, came into Britanny vnder the leading of their Captain HENGISTVS (as saith BEDA); who, assisting the Inhabitants, in such manner subdued their enemies, that they rebelled no more. But they, afterwards growing strong and ambitious, did the like in Britanny as the Vandals did in Africa; and making war vpon the Country, and subduing the Britannes, made themselves Lords of all the Land, excepting that which is now the Kingdome of Scotland.

In this manner the Empire lost this Land, and the Angles remained Kings thereof; and afterwards it lost the name of Britannie, and by them was called Anglia, and now England, which is as much to say, as the land of the English; and so from henceforth we will call it. And their power so much increased, that in the time of AVGVSTVLVS, as we will hereafter declare, they banished and draue the Britannes wholly out of that countrie, so as some came over into France, and inhabited that countrie which is now called Britannie, where before that time dwelt the Turones and Veneti, which through their coming thither is called Britannie: But a great number of the Britannies fled to the mountaines towards the North-west now called Wales, where they maintained themselves against all Inuaders. Thus the dominion of that Land rested in the Kings of the Angles or English, and hath continued in them with great alterations, warres and troubles, which import not me to reare. Of all which, besides BEDA, and other ancient and moderne authors not a few, POLIDORE VIRGIL, an author of our time, hath written a historie, of the beginning and success of all matters in Britannie or England.

But to returne to our story of GENSERICVS King of the Vandales; I say, that being vnaffected with Africa, he rigged vp a Fleet and layd it into Sicilie, and took great part thereof, robbing and spoiling the Country: And truly he had taken all the rest of the Land, if that VALENTINIAN (notwithstanding that he was very tender and delicate, and in person did vied all possible diligence to provide what was needfull, so farre as he was able: who presently sent commendement to SEBASTIAN, his Generall in Spain, to transport himself with the greatest power that he was able, into Africa and to make seisure thereof, while as GENSERICVS was busied in Sicilia. GENSERICVS was aduertized of this preparation; and vnderstanding that without delay it should be put in execution, resolved to leaue Sicilia, and to returne to defend Africa which was of greater importance, and concerned him more: and so Sicilia escaped out of his hands. And SEBASTIAN forbore to goe into Africa. But hee seeing himselfe of greater power then before, and that his Lord was oppressed with wars and crosses (wherein those men are seldome faithfull, which in prosperitie shew themselves most seruicable) and purposing to make himselfe Lord of all that which the Emperour possessed in Spain, was the cause that the Empire lost the same, and he without obtaining his desire, lost both his life and honour. For moued by this ambition, as I said, he treated with THEODORICVS, and the Gothes, and with the Alanes also, that they should come to a peace with him, and that they should diuide the country amongst them, without yielding any acknowledgement to VALENTINIAN. Wherewith in outward shew they seemed to be very well pleased, and yielded to his propositions, which they obserued for certaine daies: but afterwards vpon a false conduct they slew him; and hee being dead who was wont to defend the countrie, they took all Spaine, excepting some small part of Galicia and Biscay, which by reason of the inaccessible steepnes of the mountaines and the valour of the inhabitants, defended themselves for a season.

VALENTINIAN

During these euents in Spain and Africa, ECIVS neuer delisted from waiting against the French, Burgonians and other nations in France: and VALENTINIAN, leaving all things in the best order that he could in Italy, took his passage for Gracia, and went to Constantinople to see his cousin the Emperour THEODOSIUS; whose Empire as it pleased God was then better in peace and in more quietnesse then the West. At this meeting VALENTINIAN married with EYDOXA, THEODOSIUS his daughter, and then presently returned into Italy, to Emperour THEODOSIUS much greuing, sent him two Captaines called ARIOBINDVS and ANSILA, with good troups of soldiers, to the end that they should reconquer Africa; being much discontented with GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, for the breach of the peace, and for the great cruelties which he had committed in that Countrie.

These Captaines and soldiers failed into Sicilia, from thence to passe into Africa: but they so deracted the time and prolonged their departure in such manner; as they spoiled the whole Island of Sicilia, and it pleased not God that they should proceed on their iourney. For ATTILA mighty King of the Hunes, which of long time had purposed to make himselfe Lord of the Empire, hauing besides Hungary, had made a conquest of many Cities in Germanie, drawing to him for pay and by faire promises and subtil means, an infinite number of people, part of which were called Turlingi, Tungri, Ostrogothes, and Marcomanni, and other barbarous northerly Nations, which like swarms of Bees came to him in that time: which (as PAVLVS DIACONVS recounteth) determined to inuade the Empire of Constantinople, knowing that the best and greatest part of the men of warre thereof, were gone with the two Captaines afore sayd into Sicilia. At this his entrie he tooke many Cities in Thracia, and in Slaonia, and made so great spoyle in that Countrey, as the Emperour in great haste sent for ARIOBINDVS and ANSILA, who with a great Armie (as I sayd) were in Sicilia, to the end that they should come and defend the Countrey; together with other great forces which he had commanded to be leuied. And so he began the warre, and to oppose himselfe against the force and fury of ATTILA; wherto this was a great helpe, that at that instant there began to grow some suspition and iealousie between ATTILA and his brother BEDA, and enuy and emulation between the Kings which came with him; by reason whereof, the war was not so terrible as before, although they still did much harme. THEODOSIUS Emperour of the East being in this care, and at warres with the mightie ATTILA, and his Cousin VALENTINIAN in such trouble, as is before sayd, that the Vandales and their King held Africa, the Gothes and Alanes Spaine, his Generall ECIVS in France, held warre with so many nations, and therein passed so many aduentures, as they would be too long to reite.

THEODOSIUS, applying himselfe in Constantinople, with great care and diligence to send greater reliefe and forces against ATTILA, was stricken with the plague, whereof quickly

Genfericus went to make warre in Sicilia.

The treason and death of Sebastian, Generall for the Emperour Valentinian in Spain.

Valentinian
went to Constantinople, and married with Eudoxa the Emperour Theodosius his daughter.

Attiobindus and Anilla Captaine sent by Theodosius.

Attila inuaded
the Greek Empire.

Theodosius
the second died of the plague.

he died. Whose death was generally lamented : for he was a good, pitifull, very vertuous and Christian Prince; as it plainly appeareth by many letters, which at this day are extant, written to him by LEO Bishop of Rome, who liued in his time. It is written of him, that he was very deuout and religious, and spent much time in prayer; and that he fasted two daies in the weeke, and much honoured the Church and the Clergie.

Finally, he left nothing vndone which a Christian was bound to doe, neither what was conuenient for an Emperour. He was very studious and addicted to letters, and to Philosophie, and made great Libraries, principally of the holie Scriptures. He was so pitifull, that being one day reprehended for giuing so many malefactors their liues, he answered: I would to God that I could raise againe those which I haue put to death. In conclusion, he was accomplished with all vertues, and free from all vices, so as he was not subiect vnto any: onely he was noted to be somewhat mutable and haſtie. He was married to EVDOXIA, a very godly and discrete woman, the daughter of LEO NCIVS, whom he married for her vertue. onely: she was called, before that she was married to him, ATANAS, and with her mariage her name was changed. For this his goodnes and vertue, it pleased God that his raigne continued two and fortie yeeres: foureteeen or fiftene being a child, vnder the Protection of the King of Persia, in the time of his Vncle HONORIVS, as is already written; and seuen and twentie with his coffin VALENTINIAN, and for the most part he enioyed the Empire of the East in peace and quiet, and died being about fiftie yeeres old: for in a manner as soone as he was borne, he inherited the Empire. He departed this world, according to MATHEV PALMERYS computation in his additions to EUSEBIYS his Chronicle, and after PROSPERVS, in the yeere of our Lord, foure hundred, fiftie and three; and after some others, foure hundred and fiftie; and after the most common opinion, in the seuen and twentieth yeere of the raigne of the Emperour VALENTINIAN, who then raigne in Italy, and liued in the citie of Rome.

The religion and vertue of Theodosius

An example of clementie.

THE LIFE OF VALENTINIAN. THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THE THREE AND FIFTITH ROMAN

Emperour; and of his Brother in Lawe,

MARTIANVS.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

Valentinian remaining alone in the Empire of the West, tired with many warres, and seeing that Attila molested the eastern parts, to please his sister Pulcheria, and to the end that those parts should not remain without an Emperour, he gave the charge thereof to an old man called Martianus, who was a man of great iudgement, and very wise. In which time Attila, desiring to give over his enterprise against Constantinople, the siege being long and very difficult, he came towards the western parts, with a determination to passe into France and into Italie. Against whom Valentinian made Ecius his Generall, who was still his Generall in France; whom first concluding a peace with Gensericus King of the Vandales, wherinto the new Emperour old Martianus entered. This Ecius daunted Attila much, and made him know (to the great losse of his men) how valiant a man he was, so as he compelled him to flie. For which victory Valentinian began to haue Ecius in deuotion, that he had an intent to haue made himselfe Emperour, and to that end had some intelligence with Attila, seeing that he did not wholly ruin him when he might: wherefore he caused him to be slain, which was the cause of the ruine of Italie, and of the Western Empire. For Attila, vnderstanding that Ecius was dead, returned into Italie, which Valentinian invited in peace: and being being inuaded, none of the Emperours set his hand to releue it, being unable to leue any sufficient Armie to withstand the enemy. Whereupon having taken Aquileia, and coming towards Rome, at the intreaty of Pope Leo, he spared that Citie, and so leaving Italie, he returned into Hungary: where marrying with the sister of the Emperour Valentinian, upon his wedding day he gorged himselfe so full with wine and meate, as in the night (nature being unable to support so great a charge, casting up abundance of blood) he died in his bed. Whose death yielded son. liberty to the Empire, notwithstanding that the West remained in a manner ruined, whereof grew the greatest of the Empire of the East, and of Constantinople. And one yeere after the death of Attila, Valentinian was also slaine by a fouldier, whose name was Tanillus, both to take revenge for the death of his Captaine Ecius, as urged by the hatred of one Maximus, whose wife Valentinian had forced, when he had raigne Emperour thirtie yeeres.

Ruly I know not whether the reading of that which I haue already related and am presently to write, shall make the reader so much to wonder, as it doth me which write the same. For mine owne part, I dare iustifie, that no warres, alterations or changes of Kingdomes, of all that euer I haue read in auncient or moderne Histories, seeme worthe of so great admiration as those of these times, whereof we are now to treat. Neither doe I remember that I euer admired more at any thing then at these; considering the great and many calamities of so many provinces and cities, the battailes and effusion of blood, the alterations and fallies of estates, the diuersitie of people and nations which flocked together in them. And about all, I doe most wonder at the infinite numbers of people which came out of the northren parts, so as it seemed the earth did flowe with armed men. And likewise to consider, what rage, furie, pride or ambition (for I can giue it no other name) might moue so many fundrie nations, to abandon their owne countries, to ruine and conquer the world. Not being urged, or moued thereto by any offence or iniurie received. But it was theiust iudgement and permission of our Lord God, whose counsels are vnsearchable, and whose prouidence cannot be perceiued by the light of any humane eye. Let vs giue humble thanks vnto his diuine maiestie, that although, for our finnes, he suffereth warres and combustions in these our times, yet they are not so generally, neither so miserable and cruell, as those which they endured in that age, as the reader may plainly perceiue by that which is already, and hereafter shall be related, which passed in this manner.

The state of Italie and of the West, where VALENTINIAN raigne, standing in such manner, as is said, THEODOSIUS dying in Constantinople, leaving neuer a sonne to succcede him, and but one sister, whose name was PVLCHERIA, a wife and worthie woman, who as she bare a great sway in the government, and considering the warres she had with the Gothes, and in what state the whole Empire of both East and West stood, the endeouored to procure that some excellent man, both in peace and warre, might be chosen Emperour, whether he descended of imperiall blood or no. And it seemed that there was not any man, in whom more noble and excellent parts did concur, then in an old Captaine called MARTIANVS: who although he were but of meane parentage, yet with his age he was of great experience, and a very valiant and excellent Captaine.

PVLCHERIA, and those which were of her counsell having taken this resolution, concealed the death of THEODOSIUS for certain daies, vntill they had taken such order as was requisite concerning the election of MARTIANVS. And notwithstanding that he was old, PVLCHERIA took him for her husband, to giue the greater assurance and authoritie to his Empire, and so he was ioyfully received by all men for their foueraigne Lord and Emperour. And VALENTINIAN likewise, who then resided in Rome, was well pleased therewith; as well for his deserts, as also for that it was done by PVLCHERIA, of whose vertue and worthinesse there was a generall good opinion. ZONARAS an auncient Author, whom some call IOHANNES MONACVS, writeth (as IOHN CVPSPINIAN relatech) that PVLCHERIA married with MARTIANVS to giue the greater authority and reputation to his Empire: but first she took securitie of him, that they should both liue chaste; for she was a maide, and had resolved to keepe her virginitie inuiolable: and that MARTIANVS accepted thereof, and

A consideration of the calamities of these times.

Pulcheria sister to Theodosius.

Martianus chosen Emperour of Constantinople.

A notable example of chivalry

Attila transacted his war from the East into the West.

Attila slew his brother Bleda by treason.

Attila his great power & army.

Attila's stile.

Attila's edily confusion.

Valentinian made peace with Gensericus, King of the Vandals, and of Africa.

Ecius made General against Attila.

Ecius fought the last end of Theodoricus King of the Gothes, and of Spain.

they both observed the same, which is a notable example. As soone as MARTIANVS was made Emperor of the East, the first thing he did, was to make prouision to reinforce the Armie which THEODOSIVS had left, and to send against ATTILA fresh souldiers and a new General. And writers affirme, that if ATTILA had continued the warre which he began against Constantinople, he had without doubt come to confusion, by reason of the mutinies and contentions which began among his men of warre: which that politike and mighty King comprehending, and also for that (as they say) a great Captaine of his counselled him to leaue that conquest, and to goe from thence to make warres in the rest of Germany, and afterwards in France, Spaine, and Italie, where VALENTINIAN ruled: knowing that the Empire was diuided and vsurped by diuers nations, and therefore was very easie to be conquered. He resolved therefore to goe into Hungary, where by treason he slew his brother BLEDA, who together with him was equall King, for that he suspected that BLEDA was the cause of the diffension and discord; to the end to make himself absolute Lord: so great was his pride, cruelty and ambition. After this, giving good pay to his old souldiers, and raising new, he grew to be so mighty, that the Kings and Captains of the Ostrogothes, the Heruli, and other Nations which in the beginning came to aid and assist him as a friend, did now serue and obey him as their Lord. And Authors affirme, that he raised an Armie of five hundred thousand men which were souldiers leuied by him, and aduenturers (so great was his fame and reputation at that time): with which Armie coming out of Hungary, Austria, and the confines thereof, which were in his subiection, together with many other countries which he had taken in the last troubles, wherein the Empire was brought so low, he presently began to make a conquest of Germany, and tooke the most part thereof, and the best cities, as Colcin, Strausburg, Spire, Constantine, Basil, and many other, making all possible haste to come into France and Italie, imagining that VALENTINIAN should not be able to protect and defend the same. Wherewith (such was his pride) he pretended not to rest contented, but to make himself sole Monarch of the whole world; through all which his name was greatly feared: and so he intireled himself King of the Huns, of the Medes, of the Gothes, and of the Danes, the terour to the world, and the scourge of God.

PRISCUS an Historiographer writeth (who, being Secretarie to the Emperor VALENTINIAN, was sent Ambassador to him into Scythia, before his coming into Hungary) that hee was but a little man of stature, and had a large broad breast, a great head, little eies, but very quick, a very little thin beard, and some gray hairs, a flat nose, and was of a very swarth complexion; and that in his going and looks he shewed the pride and greames of his minde. He greatly delighted in the warres, and was both politick and valiant, although he did not often vse to fight in person, but reserued himself for greater occasions. Hee was milde and easie to bee pleased by those which humbly required pardon, and submitted themselves vnto him; and held and maintained his faith and word, and defended those which yeelded themselves into his protection: but, with all this, he was most proud, and desirous to make himself Lord ouer all others. VALENTINIAN the Emperor of Rome, vnderstanding ATTILA his successe, with his resolution and desire, of whom he had long stood in fear, did the vttermost of his power to make head against so great force and fury. The first prouision hee made, was, To conclude a peace with GENSERICVS King of the Vandals, who was now King of all Africa, to haue his back in safety from so mighty an enemy. This peace was very acceptable to GENSERICVS, and as to a thing which hee greatly desired, hee gladly yeilded: for, at that time there was great diffension and rebellion among his Captains and men of warre. This peace was concluded betwixt them, vpon condition that the King should resigne certain prouinces and cities to VALENTINIAN; and MARTIANVS the new Emperor of the East was included in the same.

This being ended, ECIVS, who followed the ordinary warres in France, was made General against ATTILA, for that hee was the best and most expert Captaine in his time, whom ATTILA had not forborn to haue corrupted with many fair promises, putting him in minde of former friendship: but, for all he could do, he gaue no ear to him.

ECIVS, vnderstanding that ATTILA with his Army had already passed the riuier of Rhine, and knowing himself to haue no sufficient Armie to make head against him, notwithstanding that many new supplies were come to his aid, he therefore by all means and deuices sought the friendship of THEODORICVS, whom some call THEODORODVS King of the Gothes (who possessed the greatest part of Spaine, and a great part of France, who was a mighty Prince & very valiant, and at that time lay in Tholose) to induce him to aid and assist the Romans: who frankly promised, and faithfully performed the same; which the Emperor VALENTINIAN had had also before attempted. And although that ATTILA by his Letters had sued to the contrary, promising him assurance of his estate; yet he (conceiuing that, ATTILA preuailling, he would as well seek to defeat him afterwards, as he did now the Romans) raised his whole power, and drew neere to ioin with ECIVS; and made the Alanes and Sueuians, who liued in Spain, to do the like. And, with the like perswasion, ECIVS concluded a peace with MEROBIVS King of the French, and with GVANDARICVS King of the Burgonians, who of custome were his ordinary enemies; and with the Saxons and other Nations: all which, more for fear, and through the hatred which they bare to ATTILA, than for any good will to the Romans, resolved to take part with ECIVS; whose wisdom and discretion was so great, that they all willingly iointed with him: yet for all this, ATTILA entred France with such power and fury, that without finding any resistance he tooke the greatest part thereof before that ECIVS was in order to fight with him. But while that he made this spoil and conquest in France, the Kings and people aforesaid iointed with ECIVS in the fields called Catalanes, on the borders of Tholose: so as he had one of the greatest and best Armies that euer was seene, as well for number, as goodnesse of men, and his partie was held to be of no lesse power than that of ATTILA. Wherefore the one armie drew neere to the other, and between them beganne a most cruell warre: wherein (as IORNANDES affirmeth) dyed fourescore and ten thousand men, before they came to a generall battaile, whereof we will speake presently, cyther partie desiring it, but chiefly ATTILA, who held his power inuincible, and so all nations attended the issue thereof: for it seemed that on the victorie depended the command and Empire of the whole world. And to say the truth, at this encounter were gathered together the best, and the greatest part of martiall men of all Europe, being almost a million of people: wherefore it shall not be amisse that we describe this battaile more distinctly then we doe others; seeing that it cannot be said, that there was euer seene any that was greater or more bloudie. First then, there fought there in proper person about ten mightie and warlike kings of the one side, and of the other. Of ATTILA his partie was ARDARICVS, king of a people called Gepidi, and ANDARICVS, VALAMIR, and THEODOMIR, brethren, and kings of the Gothes, or Ostrogothes, and the King of the Marcomanni, and others whose names I finde not written, and the people already named which were without number.

Of ECIVS his partie, was THEODORICVS (who was of greater power then any of the rest) king of the Gothes, Visigothes, and of Spaine, and his sonne THORSIMVND, MEROBIVS, King of the Franches, GVANDARICVS King of the Burgonians, SANGVIANVS King of the Alanes, and the Captaines and kings of diuers other nations, which tooke his part, besides the Romane Legions and Captaines of the Empire. But ATTILA made small account of all these: For he had formerly ouerthrowne the greatest part of them; so as nothing made him to feare or doubt of the victorie, but only the discretion and valour of ECIVS, who was their General. Wherefore, as he was an Infidell and superstitious, he commanded his sooth-sayers and wizards to be called together, to the end that vsing their enchantments and forceries, they should tell him what successe he should haue, and how hee should speede in the battaile: and they sacrificing their beasts, told him, that he should lose the victory, but that the greatest Captaine among his enemies should die therein. Whereto giuing credit (although that it grieved him to thinke that he should be ouerthrowne, imagining that ECIVS should die) he fought and procured it: For, he made account that if ECIVS were dead; although he lost the day, yet he would rayle new supplies, and preuaile against the rest, and so he disposed himself to fight. And as ECIVS and his partakers desired the same, the two Armies came so neere together, that there rested nothing but to come to blowes, and so they fought: which as PROCOPIVS, IORDANVS, ALABIUS, PAVLVS DIACONVS, and others write, was in this manner.

Both parties being desirous to fight, the one Armie being in the morning by breake of day in sight of the other, both Generals commanded to marshall and range their troupes, and to order their battaillons, for to charge their enemies; but as their numbers were infinite (notwithstanding all the diligence and expedition that could be vsed by cyther partie) it was past noone before they could set their men in order. ATTILA with all his carts and wagons which hee brought for his cariage, made a kinde of fort or sconce vpon the side of a hill, wherein he put the women and disarmed people of his Armie, and of his whole Armie made three battaillons, reseruing to himselfe with his Scythians and Hunnes, the maine or middle battaile. And ARDARICVS King of the Gepidi with his countrie-men, and many others in whom he reposed

The kings which iointed with ECIVS against Attila.

The warres between ECIVS & Attila.

How Attila set his Army in order.

greatest trust, led the battaile on the right hand : and to ANDARICVS, VALAMIR, and THEODORIC, brethren, kings of the Ostrogothes, with their owne people and their friends, he gaue the charge and leading of the battaillon on the left hand.

And in this order he marched against ECIVS : who had somewhat prolonged the time, by reason of a great mistrust which he had conceiued of SANGVIBANVS King of the Alanes, doubting that he would haue gone ouer to ATTILA : for he was aduertised that there had been some treaty between them ; wherein ATTILA granted to resigne to him a Citie, wherein he had lien, and which was taken from him. Wherefore ranging his Armie into three squadrons also, in the middle squadron, he set the said SANGVIBANVS, placing in the auaunt, and arierward of the troupe, the most valiant men of the Romane Legions, to the end that he should not chuse but fight. And to THEODORICVS with his sonne THORISMUND with his Gothes and Spaniards, he gaue the leading of the squadron on the right hand ; to the end that they should encounter the Gepidi, which were a mighty people. And he tooke to himselfe the leading of the left wing, taking with him MAROBVS, King of the French, with his people, and the Burgonians, whose King with the greatest part of his forces were slaine in an encounter which hapned the night before this battaile. With these troupes he placed himselfe against the Ostrogothes (the right wing of the enemy) changing it in this manner, for that he imagined, that if the Visigothes which were of his side, should haue been placed against the Gothes which were of the other side (for that they were countrie-men, and neighbours) they would not haue charged with such furie as he desired. In this order these two mightie Armies marched the one against the other, with incredible courage and assured confidence, the one to ouerthrow the other. And so there began between them, the most cruell and bloody battaile that euer was. For, although it may be sayd, that in other battailes there hath been so great a concourse of men, as they could not well be numbered ; yet they were not such men, as these which now fought ; or that it was so obstinate and cruelly fought, with the slaughter of so many men and effusion of so much blood as this was, I doe not remember that I euer read. For therein fought the Flower (for valour and courage) of almost all the Nations of the World : As, the Romanes, the Scythians, the Hunnes, the Gothes, the French, the Germanes, the Spaniards, the Gaules, the Burgonians, and of each of these a very great number : So as in my judgement, this may be recorded for the greatest and most fierce battaile that euer was. The first attempt was to get a little Hill betweene the two Armies, which either of the two Generals thought requisite to be taken, thereby to haue the aduantage of the other. ATTILA sent certaine troupes to take that Hill : but to that effect, thither already THORISMUND, sonne to THEODORICVS, was come with his people, which were Gothes and Spaniards ; so as these by this Hill, and all the rest presently gaue the charge : and the slaughter, the cries, and the sound of the blowes with swords and lances, was such, as it seemed the firmament had rent in sunder ; so as no man could doe any other but fight. And they all fought with such furie, as there was not any aduantage scene from none till night, for so long it endured. What particular exploits were therein performed, cannot certainly be knowne : for the Historiographers (which treat thereof) affirm, that among so great a multitude of people, it could not be seene nor iudged how things passed ; for euery one applied himselfe to strike, and to kill, and there was not any squadron or troupe that stood still, to looke on. But it is certaine, and they all affirme the same, that a little Brook, which ranne where this cruell battaile was fought, grew so high with the blood of those which were slaine, as it vsed to doe after some great raine had fallen. And the streames of blood were so great, as they carried the dead bodies down the valley. This ought not to be held for incredible, seeing the number of the dead was so great, as all authors agree it exceeded the number of one hundred & fourescore thousand men ; and they all lay dead in a small circuit of ground. For in this fight there was no retreat, nor running away, but all dyed fighting. In this manner, in the heat and fury of the fight, the night came vpon them, and parted them, but with great and apparant aduantage on ECIVS his side ; for ATTILA his troupes began to giue ground, notwithstanding that hee vsed all possible meanes to haue maintained the fight. And THEODORICVS, King of the Gothes and of Spaine, charging too farre in amongst his enemies, was slaine. Some say, that his horse fell with him, and so he was troden to death by his owne men ; and that his sonne THORISMUND falling into the like danger, was rescued by his people. ATTILA, perceiving the defect and weaknesse which was in his people, in the best order that he could retired to his fort or sconce, which he had made of his carts and wagons, and therein fortified himselfe that night, with those which repaired

How ECIVS marshalled his troupes.

A battaile fought betweene ECIVS and Attila, the most cruell that euer was fought in the world.

A strange sight.

Theodoricus
King of the Gothes slaine.

repaired to him from the battaile (for some were fled other wayes) there expecting the next dayes fortune. ECIVS went vp and downe the fields, as the Lord thereof, gathering his people together and setting them in order, to the end, that their disorder should not encourage the enemy ; for by reason of the multitude of people, and the darknesse of the night, it could not certainly be sayd who had the victory, and so they passed that night without any certain knowledge whether THEODORICVS were alieue or dead. The next morning by the breake of day the victory was apparant : for ATTILA durst not come forth of his campe, and so ECIVS and his souldiers had the spoile of the field, and were Lords thereof. The Armies were soneere together, as notwithstanding that ATTILA held himselfe for ouerthrowne, yet hee neither durst neither could retire : wherefore, he resolved to fortifie his campe and to defend himselfe therein. And as THORISMUND found his father dead in the field, he with his Gothes and Spaniards was so extreemly enraged, as he purposed to haue assaulted ATTILA in his campe, to reuenge the death of his father, by his ruine. For all Writers affirme that hee might haue done it, if ECIVS would haue consented thereto, and haue giuen him such ayd as he might haue done. And they also write, that ATTILA was in such despaire, when he vnderstood that they meant to assault him, seeing the small forces hee had to defend him, that he resolved rather to kil himselfe then to com into his enemies hands. But the wise & valiant captain ECIVS, knowing both the ambition and power of THORISMUND, THEODORICVS his sonne, and how mighty the Gothes were, was in great doubt, that they hauing wholly defeated ATTILA and his Armie, would haue conuerted their Arms against the Romanes, who would haue been vnable to defend themselves against them : and therefore it was most profitable (the time considered) to giue ATTILA meanes to escape ; to the end that the Gothes and French should not be freed from the feare of him. And to that end, without disconceing his conceit, he counselled THORISMUND, that setting all other matters aside, he should go to take possession of his kingdome of Spaine, before that the Alanes, the Sueuians, or any other Nations should cause any alteration, or rebell against him : And that before this, hee should not attempt any other enterprize ; for it was vncertaine whether he should be able to bring his purpose to effect. THORISMUND deeming this to be the counsell of a father, and a friend (as indeede it was profitable for him) accepted his aduice, and without any delay presently departed towards his countries, aswell those which he held in France, as those in Spaine. And ECIVS, for the consideration aforesaid, forbore to assault ATTILA's Camp : and so he and the kings which were with him had meanes to escape, and abandoned what he held in France. But the counsell of this great Captain (although that to this effect it seemed profitable) afterwards fell out cleane contrary : for it was the cause of his owne death, and of great miseries (as hereafter shall be declared) to the Romane Empire.

ATTILA being in this manner gone out of France, by long iournies, as a man vanquished, went with his Army into Hungary, and the countries there adiacent, of which he was in peaceable possession ; where relieuing his people, he rested certaine daies. From whence (they say) the Hungarians are descended, deriuing their name from the Hunnes and another nation called Catti or Gatti, and so they were called Hungary, and Pannonia is now called Hungaria ; although that neither in Hungary, neither in other Prouinces are obserued the limits and bounds which in ancient times they held. For as there haue beene great changes and alterations in the names ; so haue there beene likewise as great in their limits and confines. But seeing this concerneth me not, without producing any example, this shall suffice for an aduertisement to the Reader.

ECIVS (hauing obtained so great a victorie, leauing all that which in France the Romanes enioyed, and ATTILA had possessed, and the French and Burgonians in amitie, and friends) he came to Rome, where the Emperor VALENTINIAN expected the issue of the battaile. This victory freed all Italie from feare, and purchased to ECIVS the greatest honour possible ; he entering Rome with great solemnity and incredible ioy of all sorts of people : within few daies after (as the most of the Authors which I follow doe write) VALENTINIAN began to suspect, that he had an intent to haue made himselfe Emperor, and that he had intelligence with ATTILA ; The suspicion growing (as he said) for that ECIVS after the battaile did not wholly ruine ATTILA. And as EVTROPIVS particularly relateth, VALENTINIAN was so highly incensed against ECIVS by MAXIMVS a Gentleman of Rome, as he caused him to be slaine. Which (they say) MAXIMVS did to the end to be reuenged of VALENTINIAN (as afterwards he was) for rauishing his wife ; which iniurie he dissembled, and

A great victory
obtained by ECIVS against Attila.

ECIVS led in surrender by VALENTINIAN.

The death of ECIVS.

and made no shew to vnderstand, vntill that he had oportunitie to effect that which afterwards he put in execution, which was to kill the Emperour, which he neuer durst attempt so long as ECIVS liued. ECIVS being slaine at this time (although that PAVLYS DIACONVS seems to be of opinion that it was afterwards) with him ended the whole force and power of the Western Empire; whereof PROXIMVS a discrete and Noble Romane gentleman gaue VALENTINIAN to vnderstand. Who being demanded by the Emperour (as PROXIMVS writeth) whether he had not followed the best and most profitable counsell, by putting ECIVS to death, answered: whether the Emperour hath put ECIVS to death with or without reason, I dare not determine; but this I dare affirm, that by killing him, thou hast with thy own left hand cut off thy right. Sure, he was a true Prophet, as the Historie hereafter will make manifest.

While these things passed in the Western parts, the Emperour MARTIANVS reigned in great prosperity in Gracia and the East: for he was a very wise man, and a lover of peace; and so he maintained and preferred the same with the Persians and other Nations, without losing a nyot of his confines: but rather in all treaties, had euer the advantage, and got ground. He sent aide and men of warre to serue VALENTINIAN in the warres with ATTILA: so as MARTIANVS liued in prosperity and well beloued. But returning to our Western Historie (thus it went) As soone as ATTILA vnderstood that ECIVS was dead (the feare of whom made him to contain himselfe within Hungary and Germany) he resolved without any delay, setting all other matters apart, to come against Italy, which only being in peace, held for VALENTINIAN. And coming downe with a very mightie Armie, with some of those Kings before named, which after that he was driuen out of France, he had ioyned with him, he descended with great furie, taking by the way all the Cities and countries as he passed, putting all to fire and sword. And in this manner he entred poore Italy, through the Prouince of the Venetians now called Friulia, robbing and spoiling all places: where there came against him a Capitaine sent by VALENTINIAN with a great and mighty Armie, with which ATTILA fought a very cruell battaile: but the Imperiall Generall and Armie were overthrowne, with great losse and slaughter of men; and so ATTILA marching forwards, tooke many Cities: which put all Italy in such feare, that the inhabitants in no part thereof, held themselves in safety from the power and rage of ATTILA. And this his coming and the feare of him, was the cause of the first beginning of the mighty and famous Cite of Venice, which in those daies begonne to be built (according to the most part of the best Historiographers) by people which flying from the rage of ATTILA, reduced themselves to dwell in certaine little Ilands, with their wiues, children, and goods, where that Cite now standeth, imagining that there they might liue in safety: and there fortifying themselves in the best manner they could (for ATTILA his Armie did consist of land-men only) afterwards they resolved to continue there, notwithstanding that the feare was past, and began to set orders concerning their gouernement and iustice. And hauing good successe, they grew in processe of time to such greatnesse, that in a manner they became absolute Lords of the Sea, and gat many Ilands, kingdomes and Noble Cities, and are vntill these our daies the honour and credit of all Italy, and preserve their liberty inuiolate, calling their Cite Venitia, after the name of the Prouince from whence they came, which was the maine Land vpon the shore situate neerer to Venice: which, for that it appertaineth not to my Historie, I will passe over with silence, referring the Reader to BLONDVS, SABELLICVS, and other Authors which treat thereof at large.

ATTILA, hauing taken all the countie behinde him, besieged the Cite of Aquileia, which at that time was of great power, whereinto, besides the inhabitants, and such as were borne therein, entred many Romanes, and other of the Emperours souldiers which escaped from the battaile wherein their Generall was overthrowne: and they so valiantly defended the same, that ATTILA besieged it three yeeres, and could not take it, holding it for a great dishonour to raise his siege before he had it: in which time he did much harm in all the countrey round about, with his men of warre, and there were many conflicts between the besiegers and the besieged.

During the time of this long siege, GENSERICVS king of the Vandals made himselfe peaceable Lord of all Africa. And the French with MAROBVS their king grew mighty in France, and enlarged their Dominion, and the Burgonians in the countrey now called Burgundy did the like. And the Gothes, Alanes, and Sueuians in like manner in Spain, and in such part of France as is afore said. And the Emperour VALENTINIAN neuer came to relieue Aquileia, and as little did MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople, eyther through cowardize cowardize, peechcleinesse, ill gouernment, or want of power sufficient for such an enterprise, standing in feare of ATTILA and his power, who at the end of three yeeres that he had held the same besieged (relatoly assaulting it vpon a day with his whole Armie without any intermission, with drawing such as were weary and tyred, and setting others in their places) heooke it by force; and hauing sacked it, and put all to the sword which he found therein, he made it to be cast to the ground, not leaving any one house or building that might be inhabited, it hauing been one of the richest and most Noble Cities of that time: for Aquileia, and Rauenna, after Rome, were the best and most populous in that age.

ATTILA, hauing thus like a sauage barbarian ruined Aquileia, he marched forwards with great expedition; and within very few daies, tooke many excellent Cities and Townes; among which, were Munichia, Brescia, Cremola, Bergamo, and all their confines. The like he did by Adria and Padua; and other neighbour townes; and went to the Cite of Rauenna, which for that the Emperour held their court there, was the most famous Cite in all Italy, which yielded to him without any assault. From thence he marched into Tuscan, with a determination to haue made no stay vntill he came to Rome; and wholly to haue ruined the same; and so in speeche he gaue out. At that time LEO the first of that name was Pope, who at the request of the Emperour VALENTINIAN, accompanied with many Senators, went to ATTILA, and treating him for pities sake to spare Rome, and not to destroy that City; which Intreatie he made with such discretion and wisdom, and it pleased God to giue such efficacie to his words, as notwithstanding that ATTILA was the most cruell and inexorable Prince in the World; yet the Popes supplication did so much preuaile with him; that he not only gaue ouer his iourney to Rome, but resolved to depart out of Italy, and to returne to his ancient seat in Hungary, requiring first a great summe of money to be leuiued vpon the Cite for a signe and acknowledgement of Souerainty. And the state of Rome was now come to this point, as they durst not make denayll of any thing that ATTILA required at their hands; and (withall) they held it for a very great good hap, that ATTILA would forbear to put his cruell determination in execution.

Some Authors haue written (whether truly or falsly, I dare not maintaine) that all men wondering at this sodaine alteration of ATTILA his purposes, and some of his fauorites asking him the cause thereof; he answered, that he durst not denie the Popes demand: For, whilst he stood talking with him, he thought that he perceived two old men standing behinde him, with vnsheathed swords in their hands, threatening to kill him, if hee failed to perform what he required; and that he therefore durst do no other, which was held for a miracle.

After this agreement ATTILA returned into Hungary, where he was held for the greatest and most powerfull Prince of the World, and was so much feared, that MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople sent to sue for peace, and therewith sent him presents and money to obtaine the same. And he to the contrary sent to the Emperour VALENTINIAN, requiring him to send him his sister HONORATA for his wife; threatening, that if he sent her not he would againe returne into Italy, and destroy Rome. Whereof VALENTINIAN agreed by the content of his sister; For shee, by means of an Eunuch, had written to him, and receiued letters from him, procuring him to require her to wife whatsoeuer hapned; which she did, for that her brother constrained her to liue a maide, lockt vp to her disgrace, and to the dishonor of the Emperour her brother: and he fearing ATTILAS displeasure, sent him his sister, according to his request, and he tooke her to wife, together with others which as a Barbarian he held. This his marriage was the cause of his death: For he, holding a royall feast, and banquet at his wedding, dranke and ate that day so much: that waxing drowzie, and being overcome with slepe, he laid him downe; musing or groeling vpon his face, and nature being oppressed with what he had eaten and drunke, such abundance of blood gushed out at his nose, and with such vehemency, that in the space of an houre he was choaked therewith, and so hee ended, shedding his owne blood, who had caused fire and riuers of humane blood to flow; and had slaine a greater number of men, and vsed greater cruelty then any King or Capitaine that euer was before him.

The death of ATTILA gaue liberty to some Kings and Nations which were vnder him, and had serued him in all his warres, and there ensued great warres betweene them and his sons. But the Empire could neuer recover the Prouinces and Countries which it had lost in Germany, in France, in Spain, in England, and in Africa; although that in France and Spain it held some part: yet it so much declined and fell to so meane estate, as from henceforth wee shall write

The saying of Proximus to
the Emperour Valentinian.

Attila his coming into Italy,
Forum Iulij.

The beginning of the city of Venice.

Some are of opinion that it is called Venitia of these words Venite qua, u-fied by those which were first there, to induce the rest which were on land to come thither.

The siege of A-quileia.

Aquileia taken and razed by Attila.

Cities taken in Italy by Attila.

A great miracle of grace.

Attila had Valentinian's sister to wife.

The death of Attila.

The end of the Empire in the west.

of the Emperors and such accidents as happened in Italy, as additions annexed to the Empire of the East, principally naming the Emperors of Constantinople, wherein consisted the strength and power of the ancient Empire. For, after five or six Emperors, and some of them tyrants (as we will shortly declare) AVOVSIVS being the last of them, for the space of three hundred and thirtie yeeres the western Empire was wholly lost, and that which in Italia remained was subiect to the Emperors of Constantinople, who ruled the same by their Governors (called Exarchi) vntill the time of Pope L. so the third, in which time through the negligence and baseness of the Grecke Emperors, the Imperiall state was transported to the West, as when time cometh we will specifie.

The death of
the Emperor
Valentinian.

The next yeere after the death of ATRILA, the Emperour VALENTINIAN was slaine in Rome, by the secret practice and treason (as it was afterwards knowne) of MAXIMVS; and he, which executed this murder was a valiant souldier, who had serued that braue Captaine ECVS, whose name was TRASILIA, who did it in reuenge of the death of his Captaine, And so ended VALENTINIAN after that he had reigned thirtie yeeres; five and twentie in the company of his father in lawe THEODOSIUS the lesser, and five with MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople, whoby reason of his death remained sole Emperour, which happened in the yeere of our Lord (after most writers) foure hundred six and fiftie. He left not any sonne that might succede him, but two daughters by his wife EVDORIA.

THE LIFE OF MARTIANVS. ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRE AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR of ROME. (*)

Maximus surge: the name of Emperour.

Presently vpon the death of the Emperour VALENTINIAN in Rome, as PROCOPIVS, PAVLVVS DIACONVS and some others doe write, MAXIMVS for that he was a Romane Citizen, of high parentage, nobly defended, and of great authoritie in the Citie, presently vsurped the name of Emperour; and was possessed of Rome and of all Italie. And the better to assure his tyranny, he vsed such meanes, as (more by force, then any free consent) he married with EVDORIA, which had been VALENTINIAN'S wife, and daughter to the Emperour THEODOSIUS the lesser. Towhom after that he had her in his power, thinking thereby the better to winne her loue, he discovered and confessed that he had caused her husband to be slaine: with this addition, that he did it languishing for the loue of her; which did nothing allwaie her discontentment, but rather so much incensed her, that she resolved to be reueng'd on him by any means howsoever

uer. And imagining that from Constantinople, or from the Emperour MARTIANVS, the should not haue any redresse, she secretly wrote to GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, who then reigned in Africa, very effectually recommending her vnto him, and earnestly intreating him to set her at libertie, and to deliuer her from the power of MAXIMVS; who was a tyrant and a traitor. GENSERICVS to take the benefit of the time, and in hope to make himselfe Lord of Italy, or at least to haue the spoile thereof, employing his whole power, raised the greatest Armie he was able, and vsing all possible expedition sailed into Italy, being so strong as Authors affirm, that he brought with him three hundred thousand men in his Armie: against whose power MAXIMVS was neither able, neither durst make any resistance, notwithstanding that he attempted as farre as he could: wherefore being altogether hopelesse and in despair, he resolved to flic, and to abandon Rome; but by the way he was slaine by a Roman captaine called VRVS.

Genericus
came into Italy
with 300000
men.
The death of Maximus.

When GENSERICVS arriued on the coast of Italy, there was so great feare in Rome, as all the principal citizens abandoned the Citie: wherefore Pope L. so seeing the calamitie likely to fall vpon it, resolved to hazard his life for the same. And knowing how great cruelty GENSERICVS had vsed against the Bishops in Africa, as an Heretike (for he was an Arian) before that he came to Rome, he went forth to meete him, and in great humilitie intreated him for the Honor of Christ to mitigate his furie, and to content himselfe with the wealth of Rome, without spoiling and sacking the Churches and Temples. But this cruell king forbore not to march to Rome, and to enter it with his whole Armie, and robbed and spoiled without any difference as well the sacred, as the prophane. Being in Rome thus buisied, in the space of foureteene daies, he departed from thence, carying with him infinite wealth, and rich prisoners; and so Rome being the head of the world, and Queene of all Nations, was spoiled, dishonoured, and sacked by the Vandales, hauing already at another time been spoiled by the Gothes, as aboue is mentioned: a wonderfull example, to moue a man to make little account of the power & riches of this world. Leaving the Citie thus wasted (notwithstanding that at the intreaty of Pope L. so he commanded that no edifice or buildings should be set on fire, neither any man to be slaine or tortured) he led with him from Rome the Emperesse EVDORIA, and her two daughters which she had by VALENTINIAN, which he afterwards caried with him into Africa. After that GENSERICVS departed from Rome, he did the like in many other Cities in the marches thereof, as he had done there: and destroying the Citie of Capua, for that it made some resistance, he went to Naples, and besieged it, thinking to haue wonne it by assault. But the inhabitants so manfully defended it, that he was driuen to raise his siege, and so returned into Africa laden with the spoiles and wealth of Italie, where he married one of the Emperour VALENTINIAN'S daughters, which he brought with him from Rome to his sonne TRASTMYNDVS, who succeeded him in his estate.

Rome sacked by Genericus.

The Emperesse Eudoxia, and her two daughters caried into Africa.

This befell in the sixt yeere of the raigne of MARTIANVS, being the next yeere after the death of VALENTINIANVS. GENSERICVS with his Armie hauing left Rome, and being departed out of Italie, the principall Senators and Romane Gentlemen, which through want of forces and of an Emperour, had abandoned the Citie, presently returned, and by common consent, chose for Emperour of Rome, Italie and Sicilie (for now in a manner all the rest of the state was vsurped) an antient Noble Romane Gentleman, both for age and blood, of the order and dignity of Senator, whose name was AVITVS: which when the Emperour MARTIANVS vnderstood, as a gentle and religious Prince, he was very glad thereof, and allowed and ratified his election, in hope of better order to be taken in the Government; and so it seemed that there was good hope to haue preserved the Empire in that state wherein it then was. But all was disturbed through the death of MARTIANVS, who was poisoned in Constantinople, by the practice and deuce of ARDABYRVS, and his father ASPAR, who were his Captaines: which happened in the yeere of our Lord 459, he hauing reigned seuen yeeres. This MARTIANVS was a vertuous and a iust Prince, and preferred and enlarged the Easterne Empire;

Auitus chosen Emperour by the Romans.

Martianus poisoned in Constantinople.

THE LIFE OF LEO THE FIRST, BEING THE FIVE AND FIFTITH ROMANE EMPEROR; AND OF THOSE WHICH IN HIS TIME TOOK Vpon THEM THE NAME OF Emperors.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

When Martianus was dead, some which had bene the causes thereof sought to haue vsurped the Empire: wherein failing to effect their desires, they made Leo Emperour, being a Greeke borne, who in the beginning of his Empire bare himselfe so valiantly, that there was not an enemy so hardie, as to make warre against him. But in the Westerne Empire many tyrants arose, and many Emperours; which for that they liued not long, were the cause of great alterations and combustions: and the Vandales aduentured to come into Italy, against whom Leo sent a good and a worthy sctee, vnder the conduct of a Capitaine called Basiliscus, who encountering them, ouerthrew them. In the meane time Leo in Constantinople was driven to fight against some who sought to haue vsurped: who being overcome and slaine, he had great difficultie to rescue Rome, which was sacked and spoiled by many under the name of Emperours; which for that they liued not long, or were deposed from that dignity by others which were more mighty then they, were the causes of very great troubles in the Westerne Empire, in the middle of which tumults ensued the death of the Emperour Leo in Constantinople, when he had reigned feneenteene yeeres.

Resently when MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople was dead (whose death was greatly lamented) the principall men began to consult about the choosing of a new Emperour: and ASPAR, who wrought the last Emperours death, sought to haue bene his successor: but he preuailed not, for as much as he was of the Arrian sect: for as the Catholike Christians were the stronger side, so they would not consent to his election. But seeing that he could not obtaine the Empire for himselfe, hee bare a great sway in the election of another, which was an excellent man both in peace and warre, a Tribune, whose name was LEO, a Greeke borne, and the first that euer was Emperour of the Greeke Nation, and as most Authoivs write, was born in the City of Bessica. But ASPAR first made this bargain with him, that when he should be

be in full possession of the Empire, hee should then make his sonne, ARDABYRVS, CÆSAR; although it succeeded not. This being concluded, LEO was chosen and obeyed for Emperour: and gouerning the Empire in good order and with good successe, in the beginning thereof he wan great credit and reputation; so as neither Africa, Asia, nor Persia, durst to stirre against him: but in the West, in Italie, and in Sicilia, there were great alterations, and many were Emperours more in name, than in power or authority comparable to the Antient. And that old and mighty King GENSERICVS neuer desisted from infesting Italie, coming himself in person, and sending his fleets to rob and spoil the Countrey; so that (as EVYROPVS relateth) he ruined and laid waste many Cities, and in the end became sole and absolute Lord of all Sicilia. In the first year of the Reign of LEO, AVITYS died in Rome, who (as we said) reigned there, and the Roman Army, being then neere to Ravenna, chose and nominated for Emperour a good man of warre, whose name was MAIORANVS: whereto the Emperour LEO gaue his consent.

The death of A. vitus.

This MAIORANVS was a good Prince, and an excellent Captain, for the time he reigned: for, he took great care, and vsed great diligence in defense of Italie against the Vandals & GENSERICVS their King: and to that end he raised a great Army, and remained for the most part of his time vpon the sea-side, to be the better able to send relief and succour where most need required. This prospering well with him, and seeing himself mighty and strong in men and munition, he resolved to haue sailed into Africa, in hope and with intent to haue reconquered the same; but he could not accomplish that good work: for, death surprisid him when he had reigned three yeeres and odde moneths. Some say, that hee died of a disease: and others say, that the same Army that chose him slue him. In place of MAIORANVS rose vp another Emperour, which was an eminent man called SEVERIANVS; who, besides the ordinary warres against the Vandals, was troubled with another against the Alanes: who, with GEORGE their King departing from Spain, where they had of long time inhabited together with the Gothes, resolved to come into Italie, thinking to haue conquered the same, and to haue made themselves Lords of certain places in Lumhardy: against whom, SEVERIANVS commanded an Armie to bee leuied, and made a valiant man called RITHINER Generall thereof, who was by lineage a Goth, but now made a Citizen of Rome, and received into the degree and dignity of a Roman Gentleman. The King of the Alanes coming with the Roman Generall neere to the City of Bergamo, to a battell which of either party was very cruell, in the end the Alanes were ouerthrowne, and their King slain.

The death of Majoranus, chosen Emperour.

Seuerianus chosen Emperour.

After this victory and other accidents which happned of lesse moment, SEVERIANVS died in Rome, when he had gouerned the Empire in Italy almost foure yeeres: and in his place was chosen a very excellent man of war, sent thither by the Emperour LEO to succour and protect Italy against the Vandals, who was called ANTHEMIVS, and was sonne-in-law to the late Emperour MARTIANVS, LEO's Predecessor. There presently arose against ANTHEMIVS (intituling himself Emperour) a Captain whose name was GERVANDVS, who was Prefect and Gouernor of the Prouince of Narbonne; which was all that remained subject to the Empire in France. But ANTHEMIVS speedily sent his Captains against him: and, being by them taken, hee was condemned to perpetual exile; and ANTHEMIVS established in his place a friend of his which was a good Captain, called BELIMER, to gouern the Countrey of Gallia Narbonensis. This rebellion was scarcely ended, when in Rome another prime man arose, and would also haue rebelled, called PATRICIVS: but ANTHEMIVS pacified that matter with as great facility as the rest.

The death of Seuerianus.

Anthemius chosen Emperour.

Geruandus was called Emperour.

During all these alterations, and the death of Emperours in Italie, the Emperour LEO gouerned Greece and the East very valiantly, and in peace. But the ould and politick GENSERICVS, King of the Vandales in Africa, seeing the alterations and troubles which daily happened in Italie, resolved with himself to invade it, and to make himself absolute Lord thereof; which was a thing that hee long desired, as a man who had tasted the sweetness of the wealth and riches of Rome. Whereupon hee mustred vp his valiant Vandales, and the countrey Inhabitants of Africa and other Nations; and armed and rigged the mightiest Armie and Nany that hee euer before had leuied. Whereof when LEO was aduertised, and knowing that ANTHEMIVS had not power sufficient to defend himself against GENSERICVS, and that if ANTHEMIVS sped ill, his estate was not assured (at the least Slauonia, and those Countiees which bordered vpon Italy) he resolved to imploy his whole power against GENSERICVS, in defense of ANTHEMIVS; who of his side made all the prouision of men and Arms that Genfericus, King of the Vandals, came again into Italie.

possibly he was able, for the defence of Italy, and had rigged vp an excellent fleet for the Sea. When L eo had prepared his Armie and fleet, he made one B asili c vs, a great man in his countrie, Generall thereof, who was his brother in law, being brother to his wife the Emperesse, and was also brother in law to A nthem i vs: for A nthem i vs had married his sister. B asili c vs, with his great fleet departing from Greece, safely arrived in Italy; and ioyning with the fleet which A nthem i vs had prepared, they went in quest of G enseric c vs, who with no lesse a fleet was come vpon the same coast.

These two Naues being come within sight one of the other, and G enseric c vs knowing his enemies souldiers to be farre more readie and expert in Sea seruices then his were, would gladly haue avoided the fight; but he was so charged by B asili c vs, that he could not chuse but fight: and as the battaile was fearfully begun, so was it cowardly maintained. And he feeling his disadvantage, would haue gon out of the fleet, whilest the ships were fighting one with an other, and did attempt to haue done so: which the rest of his fleet perceiving, they all presently turned their backs, and he was apparently ouerthrowne: where he lost many of his ships and much people; and so very shamefully fled into Africa. Whom B asili c vs pursued, and took land but two hundred and fourescore furlongs from Carthage: and (as P roco p ri u s reporteth) if he had presently gone thither he had easily taken the same. And G enseric c vs being without forces (as he then was) he might haue taken all that prouince: for alreadie on the other side towards the East, another Captaine whom L eo had sent, whose name was H erac l i u s, had taken the citie of Tripoli, and other townes: but through ignorance, or as some say, B asili c vs being corrupted with a great summe of money by G enseric c vs, he forswould the warres, and was content to retire his Armie into Sicilia, and there to recover what G enseric c vs possessed. Whilest as the Emperor L eo's Captaines and souldiers performed these seruices, he himselfe was not idle in Constantinople: for A spar and his sonne A rdab r i u s had caused great combustions. And as they were chiefe in making him Emperour; so were they of great power and authoritie in his Court, and in the government of the Empire: besides that both the father and the sonne had euer been eminent men, and very powerful. This A spar, perceiving that B asili c vs the Emperors Generall prospered well in all his actions, began to feare to fall from that dignitie which he then enjoyed; imagining that the Emperor being out of feare of G enseric c vs, would make small account of him: and to auoide this, he resolved whilest B asili c vs was in the warres, to importune and vrge him to nominate and make his sonne A rdab r i u s, C esar, according to his former promise when he was chosen Emperour; which he had hitherto deferred, by entreating them with some apparant reasons. But now A spar (as a mightie man) so audaciously importuned him to hold his word, as taking hold of the Imperiall robe which the Emperor then ware, he said, L eo thou oughtest to performe what thou hast promised me; for he that wareth this robe ought not to lie. Whereto the Emperor answered: And much lesse ought he to endure that any man vse violence or force him.

A spar, perceiving the Emperors determination, resolved to make his sonne C esar by force; and accounting himself of sufficient power to effect it, gaue him the name of C esar; and leuying such forces as he was able, the warre began between him and the Emperor. Some say that L eo nominated him C esar, and that the Catholike Christians would not yeld thereto, for that A spar and his sonne A rdab r i u s were both Arian hereticks: whereof ensued great tumults. But howsoeuer the matter went, it is certaine that they tooke Armes against their Soueraigne, and that their men of warre fought one partie against other. Wherefore in great haste L eo sent to recall his Generall B asili c vs from Sicilia, to the end that with his Armie and fleet he should come to his aide: but before that he could come, the Emperour was in great danger, and likely to haue been vtterly lost and ouerthrowne.

But being come with his Armie, notwithstanding that there were many skirmishes within the citie of Constantinople, and that in apparence it seemed the matter went in a manner at euē hand (for A spar and his sonne were excellent men of warre, very rich and of great power) yet in the end L eo's partie prevailed, and the two tyrants were taken and put to death by the Emperours commandment: and so was he freed from this daunger and seruitude.

But there presently ensued other troubles with the Ostrogothes, which had accompanied A ttila in his warres. For B alem i r and T hodomir Kings of those Gothes, with all their whole power, after many battailes fought between them and the sonnes of A ttila (which I write not; for that it appertaineth not to our historie) resolved to make warre in the

Genseric
ouerthrowne
in a battaile by Sea.

Speeche vtter-red by Aspar
to the Emper-L eo, with his assure.

Aspar made Cesar by his father Ardaburius by force.

Aspar and his sonne Ardaburius, slaine
by the commandment of the Emperour L eo.

East Empire: and beginning in Slauonia, they put the Emperor L eo to great care and trouble. But he, as a wise Prince and a lover of peace (seeing that there was no other remedie) gaue them Hungarie and Austria, and taking hostages and great assurances of them, concluded a peace; which at that time was very necessary and profitable for the Empire, although nothing honourable. He also granted vnto them Serua, Misia, and Walachia.

In the meane season, after the ouerthrow of G enseric c vs, the Emperor A nthem i vs liued in peace in Italy. But as there is no constancy in humane estates, and that in the time of most prosperity, there many times happen the greatest disasters and calamities; R ithiner, who (as we said) ouerthrew the Alanes and slew their King neere to the Citie of Bergama, being growne proude and vaine glorious, by reason of so famous a victory, forgetting the fauours which A nthem i vs had bestowed vpon him (first in marrying him to his owne daughter; and then making him Governour generall of Gallia Cisalpine, now called Lombardy) resolved to rise and rebell against his father in law, and soueraigne Lord; by either of which he was bound to haue been a faithfull and loyall seruant; and to that end resolved to come with the greatest force that he was able, against the Emperor A nthem i vs: whereupon, all Italie was in Armes, either for the one party or for the other. But Pope E phani u s vsed the meanes to bring them to a peace: which he caused to be confirmed vpon certaine conditions, and with exceeding great oathes. But the wicked R ithiner (within a litle while after) brake all, and with his Army came to the walls of Rome, making warre against all such as tooke part with the Emperour.

A nthem i vs was then vn furnished of any sufficient Army to take the field; and therefore contenting himself to defend the Citie, suffered it to be besieged, expecting the succours which came to him out of France. For B alem i r (whom as we haue said, he had made Governour of Gallia Narbonensis) vnderstanding in what distresse he was (as a loyall and gratefull seruant) resolved to come with the greatest power he was able to leuie, to relieue his soueraigne Lord and to raise the siege. And the Emperor L eo b vnderstanding what past in Italie, and knowing how small meanes and power A nthem i vs had to defend himselfe, being informed also of the treason of R ithiner, with all speed he sent into Italie a Captaine whose name was O l i b ri u s, with a good Army against him; with authoritie, when he should fee time fit for it, to take the name of Emperour. Which when A nthem i vs vnderstood, thinking by this meane to be freed from the siege, wherewith the Citie was distressed, he agreed that the other should be called Emperour, and willingly allowed his name and title.

But before that O l i b ri u s could come, B alem i r arrived with such succours, as he brought with him out of France: and seeking to enter Rome, and to ioyne with A nthem i vs, R ithiner got between him and the Citie, in such manner, that whether B alem i r would or would not, they came to blowes, and there was between them a cruell battell, wherein the loyall Captaine (through the secret iudgement of God) was slaine by the traitor: whereupon, the people of Rome being out of hope of this succour (and as O l i b ri u s which came from Constantinople was in Rauenna, so farre from Rome) they so cowardly fainted, as R ithiner entred the Citie by force; and being in possession thereof, put his Lord and father in law the Emperour to death, and sacked the whole Citie, excepting two streets wherein hee was lodged. And so this was the third time that Rome endured wants and much trouble in defending it selfe, and violence and spoile after it was taken. So that (as it hath been scene, and hereafter will often appeare) this World knoweth not how to giue any good thing, but takes it away againe; neither how to aduance, but to the end to pull downe againe. Rome had commanded and subdued the whole World, and had reigned ouer all the habitable knowne Nations of the earth: it had tamed and deputed great Kings and Common-wealths of their Kingdomes and Dominions, and had enriched it selfe with the spoiles and wealth (in a manner) of all the Nations and Cities of the World. Neuerthelesse, through the diuine prouidence of God, in proceesse of time it was taken and spoiled by the same people and Nations which it had subdued, and brought vnder their yoke. And those Nations came to Rome, tooke it, and made spoile thereof, as if they had come to fet home, and to haue that restored to them, which in former time was taken from their Auncestors; which the Reader may plainly perceiue by that which is already written, and shall be written hereafter: which will shew how often Rome hath beene entred and taken by force, and how often it hath beene sacked and spoiled, and indured such like disasters and calamities.

But to returne to our History: R ithiner being Master and Commander of Rome, and Rithiner rebelled against the Emperour A nthem i u s in Italie.

Balemier
ouerthrowne
and slaine by Rithi-ner.

Rome taken and sacked the third time by Rithi-ner, wherein the Emperour An-themius was slaine.

Rithner made Emperor of Rome, and his death.
Olibrius made Emperor, and his death.

of the rest of Italie, with the power and name of Emperor (excepting Ravenna, and the marches thereof, which was defended by OLIBRIUS) three moneths only hee enjoyed this sovereignty: after which, he fell into an extreme sickness, whereof he died in terrible pain. And as soon as he was dead, OLIBRIUS was proclaimed Emperor in Rome, who then was in Ravenna: and coming thither, and giving out the signes and shew of an excellent good Governour, within foure months he died of his natural death. And as Rome had lost her power and authority: so had the Emperors thereof little health, and short life. For, who-so shall make a computation thereof, shall finde, that whilst L E o reigned in the East, there were in Italie (by good and bad titles) one and other, six or seven Emperors.

Glizerius
made Emperor, and deposed.

Presently after the decease of OLIBRIUS, the Senate of Rome, considering the losses and tyrannies past, would have used their authority in chusing an Emperor by voices, and by general consent, with good aduice and consideration; but they could not bring their purpose to effect: for, being overruled by GVANDIBARVS (a Captain who then was in Ravenna) they made choice of one GLIZERIVS a Senator of Rome, who was in Ravenna with him. Yet his Empire lasted but a while: for, the Emperour L E o, vnderstanding that his election was by force, sent against him a Captain called NEPOS, with the title and name of Emperor; who, being assisted by the Romans which against their wils had sworn obedience to GLIZERIVS, deposed him, and made him against his will to take Monastical Orders, and gaue him a Bishoprick: but he took the Empire to himself; which was the occasion of many commotions and troubles in Italie. For, GVANDIBARVS, who had advanced GLIZERIVS, took his suppression for a great disgrace and an indignity done to himself: wherefore he leuied an Army, to the end to haue restored him. But Pope EPIPHANIUS used such diligence, and took such pains in the matter (who, as we said, made the peace between BALBIR and ANTHEMIVS, although it continued not long) that hee made a stay thereof, procuring peace between them: so as they laid down their Arms; and for that time NEPOS remained in peace in Rome. But, as hee liued in that estate, he was aduertised that HENRY King of the Gothes (who then reigned in Tholose in France, and in the greatest part of Spain) made warres upon those Countries which were subject to the Romans; and had taken certain Towns; so as it was feared that he would haue proceeded further. NEPOS, to shew his power, leuied a very good Armie; and, making one ORBSTES, a private friend of his, General thereof, commanded him to take his way towards France. But ORBSTES, departing with very great forces, took no care for going that journey according to his commission, which had been more for his honour; but rather, as soon as he came to Ravenna (having first founded the good will of his Army, so far forth as he thought expedient) made his son to be called Emperor, whose name was AVGVSTVS; whom the Romans called AVGVSTVLVS (for, that name they gaue him when hee was a child) and so he is called by all Historians. And having brought this to effect, he resolved to return to Rome against NEPOS; who, as hee had employed all his men of warre and whole power in that Army, was not of force able to stay his coming, neither to make any defense or resistance against him. Wherefore he abandoned Rome, and the hope to bee any longer Emperor, having been so but a little while; and fled into Dalmatia, which was vnder the jurisdiction of the Emperor L E o: and so AVGVSTVLVS continued in Rome in possession, and with the name and title of Emperor.

Orcestes, being sent by the Emperor Nepos with an Armie into France, made his son to be called Emperor.

The Emperor Nepos, abandoning Rome, fled into Dal-
matia.
Augustulus made Emperor.
The death of the Emperor Leo in Constantinople.

While the affairs of Italie stood in this estate, the Emperor L E o died in the City of Constantinople, having reigned (as writeth PAVLVS DIACONVS) seuenteen yeers with great valor and honour, as an excellent Prince, in the yeer of our Lord foure hundred, threecore and sixteen; who left not behinde him any sonne to inherit, but two daughters, the one called ARADNE, and the other, L BONCIA: the one was married to ZENO, who afterwards was Emperor; and the other to MARTIANVS, sonne of ANTHEMIVS, who (as we haue said) had been Emperor of Italie: yet some say, that ARADNE, who was wife to ZENO, was not his daughter, but his sister, and that hee instituted a sonne of hers before his death for Emperour, and his Successor. His death was condoled by all, and many lamented the same with tears.

The Emperour L E o being dead in Constantinople, and AVGVSTVLVS reigning in Rome, the general estate of all the Provinces that were wont to be in subjection to the Empire, stood in this manner: The Gothes, with their King called by some EVRIQVS, and by other HENRICVS, held Tholose, and that part of France which borders vpon Spain, and the greatest part of Spain it self. The Suenians in Gallia, and in part of the Kingdome of Leon, held warres with the the Gothes, and to the Empire remained some haucn townes on the coast of Arragon, Cathagena, and Tarragona, and some others also. The Alanes which remained in Spain, dwelt together with the Gothes in a part of Spain towards Italy: and after the names of these two nations, that province was called Gotalonia, which now through corruption of speech is called Catalunia. In France reigned the French, in Paris and in all the countries round about it, and in other countries with all that which we now call Flanders and Picardie, whose king was called HERERICVS. The Burgonians held the two Burgundies, and the Empire held no more but Marbone, and some land thereto neere adioining, which continued but a while in the Emperours iurisdiction. In England reigned the English Saxons, and in Scotland the Picts and Scots. In Hungarie, Austria, and Misia, Serua, and Walachia, the Ostrogothes, with their King TODOMIR, and his sonne THEODORICVS, by permission of the Emperour L E o, bare the sway. In Africa were the Vandales, and their very old King GENSERICVS, many times spoken of: who died within a little while after, and his sonne HONORICVS succeeded him. The most of the provinces of Germany were vsurped by the successors of the Hunnes, called Hercul, Turing, and others which came thither with ATRILA: and betwene all these nations and countries and their Kings were great warres, each of them courting to enlarge his territorie and dominion. All the Easterne provinces were in peace subiect to the Empire, and to the Easterne Emperour, who then was L E o, nephew of that L E o of whom we but now discoursed.

THE LIFE OF LEO, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SIXE AND FIFTITH ROMANE EMPEROR, And of his Father ZENO.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Emperour Leo being dead, his Nephew, whose name was also Leo, took possession of the Empire: to whom it seemed a matter unreasonable, that his father, whose name was Zeno, should live as a private man, and be an Emperour: wherefore he renounced the Empire unto him, and crowned him with his owne hand, and within short space after dyed. Zeno being then made Emperour, the widow Emperesse being much displeased that he should enjoy so great a dignity, procured Basiliscus a Captain of his owne, to rebel against him; who making himselfe Emperour, compelled Zeno to flee into Isauria in Asia: but he continued not long in that miserie, for Basiliscus being hated for his pride, behuied himselfe so, as Zeno was restored to the Empire. Whilst as he liued in the East in peace, the Westerne Empire and Rome were so troubled, that Orestes father to the Emperour Augustulus was taken prisoner in Pavia, and there slaine. And Augustulus (for feare) left the Imperiall ensignes, the Empire and Rome to the discretion of Odoacer, who was afterwards displaced by Theodoricus King of the Ostrogothes. And Zeno having been somewhat troubled with warres in the East, and having obtained victorie against two tyrants, which were Alpar and his sonne Ardaburius, which rose against him, dyed of an ordinary death in Constantinople, when he had reigned sixteen yeeres.

Am of opinion that the Reader hath sufficiently vnderstood, in what estate the Empire remained, when the Emperour L E o died in Constantinople: wherefore I hold it needlesse to make any repetition thereof. I say then, that as soone as L E o departed out of this life, his Nephew without any contradiction was acknowledged and obeyed for Emperour, whose name also was L E o. For as I sayd, his Grandfather had chosen and so appointed him to be, before his death, and hee held the Empire the space of certaine moneths: at the end of which he did a thing which seemeth strange, and breedeth admiration. Which was, that of his owne accord

Leo refused the Empire, and gave it to his father Zeno.

cord and voluntarie free will (holding it a hard case, that the father should be subject and inferior to the sonne) he renounced the Empire, and gave it to his father ZENO, and crowned him with his owne hand, and presently did him homage. For fathers in their life time to give to their children their kingdoms and dignities, is a thing we have seene, and often read of; and it seemeth that there is reason to induce them thereto: but seldom hath any man euer heard, that the sonne would dispossesse himself of a kingdom or Empire, to give it to his father. For it hath rather happened to the contrary, that the sonne hath bereaved the father thereof by force in his life time, yea and sometimes hath wished and practised his fathers death, to be his heire, and to succede him. Therefore I say, that this accident is very strange, and the reverence and obedience of this sonne much to be noted.

But it succeeded in this manner, that ZENO was crowned and obeyed for Emperor in Constantinople, and his sonne LEO remained in his former estate. To the contrary hereof, in Italy ORBESUS made his sonne AVGVSTVLVS Emperor, not desiring or procuring it for himselfe. LEO having renounced the Empire and given the same to his father (as IORDANES and other authors say) died within few daies after. But PAVLVVS DIACONVS reporteth after another manner: for he saith that the father fought his sonnes death, from which he was delivered by making himselfe a Priest, and so lived certaine yeeres. But howsoever it was, there is no more mention made of LEO, and his father ZENO began to rule the Empire. Going in progresse to visit the same, being in Chalcadonia, the widow Emperesse, his wifes mother, who remained in Constantinople, repining to see ZENO Emperor, whom her husband LEO euer accounted worthe of the Empire (as IORDANVS writeth) induced her brother BASILISCVS, who (as we said) ouerthrew GENSRICVS in a battaile at sea, to take upon him the name of Emperor. And as by reason of that victorie and the affinitie which he had with the late Emperor LEO, he was very mightie and highly esteemed: so was he both able and willing to make himselfe Emperor, and for such was received; and they sware obedience vnto him in Constantinople. Which as soone as ZENO vnderstood (whether it were through basenesse of minde, or to auoide the warres and the effusion of blood which would haue ensued) he took no care to make any head against him, but retired himselfe into Isauria, which is a very strong and guardable prouince in Asia the lesse, where he assured himselfe to line in securitie. Whereof BASILISCVS waxing proud, and very ioyfull, and holding himselfe now safe and past all danger, he made his sonne MARCVS, CÆSAR. But his pride and ioy continued but a while: for as he was infected with the Nestorian heresie, so he began to persecute and afflict the Church and Catholike Christians; by meanes whereof (as IORDANVS and PROCOPIVS report) he grew so hatefull, and was so abhorred by all sortes of people, that those Captiues which he sent against ZENO, returned against himselfe, and by the generall consent of all men ZENO was restored, and reestablished in the Empire; and he with his sonne MARCVS and VERINA his sister, were taken prisoners, and being banished died in exile. In this manner remained ZENO mightie and in peace, hauing bin dispossessed of the Empire the space of eightene moneths: where we will leaue him, and returne to speake of AVGVSTVLVS the Emperor of the West, or to say better, of Italy.

Whilest these things passed in the East, we told you how that ORBESUS had exalted his sonne, and made him Emperor against NEPOS, who held his Empire in Rome, and that NEPOS had abandoned Italy, and AVGVSTVLVS remained there; and seeing that in Italy no man durst oppose himselfe against him; by the aduice and counsell of his father he made peace, and entred in league with GENSRICVS King of the Vandales in Africa, who was now growne old and worne with beaung armes, and euen at deaths dore. By reason of which league, hee held himselfe to be in great securitie: for of ZENO he made no account, seeing the discord between him and BASILISCVS. But his trouble and ruine sprang from whence he least mistrusted it; for the Heruli and the Turingi, a people of which we haue made mention, and which had serued in the warres vnder ATTILA the mightie King of the Hunnes, and which at that time inhabited along the riuier of Danubius, in the furthest confines of Hungary, took for their Capitaine a man of their own nation called ODOACER, with a resolution to come into Italy, and to make a conquest thereof; seeing that no man had any right thereto, but he who was of greatest power, and could best fight for it. And it was the will and pleasure of God, that as Italy had sent Captains to the conquest of all parts and nations of the world, so should Captains and men of war come from all parts and nations of the earth to make a conquest thereof. Leaving apart other accidents which by the way befell ODOACER; hee beeing approached to the

Borders

Borders of Italy, ORBESUS, the father of AVGVSTVLVS, sallied forth to encounter him, with an excellent Armie which the father and sonne (hauing intelligence of his coming) had leuiued.

The two Armies being com within sight one of the other, both the Generals would haue fought: but certain companies of ORBESUS his souldiers went ouer vnto ODOACER, which when he perceived (reposing no firm confidence in the rest which remained) hee retired in the best order he could towards Ticinum, which is now called Pavia, a City in Lombardy; and ODOACER pursued him. But ORBESUS, hauing no sufficient Armie to take the field to fight with him, suffred himself to be besieged in that City: And notwithstanding that he did as much as was possible for his defense, yet the assaults giuen were so terrible, that the City was entred by force, after that hee had defended it many daies, and ORBESUS taken: on whom, and the souldiers which were with him, ODOACER souldiers executed extreme cruelty. And from thence ORBESUS was carried prisoner to Placencia; where, by ODOACERS commandement, he was put to death.

After that ODOACER had obtained this victory (as AVGVSTVLVS his Empire had but a weak foundation, and lesse equity of his side) all things went against him, and prospered with his enemy: and so with small difficulty, and as little resistance, ODOACER took all the cities of Italy, and presently proclaimed himself Lord and King thereof.

When AVGVSTVLVS vnderstood that all the towns and people took part with ODOACER, he departed from Rauenna, where he then kept his Court, to go to Rome: but by the way, before he came thither, being out of hope, hee voluntarily put away his Robes and Impetiall Enginies, abandoning Rome, and fled; contenting himself with the hope of sauing his life, when he had reigned two yeeres a peaceable Emperor: and so he afterwards ended his life in poeuertie and misery (as it is to be presumed); for, the Historiographers make no more mention of him. Rome being abandoned by AVGVSTVLVS, ODOACER without any resistance possessed himself of all Italie, which he enjoyed foureteen yeeres in great prosperity: after which we will tell you who were Lords thereof. And so in this AVGVSTVLVS ended the Empire and dominion of Rome; which afterwards had no Emperor for the space of three hundred and thirtie yeeres. This happened in the year one thousand, two hundred, nine and twenty. after the building of Rome; and in the five hundred, nine and twentieth after that IVLVVS CÆSAR made himself Tyrant and Lord thereof; and in the year four hundred, seventy and seuen, after the birth of our Saviour CHRIST.

In these times (as PAVLVVS DIACONVS and BLONDVS write) there arose a Nobleman in England, by linage a Roman, descended from those which in ancient time had dwelt in that land; whose name was AMBROS, who joyning with the Britans, the ancient Inhabitants of that Country, against the Angles, fought many battels with them; but in the end hee was ouerthrowne and slain. Whereupon, many of those Britans resolved to abandon that land; and in Barks and Ships (such as they could get) embarked themselves, and sailed ouer into that Coast of France which for that cause is now cald Britanny; where in those daies dwelt a people called Veneti, Cenomanni, and others: where, sometimes by leaue, and with the good will of the Inhabitants, and sometimes without it, they inhabited and possessed themselves of that Country; and haue continued there euer since with good successe; that the name thereof and their language continueth there untill this day, and is one of the best Prouinces of all France; wherein haue been mighty Princes; but, by means of sundry alterations, the French Kings is now Lord thereof.

After this, the Emperor ZENO reigned in Constantinople, and ODOACER in Italie, some yeeres peaceably; so as there hapned not anything in the Empire worth the writing; but in the end fortune turned her wheel in such manner, that ODOACER justly lost all that which hee had wrongfully gotten; and one Tyrant was bereaued of what he had taken from another Tyrant which happened in such manner as we will set down. THEODORICVS, son of THEODOMIR King of the Ostrogothes, who in the time of the Emperor LEO the First had lien in hostage in Constantinople, when his father and vncle made peace with LEO, who granted vnto them Austria, Hungary, and Misilia, to inhabit; at this time his father THEODOMIR being dead, THEODORICVS succeeded him in the Kingdom: whereof when the Emperor ZENO was aduertised, he sent Ambassadors to him; giuing him to vnderstand, that he was very glad of his succession; and therewith requested him to come to his Court, for the great desire he had to see him, and to doo him honour: which THEODORICVS gladly performed; remem-

Orbesus, father to Augullinus, marches against Odoacer.

Orbesus takes and leaves Odoacer.

Augullinus abandons
Rome to Odoacer.

Odoacer made himself Lord of all Italy.

After the building of Rome, Anno 1220 after that Iulius Cæsar made himself monarch of the Roman Empire.

The Britans abandoned England, and went ouer into Brittany in France.

Basiliscus made himselfe Emperor against Zeno in Constantinople.

Marcus made Cæsar by his father Basiliscus.

Basiliscus the tyrant disposessed, taken prisoner and banished, died in exile, together with his sonne
and sister.

Augullinus made peace with Geneticus
King of the Vandals in Africa, Augullinus Emperor in Rome.

Odoacer king of the Heruli
came into Italy.

Theodoricus,
King of the Goths, came to
the Emperor Zeno's Court.

remembering the honour and good entertainment which in former time he had received in Constantinople. Whither when he came (besides that he was very solemnly received at his first coming) he was afterwards very honourably entertained by the Emperor ZENO, who gave him Ensignes of Arms, and other honours and dignities, assigning to his people pay and perpetual pensions: and so was THEODORICVS beloved and esteemed by the Emperor & his whole Court. And, living in this manner with great contentment for a certain space, his people that came with him, and those which remained behind also in his Countrey, being accustomed to the warres, and to rob and spoil, and now grieved with living idle in peace, continually petitioned him, that (imitating those from whom he was descended) he should seek to make some conquest, and not to spend his life in banqueting and feasting; but principally they counselled him to sue to the Emperor to give him leave to make a Conquest of Italy, which ODACER had taken and vsurped, and they told him so many things thereof, that in the end he resolved to follow their counsell: and, finding a time and place convenient, he made a faire speech to the Emperor, intreating him to grant him what is before said; which, Bishop JOHANNES writes at large in his Book of the Originall and Acts of the Gothes.

Theodoricus
made suite to the Emperor to give him leave to conquer Italy
from Odacer.

When ZENO had heard his discourse, and understood his meaning, hee was very fussy for it: for, he desired ever to have had him neer to himself, and not to have suffered him to haue departed; allwell for the loue hee bare him, as for the fear and doubt which hee ever had of the Gothes. But seeing his resolution, after counsell taken with the Senate, he was of opinion what hee might well grant him (as he requested) the conquest of Italy; considering that the Empire had lost it, and that it was now in the power of ODACER; wherefore it were better that a King which was a friend and confederate should possess the same, than another; and if hee did not accomplish his conquest, yet it was a means to weaken both their forces; of which the Empire stood in fear, having been oftentimes molested by them.

When the Emperor had made this Grant, and confirmed the same by publique instruments, THEODORICVS took his leave, and went into Hungary and into Misla, where his people inhabited: there he gathered together the best and choicest men of war he was able for this enterprise, and began to march forwards with his Armie; but by the way he was hindred and encountered by certain Kings and barbarous people which were the remnant of ATILIA his troops: so as by that time he came into Italy, he was well trained in the warre, and his souldiers were accustomed to vanquish. ODACER, who some daies before was advertised of his coming, had leued a very great Armie, and had assembled together the people of that countrey, whom he perswaded to aid him, and to defend themselves.

Theodoricus
entered Italy, & Odacer went to encounter him.

A battell between Odacer and Theodo- ricus.
Odacer was overthrowne
by Theodoricus.

When THEODORICVS was arrived in Italy, he encamped himself by a rivers side called Sonza, neer to the ruines of old Aquileia, to refresh his Armie in those fertill fields: As soon as ODACER heard of his coming (as he lay in wait for him in those Marches) hee drew to neer with his Armie, that in short space they came to a battell (which THEODORICVS with great courage offered, and ODACER refused not: for, it seemd that both the Commanders desired the same); which was one of the most cruell and bloodie that hath been seen: for, the Commanders and souldiers of either side were very valiant; and the one fought to winne a Kingdom, fame and honour, and the other fought to preserve all these. The Fight lasted a great part of the day; and, after great slaughter, and effusion of much blood on either side, THEODORICVS obtained the victory, and ODACER was faine to see when he had done all that was possible for him to maintain the Fight. And although ODACER lost this battell, yet he lost neither courage nor hope to defend himself: but, gathering together the remainder of those which escaped from the battell, he raised new forces; and, again taking the Field neer to the City of Verona, returned to fight with THEODORICVS, who followed him thither: and the two Kings came the second time to battell, which was no lesse cruell than the first; for, this was the last of ODACER's hope: but hee was again overthrowne; for, those supplies which came to his aid forsook him, and he lost great part of his Army fighting; and afterwards in his flight passing the river Pa, many of his people were drowned.

Odacer overthrowne the second time by Theodo-
ricus.

In this flight ODACER neuer staid till he came to Rome: where he thought to have gathered a new head, and there to have resisted his enemies; but they would not receive him: for, seeing that hee had been twice overthrowne, they had no hope or confidence in him; but sought to gratifie THEODORICVS, so as the City was in Arms: wherefore ODACER returned, and with the best forces hee was able to gather together, put himself into Ravenna. THEODORICVS for that time forbore to pursue him; but went to Milan and took it, with other

ther cities in that quarter: whereupon, many cities in Italy sent to him to yeeld their obedience, and many companies of souldiers came to serue him in his warres. In the meane season ODACER fortified himselfe with armes, men, and victuals, thinking at the least to have been able to defend himselfe in Ravenna, which at that time (after Rome) was the principall citie of all Italy. THEODORICVS, being in a redines to besiege it, there followed so sodaine an alteration, as he neither could, neither durst to stay before it: for by the procurement of one of ODACER's Captaines, who was either a president or admirall of some part of Italy, many Captaines, townes, and people againe took part with ODACER; and they grew to so great ahead, that THEODORICVS was in such feare, as he put himselfe into Paulia, and many daies passed before that he drew his Armie againe to field, so as neither ODACER came to seeke him, nor he ODACER. Within few months after, they made frontier warres; and THEODORICVS, recovering forces, committed his Mother and Sisters to the keeping of EPHIANIVS Bishop of Pania, and went to Ravenna (wherein ODACER lay) and laid siegethereto: but ODACER so manfully defended the same, that in three yeeres space (for so long the siege lasted) he not onely made head against THEODORICVS, but made so many sallies vpon him, and gave him so many alarmes, as he neuer suffered his Armie to rest. But in the end wanting victuals, and out of hope of any reliefe, having first tried all means both to offend and defend, and seeing it auailed not, he resolved to yeeld to THEODORICVS, vpon condition that he should give him assurance of his life, with promise to allow him some place in Italy, wherein he might live; which promise was ill performed: for he commanded both him and his sonne to be slaine: and so ended the life and raigne of ODACER, which cannot iustly be termed, cowardlie.

Theodoricus besieged Odacer
in Ravenna.

Odacer slaine
by the commandment
of Theodoricus.

ODACER being dead, the remainder of his Armie of Heruli, which escaped from the battelle, were entertained by THEODORICVS, and he gaue them pay, and in short space made himselfe Lord of all Italy, finding not any resistance; afterwards he went to Rome, where he was receiued with great ioy and solemnitie, as well for the fame and good report which they had heard of him, as for that he was sent thither by the Emperor ZENO. And this morouer digreadly helpe him to get the good will of the citie; that at his very first coming thither, he caused a great quantitie of wheat to be distributed amongst the citizens; whereof they then stood in great need: And so he remained Lord of Rome, and of all Italy, calling himselfe king thereof, as ODACER had done, thirteene yeeres before.

Theodoricus
went to Rome
and made himselfe Lord there of all Italy.

This THEODORICVS was a very vertuous, iust, and a most excellent Prince and gouernour, and made himselfe very mightie, and much beloved and feared: but about all, he was very wife and circumspect in preserving his estate. And to the end to make himselfe the more mightie, he procured alliance with all the kings then in Europe: for he presently treated a marriage with ANDEFREDA the French Kings daughter, which he solemnized with great feasting and triumph. And of his owne three daughters, one he married to SIGISMUND King of the Burgonians; and another to ALARICVS King of the Visigothes, and of Spain; and his third daughter called AMALASINTHA, he married to a Prince of Germany called EVTHARICVS; and his sister ALMAFREDA hee married to HONORICVS King of the Vandales and of Africa, who was GENSERICVS his heir and successor. So as with all the Princes neere vnto Italy, he made some amitie and league of friendship; and held that kingdom, which with such honour he had conquered, with no lesse honour, the space of thirte yeeres.

The alliance and league made by Theodoricus.

Whilest these things passed in Italy, ZENO the Emperor of Constantinople and of the East, had somewhat to doe with the Bulgarians, who euer since the death of ATILIA had inhabited Germany, and had made an incursion into the province of Thracia, and done much harme in that countrey: but they quickly returned to their habitation. In Constantinople also happened a great fire, which burnt a great part of that citie. There befell vnto ZENO also another great disaster, plotted by a favourite of his, who was steward of his palace, whose name was YLLO, which was thus: This YLLO made the Emperour beleue (though vniustly) that his wife the Emperesse, whose name was ARABIANE, daughter to the Emperour LEO, liued dishonestly; and so ZENO being deluded, commanded her secretly to be slaine. And hee to whom the charge of the execution was committed, revealed the secret to a young gentleman of the Emperesse chamber, who presently advertised her Ladie thereof. And shee the very instant without any delay, fled from the palace in the closest manner she could, leaving her in her chamber, which had advertised her thereof, and went to the house of ACACIVS then Bishop

What befell
the Emperour
ZENO
in Constantino- ple.

The treacherie of Yllo against the Emperesse Arianne.

D d

of

of Constantinople. The Emperour the next day, assuring himselfe that his commandment had been effected, clad himselfe in mourning attire, faining that his wife had died naturally. But presently the Bishop, came vnto him: who with great authoritie severely reprehended his lightnes and hastic resolutions; aduertising him of his wifes innocencie; and that her accusation was vntre. Finally, he handled the matter so well, as hee perswaded him of the truth, and reconciled him to his wife, and made a perfect peace betweene them. But the Emperesse ARIADNE, after that she vnderstood that it was YLIOS which had accused her, as a woman would bee reuenged, and commanded a certaine man, whom she held fit for that purpose, to kill him; who the better to bring his purpose to effect, lay in wait for him: and purposing to haue stricken him vpon the head, his blow failed, and it happened vnto him as to S. PETER: for missing his head, he smote off one of his eares, and so hee escaped. And daring not to remaine in the Emperour ZENO's Court, he resolved to commit a greater treason then the former, which was to goe into Asia, and there to rise and rebell, with a great part of the East: which he might easily doe, for hee was very cunning and of great account; and ZENO for his conditions was in those parts very ill beloued. But he speedily sent a good Armie against him vnder the leading of a Capitaine called LEONCIUS: but this YLIOS used such meanes and perswasions to LEONCIUS, as he did the like: and so of onerant there arose two, which made themselves Lords of a great part of Asia the lesse. But within few daies after, the Imperiall Armie which had conspired with them, after that the souldiers were growne rich by spoile and boocie, repenting their errors, and to obtaine pardon, vpon a day mutined and slew them both, and brought their heads to Constantinople. And so was ZENO freed from this trouble and reuolt, and liued the remainder of his time in rest and peace: notwithstanding that he put certaine Noblemen to death without any iust cause. All these things being past, in the seuenteenth yeere of his reigne ZENO died of a naturall death in Constantinople. It is written of him that he was exceedingly ill fauoured and deformed, and of a loathsome aspect and gesture. He is not reckoned among the good Emperours; and it is also said of him, that he would sometimes be drunke. He died in the yeere of our Lord foure hundred, fourescore and fourteene.

By what meanes
the Emperesse was deliuered from death.

Leoncius conspired with Ylios, and both were slaine by their souldiers.

The death of Zeno.

THE LIFE OF ANASTASIVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND SEVEN AND FIFTITH RO- MANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGUMENT.

ZENO being dead, Anastasiu was chosen, who was greatly fauoured by the Emperesse: to whom she was married, at the end of fortie dayes after the obsequies of her dead Husband. This man finding all things in peace, in the beginning of his reigne did many good deeds: but he suddenly altered his condition, and being posted with the hereticke of Eutiches or Euticeus, which made a quarternitie of the Dionysie, he began to growe hatefull to God and men; and many countries rebelled against him. Against which passing himselfe in order to fight (although that he ouercame many of the Rebels) neuertheless he was once brought to such an extremitie, as he was driuen shamefully to buy his peace with money; and afterwards the Persians, rising against him, gaue him many crosses in sundrie battailes: but finally he made a truce with them, and during the time of the truce, he was slaine by a thunderbolt from heauen.

ZENO had not any sonne that might succeed him in the Empire: wherefore, after his death some of the chiefeest Lords procured themselves to be chosen; among which was this ANASTASIVS: who although he were not of any Noble Family, yett he was a man of great reputation, and well beloued. By reason whereof, and also for that he was in great fauour with the widow Emperesse, he was chosen Emperour, with the ayde and assistance of an Eunuch, called VABRICIVS, who was of great authority in the Court. And ARIADNE did not onely procure his election aforesayd, but within forty dayes after the obse-

Anastasiu chosen Emperor.

obsequies of her dead husband were solemnized, and his body intombed, she married with the new Emperour: and by this meane obtained ANASTASIVS the Empire. In the beginning whereof, without any contradiction, but with the generall contentment of all men, he was obeyed: and he not onely found the Empire in peace, but there was peace also in Italy, France, Spain, Germanie, and Africa; they gouerning those kingdomes as their owne, who were successors to them which first vsurped and tooke them from the Empire; notwithstanding that shortly after there arose great vvares betweene them. THEODORICVS, who was called King of Italy, made choise of the citie of Rauenna for his royall seat; which was by him enobled with sumptuous buildings: and in his absence he commanded the like to be made in Rome, and did much good through all Italy, directing all things like a good and an excellent Prince; in so much as the people praised God for him, and held themselves happie, in that they had so good a man for their Lord and gouernour.

But returning to our new Emperour; as soone as he was crowned, he commanded by a publike decree that all such debts as were due to his chamber of accounts, or as we say, his exchequer, vntill that day, should be pardoned, and not be recovered from the debtors; which amounted to a very great summe. He began also to giue offices and places of charge to such persons as were of worth, and sufficient for them, and not for money (as the custome was) by reason of late wants. By meanes whereof and of other apparant signes of a good prince, in the beginning of his reigne, he was very well beloued. But this lasted but a while: for he was infected with the hereticke of EVTICHES, who held an abominable opinion of the person of CHRIST. And for as much as nothing can be of any assurance, or acceptable without faith; this Emperour began to growe secretly hatefull to God, and publickly odious to men; and so although that he died old, yett he died an euill death: And in his life he was neuer free from tyrannicall which rebelled; and other warres and troubles. The first which rebelled, were the people of Illyria (a very valiant nation in Asia the lesse) the occasion whereof was, for that hee took, from them, that pay which his predecesor ZENO had promised, and giuen them, when he subdued the tyrant ILLOS, who (as we said) falsely defamed the Emperesse. This nation making choise of a valiant and expert soldier, whose name was LILINGVS for their capitaine, made cruell warres vpon the lands of the Empire, for the space of fixe yeeres. In which time, betweene the souldiers of ANASTASIVS and of LILINGVS, there happened some battailes, and many conflicts and skirmishes, vntill that LILINGVS dying, the Illyrians being scattered, and lost through want of a capitaine, were cruelly punished, and many cities were ruined, and laid waste, as relateth IOHANNES the Bishop: who although briefly, yett he expresth the greatest part of that historie.

There arose also against ANASTASIVS, another capitaine in Cilicia, at the same instant, called ATHEMIDORVS, but he was soone brought to ruine. In Slauonia and Dalmatia, rebelled two mightie men and very rich, called SABIANVS and MUNDO: and neere to Adriano, another whose name was POMPEY: and within the citie of Constantinople, were certaine tumults and insolenies committed, wherein many men were slaine. By reason of all which rebellions, ANASTASIVS was much perplexed; and being in great feare, he came to some compositions (little to his honour) and lost fundrie townes. Being freed from this trouble, he had another ciuill warre, which was of great importance and long continuance, against a valiant soldier, a Scythian borne, but trained and brought vp in the wars of the Romans, and in the Emperours house, and court: he was high constable, or commander of his men of warre, and was called VATILIANVS, who either of ambition and desire to be absolute, or for some displeasure or discontent (which historiographers write not) rebelled against ANASTASIVS; and with threescore thousand men, which he leuied, of Hunnes and other nations, began cruell warre against him, both by sea and land; so as sometimes he came within three miles of the imperiall citie of Constantinople. Against whom the Emperour raised a great Armie, and made his nephew HIPATIAS General thereof, who before he could come to fight any battaile, by a wife was taken prisoner by the Hunnes, and deliuered into the power of VATILIANVS: After which, the Emperours other captaines were ouerthrowne; so as the warre continued fixe yeeres: and in the end thereof, the Emperour bought his peace of VATILIANVS, for a great sum of money which he gaue him, and so was deliuered from the perill, although not from the disgrace and dishonour of buying peace. In this warre (as writeth ZONARAS) called IOHANNES MONACHVS (as relateth IOHANNES CYSPINIANVS) ANASTASIVS was greatly assisted by the skill and industrie of PROCLUS, an excellent philosopher and Mathematician,

The hereticke of Eutiches.

Lilingus rebelled in Illyria against Anastasius.

Athemidorus, Sabrianus, Mundo, and Pompey, Dy-
rants.

Hypatius made General against Vatilianus.

Proclus, an excellent Philosopher.

Mathematician, who was most skilfull in inuening instruments, engines and stratagems. Amongst other matters, they report one thing of him, which seemeth incredible, which I dare neither affirme, nor deny, but will recite it for a wonder, let the reader belieue what he listeth; yet I say that the secrets of nature are so great, as we ought not to hold all for impossible which we cannot comprehend how it may be brought to passe. That which I say, these authors write for certain, which was, that as we now see certain glasses, which being lay in the sunne, with the reflexion of the beames thereof will set tow or flax on fire, and such like other dry stuffe neere at hand; so did this PROCLVS make a very great many of these glasses, which wrought effect with such force as being let vpon the high turrets of the walles and bulwarks, they set on fire and burnt whole fleets of shippes in the harbour, with all the people that were in them; and in like manner any other engines that were erected against the walles, wheresoeuer they were (if the sunne-beames might reuerberate from those glasses) wherewith the enemy was greatly annoyed, which was done in the same manner as we now see tow set on fire. Whilst these things passed in the Empire of Constantinople, there were great wars betwene the King of France, and Spain, and THEODORICVS King of Italy: which for that they are long to recite, and nothing to my purpose, I omit.

But returning to our Emperour, who seemed now to bee at some rest, being freed from warre with VATICIANVS; there happened another warre with the Persians, which was of as great importance, and no lesse perillous, the cause whereof was this. At that time in Persia reigned a King both mightie and valiant, whose name was CAVADAS; who by reason of warres and other expences, stood in neede of a summe of money, therewith to pay a certaine King which was his neighbour to whom he was indebted: which by ambassage he requested the Emperour ANASTASIUS to lend him, as to a friend and confederate (as he then was). But ANASTASIUS taking counsell vpon the matter, was aduised not to graunt it, for that it was a meane with his owne money to ioyne in league of amitie and friendship, those which were the ancient enemies of the Empire: and that therefore the best course was to take away the meane from the Persian, to be able to make payment; to the end that they might make warre one against another, and so waste and consume themselves. And in this manner it was concluded, in the best sort that might be, to excuse the matter, without granting what the King requested. The King of Persia hauing receiued this answer, was so extremely enraged therewith, as he resolved to make warre against the Romane Empire: and putting his determination in execution, leuying a great Armie, and making great preparation for the warres, he personally entred the limits and confines thereof, and made cruell warres, and incamped himselfe before the citie of Amida, which was then a great and a famous citie in the prouince of Mesopotamia, as writeth PROCOPIVS, before which were many conflicts: but in the end the Persian tooke it, and held the same for some space. As hee lay before this citie, ANASTASIUS raised the greatest Armie that euer hee had before, which hee diuided into foure parts, and sent the same vnder the command of foure Generals, against CAVADAS: whose names were ARIOVINDVS, who then was Pretor in the East; and CBLER, the Capitaine of the Emperours guard; and another was called PATRICIUS borne in Phrygia; and the fourth was HIPATIAS, who was the Emperours Nephew, as is before said. And with these went other great men: as IVSTINVS who afterwards was Emperour, and some other noble and expert men in the warres.

These Armies marched by severall waies, and directed not their course to relieue Amida; but to make warre in sundrie parts of CAVADAS his kingdome. He being aduertised of their coming, went to meete with ARIOVINDVS; who behaued himselfe so cowardly, as not daring to fight, he retired very shamefully, and left his campe full of many rich things, and of great value, which were taken by the Persians, who had them in chase, and pursued the Imperiall Armie. The other two Generals, to wit, PATRICIUS and HIPATIAS, ioyning their forces together, being neere the enemy, began the warre, without any certaine knowledge where the King was, after the retreat, or rather flight of ARIOVINDVS; and they by chance met with eight hundred horse of his, the King being but a little behind them with a very mightie Armie: who putting themselves in order for their defence, were all slaine and cut in peeces, without any newes learned of them by the Romans: and they hauing no sight of CAVADAS his troups, pitched their tents vpon a rivers side; the current whereof ranne directly that way as CAVADAS came, and so they began to victuall and refresh themselves, of their wearie journey; and and went into the water, and did fetch water out of the said riuier. And as CAVADAS and his Capitaines saw the water come downe troubled, bringing therewith other things which seemed to be lately throwne into it, they suspected as it was; whereupon CAVADAS in all haste commanded his Armie to march in order ready to fight. Which came so suddenly vpon the Imperialists, that before they could range themselves in order, they were broken and ouerthrowne; and the most part of all these carelesse Capitaines were slaine, except some which escaped by flight. And without question if at this time the Hunnes had not come downe out of Seythia, Asiatica, and with great power had not made warre vpon the Persians, country, to take order for the defence thereof, he had after this overthrow done great spoiles in the Empire. But he vpon this occasion retiring himselfe, there came in good time the fourth Capitaine called CBLER, with his Imperiall Armie, who began in better order and more aduisedly to follow the wars: and gathering together those troups which ARIOVINDVS had left (for he himselfe was commanded by ANASTASIUS to come to Constantinople) and ioyning with PATRICIUS the Capitaine which escaped, they besieged the Citie of Amida, which the Persians had taken; and after a long siege, they gat it by a wile. This most cruell warre continuing two yeeres, with great slaughter and losse to either side; and the Persians being much distressed by the Hunnes, and other nations which with them entred their countries, being expired, ANASTASIUS commanded a citie to be built in Mesopotamia, which he called after his owne name, Anastasia: wherewith the Persians were much displeased. But they were so oppressed by the Hunnes, as they durst not breake with the Emperour, and so the peace continued during the life of ANASTASIUS, wherewith he was well content: for in the wars he had lost both many men and much reputation; and being (as we said) infected with the heresie of EVTICHVS, he reigned in great trouble. In the end when he least thought thereof, when he had reigned seuen and twentie yeeres, a Thunderbolt fell from heauen which slew him in the yeer of our Lord, five hundred and nineteene, leauing not any sonne that might succeede him.

THE LIFE OF IVSTINVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND EIGHT AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

AFTER ANASTASIUS IVSTINVS EVRODALATES succeeded in the Empire. And truly it is a wonderful thing to consider from how base an estate, and from how poore a beginning he mounted to so high a dignitie; and of the waies and meanes wherebv he attained thereto. Which for an example of the strang adventures and variable accidents in this life, I hold worthe to be related in such sort as it hapned. This IVSTINVS was borne in Thracia (yet some say, that he was of Slaunonia, or Dalmatia) of poore and simple parentage; so as from his infancy he was bred vp in keeping of beasts. But as it pleased God in his secret indgement, to ordaine him to raigne and rule, to some good end; he inspired him to leaue that base kinde of life: so as at the age of seuentene yeeres he went to the warres, with a resolution to continue in the exercise of Arms. And he proued so worthy a souldier, that within short space he purchased the name of Valiant, and fought oftentimes with great dexterity and courage, with his enemies in single combats man to man; and in all occasions made good proof of his person. Wherefore within short time he was made a Captain, and within a while after an Earl; which (as is already said) at that time was, and still is, a great dignity. In that estate was he when ANASTASIUS died, being now well grown in yeers: And as presently after his decease the Lords began to consult whom they should make Emperor; a great Courtier named AMANTIVS, who was an Eunuch, and had bin the Emperors Steward, and was now the best monied man of his time, sought by all means to make a great and mightie man, called THEOCRETIANVS, who was his great friend, Emperor. And for as much as the Armie and men of warre bare greatest sway in the election (for, now nothing was done in such order as it behoued, but by force and by benefit) he therefore determined to buy the good wils of the Captains and men of warre: And to this effect hee purposed first to winne IVSTINVS, and to vse him for a mean to perswade the rest; and conferred with him concerning the same. And, coming to a composition, hee gaue him a great summe of money, to the end he should diuide the same among the Captaines and men of warre where he thought good; conditionally that THEOCRETIANVS might be chosen Emperor.

Amantius sought to get the Emperre for his friend Theocretianus.

The mean where by Iustinus got the Emperre.

When IVSTINVS had gotten this money into his fingers, hee forgot to deal for THEOCRETIANVS, but secretly sought to buy their good wils for himself; and carried the matter so cunningly, that when AMANTIVS thought that the souldiers would haue made his friend Emperor, he found that they had nominated and would haue IVSTINVS. And in this manner they presently sware fidelity and obedience to him, by the generall consent both of the Senate and Army: for, besides what is already said, he was well beloued, and held for a vertuous man, and a good Christian.

AMANTIVS seeing himself deluded, although for the present he could not refuse to yeeld him obedience, yet shortly after hee practised the death of the new Emperor, and conspired with THEOCRETIANVS, who pretended to haue bin chosen Emperor; and with another called ANDREAS, and with MISSAHLE and ARDABURIUS (all which were of the Emperors chamber) to the end they should kill him as soon as any opportunity were offered. But it pleased God that their treason was discovered; and, it being proued, IVSTINVS commanded AMANTIVS, ANDREAS and THEOCRETIANVS, to be slain; and the rest to be perpetually banished. And, the better to assure himself in the Emperre, hee vsed a mean that VATILIANVS, who rebelled against ANASTASIUS, came to Court; whom he made ordinary Consul, and Generall of all his men of warre, and bestowed great gifts and honours vpon him. But, for all this, he (as ingratefull, and a Traitor) within fewe daies practised with some others against the life and estate of IVSTINVS: which being discovered, he was vpon a day slain in his Palace, together with PAVLYS and CELERIANVS, who were confederates and complies with him in his treason.

The treason and death of Vatilianus.

IVSTINVS being freed from this danger, and seeing himself in peace in the Emperre, being a good Christian, and knowing how far the Arrian heresie had extended it self over the world, resolved to vse therein all the remedy that possibly he could: whereto he was likewise perswaded by Pope HORMISDA, who from Rome sent GERMANVS, Bishop of Capra, to confer with him of matters concerning the faith. Whereupon IVSTINVS sent his decrees throughout all the East, commanding that no man should bee accepted into the Church for Bishop or Priest, that should bee of the sect of ARRIUS. At what time IVSTINVS did this good deed, TRASIMUND King of the Vandals died in Africa, who was an Arrian Heretick; and his sonne ELDERICVS possessed his Kingdome, whom he had by the Emperor VALENTINIAN'S daughter. This man, following his faithfull mother, and not his hereticall father, as soon as he was established in the Kingdome, recalled from exile all the Catholique Bishops which his father had banished (as is aboue said), and reformed all the Churches. But the Emperor and this King hauing done so good a deed, THEODORICVS, who ruled in Italie, becoming of great power, and for that he was (as the most of the Gothes were) an Arrian Heretique, was therewith much displeased; resolving, if the Emperor did not reuoke his decree, to vse through all his dominion all manner of cruelty against the Catholiques. But first hee constrained Pope IOHN, who succeeded HORMISDA, to go to Constantinople, and with him THEODORVS and AGAPETVS (men who had been Consuls) to treat with the Emperor, to the end he should presently restore those Arrian Bishops which he had depoled; otherwise that in his dominions he would put to the sword all such as did not beleue as he did.

Iustinus the Emperre persued the Arrianus.

Pope IOHN and the other Ambassadors being arriued at Constantinople, were very honorably received; and the Pope with teares intreated the Emperor to be pleased, notwithstanding that his suit was vnjust; yet to auoide the excessive cruelty which was expected, for the present, to permit the Arrian Bishops to be restored. The Emperor to eschew this cruelty, granted his request: and so the wicked Bishops were restored to their Churches; and the Emperor did Pope IOHN great honour, and those which came with him. In the meane time, whilst they were in Constantinople, THEODORICVS King of Italie, made SIMACHVS, and BORTIVS SAVERINVS to be slaine, who had been Consuls, and were very Noble and excellent personages, very deuout Christians, and excellently learned in all Arts. And not herewith content, hauing beene vntill then a good and iust Prince; hauing Pope IOHN and the other Ambassadors which came with him from Constantinople in suspition, by reason of the great honour done vnto them by the Emperor, he commanded them to be apprehended and cast in prison; where they all three died of hunger and cruell vage. After which cruelty, it pleased God that within ninetie daies he died suddenly, leauing a Nephew of his, called ATHALARICVS for his heire: for he had not any sonne. And for as much as his Nephew was but eight yeers old, his mother took vpon her the government of the Kingdome, as a woman who was very wife and valiant.

Theodoricus King of the Gothes defended the Arrianus.

The cruelty of Theodoricus, and his death.

Returning to IVSTINVS the Emperor; It grieved him much for that which THEODORICVS had done: but he was not of power able to redresse the same; for, besides the wants and necessities wherewith he was oppressed, the Persians made warres against him, which was a Nation, of all others, most feared by the Romans. But for the small time that he liued, hee had good success in those warres, and his Captaines obtained some victories; SCITA and BELISARIVS being his Generals. Of which two, BELISARIVS (who then was very young) proued afterwards to be one of the best Captaines in the world, and which conquered more countries, and obtained more victories, than any other man in his time: as we will hereafter briefly declare. IVSTINVS, living in this prosperity, seeing himselfe old, and without any sonne to succcede him, resolved to make IVSTINIAN, who was his Nephew and his sisters sonne, CÆSAR; and to adopt and nominate him for his successor; and so presently made him his companion in the Emperre. And within four moneths after, falling sick, he died in the Citie of Constantinople, when he had reigned eleuen yeeres, or (as some Authors write) but nine. I finde little more writen of him, then by me is rehearsed. He died in the yeere of our Lord, 529; and, as some say, 28.

The death of the Emperre Iustinus.

THE LIFE OF IVSTINIANVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND NINE AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR of ROME.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

After Iustinus, without any contradiction, succeeded Iustinianus, who amongst his first attempts, made one against the Persians, vnder the leading of Belisarius; whom with variable fortune of ill warres, in the end he ouercame: Yet he made a peace with them afterwards. After this, there followed a ciuill warre in Constantinople, wherein Iustinian was likely to haue sped but ill; but by means of Belisarius, he was freed; notwithstanding there died therein many thousand; which being ended, he returned to make a conquest of Africa, which of long time had beene vsurped by the Vandals; and getting it, he came againe to Constantinople, where Iustinian prepared him a triumph. But it was not long before the Emperre

Emperour sent him into Italia against the Gothes, where after many changes of fortune, and treaties of peace, and of truce, having taken the Citie of Naples (wherein as it seemed consisted the principall hope of the Gothes) he took his way towards Rome, who's he peaceably entered, and defended the same, with great valour, against Vitiges King of the Gothes, whom Belisarius at last took prisoner. After this victory Iustinian recalled Belisarius, to employ him against the Persians, which was the occasion that Italia againe fell into the hands of the Gothes, particularly Rome, which by Totila was burnt and destroyed; and that for no other defect, but for that it could not be relieved by Belisarius, who then was sick. Who as soone as he had recovered his health, took it againe from the Barbarians. And re- turning to Constantinople, the state of Italia was very happily governed by Narces an Eunuch, In which time Iustinian having applied himselfe to reforme and abridge the Lawes, when he had reigned nine and thirtie yeeres, departed this life, no lesse replenished with yeeres then full of glory.

After the death of IVSTINVS, IVSTINIANVS was without any contradiction received and obeyed for Emperour; being of the age of foure and fortie yeeres. He was a powerful and a good Prince, and such a one, as might well be compared with the best in ancient time, for his good government, both in peace and warre. The warres and conquests which hapned in his time (which was little lesse then fortie yeeres) were so many, and so noble, that I cannot expresse the same as I would, and they deserve; following my accustomed breuitie. I will therefore write as I may, notwithstanding that the length of the time, and the variety of accidents, will compell me to exceede my prefixed limits.

As soone as IVSTINIANVS saw himselfe confirmed in the Empire, he was not contented to preferue that which he inherited from his Vncle; but (bearing the minde and hauing the iudgement of an antient and good Emperour) he began to desire, and therewith to practise, to enlarge the Empire, and to reduce the same (if it were possible) to the antient majestie and dignitie. The first occasion of warres that was offered, was against the Persians; who in the time of his predecessors, had broken and violated the peace, invaded the bounds of the Romane Empire, and vsurped certaine countries and Prouinces thereof in so much (as PROCOPIVS writeth) that for the space of fiftie yeeres before the reigned of IVSTINIAN, in all the wars the Imperialists commonly had the worst, and all conclusions of peace were made to the advantage of the Persians.

The cause of this warre betweene the Emperour IVSTINIAN, and CAVADAS King of Persia, was in truth the emulation and hatred which these two Empires, and the Lords thereof, had of antient time borne, and still did beare the one against the other, which was continually nourished and increased, as by that which we haue written may plainly appeare. But the occasion and principall cause was this, IVSTINIANVS, as soone as he was Emperour, sent BELISARIUS, an excellent Captaine, into those frontiers, with direction, in a certaine citie, which was on the borders of Persia, to build the strongest and most inexpugnable Castle that could be devised, for that Citie was one of the entrics and passages of greatest importance; which order BELISARIUS presently put in execution. Whereof when CAVADAS was aduertised, he was highly offended, and presently sent Capitaines and men of warre, to require BELISARIUS to giue over the worke, which if he would not doe; that then they should throw downe what he had built.

These men being come to the place where this Castle was a building; there passed many words, and some deedes betweene them: and for as much as the builders were not of force sufficient to make resistance against the Persians, the Emperour sent thither two Capitaines, brothers, with some companies of souldiers. These being arrived, and the Imperialists persisting in their building, and the Persians in hindering the same, they came to fight a battaile, wherein the Imperialists being fewer in number, were by the Persians defeated and overthrowne, and many were slaine, others were carried away captiues, and the building was laid leuell with the earth. When IVSTINIAN vnderstood of this overthrow, he presently made BELISARIUS General of all his forces in the East, who as a wife and valiant man, with all expedition raised a very mightie Armie; and taking to him another Captain called HERMOGENES (whom the Emperour with a good supplie had sent vnto him) he took his way towards the Citie of Durra, in Mesopotamia, which at that time was the frontier of the Persians; where began a cruell warre betweene

The beginning of the warre betweene the Emperour Iustinian and the Persians Belisarius made General against the Persians.

between the one and the other Nation. But as IVSTINIAN, seeking to imploy his time in recouering some other Prouinces which the Empire had lost, desired peace with the Persians, he sent an Ambassador called RUFINVS, to CAVADAS King of Persia, to treat of a peace (if vpon honourable conditions it might be concluded).

This Ambassador being come into the Borders where the King was, before that hee was to come to his Court certain motions were made of peace; and as they treated thereof, the Imperiall Generals were giuen to vnderstand, that the Persian Army came to seek them, and was within half a daies journey, and had for General thereof a great man called PEROZAS, who was Mirraces, which was the name of a Magistrate, of great dignity and authority in Persia. Whereupon BELISARIUS set his troops in order; and the two Camps came to lodge neere one to the other: and so they continued the space of two or three daies, ranging themselves euery day in order of battell; either partie expecting when the other should charge. Vpon one of those daies certain Archers of the one and other side beganne to skirmish: whereupon, the squadrons moued and brake the one vpon the other; and fought in such manner, that it was a very cruell and a bloody battell, which lasted till neere night: wherein the Romans in the right wing had the worse, and the better in the left; and euery Captain did his best to obtain the victory: but in the end the Romans preuailed, and made great slaughter of their enemies; and PEROZAS the Mirraces escaped by flight.

BELISARIUS, hauing obtained this notable victory, within fewe daies after recovered some places in Mesopotamia, which the Persians had vsurped; wherein also passed sundry difficult conflicts and encounters. In the Kingdome of Armenia, wherein the Persians held many places, SITTA being General, and DOROTHVS Pretor, the warres were followed with the like good fortune; and the Imperiall Army, obtaining victory, recouered most part of what was lost. The wars standing in these teares, and kindled euery where, RUFINVS (who we said went Ambassador to the King of Persia) vpon safe conduct came to his Court, and had many treatises and discourses with him; but no peace could be concluded: and CAVADAS, resolving to prosecute the warres anew, to be satisfied for the losses which his people had received; by the counsell of AZAMANDER, a valiant old Captain of his (who in times past had gotten many victories against the Romans) he made EZARETHA, General of his Armie, a man both valiant and of great experience, and a Persian born. With whom, BELISARIUS, together with SITTA the other General, after some encounters, came to a battell; which was one of the cruelliest and greatest of all that hapned in those wars:

This battell was fought neere to the Riuer Euphrates, and much against the opinion of BELISARIUS; who, knowing that the enemy had the advantage, would not haue fought: but his troops against his will prepared themselves. Whereupon he, seeing their resolution, marshalled and encouraged them against the Persians, which were already in order. And the fight began with so great fury and obstinacie on both sides, that for the greatest part of the day it appeared not whether party should haue the victory; vntill such time as the Imperialists, being vnable any longer to endure the toil thereof, for they were fasting, being Easter Euen (Christians of our Age may see how inuolubly fasting daies were obserued in those times) they disbanded, and began to scatter. Whereupon the Persian horsemen charged BELISARIUS his horse-troops with such force, that the Romans brake, and began to flee, and the like did the other squadrons of foot. Which when BELISARIUS perceiued, after that hee had vsed all means to stay them, and to haue renewed the Fight, and could not preuaile, hee alighted from his horse, and placed himself in a squadron of footmen, which kept together whole and vnbroken; and, encouraging them with his presence, they all resolved rather to dy than to be overthrowne. And EZARETHA and the Persians, which followed the chase of those which fled, seeing that squadron to remain whole, returned with great fury, thinking easily to haue had the execution of them: but they failed of their purpose, for they kept themselves so close together, that they could not be broken; and fought so valiantly, that they did the Persians more harm than they received from them; and so till night held their ground, and kept themselves in such order, that EZARETHA and his men were faine to leaue them: but they had the ransacking of their tents, and so returned to their Camp. BELISARIUS in very good order withdrew himself to a little Island, which the riuer Euphrates maketh in that place; whither the greatest part of his souldiers which fled, were already retired. And there the next day he again set himself in order, and gathered together his souldiers: but the Persians, houlding themselves for victorious, had the spoil of the Field. After this journey EZARETHA remoued his Camp to another quarter: for,

PEROZAS, General for the King of Persia.

A battell with the Persians, wherein Belisarius had the victory.

SITTA, General for Iustinian in Armenia, ouercame the Persians.

Ezaretha, General of the Persians.

A cruell battell.

for, there hee had receiued greater losse than BELISARIUS; insomuch that CAVADAS King of Perfia, vnderstanding what number of men were lost in that battell, held not himselfe content, nor for well seru'd in that victory. And dying shortly after, his sonne COSROES succeeded him in his Kingdome: with whom, after many embassies and treaties, a peace was concluded; and BELISARIUS reconquered other Countreies, which other nations held in the East. Thus much honoured and victorious, being sent for by the Emperor IVSTINIAN for the warres in Africa, SITAS remaining Generall, he came to Constantinople; where he was receiued in triumph with great solemnity.

This being past, within few daies after there fell so great a vprore and tumult in the City of Constantinople, that it was likely to haue gone ill with IVSTINIANS: for, this tumult in the beginning, growing from the factions of the common people, came to that point, that IPATVS and POMPEY brethren, the chief men of that City, with the fauour of the people which took their part, they being the Emperor ANASTASIUS sisters sonnes, rebelled against IVSTINIAN; and IPATVS took the Ensignes and name of Emperor: and the warre was so cruell within the City, that 30 thousand persons were slain. But in the end IPATVS was taken and slain, and IVSTINIANS troops remained victors: wherein BELISARIUS did him great seruice about all others. Afterwards (punishing such as were offenders, and confiscing their goods) the conspiracies and troubles were all appeased; and IVSTINIAN liued more in peace, and in better estimation, than euer before. But soon after followed the wars of Africa, the occasion whereof grew through the dissension between GENSERICVS his nephews, the first King of the Vandals that euer raigned in Africa, which hapned after this manner: YLDERICVS, one of the nephews of GENSERICVS, succeeding in that Kingdome, bec'ing in contention with another who was his cosin germane, and nephew also to GENSERICVS, whose name was GILMER: both which pretended to haue title to the Kingdome, vpon what occasion for breuitie I will omit. This YLDERICVS grew to be so negligent, that GILMER (who was both wife and valiant) took him prisoner, and against all reason made himself King and Lord of all Africa; vnder this title, that the other was vncapable and insufficient for the government. Wherewith the Emperor IVSTINIAN was very much displeased: for before that he was Emperor he held friendship with YLDERICVS, who was now deprived of his Kingdome. Whereupon, after that he had required GILMER by his Ambassadors to render the Kingdome to his cosin YLDERICVS, which he refused to perform, hee resolved to make a conquest of the Kingdome of Africa, and rigged a mighty Nauy, and sent his Noble Generall BELISARIUS vpon that seruice; and to that effect commanded a great army to be leui'd: with which BELISARIUS embarking himself, accompanied with many excellent Captains in five hundred sail of Ships, and fourscore and twelue Gallies, hee began his voiage towards Africa. Wherein, a great man born in that Countrey, whose name was PRYDENTIVS, had taken Arms against GILMER in the City of Tripoli, on the behalf of the Emperor IVSTINIAN; and another Captain in Sardinia, whose name was GODAS, had done the like. So as when BELISARIUS arrived in Africa, hee found some which took his part: and hauing landed his Army neer to a City called Titimush, marching along the seacoast he took his way towards Carthage: and his Nauy did the like by Sea.

When the Tyrant King GILMER vnderstood of the coming of BELISARIUS, with the Army which he had in readinesse he departed from that City wherein he first intituled himself King, and sent commandment to his brother called AMATA, whom hee left in Carthage for the guard of the City, and of YLDERICVS the deposed King, that hee should presently kill him, and such other prisoners as were in his power; and then with his whole force he should fallie out, and take the Field against BELISARIUS, and at a certain time appointed should fight with him; for that he at the same Instant would charge him in the Arreergard. Hee sent another Captain all the day long to trouble him on the one side, and to tire his people with continuall alarms. To be brief, there passed many things in that journey worthy to be noted: and, coming neer to the City of Carthage, AMATA, beginning to fight at such time as his brother had appointed, was slain by BELISARIUS his Vaunguard: And GILMER, without hauing intelligence thereof, with his troops so resolutely charged in the Arreergard, that the Imperialists began to retire in such manner, that if GILMER had not made an Alt (as PROCOPIVS affirms) that day he had gotten the victory. But when it was told him that his brother was dead, hee caused his troops to stand. And BELISARIUS his souldiers, vnderstanding of the good successe of their Auanguard, which was farre before them, being by him animated Cauadas King of Perfia dying, his son Cosroes succeeded.

A great tumult in Constantinople.

IPatius rebelled in Constantinople, and was slain by IVstinian.

The occasion of the conquest of Africa against GILMER, King thereof.

BELISARIUS went to the wars of Africa.

BELISARIUS being arrived in Africa, King GILMER came against him.

AMATA, brother to GILMER.

and encouraged, returned to fight with such fury, that GILMER was wholly ouerthrowne and scattered, and many of his people slain, and hee by flight saved his life; and his souldiers, which escaped from the battell, straggled into diuerse parts: vpon which, greater execution had been done, if night had not ouertaken them.

The next day after this battell, BELISARIUS marched with his Armie towards the City of Carthage; where hee arrived in the euening, and found no resistance; for, they opened their ports, and made great lights to haue receiued him: but he would not by night come into an enemies City, leauing it vntill the next day, and then entred with great quietnes, without any spoil or murder committed by any of his souldiers; he hauing so commanded; for, his authority and reputation was such, that no man durst doo the contrary. The Vandals, which were in Carthage, withdrew themselves to the Temples and Churches; and BELISARIUS, granting them their liues, commanded them to come forth vpon his word, which hee held inuolubly. Possessing himself of that City, he commanded the wals thereof to be repaired, which were in many places decayed; which was the occasion why GILMER did not retire thither: BELISARIUS, being in Carthage, sent a Poste, a chief Captain called SALOMON, to the Emperor IVSTINIAN, to giue him to vnderstand of all that had passed. And GILMER, who escaped from the battell, recovered certain fields of Genetha, called Bulla, which are foure dayes march from Carthage: where (as a man no way disiniaid) he gathered together his troops that were scattered, and leui'd others: and he also sent in great haste to recall his brother AZON, who then was in Sardinia; whither hee had sent him against GODAS, which (as wee said) was in Arms in that Island against GILMER: whom AZON had ouerthrowne and slain, and recovered the Ile. But AZON, seeing the message from his brother, left all, and came with his forces to ioyne with him. GILMER, after that his brother was come, hauing recovered a sufficient Army, took his way towards Carthage to besiege BELISARIUS; or to giue him battell if he would come forth and fight: but BELISARIUS for certain daies would not take the Field, vntill hee had thoroughly repaired the walles of the City, and taken order for the rest. Which being done, he took the Field with his Armie; drawing neer to GILMER, who attended his coming.

The next day one Army hauing fight of the other, each of the Commanders set his people in order; and the Fight on either side began with such fury, that in the first charge AZON, GILMER'S brother, was slain, and certain other principall men of the Vandals; which strook such a feare among them, that they began to faint: and BELISARIUS charging with his Squadron, they turned their backs, and fled to their Camp, which they had very well fortified; and GILMER, vnable to stay them, did the like. BELISARIUS, gathering together his forces both of foot and horse, the very same day in the euening made towards GILMER'S Camp, with intent to haue assaulted it, and to haue made a compleat victory. When King GILMER saw the battailions march, knowing that he was not able to defend himself, with some few seruantes which followed him he fled: and BELISARIUS with little resistance, by reason of the Kings absence, got their Camp: his souldiers, putting to the sword all they found were able to beat Arms, took all the women and children captiues; and in the Camp they found an infinite quantity of gold, siluer, money and jewels: Which (as PROCOPIVS affirms) was one of the greatest and richest spoils that euer was seen of taken. For, the Vandals, hauing no place or refuge which they accounted safe, carried their gold, siluer, money, and all their treasure, with them: so as within one houre they lost all they had stoll and gotten together in Africa in 55 years. For, so long had they been in possession thereof.

The next day, BELISARIUS, to let slip no occasion, dispatched an excellent Captain called IOHN, with a good troop of horse to pursue GILMER; he himselfe purposing to do the like. And, leauing good order for all things in Carthage, and a sufficient garrison, hee followed with some of the choice men of his Armie. King GILMER, riding without any stay, retired himself into certain inaccessible mountains and rocks in the Prouince of Numbidia, called Papida; inhabited by a people called Maurusi, who were great friends to the Vandals. But before hee came thither, he was in danger to haue been taken by IOHN; and he escaped out of his hands when hee was very neer vnto him. But it was his ill hap that one of his souldiers, shooting at a bird, and missing it, slue his Captain; who, being shot through the throat, fell down dead: and by that mean had GILMER opportunity to escape, and to take the rocks & mountains; where hee staid not long ere BELISARIUS came. But forasmuch as it seemed a long work to take those rocks where GILMER was, by force; hee left one PHARAS a Captain with sufficient forces

A battell where- in King GILMER was ouerthrowne.

BELISARIUS entred Carthage with victory.

King GILMER escaped from the battell.

AZON, brother to King GILMER came to his aid with succour.

The second battell and victory obtained by BELISARIUS against GILMER.

The Vandals held Africa 55 years.

The flight and pursuit of King GILMER.

Gilimer brought by Pharas.

forces to compass in GILIMER; so as by no means hee could escape. And hee with the rest of the troupes returned to Carthage, and in his going and coming, tooke many Townes; and much people, with great ioy and contentment came to doe him service, glad to see themselves freed from so great servitude, and so restored to the libertie of the Empire.

Belisarius conquered all Africa in little more then foure moneths, which had been held by the Vandales
ninety six yeeres.

Being come to Carthage, for the full accomplishment of his victorie, he sent a Captaine to take the Isle of Sardinia, and sent other Captaines into Mauritania, and into diuers other parts, in all which he had most happy successe: for the Vandales in all places (for the most part) were ill beloued. So as in little more then foure moneths, BELISARIUS reconquered all Africa, after that the Empire had lost the same the space of fourescore and fixteene yeeres. And truly it was a wonderfull thing: for all that people were Arrian hereticks, and for such the same IUSTINIAN recordeth them, in his booke de officio Pretoris: wherein although that he saith, that there were one hundred and fiftie yeeres expired after that Africa was lost, it doth not therefore gainsay the ninety and six, as I have reported: for that was written nine yeeres afterwards, and he speaketh according to the day of the making of that law. But the truth is, that they possessed Africa but ninetie six yeeres. PHARAS, which remained behinde, to beseege King GILIMER, begirt him in on every side, in such manner, that GILIMER seeing no other remedie, after many letters which past betwene them, yielded himselfe vpon securitie of his life: which assurance BELISARIUS sent vnto him, and to certaine his kinsmen which were with him. And PHARAS as soone as he had him in his possession, came with him to Carthage to BELISARIUS, who entertained him very honorably. And so BELISARIUS ended his victories and enterprises: which truly was an admirable thing, and worthe of great consideration, if we call to minde the valour and power of those Vandales, and the great victories which they had obtained against the Romanes, of which we haue touched some. BELISARIUS presently sent to give the Emperor IUSTINIAN notice of the successe and issue of the warres, and to intreate him to give him leaue to make his repaire vnto him, and so bring GILIMER with him. Whereto IUSTINIAN answered, that he should doe therein what best pleased him, either to continue in the government of Africa, or to repaire to him at his pleasure. But BELISARIUS to cleere himselfe of certaine whispering mutterings, vnjustly raised against him, chose rather to goe to Constantinople, and left SALOMON before named for General and Governor of Africa, with a good part of his Armie; who afterwards had wars with the Maurusi; which rebelled, and he subdued, although with great danger and trouble.

Belisarius left Salomon governor of Africa.

BELISARIUS followed his journey, leading with him the King and many of his kindred, men and women prisoners, with infinite iewels, treasure and riches, which was the greatest and best part of all that the Vandales had stolne from Rome, Spaine, Africa, and other Princes; in almost a hundred yeeres before. Being come to Constantinople, the Emperour commanded him to be receiued in triumph, with all the ceremonies and solemnities, which the Romanes Customs in old time, and the Emperours afterwards triumphed in Rome.

Belisarius his triumph.

The Historie of IUSTINIAN must of necessity be longer then that of many other Emperours; as well for that he reigned a long time, as also for that the accidents which happened in his time, were great and famous, and the feates of Armes done in that time, noble and excellent: wherefore it shall not be fit to forbear to make mention thereof. I doe also know, and (as I thinke) have said it, that Readers take pleasure in reading of great battailes, strange aduentures, conquests of countries, and alterations of Kingdomes and estates: wherefore the Histories of peaceable Princes, and of happy times, without warres and disasters, are nothing so pleasing as are those which treat of slaughters, ruines of estates, alterations of kingdomes, notable victories, insurrections, factions, tumults, rebellions, and finally great accidents whether good or euill: for which reason fabulous bookes are read, and doe commonly giue content, for that they kill and cut in peeces thousands of men, batter Cities, and faine things in a manner impossible. Hercin, following the aduice of HORACE, I haue determined to take care as well to please, as to profit the Reader (when I may) with the truth; relating sometimes the great deeds of Armes, without concealing the examples of peace also, and the good conditions and vertues of peaceable and milde Princes, reproving and condemning vice and sinne, by detecting and abhorring those which committed the same; for so that end Histories are written, and are to be read; that reading vicious and wicked actions, the Readers may flee them, and follow those which are good and vertuous. And by the variable aduentures and accidents may become

To what end Histories are to be read.

more more more

more circumspect; and frame the rule of their liues according to such things as may befall them.

But returning to our purpose, BELISARIUS rested not long in Constantinople, before that IUSTINIAN gaue him the charge of the warres, and conquest of Italy, and Sicilie, against the Gothes; and THEODATUS who at that time was Lord thereof: which enterprise was held to be of no lesse importance and danger, than that of Africa: and the successe thereof shewed it afterwards to be farre greater, in regard of the great battels and slaughters which followed.

The beginning of this war (briefly) was such, as in the end of the life of the Emperor IUSTINIAN was by vs related. For, the great and redoubted King THEODORICVS being dead, his Nephew, ATHALARICVS (for that he had no sonne) succeeded him in the Kingdom of Italy, being of the age of eight yeeres. Wherefore his mother AMALASYNTE had the government of the Kingdom; who began to rule with infinite wildome, and to bring vp her sonne in virtuous exercises, and in the study of learning and good letters. But it was not long before that contentions and factions arose between her and her sonnes kinned; and particularly the malice and enuy grew between her and THEODATUS, cozin-germane to ATHALARICVS. Whereupon she, seeing her self oppressed, gaue the charge of the bringing vp of her son to certain principall men of them: and, leaving Rome, she came to Rauenna, where she still had great authority in the government. The enmity increasing between her and THEODATUS, who was a man of great power, and openly had made himself Lord of the Province of Tuscane; either of them, to weete, AMALASYNTE and THEODATUS, sought the friendship and assistance of the Emperor IUSTINIAN, and promised to giue him entrance into Italy.

As matters stood on these terms, the young King ATHALARICVS died; wherewith AMALASYNTE was greatly troubled and very hardly sorrie, for that she was a widow enuid, and ill-beloued of the chief men among the Gothes. Afterwards, studying what course was best to be taken, she resolved to come to an agreement with THEODATUS, and to make him King of Italy; persuading her self, that he for so great a benefit could not chuse but be her faithful friend; and that she should still hold the authority, and he the name and title of King. She having resolved heerupon, procured certain treaties and a meeting to be had: yhere, after long discourse and great promises, bound with solemn othes, made by the one and other party, shee proclaimed him King of Italy; and he joyning his power with her forces (which were greater than his) without difficulty obtained the Kingdom, and all men obeyed him. But this deuice proued ill with AMALASYNTE, neither was it any sound course for her: for as soon as THEODATUS saw himself an absolute Lord, and in possession, he began to rule, little to her liking; and within fewe daies commanded her to be apprehended, and in the end to be put to death, like an ingratefull and wicked Christian.

Theodatus, sent to Atha-laricus, recovered the kingdom of Italy for himself.

IUSTINIAN being aduertised hereof, was highly displeased (for hee tooke part with AMALASYNTE) and detecting so vile a fact, holding this for a good occasion, through the desire which he had to recover Italy to the Empire, hee resolved suddenly to make open warre against THEODATUS, in hope to make a conquest thereof by armes, which before he sought by wiles and secret practices. And to that effect hee chose BELISARIUS for General of his armie, who then came triumphing and victorious from Africa. IUSTINIAN at that time had an Ambassadour in Italy, called PETER, who went thither to treat of peace between AMALASYNTE and THEODATUS, with whom THEODATUS labored to come to some conditions of peace, for hee greatly feared the power of IUSTINIAN: and whilst that hee was builde hereabouts, BELISARIUS arrived with a Naue and an armie in Sicilia, for that hee held it expedient first to take that Island: and suddenly landing his men, hee presently took the cite of Calania, and within fewe daies after marched towards Syracusa, and with the like fortune entred, and took the same, and did the like by many other townes and cities.

Theodatus apprehended Amalasynthe, and caused her to be slain.

Then hee marched to Palermo, where hee found greater force and resistance, for it defended it selfe certaine daies, and many men were slaine of both sides: but those which were within it fearing their ruine, yielded themselves to BELISARIUS, and so did all the rest of the Island. Such was his expedition and good hap in the warres: And foras much as hee (for his fame) was greatly feared, THEODATUS seeing what had happened in Sicilia, standing in feare of him, treated with this Ambassadour PETER concerning certain conditions of peace, wherein he renounced his right to Sicilia; and that in Italy in all decrees & proclamations to be made IUSTINIAN should be first named, and that every yeere THEODATUS should send him a golden crown,

Belisarius rec-Sicilia.

in token of subjection, and other things which PRUDORIVS setteth down at large.

PATR being gone with this message, fear so much increased in THEODATVS, that hee sent vpon the way to recall the Ambassador which he had sent with PETER, whose name was RVARIVS; and made him to swear, that hee should not reueal his resolution vntill that he came into the presence of the Emperour; and saw whether hee would accept of the first offer or no; and if he did not, that then he should offer the whole Kingdom of Italia to IVSTINIAN, vpon condition that he should giue him some lands and possessions in Gracia or else where, to liue in. And to that effect he wrote a notable Letter to the Emperour, with his owne hand. When IVSTINIAN had heard the first offer made by THEODATVS; as hee was a valiant Prince, and of an haucie courage, he would not accept thereof; whereupon, the Ambassador discovered the second, wherein he offered him Italia: wherewith hee was exceeding glad, and wrote a gracious Letter to THEODATVS, and therewith sent Ambassadors to confirm the agreement, and to command BELISARIVS; that, making an end in Sicilia, he should passe ouer into Italia, and possesse himself of the forces thereof: but the account was not so concluded. For, in the meantime that these Ambassadors went and came, THEODATVS his Captains had obtained a notable victory, and had slain MVNDVS; and his son MAVRICIVS, who were IVSTINIAN's Captains in Slauonia, and had defeated the Imperiall Armie.

By reason of his victory, THEODATVS grew so proud, that hee not onely refused to accomplish what he had offered; but, saining himself much displeased with some speeches vsed to him by IVSTINIAN's Ambassadors, he caused them to be apprehended. This also increased his presumption; for, at that instant BELISARIVS was gone out of Sicilia into Africa to rescue SALOMON, whom hee had left there. For, a Captain called ESTORZAS mutined with the greatest part of the Army, and making himself Lord of the Country, put to death the Iudges and Gouerneurs thereof. But BELISARIVS, arriuing in Africa, took such order, that within very fewe daies he ouercame them in battell, and vsed extreme punishment in the Country; and so, leauing all in peace and quiet, returned into Italia, the affairs wherof he found in such estate as is before said.

At this time (as PROCORIVS writeth) there was seen so prodigious a light in the Sun, that the like hath neuer been heard of: which was, that the greatest part of one whole yeer the Sun gaue so little light, that it was but equall or little more than the light of the Moon; the sky being clear and without clouds, or any other thing to shadow the same. And lo, without any apparent occasion, it was obscured all that time: which, as it was afterwards conjectured, was the occasion of the famine and want of grain, which generally ensued through all the world, and did prognosticate the wars and effusion of blood which followed in Italia.

IVSTINIAN, seeing the inconstancy of THEODATVS, and being greatly displeased with the death of his Captains in Dalmatia, and the imprisonment of his Ambassadors in Italia, with great widdome, and the courage and resolution of a worthy Prince, providing for both occasions, sent into Dalmatia and Slauonia for his Generall, a valiant Captain called CONSTANTIVS; who recovered much of that which was lost, and renewed the warre in that part. And, as for the affairs of Italia, he commanded BELISARIVS speedily to enter it with the greatest power he could. Who, with his accustomed expedition and courage, left, in the fortresses and strong holds of Sicilia, such garrisons as he thought good; and transported his Army into Italia at the streight of Messina; and began to seise on the places and towns neer the sea-side, not finding any Army to hinder him; and so he conquered all the Coast to the City of Naples: wherein THEODATVS had put a great garrison of Gothes, who valiantly defended the same. Where passed many conflicts; and the Besieged sent secretly to craue relief, but in vain; for, in the end they were taken by force, and the souldiers had great spoil, and made great slaughter of the Gothes. But BELISARIVS, the next day assembling his Armie, took such order with the souldiers, that they set all the Inhabitants of the City at liberty, and restored to them the greatest part of the goods which were taken from them; contenting themselves with the spoile of their enemies onely, sparing the citizens: to whom they protested, that the cause of their coming was, To set them at liberty. Great was the fear which the taking of Naples strake into the Gothes; for, they held it impregnable. Wherefore all the chief men and Captains amongst them, seeing the small prouision that THEODATVS made, and assuring them that BELISARIVS would not continue long in Naples before he came to Rome; One inuiuing another, they mette at a place neer vnto it; and, after long debating and consultation vpon the matter, they did chuse a wife and valiant Captain for their King, who by name was called VITIGES.

to the end that he should presently take order for the leuying of men of war, and the defense of the countrey against BELISARIVS. Which which when THEODATVS vnderstood, who then was in Rome, holding himselfe to be in no securitie, he fled thence towards Rauenna; but he was ouertaken vpon the way by a Captain called OPTARVS, whom VITIGES sent to pursue him; and so was slaine by his commandment, when he had reigned three yeeres King of Italy. THEODATVS being dead, VITIGES called a councill; and being of opinion that he had not power sufficient to attend BELISARIVS in Rome, neither to sallie forth to fight with him in the fields, resolved to go to Rauenna, and there raising sufficient forces, returne to giue him battaile. And he was the rather induced thereto, for that he stood in doubt of the French, which had declared themselves for the Emperour. Being thus resolved, he left for gouernour of Rome a Captain whose name was BADERS, with fewer thousand mercenarie souldiers in garrison: and encouraging the citizens to defend themselves, he tooke his way towards Rauenna.

BELISARIVS, leauing a good guard and garrison in Naples, marched with his Armie towards Rome; where the inhabitants knowing of his coming, resolved that they would not stand vpon their defence, but opened the ports & let him in: and they so agreed together, as the Gothes could not hinder it, but held it their best course to be gone. And it so hapned, that in one day, and at one instant, BELISARIVS entered at one port, and they sallied out at another. Who after that he had made a most excellent speech to the Senate, and encouraged them to embrace their libertie, he presently applied himselfe to repair the walles and to fortifie the citie; bringing in victuals and prouision from all parts: For all the countrey round about was at commandment.

In the meane while, the new King VITIGES, (who was neither idle, nor a coward) left nothing vndone that might encrease his power against BELISARIVS. First he concluded a peace with the King of France, to the end he should not bee his aduersarie, and gaue him those lands which THEODORICVS held in France, thereby to be the better assured of his friendship; and sending for his binarie capitaines and souldiers which he usually held in France, hee commanded them to come and ioine with him. And from Germanie and other parts he procured all the aide he possibly could. Finally, he vsed such meanes, as hee raised in Rauenna, and the marches thereof, one hundred and fiftie thousand men, of foote and horse; good souldiers, and the most of them very well armed.

With this Armie he began to march towards Rome, wherein BELISARIVS was; but not with any such forces as might suffice to take the field, or to fight with so great an enemy. Whereupon King VITIGES (nothing doubting of the victorie) grew so proud, as hee not onely tooke care that BELISARIVS should not flie and abandon Italia, but by the way hee ever asked, whether BELISARIVS were fled or no: and reioiced infinitely when it was told him that he fortified himselfe in Rome; and that it seemed, he meant to abide his coming. But the valiant BELISARIVS was farre from that which VITIGES supposed, for he was resolved rather to die, then to abandon what he had gotten. But seeing his small power, in respect of his aduersarie, he sent to BLESVS and CONSTANTINVS, Capitaines which hee had sent into those marches, that they should presently returne to Rome with their troupes, where hee was with his, and had fortified and furnished the citie; with a resolution to defend the same, and to stoppe the enemy, if he purposed to goe forwards, to recouer what he had gotten in Campania, Pulia, and Calabria. But VITIGES held on his way directly towards Rome, imagining that it could not be held; and at his arriual there happened so great an accident, that although I know it will somewhat detain me, yet I will describe it.

BELISARIVS, at a bridge ouer the river Tiber, about a mile from Rome where VITIGES should passe, had caused two very strong towers to bee built, and placed therein a very good guard to entertain the enemy: but VITIGES being comm with his Armie, those that had the guard at the bridge, one night were in such fear, that without any fight they presently gaue vp the place; and the same night VITIGES began to passe ouer a great part of his Armie. The next morning, BELISARIVS, suspecting no such matter, sallied forth of Rome with a thousand choice horse, and came towards the bridge, to the end to chuse a fit place to lodge his people, for the defense and stopping of the passage: but being comm somewhat neer vnto it, he suddenly met with VITIGES men-at-Arms, who that night had past the river by the bridge: wherewith BELISARIVS was so much dejected (imagining the guards of the bridge to be lost) that with lesse discretion than he ought, hee charged VITIGES men with Theodatus of jereen to vnder the kingdom of Iste into the lands of Iustinian.

Theodatus refused to perform his promise

The same gave very little light for the space of almost a year.

Belisarius came with great power into Italia.

The Gothes, discontented with Theodatus, chuse Vitiges for their King.

Theodatus flane by the commandment of Vitiges.

Belisarius entered Rome.

Vitiges leuied an Armie of 150000 men of foote and horse.

Vitiges marched towards Rome against Belisarius.

A strange encounter.

so great rage and fury, that there followed a cruell Fight; so as VITIGES his Vauanguard retired to the battailon wherein he himself was: whence hee charged with so great a troop of Gothes, that BELISARVS his company was held for lost; and hee in his owne person did wonders, slaying and wounding many of his enemies; and charged so farre in amongst them, that all Authors which write thereof affirm, that he discharged the part of an excellent man at Arms, but not of a good and discreet Generall. For, he put his person in such danger, that hee was held for dead; and so it was presently reported in Rome by some of his people which fled. He being in this distresse, wherein hee lost many of his friends and seruants, being vnable any longer to maintain the Fight, his people began to retire a main gallop, and hee did the like, after they had slain 1000 of the Gothes. And many of VITIGES his horsemen pursued them: euen to the very gates of Rome, which were shut: and those which held the guard there would not open them, fearing to let in the enemy. And for that with the noise and callings, they knew not BELISARVS by his voice, whom they accounted for dead; he, hauing fought the greatest part of the day, was driuen to lean to the wall; and, ranging his souldiers into a Squadron, made head against the enemy, and so continued fighting, without any meat or sustenance, till it was night: in the which hee did a valiant, though a dangerous and desperate, exploit; which was, that he charged the Gothes with such fury, that they all beleened (through the darkness of the night) that great troops had sallied forth of the City: and in this doubt they began to retire towards their Camp, BELISARVS still charging them in the ariereguard, til hee found a free place, and then returned; and, coming to the Port, was knowne and receiued into the city with his people, although many, fewer in number than they sallied. And so he escaped this perillous conflict, with a great number of arrows sticking in his horse & armor; and had some blowes and cuts with the sword, but none of them toucht his flesh: which was held for a wonder by those which saw in how great danger hee had been.

The next day VITIGES arriued, and ouerran the fields of Rome; and, being vnable to besiege the City round on euery side, by reason of the greatnes thereof, hee diuiding his Armie, inuested it with six Camps: and forasmuch as it would be too long to recite the conflicts which passed in that siege, they were so great and strange, I will leaue them all. Onely let this suffice, to vnderstand, that it was one of the most terrible and bloody sieges that euer was before any city: for, it continued one whole year and nine daies; and the first seuen moneths of that time, VITIGES and his Gothes (who were valiant men) neuer ceased to batter and assault the City on all parts; where they did and receiued much hurt. And BELISARVS and his people neuer suffred their aduersaries to rest, neither forbore to sallie forth and to fight with them in field; so as in skirmishes and sallies Writers affirm, that they slue about 40000 of the Gothes: in which time hee did marvels in Arms, as well for valour and hardinesse, as for wisdom and pollicie, as an excellent Captain.

The Emperour IVSTINIAN was not carelesse of this siege, but sent reliefe and succor both of men and munition to BELISARVS; and supplied him with certaine Captains and companies of horse and foote, with come and other victuals, which without great trouble and daunger could not come to Rome. But this was not so sufficient, but that they endured extreme famine. Yet that notwithstanding, he managed things so wisely and valiantly, as VITIGES seeing himselfe and his Armie tired, and weakened, sought to make a truce with him, which was concluded for three moneths: but it continued not so long, for VITIGES through the cunning and treacherie of some, demanded to haue leaue to come in, and to see the citie, within the time of the truce: whereupon the warres were renewed. And BELISARVS sent commandement to a Captain of his called IOHN, who was Marshall of his Armie, that he should make cruell warres in the marches of Rauenna, whither hee had sent him with about two thousand horse, and certaine other souldiers before the time of the truce, imagining that hee harrying that quarter, VITIGES would rife from before Rome. This Captain sped so well in his enterprise, as hee took the citie of Arimino, and other places. And VITIGES standing in feare to lose Rauenna, raised his siege from before Rome, and returned to defend the rest. But in his retreat BELISARVS charged him so furiously in the ariereguard, as he slew a great number of his men. And so with shame, dishonor, and losse of his forces, VITIGES returned to the countrey of Rauenna, and very resolutely besieged Arimino, wherein this Captaine IOHN was.

BELISARVS, to auoid losse of time, leuying such forces as hee could get, staid not any longer: but whilst he went to Naples, and fortified that City, he then presently took his way towards the city of Rauenna: and so the warres were renewed in diuerse parts of Italie. And to BELISARVS came a Captain sent by IVSTINIAN, called NARSIS, an Eunuch, with a great supply of souldiers. This NARSIS afterwards was Generall; and an excellent man: with whom, and those which hee had already, BELISARVS relieved IOHN, who was besieged in Arimino; and with some losse of men constrained VITIGES to raise his siege. Before and after which, in Gallia Cisalpine, now called Lombardy, Milan, Bergamo, &c. and other Cities, took part with BELISARVS; whiche hee sent some Captains, and therefore followed great conflicts and battels, as well with the Gothes, as with THEODORVS King of France, who came with a resolution to haue made himself Lord of that Countrey; while they were busied in these wars. BELISARVS, after many great adventures, fought a battell with VITIGES, who had drawn together his whole power to that end: And, to vse brevitee, BELISARVS getting the victory, VITIGES, fleeing to Rauenna, was therein besieged; which siege lasted many daies, and there were many treaties of the one and the other side; so far forth, as to offer to make BELISARVS King of Italie: But hee continuing his siege, and the City being taken, VITIGES was delivered into his hands, with whom in a manner all Italie came under his obedience.

The affairs of Italy standing in this estate, by the commandment of IVSTINIAN, BELISARVS was to depart from Italy (which he ought not to haue done); for the Emperour meant to employ his person in his wars against the Persians, leaving Italy in subjection; although that afterwards through his absence there followed great alterations & combustions. For, although that IOHN, BESA and VITALIS (all valiant men, and of great esteem) remain'd for Commanders and Gouverners in his place, yet there was no comparison between them and him: for, he was a most excellent Captain. This great Captain BELISARVS departed from Italie, carrying with him King VITIGES, and the Queen his wife, with many of his kindred, and other principall men of the Gothes, prisoners; and was receiued into Constantinople with exceeding honour and much joy: And he was so beloued and esteem'd, that all men, both inhabitants and strangers, went to see him as a wonder of the world, extolling his vertues and noble acts; which for the breuitie of my stile I am not able to expresse. This was also a great help thereto, in that hee was a man of a most pleasing countenance, tall of stature, of an excellent constitution, Noble of condixion, milde, courteous, and endued with many other rare and herocicall vertues.

Within fewe daies after that BELISARVS was gone out of Italie, some Cities rebelled, and chose YDIBALDVS for their King, a valiant Captain, and of great authority among the Gothes; who began to growe mighty by means of the euill government, and the powlings and extortions, vsed by the Emperours Captains in the Countrey. He leuying an Army (which vntill then hee durst not do) presumed to fight with VITALIS, and ouerthrew him in battell, and began to be feared by the Imperialists. But, because hee slue a nephew of VITIGES, one of his guard slue him, when hee had reigned little more than one year. In his place was chosen ARARICVS (whom PAVLVS DIACONVS and IORDANVS call ARARIS) who was also slain within fewe moneths. And then they chose TOTILA for their King; who wrought the miserie and destruction of Rome, as I will presently tell you, when as we haue declared how and vpon what occasion BELISARVS was drawn out of Italie by the Emperour IVSTINIAN, which before we spake not of, which passed in this manner:

COSROES King of Persia, seeing that BELISARVS (whom he chiefly feared) was busied in the wars of Italie, sought some occasions, whether fained or iust, to make warre vpon the territories of the Empire; and, entering some Prouinces, took certain Imperiall Cities. Whereupon IVSTINIAN, who very circumspectly provided for all parts, besides the ordinary garisons sent an Armie into the East, and for Generall thereof a valiant Gentleman named SITTAS, who in a battell was ouerthrowne and slain. And IVSTINIAN sent another called BUCINA, a very rare man at Arms; and also a nephew of his called GERMANY, and other Captains and souldiers: so as the war was very cruell and bloody between COSROES and them, which I haue not time to relate. But the Imperialists could not make sufficient resistance against the Persians: and so COSROES entred far into the Empire; and, leaving Mesopotamia on the right hand, marched towards Syria and Cilicia, and by assault took many good Cities. Wherefore IVSTINIAN, holding no man sufficient for that war but BELISARVS, sent for him out of Italie: at what time hee had brought it all vnder subjection, excepting some fewe Holds and Castles in Lombardy, wherein the Gothes had fortified themselves.

BELISARVS leauing Italie, and arriuing at Constantinople, within fewe daies after was sent

A desperate assault.

Rome terribly besieged, and assaulted by the Gothes.

Vitiges besieged Rome.

Rome hardly besieged.

Vitiges took truce with Belisarius for three moneths.

Vitiges raised his siege from before Rome.

Narsis sent by the Emperour to the aid of Belisarius.

A battell: Belisarius victor.

Belisarius took King Vitiges prisoner. Belisarius left Italy by the Emperours commandment.

Belisarius carried King Vitiges and his wife prisoner to Constantinople.

Ydibaldus was chosen for king of the Gothes by some of their Armes.

Totila made king.

Cosroes, king of Persia, made war in the East.

Captains sent against the Persians, Sittas, Bucina and Germany.

The Persians took many cities in the Empire.

Belisarius from against the Goths.

Totila his good success in Italy.

Belisarius by the Emperours commande ment returned into Italy.

Totila besieged
Rome.

Belisarius effected by the river Tiber, with a determination to relieve Rome.

who had last against Cosroes the mightie King of Persia; And with his comming the Im-perialists took heart, and he requied the warre with such discretion and courage, as there was profant alteration in all things: and having obtained some victories against certaine of Cos-roes's Captaines (for he himselfe durst not fight with him) he recovered much of that which was (stolen) by means whereof the affairs of the East went daily from well to better, through the presence and good gouernement of Belisarius. But in the meane season (which was two yeres) the estate of Italy wanted worse: for as we said, Totila, being made King of the Goths, followed the warres with so great courage and in so good order, as hauing ouer-throwne and slaine some of the Emperours Iustinian's Captaines, the Goths wanne such reputation, as all the towines took part with them, excepting such as were held by garisons.
And Totila marched through all Italy, without finding any resistance, and besieged the great cite of Naples: which after many exploits, both by sea and land, he tooke; and many others in that quarter, and prospered so well in his enterprises, as it seemed, that in a short space he would (without speedie redresse) make himselfe Lord of the whole. Which when Iustin-ian perceived, grieving more for Italy, then for all the rest, he commanded Belisarius, that leauing the affairs of the East in the best order he could, he should make his repaire vnto him, and be as a seruant accustomed to obey; did so. Leauing his people in the East, and com-ming to Constantinople, without any stay, he was sent by the Emperour into Italy; whither he went with so great haste, that he could not leade with him above fiftie thousand men: for it was thought that he should haue found sufficient forces there; and was made to beleuee that the Emperours' partie was not brought to so great extremitye as it was. But he found all quite contrarie, in so much as it did partly seeme that his comming did more harme then good; for being wished for, and expected by his friends, and feared by his enemies; seeing him come with so small forces, the one were dismayed, and the other took courage: and so in the beginning his enterprise was very doubtfull and tedious. Putting himselfe into Ravenna, to fortifie and defend the same, within few daies he took such order, as notwithstanding that he could not keepe the field and heard the enemye (for that he was too mightie for him) yet the Goths neuertheless did rather lose then get. Wherewith Totila being much displeased, and desirous to make warres to the yerkmost, assembled all his whole power, and sent Captaines and companies to Ravenna against Belisarius. And he with his whole Armie went to Rome, which was so flenderly provided for, either with men or munition, that it seemed, it could not long be defended.

Belisarius vnderstanding hereof, and remembering with how much trouble and ex-tremitye he had defended that cite in former time, and seeing that he had not forces to keepe the field, neither could put himselfe into it by land, was much displeased and sorrowfull, and wrote an earnest letter to the Emperour Iustinian, desiring him to send him men and money; resolving to put himselfe into Rome by sea from Ravenna, where he then was. And passing ouer into Dalmatia, and thence to Dyrrasse, he found captaine Iohn, whom Iustinian had sent with a good Armie, wherewith he was of opinion to be able to fight with Totila.
But the reliefe of Rome he held necessarye to be provided for, with greater expedition then could be made with that Armie: for if Totila should take it, he feared that all Italy would revolt.
Wherefore he resolved to goe thither by sea, and to put himselfe into Rome by the riuer Tiber:
(for the cite called Porto in the mouth of Tiber, held for the Emperour; and Ostia on the other side of the riuer held for the Goths) and that Captaine Iohn should crosse the Sea with his Armie, and comming into Calabria, should march by land, to relieue him.

This being thus concluded; Belisarius sailed, and arrived at Porto in the mouth of Tiber; and hauing no sufficient power to march by land, by reason of Totila's great Armie, heer speedily rigged a great number of Barks and Fregates, which he fraughted with men and munition, and so passed by the riuer. And notwithstanding that Totila had in the narrowell place of that riuer drawne chaines, and made a bridge, and two Castles at the ends of the bridge, guarded with a great number of souldiers, by this meanes to stop his passage, yet Belisarius followed his course by the Riuer; and comming to the bridge, he and his people in such fort charged those which guarded the same, that they brake and scattered them and passed through;
and Rome had been presently relieved, and euery thing had had good successe, had there not befallen a strange mishap, which troubled and altered all.

Belisarius had left his wife and familie (which wife he loued so much, as in his other warres he euer carried her with him) in the port before named, at the entrie of the Riuer, with

A great misfortune which befell Belisarius

Totila took Rome.

Totila burnt and destroyed
Rome.

Belisarius entered Rome to the end to fortify and defend the same.

Totila besieged Rome, and therein Belisarius.

Belisarius was inforced out of Italy.

with a Garison which held the fort, and a good Captaine, whose name was Isaaz, with expressiue commandement that he should not fallie forth without the walles, but should keepe the fortesse. But Isaaz, hearing the newes of Belisarius's victorie, and being desirous to doe some notable exploit of himselfe, sallied out of the towne with his Garison, to charge Totila: his souldiers, which lay there against him: and although that at the first he disordered them and made them retire, yet in the end he was ouerthrowne by them and taken prisoner. Whereof Belisarius was presently aduertised by some which fled, and the report went (without any author) that the Towne was taken, and that his wife was in the enemies hands. Which when he vnderstood, he was so grieved and enraged, that without expecting any further newes, he returned downe the Riuer, with a determination either to die, or to see his wife at libertie, imagining that if he sped well, he might speedily returne to the rescue of Rome. But being come to the port, he found the place at his deuotion, and that his wife was well and at libertie, although the Captaine were lost. Whereupon he tooke greater displeasure to see himselfe thus delayed, then at the first euill newes; and the same night after his arruall at the port, through extreme choler and griefe which he had taken, or some other vn-knowne occasion, he was so extremely taken with a feuer, that he fell downe for dead, and his disease daily encreasing, he was oftentimes at the point of death. In this meane time, which was for the space of many daies, Totila did so straightly besiege the Cite, that they within died of hunger, and did eat dogs, cats, rats, and other things which seemed impossible. And Totila in the end, hauing the Cite in his power, sent his Ambassadors to Iustinian, offering to be his seruant and good friend, and to preserve and keepe the Cite, if hee would grant him peace; if not, that then he would raze it and make the most cruell warre he could.
Iustinian answered that his Generall Belisarius was in Italy, to whom he referred all matters.

Totila was so enraged with this answer, that hee resolved to ruine Rome, and so hee did. For hee made the Capitoll it selfe to be burned, and the best part of all the Cite, and the third part of the walles hee caused to be throwne downe, and commanded the inhabitants to abandon the Cite, vpon paine of death, and to goe to liue in some other place. And so he left burnt, desolate, and waste, that Cite which had commanded the World, and which had bene the greatest, most frequented, and best peopled of all others. Then he marched against Iohn, who with the Armie sent by Iustinian, came through Calabria, towards Rome, who shewed himselfe so very a coward, that hee durst not attend him in the field, but put himselfe into Ostia, the furthest place of all Calabria. And so Totila without any resistance tooke all Calabria, Abruzzo and Lucania, which vntill then held for the Emperour Iustinian.

In the meane time, Belisarius recovered his health, and performed one of the most desperate attempts, that euer he had done at any time before; which was with those troups which he had, to goe and put himselfe into Rome, with a resolution to repaire, reedefie and defend the same; and so he did. And so first sending his wife to Constantinople, he presently went to Rome (as desolate as it lay) and caused with all expedition, trenches to be digged, and ram-piers to be made, where the walles were throwne downe, and all the victuals that possibly could be gotten, to be brought thither, and made a Cite of that which lay waste. Through the same hereof, many Citizens, that could get to him; for the loue of their countie came; and put themselves therewith him. Whereof as soone as Totila was aduertised, by long iourneys without any intermission, he returned againe, assuring himselfe presently to enter it, and there to take Belisarius: But Belisarius so valiantly defended the same; that to his great losse, Totila was driuen to raise his siege. Whereby it may be imagined, how well he would haue defended it before it was ruined, and he repaired it with new ports and rampiers. In the meane season captaine Iohn in Calabria and Pulia gathered the Citizens of Rome together and sent them thither, in whose Cite Belisarius remained; and hauing fortified it, and left a good Garison therein, with an excellent Gouernour called Gonon; he went to ioyne with Iohn, and other Captaines, to pursue Totila:
where many things hapned too long to be recited. But the King of Persia againe making wars in the East, Iustinian resolved to send Belisarius thither, although that afterwards he went not, for peace was concluded betwene them: Vpon this occasion Belisarius again went out of Italy, although not with so great good fortune, and victories, as at the first, yet with no disgrace, neither with any lesse honor, for he neuer failed in any thing, to doe what behold him, or what he was able; and so in summe went to Constantinople; where he remained all the remainder of his life. After he had liued there certaine yeeres, Agathius writeth, that the Huns came down into Thracia, euen very neer to Constantinople, robbing and spoiling the countrie. And Belisarius being now old, was sent against them; and overthrow them in battaile; and had not Ivstinian sent for him to returne; hee had wholly ruined them.

Totila besieged and took Rome.

Within few daies after that Belisarius was departed out of Italy, Totila returned to Rome, and againe besieged it, and after a long siege and great extremities and famine endured by the besieged, through the negligence of John who should haue relieved it, and the treason of some others, the fierce barbarian tooke it, but the taking of it at this time was quite contrarie to the last: for now he did not any harme, but sought to repaire and repeople it, and gave great gifts, priuiledges, and exemptions to the inhabitants, to the end they should returne and dwell there. Afterwards he took many other places, and passed ouer into Sicilia: and for that he could not easily make a conquest thereof, he left foure captaines with many men of warre therein, and returned into Italy. And if Narses a captaine whom Ivstinian sent, had not come thither, he had within short space made himselfe absolute Lord of the whole countrie. This Narses was a famous Captain, valiant, and of great experience, and very priuate with the Emperor Ivstinian; and therefore rich, and of great authority; who came into Italy with a great Armie, leuiued of fundrie nations, as Hunnes, Heruli, and other warlike people. Amongst which there came to his seruice, a people called Longobardi, who then dwelt in Hungarie; and he marched by land along all the coast of the Adriaticke sea; now called the gulf of Venice, vntill he came to Rauenna; notwithstanding that at his entrie into Italy, he had some encounters and conflicts with some of Totila's Captaines, where there came to ioyne with him some of those Captaines and companies, which Belisarius had left. Staying but few daies in Rauenna, he tooke the field with his Armie, directing his course for Rome. But Totila who was no way a coward, attended his coming upon the way, and presenting him battaile, they fought, and in the fight Totila was slaine, and his people scattered and overthrowne. Which victorie was the occasion that Narses easily reconquered all Italy: for after this fight, he held on his iourney and besieged Rome. And notwithstanding that the Gothes which Totila left there in garrison, did defend it well, yet Narses took it by assault, with great losse of the defendants. And departing from thence, he took all the towns and cities round about.

Treyas made King of the Goths.

After the death of Totila, the Gothes made a great man amongst them whose name was Treyas, their King, who took all Totila's treasure which lay in Pania; and sought to get men and aide against Narses, and sent to intreate reliefe of the French, who would not intermeddle in that warre. But Treyas seeing that Narses tooke cities and towns, without finding any man to fight with him, departed out of Lombardie with all the power hee could make, and marched towards Campania, where Narses staied for him. They both lodged their Armies vpon a riuer side: where after some notable skirmishes, they came to a battaile, which was one of the most cruell that had been fought in all that warre. For historians report wonders wrought by this Treyas, King of the Gothes in his owne person; but in the end being ouerborne by Narses's men, he was by them slaine, iust at twelue of the clocke at noone; at which time he had fought about six howers; and yet notwithstanding his death, the battaile ceased not, vntill that darke night parted them, without apparance of any victorie of either side: and reposing themselves as well as they could that night, the next morning the Gothes in despair, and the Imperialists despised, to see that a people without a Captaine should defend themselves, returned againe to fight, without ceasing; and the Gothes taking the benefit of the side of an hill, defended themselves. But in the end towards night they sent their Ambassadors vnto Narses, offering to render all that they held in Italy, conditionally that he should giue them leaue to liue in it, without any armour or weapons. Which request Narses granted, for that he would not fight with a desperate people; and for the great losse which his Armie had already receiued: and so they deliuered what they possessed, and some of them continued in Italy, subiect to the inhabitants, in such manner, that within a very short space the name of the Gothes was wholly extinct, rooted out and forgotten, although not presently after the victorie: for some Captains and companies which remained in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lombardy, and in the Prouince of Tripadana, now Piemont, began to fortifie; and they crauing aide and succours coming out of France and Burgundy, the war was renewed, which lasted welneere

neere one whole yeere, and therein passed great battailes: but in the end Narses obtained both the field and the victorie, and was absolute commander of all Italy. And it pleased God to make him the instrument to roote out, and to extinguiish the name of the Gothes and Ostrogothes in Italy, 18 yeeres after the beginning of this warre, and threescore and twelue, after that Theodoricus first entred and made himselfe Lord of that countrie. But to the contrary, the Visigothes in Spain grew daily more powerfull, and the name of the Alanes and Sueuians extinct, the Gothes only remaining. At that time reigned Thanaagildys in great prosperitie in Spain, and ruled that kingdome the space of 22 yeeres. These enterprises being ended, Narses applied himselfe to the vttermost of his power, to the reedifying of Rome; caused the inhabitants to reduce themselves to one part thereof; and so he tooke the best order he could, both for the government of the same, and of Italy also. This Narses was a man of great iudgement, a good christian, very zealous in Religion, and desirous of the good of the common wealth, and besides all this, was one of the most excellent captaines of the World. By reason whereof he held the government of Italy as long as the Emperor Ivstinian liued; who during all the time of these great wars, made his continuall abode in Constantinople, providing men and money for the wars in all parts; as well for those of Italy as in the East, where hee had dangerous wars against Cosroes King of Persia.

Agathius writeth of this war in a particular Booke. Narses drove the Gothes out of Italy.

The valour and prudence of the Emperor Iustinian.

There hapned in the time of Ivstinian (besides the warres and conquests before specified, and many others, which for breuitie, and for that they were of no great importance, I omit) earth-quakes, famine, and other great calamities. For in his raigne the times were so variable, and there hapned such strange accidents, as the like had neuer beene. And he (as I said in the beginning) was as an excellent prince, and exceedingly carefull for the wars; providing captaines, fouldiers and money, without taxing or oppressing his subiects, with incredible magnanimity and bounty. By meanes whereof, he preferred the Empire of the East, and reconquered the Prouinces of Africa, wholly subuerting and expelling the Vandales out of those countries, and did the like by the Gothes in Italy. And concerning his Government in time of peace, he was no lesse carefull; so as it seemed he neuer had applied himselfe to any thing else: for as the lawes and statutes made by other Emperors his predecessors, were so many, that aman could hardly reade them; and so variable and intricate as it seemed that many of them did contradict one the other; he reduced them all to a conformitie and breuitie; drawing out of them that onely which was necessarie, and made other new. And in this manner he abridged all the lawes of the ancient Magistrates, Iudges and Lawyers, which contained about 2000 bookes, and reduced them to fittie, called the Digest, and compiled the 4 bookes of the Institutions, commonly called Instituta. And the lawes and decrees of all the Emperours and Cæsars, which were dispersed abroad in very many bookes, he reduced to twelue; called Ivstinians Codex. And he made another book intituled, The Volume, wherein he included three of those twelve bookes aforesaid. To bring these things to effect he held about him great learned men; but the principall ministers and authors thereof were, John Patricius, and Theophilus, and Dorotheus, but chiefly Tribunianus, all singular Lawyers and Philosophers. Besides all this, Ivstinian was very iudicious in Architecture, and built many great and sumptuous edifices. But he was taxed with this vice, that he willingly gave care, and was a friend to bake-biers, and such as spake ill of others, and was very vengefull against such as any way offended him. He was also noted of ingratitude, and couetousnesse, and that by all waies and meanes he sought to encrease his rents, and treasure; but he afterwards spent it all frankly and bountifully in the warres, and vpon his fouldiers.

Iustian abridged the lawes.

Codex Iustinian.

Being now very old and having no sonne that might succede him, he chose his Nephew Ivstin, for his companion in the Empire; which Ivstin, was his daughters sonne. They write of him, that in his old age, he was infected with the heresie of those, which beleued, that the flesh and bodie of Christ was impassible. Which heresie is to be supposed proceeded through want of iudgement, whereof he was bereaued some daies before he died. Finally, after so many noble acts and many others, which for breuitie cannot be expressed, the good Emperor Ivstinian being about 80 yeeres old, left this for a better life, when he had reigned 39 yeeres, in the year of our Lord, 568, and was greatly lamented and deplored through all the whole Empire.

Iustinian made his nephew Iustian, his companion in the Empire.

Iustinian died in the year 568.

Tripadana, Piemont.

THE LIFE OF IVSTIN. THE SE.
COND OF THAT NAME,
AND THREESCORE RO-MANE EMPEROVR.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

Vpon the death of Iustinian, his daughters some Iustin tooke possession of the Empire, whom farre vnlike to his Grandfather, both in condition, and in his vigilantes care for the government: for he left the administration thereof to his wife Sophia. He had warres with the Persians, but they were soon ended, and he particularly applied himselfe to the affaires of Italy, which for the Empire was gouerned by Narles: For, Iustin in the East, gaue himselfe to pleasure and sensualitie. This Narles, being to his great glory performed many worthe enterprises, was ill rewarded by Iustin, and his wife Sophia: But the injuries done vnto him were the occasion of so great misfortunes, as poore Italy shall neuer haue cause to lament them. For Narles calling Alboinus King of the Longobards into Italy, and afterwards desiring to haue stayed them (whom hee could not) hee was the cause of the ruine thereof: For they made themselves Lords of the greatest part thereof, and possessed the same about two hundred yeeres. In time of which warre, Iustin died of the Goutte, when hee had reigned eleven yeeres.

Iustin obeyed for Emperour.

Sophia wife to the Emperour Iustin.

we said) was IVSTINIAN'S daughter. His father was a great Noble-man in the countrie of Slaunomia; he himselfe was of a quick and actiue wit, and both apt and sufficient for any thing; but ill conditioned and vnworthy of the Empire, prouing farre vnlike his Grandfather. For, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, he became colicetous and tyrannous, a robber and a despoiler of the poore, and about all, he was retchlesse and negligent in matters of iustice and gouernement; and thereof left all the charge and care to his wife the Emperesse, whose name was SOPHIA, whose wit was incapable thereof, neither had she conditions or vertues deseruing the same. At his first coming to the Empire, this SOPHIA, to win the loue and good will of the people, counsell'd IVSTIN, out of his Exchequer, to pay the debts of such poore men as were vnable to make satisfaction without their vndoing, which he did: wherefore in the beginning of his raigne he was generally well beloued.

same

There also happened warre between him and HORMISDA King of Persia, who through the death of COSMOS succeeded in that Kingdom: whither he sent a Noble-man called MARTIN for General, and there passed great matters, but principally a cruell and bloudie battaile, wherein the Imperialists preuailed; and finally they returned to treat of peace; and that was confirmed, which was made in the time of the Emperour IVSTINIAN. So the East remained in peace, and IVSTIN passed his time without care in pleasure, giuing himselfe ouer to vice and sensualitie. So as of him there is no notable matter to be written, but of the affaires of Italie: which happened in this manner. In the fourth yeere (as some write) of the raigne of the Emperour IVSTIN, and the tenth or twelfth of NARSES his gouernement in Italie, after the great victorie obtained through his wifedom and policie against the Gothes; some malicious men enuying his great honour and dignitie, and the great riches which he had gotten in former warres, reported and wrote to IVSTIN much euill of NARSES; and as in Court (an vsual thing) there wanted not some that enuid him, and were glad thereof, so they found the fauour to be heard; and IVSTIN through want of iudgement, and the Emperesse SOPHIA being light of beleefe, were perswaded that what was told them of him was true. So without respect or regard of the daungers and troubles wherewith he had conquered Italy, they resolved to depose him from his gouernment, and to send him a successor, which was one of the greatest indignities that could be done him. And it pleased God to permit so great an ingratitude to be punished. For SOPHIA was not content to embase NARSES by depriving him of his gouernment, but she also disgraced him in his speeches, saying, that she would haue him come to spinne amongst her women at Constantinople. And a principall man called LONGINVS, was presently sent to take his place and to succeed him.

When NARSES vnderstood of this, his courage could not endure so shamefull a disgrace, without great disdain. Wherefore being no lesse grieved with the words vsed by SOPHIA, then with what they had done; it is written that he sayd: That, seeing that she meant to make him to spinne, he promised to twist her such a web, as she should neuer be able to vntwine: which he well performed, as hereafter shall be sayd. And vnderstanding that LONGINVS was come to Ravenna, he durst not goe to Constantinople, but came from Rome (where he then liued) to Naples, where he was so much beloued and honored, as he held himselfe to be there in security. From thence as a man disgraced and in despair, he by often letters and otherwise, sollicit'd ALBOINVS King of the Longobards, who was his friend, and had sent men to ayde him in his warre against the Gothes; and at that time made his residence in Hungarie, that he should come into Italy, and make himselfe Lord thereof; and that he would assist and direct him in what he had to do in that conquest. And ALBOINVS afterwards followed his direction. These Longobardi, as some say, were so called, for that they were long beards. Their originall and the place of their breeding (as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth of them) was in an Iland in the German sea, then called Scandinavia: from whence they being many, and accounting their Country too little for them (as many other Northerly Nations had done) with two Captaines, the one called AYON, and the other THATON, left their Countrie, and went to seeke some place wherein they might inhabite, either by peace or warre.

These Captaines being dead, they chose one AGERMOND for their King, and afterwards had other Kings; and diuers warres at sundrie times with variable successe, against the Gothes, the Vandales, and other nations; vntill that after many yeeres they became Lords of Hungary; from whence their King ALBOINVS sent men of warre (as we said) to the aide of NARSES against the Gothes; wherof grew the occasion that he called him into Italy, to the end that he should make himselfe Lord thereof; who resolved to goe thither, as well for the proffer made to him by NARSES, as for that hee had heard of the fruitfulness of that soile, not onely by common report, but also by the particular relation, made by those whom hee had sent to seeke NARSES in those warres. Whilest that he multered vp his souldiers, and made such preparation as for so great an enterprise was requisite, LONGINVS the new Capitaine and gouernour of Italy, settled a new forme and order of gouernment, which continued a long time after: which was, that coming into Italy hee tooke the name and title of Exarch, which

Hormisda king of the Persians.
Warre & peace in the Persians.

Narles depost from his go-uernment of Italy.
Longinus sent to gouern Italy.

The Lombards
what people they were.

Exarchus the name of a supreme Govern-nor.

The original of Duxes.

The last Roman Consuls.

is, Generall or supreme gouvernor. And resting in Ravenna, careless of seeing Rome, in every city of Italy he placed a governor called Dux: whereof (as I imagine) sprang the beginning of the title and dignity of a Duke, which now is vsed throughout all the World. And so each of them gouerned a Citie, and not as in former times, when every Prouince had some principall man of great authority for their particular Capitaine or Gouvernour. In Rome for the greater honour was placed a Gouvernor called Præles, who was (as we say) a President or Lord Deputie. And so the Authoritie of the Senate, and dignity of the Consuls, was wholly lost and extinct, so as they were neuer after in that manner as in ancient times: for NARSSES and his companion BASILIVS were the last Consuls.

This forme of gouernement being established, and ALBOINVS king of the Longobards being in a readinesse to take his journey towards Italy, it followed that Pope IOHN the third, with the generall consent of all the Roman people, who infinitely loued NARSSES, went from Rome to Naples, where he then was, and perswading him to returne to Rome, preuailed so much as he brought him with him, where he was receiued with great loue and ioy, they pretending to protect him, and to keepe him there amongst them. Whereupon NARSSES repented that euer he had called ALBOINVS, and againe wrote to him, to take no care to come into Italy, alleging many difficulties. But as ALBOINVS was refused, and knew the small force that was in Italy, with the gouernement of LONGINVS, and the little discretion and care of the Emperor IVSTIN, he would not be dissuaded from his intended enterprise, but hastened his coming. Before which, NARSSES died in Rome, where he left great treasure hidden, which afterwards was found; and his bodie was carried to Constantinople. And at the same time died Pope IOHN who brought him from Naples.

The death of Narses.

King ALBOINVS departing with a great Armie of Longobards from Hungary, together with a great number of Saxons and other Nations which he had leuiued, and were ioynd with him, through the desire they had to dwell in Italy, all which might amount to the number of two hundred thousand men, with their wiues, children, herds of Cattrell, and moueable goods, such as they could carrie, would not abandon Hungary, but left the Hunnes, which liued in that countrie, and were the remainder of the great Armie of the fierce King ARTILA (of whom heretofore we haue made much mention) to guard it. Which Hunnes (as the Longobards prospered well in Italy) remained owners and possessors of the countrie, which after their name is now called Hungarie, which before was called Pannonia, as some say: yet some others affirme (as is before noted) that a certaine people called Hungari, came from the frozen sea, and together with them the Hunnes dwelt in Pannonia, and so after these two Nations it was called Hungary. But howeouer it was, vntill this day it is so called, and the successors of the Hunnes haue possessed it, and valiantly defended the same against the Infidels, vntill our time, that for our sinnes SOLIMAN the Turkish Emperour tooke the greatest part thereof.

Pannonia
wherefore called Hungary.

ALBOINVS passing with his Armie towards Italy, came into that Prouince which now is called Prinlis: where he tooke many Cities, and vsed no small cruelty, and much more would haue done, if he had not bene somewhat pacified by the prayers and intreaties of PAVL the Patriarch of Aquileia, and of FELIX Bishop of Trenigi. But being desirous to enter further into Italy, and to leaue that to safe keeping which he had gotten, he left therein for gouernour and to guard the passages into those countries, a valiant Capitaine which was his Nephew called SYSLEPVVS, and he proceeded in his journey: It was the will of God, that hee found small resistance in Italy, for it was then afflicted, both with famine and pestilence. By reason whereof LONGINVS, the Gouvernor and Exarch before named, was not of power to leuiue any sufficient Armie to fight with ALBOINVS, and therefore held himselfe in Ravenna, where he drew together the best men and the greatest number he was able, with a resolution to make frontier warres by fortifying the Townes, and putting good Garrisons in them; which hee principally did in Casarea, which at that time was a very noble Citie, neere to Ravenna, whither he drew the greatest number of souldiers he could possibly leuiue, and fortified Palania, and therein put a Garrison, which is now called Padoia, and is vnder the government of the Venetians. The like he did by Cremona and Manua, and in other of the strongest Cities, imagining if he could hold those countries, ALBOINVS would passe no further; and if he did, he should be greatly annoyed by them in his Arriereguard. Which was no ill deuice, if in that Prouince there had bene any Armie to haue made head against ALBOINVS and his forces in the field. But LONGINVS had neither heart nor power to doe it: and ALBOINVS holding it for a long peece of worke to batter and assault all those Townes, tooke another course, withdrawing him-

The coming of Alboinus and the Lombards
into Italy.

himselfe from them, for that he would not be forced to stay before any of these Townes: but went and assaulted Verona and Vicenza, wherein were no Garrisons, which with others, yeelded without resistance. From whence passing ouer the river Adda, he tooke his way towards Milane, where the Citizens (induced thereto by the perswasion of HONORATVS their Bishop) gaue vp the Citie, to free themselves from slaughter and sack.

Alboinus took Milan and other townes.

After this, other places did the like: for the famine was so great, and so generall, as, without any force the townes yeelded, being vnable to victual themselves for a siege; excepting those places which were victualled by LONGINVS: amongst which in that quarter were Pania and Brijelli, now called Verelli, which by the said LONGINVS were sufficiently furnished with all things needefull. ALBOINVS resolved to besiege them: and having bene now six moneths in Italy, he besieged Paui: but it defended it selfe so valiantly, that the siege continued three yeeres. In the beginning of which time, perceiving that it would be a long siege, remaining before it with such part of his armie as he thought sufficient, he sent the rest to make warre in other parts of Italy, and to make a conquest thereof: and they all sped as he desired: for they tooke many Townes, Cities and Castles in Italy. And the President or gouernor of Rome fearing to be besieged, and seeing the great scarcitie and famine which was in the Citie, sent to desire reliefe of men and victuals of the Emperor IVSTIN, who commanded a great quantitie of wheate to be brought from Africa to Rome, and some souldiers also. Where-with the citie was well relieved, and the Longobards at that time came not thither, neither durst they invade Ravenna, nor the cities adioyning: for they were all verie well fortified and garrisoned by LONGINVS. But in other places they made themselves Lords of a great part of Italy, in so much that between Bologna and Milan there were few places of strength; but within three yeeres war were brought vnder their subiection: and so they afterwards possessed all that prouince about two hundred yeeres, with variable fortune, as hereafter wee will relate, and by them it was called Lombardy, and is so still vnto this day. About the end of this time ALBOINVS tooke Paui: and seeing himselfe mightie, hee tooke his way towards Verona, whither hee had caused his wife Queene ROSAMUND to come, with his treasure and wardrobe; and there holding his Court hee gaue himselfe to feasting and banquetting, and was slaine by treason, by the order and consent of his wife, whose father hee had slaine, and in a banquet gaue her to drink in her fathers scull: for reuenge whereof shee worthily practised his death.

The warres of the Lombards
in Italy.

Galla C'salpis na called Lon-bardia by the Longobards.

The death of Alboinus.

ALBOINVS dying in this manner, after many incounters and battails, the Longobards chose for their King a great man of bloud and of worth amongst them, called CLERPHIS, or CLEVB, who proued a most cruell Prince, and renewing the warres, committed great cruelties in those cities which held of the Empire, in the prouince of Venetia: for in those daies the citie of Venice, which in the time of ARTILA began to be inhabited, was greatly increased by those which (to escape the cruelty of the Lombards) went to dwell in those Ilands, and were now of force able to defend themselves; and this citie began to bee famous and of great account, and hath continued and increased vntill this day: so as it is now one of the most famous cities in the world. At this time the Emperor IVSTIN who liued viciously, careless and negligent, in Constantinople was taken with so grievous paine of the gowte in his feete, as he died thereof. And some daies before his death, by the consent of his wife SOPHIA, by whom he was wholly gouerned (for that he had no sonne) he made an excellent Nobelman, CÆSAR, whose name was TIBERIVS: and hauing exhorted him very effectually to yeelde obedience vnto SOPHIA, hauing swaied the Imperiall scepter 11 yeeres, he died, in the yeere of our Lord 579: and after some, 576.

Paulus Dia-conus lib. 2.
cap. 24.
Clephis king of the Lombards.

The prosperitie of Venice.

The death of the Emperor Iustin

THE LIFE OF TIBERIVS, SE COND OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND ONE ROMANE EMPEROVR.
(*)

Such were the conditions of the Emperour IUSTIN in his life time, that when he was dead, no man lamented or mourned for him, except his wife SOPHIA, who through her husband's insufficiency governed and commanded all, and had a conceit to have continued it; meaning to have married with TIBERIVS, who presently upon the death of IUSTIN was created and crowned Emperour. But, as he was a virtuous man, just, pitifull, milde, charitable, and endued with such virtues, as in a good and Christian Emperour were requisite, he would not have her to wife; all whose conditions he knew to be quite contrary; and with whom even in the life time of IUSTIN (as some write) he was at some controuersie. TIBERIVS when he was created CÆSAR, made distribution of much of the Imperiall treasure to the poore; and afterwards at his Coronation named for Emperesse a great Ladie whose name was ANASTASIA, with whom hee was secretly married. Whereupon SOPHIA at the same feast practised by treason to haue had him slaine, with a determination to haue made one IUSTINIAN, another of IUSTINIANS nephews, Emperour. But, as it pleased God, the good TIBERIVS escaped this treason, and others also which SOPHIA practised; and his Coronation was held with great solemnitie: and the treacherie of SOPHIA being discovered (she craving mercie) hee pardoned both her and IUSTINIAN. But many daies passed not before shee attempted the like, in a house of pleasure whither TIBERIVS went for his recreation. At this time hee caused her to be apprehended, and despoiled of all her riches. But as hee was milde and pitifull, hee pardoned her her life, and gaue her maintenance, and made her to be serued with great respect and honour; but he took from her all her old seruants, placing others to attend her by his appointment; he againe pardoned IUSTINIAN: for hee knew that hee was induced to all that hee did by SOPHIA. And hee was afterwards greatly beloved by TIBERIVS, and serued him faithfully, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writes.

These were the priuate and domestical accidents which in the beginning befell TIBERIVS. In the generall estate of the Empire, hee cuer maintained iustice, and raigned valiantlie. Africa, and all the provinces which the Empire held in Asia and in Europe, peaceably obeyed him. But the warres in Italy against the Lombards, and in the East against the Persians, did put him to much care and trouble. In the warres of Persia hee had good successe, whereof wee will first speake briefly. For as soone as TIBERIVS came to the Empire, hee sent his Ambassadors to King HORMISDA, to confirme the peace in such manner as his predecessors held the same before him. But HORMISDA, who saw himself rich and mightie, would not accept thereof, but made warre vpon the Frontiers of the Empire. TIBERIVS speedily sent a mighty Army against him: but at that time they fought not. For, there was a truce concluded for a time: which being expired, a cruell warre began chiefly in the Kingdome of Armenia; where the Roman Generall and Armie came to a battell with HORMISDA: which Fight was very cruell, and of long continuance. Neuertheless, the Romans had the victory; and HORMISDA faced himself by flight; and therein were taken the greatest and richest spoiles that cuer were gotten from the Persians: all which were giuen to the men of warre, excepting the Kings treasure, and the vessell of gold and siluer for his seruice, which (as PAVLVS DIACONVS saith) was carried to TIBERIVS in Constantinople vpon twenty Elephants (which had not other loading) with a great number of prisoners; to whom the Emperour commanded rich and gallant apparell to be giuen, and then to be set at liberty, to returne to their Countrey. And in the mean time the Imperiall Armie entred the Countreies subject to the Persians; and, burning and spoiling the same, returned with victorie. But within a small time after, HORMISDA leuied the greatest forces that he was able, and made a very valiant and expert man of warre, Generall thereof: for, by reason of his last ouerthrowe, hee made a law, that the Kings of Persia should neuer be present in any battell; and so hee againe renewed the warre against the Empire, to recover his lost honour. Against whom the Emperour sent a new Generall, a valiant and wife Earle named MAVRICE, who afterwards was Emperour; who with the like good fortune fought to fight with the Persians; and, leuying infinite numbers of souldiers on either side, they fought a great part of the day, vntill that, after many thousands of the one and other side were slaine, the victorie shewed itself to be of MAVRICE his side: and he recovered certain places, and conquered others from the Persians; so as HORMISDA was constrained of necessity to conclude some peace or truce with the Emperour. And MAVRICE came with victory to Constantinople: where hee was solemnly receiued by TIBERIVS, who married him to his owne daughter, in reward of so noble a victory.

the

Whil'these things past in the East, the affairs of Italy prospered not so well: for, CLEPHIS, the new King of the Lombards, made cruell wars against those Towns and Countreies which held of the Empire; and all things hapned so according to his desire, that he took many cities; and, being desirous to repose himself for a while, he sent his Captains and their companies towards Rome. And they took all the Cities in the marches thereof; and Rome it self was besieged by them; and was in great danger to haue been entred by force. So that (as Authors affirm) if CLEPHIS had liued but a little while longer, he had made himself Lord of Rome and Rauenna, which were the two eyes and fortresses of all Italy. But his designs were made frustrate by death, like to other Kings and Captains, who haue been a great and greater than cuer hee was; whose death was practised by the treason of his owne people. After his decesse the Lombards would neither chuse nor haue any more Kings at that time: but there arose thirty principall men, or (to speake more properly) thirty tyrants; who inuested themselves in thirty of the best Towns which they held in Italy. And so euery of them gouerned his Town and the Territorie thereof. And each of them likewise made warre apart by himself; sometimes the one aiding and assisting the other against the Empire. And as the Emperour TIBERIVS was busied in making prouision for his wars against the Persians, and did not sufficiently provide for Italy, these Captains of the Lombards had opportunity to extend their power there; and took many other Cities, coming before Rome and Naples. In which warre they committed such cruelties, robberies and insolencies, as the like had neuer been seen. So that from Rome to the Eastwards there remained little more subject to the Empire than the Kingdome of Naples, and the City of Rome, with some Towns in the marches thereof; and the City of Naples fell also into the hands of the Lombards: but we cannot certainly say, whether at this time or afterwards. Yet RAUENNA held for the Empire, and some other strong holds need into it which, through the widome and foresight of LONGINVS, were defended. And there also held for the Empire of either side of the riuers of Po, Como, Cremona, Mantua, Padoa, Bologna and Perelli: and the Lombards at this time had all the rest. Thus the warre was managed on either side with great cruelty; for, the Lombards as they were barbarous, and had not yet well receiued the faith of CHRIST; robd and spoild all, as well sacred as profane, without any difference. Where to, besides what is already said, this was a great furtherance, that in the time of this combustion TIBERIVS fell so sorely sick, that he could not apply himself to the government of the Empire; and his infirmity neuer left him till he died. Wherefore the Romans, oppressed by the Longobards, motioned a Wars with the Persians and their King Hormisda.

A battell where in the Persians were overcome.

Maurice made Generall against the Persians.

A battell where in Maurice had the victory.

The State of Italy against the Longobards.

Thirty tyrants of the Lombards.

The virtues of Tiberius.

The treason of Sophia.

I read nothing of the death and burning of this good King Tiberius the 2

579 treatie of peace; and a truce was concluded between them for a certain time. Which truce the Lombards graunted, for that the kings of France (wherein at that time reigned three brothers) being much grieued to see the Lombards growne so mightie in Italy, sent a great Army against them, which was already entred Lombardy. And they also the more willingly granted therree, for that the Saxons, which vntill then had aided them in their warres, had now left them and were returned. Tiberius being sick in Constantinople (as we said) as a good Emperour desirous as well to provide for the time to come, as he had done for the present and past; nominated for Cæsar and his successor his sonne in law Mauricius. And afterwards leaving all the Empire entire and in peace, as he inherited the same (the state of Italy onely except) in the twentieth yeere of his reign (although some say lesse) he died, in the yeere of our Lord, five hundred fourescore and five; and after some few hundred fourescore and nine. His death was much lamented by all estates, for his great vertue and integritie, and for that he was liberrall and bountifull to all men.

The death of Tiberius.

THE LIFE OF MAVRICIVS,
ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND TWO ROMANE EMPEROVR.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Empire being come to Mauricius, sonne in law to Tiberius, he shewed himselfe to be a very wise disposition, and particularly sinned in conuincingse notwithstanding that in Marriall affaires he was very wise and politicke. He sent Captaines and men of warre into Italy against the Lombards, accordingly as Pope Pelagius had requested, with whom after long warre, in the end a truce was concluded: he afterwards brake the peace with the Persians, and the warre had this issue, that after many rentes and overthrowes equally giuen and received, of the one side and the other, the new King of Persia, to suppress a Tyrant which rose against him, became a friend to the Emperour of Constantinople. After which peace, binding himselfe to the affaires of the West, he gouerned the estate with indifferent good fortune, through the valour of the Exarch, which he sent into Italy: yet in this time God sent many plagues and scourges into the World, as inundations and overflowinges of waters, famine, and Pestilence, which happened more in Rome then in any other country. Beside which miseries, it was besieged by the Lombards and Maurice for the hatred which he bare to Gregoric (who then succeeding Pelagius, was Pope) would not relente it, so as to abate the Pope, he was content to lose all Italy, which God afterwards severely punished. For his owne souldiers rebelling against him, made a priuie Colonell, whose name was Phocas, Emperour, who comming towards Constantinople with an Armie, made Maurice to flee; and he being unable to leaue such forces as might defend him, taken by the souldiers of the new tyrant, was brought back to Constantinople: where his kinde first bene the death of his wife and children, by the hands of an executioner, he had his head stricken off; all which he endured with great resolution when he had reigned twentie yeeres.

MAURICIVS peaceably obtained the Empire, by the death of his father in law Tiberius, whom he nothing resembled in his vertues, for hee was both vicious and couetous; yet in the affaires of the warres, he was very provident and diligent: as he was both valiant and politique in marriall actions, so he made choice of singular Captaines for the warres which were many, very great and dangerous. Whereof great part happened at one instant, notwithstanding that they were in sundrie parts and Prouinces. Wherefore to deliuer that in fewe words which I haue gathered together, it is requisite I should write each seuerall accident apart:

which I will performe in the best manner I can, so as in the end of all the whole may be understood. Beginning then with the affaires of Italy, I say that the truce made with the Lombards, was not of their part thoroughly obserued, but that daily from one citie or other, there were robberies committed, and some encounters and bickerings. Wherefore as Lombards were but of small power, and the Romans were in great feare to be besieged; Pope Pelagius the second wrote a Letter from Rome to Gregoric whom he had sent to Constantinople, informing him of the state of Italy; and of the great danger and necessitie wherein it was, and gaue him especial charge to be an earnest suitor to the Emperour, to send reliefe and men against the Lombards; which hee procured with much efficacy, as the Emperour Mauricius (notwithstanding that he was much troubled with the warres of Persia, whereof wee will speake hereafter) provided a new Exarch and gouernor for Italy, who was a good souldier and a wise man, called Smaraagdus, with a good number of souldiers, and sent for Lombards to returne. Smaraagdus came by sea to Ravenna, and with him Saint Gregoric, who was coming for the same and good report which was spied of him, gaue great ioy and hope to the Imperialists in Italy; and hee presently tooke order for marriall affaires. And forthwith as hee went to Ravenna, a valiant captain of the Lombards called Feraaldus, held a citie called Clus, and had made, and still did make, small warre against those of Ravenna, hee refused to let all means to dispossesse him thereof; and to drue him quite from thence, And to this effect hee sent to Docrivla an Imperiall capitaine and gouernor of the citie of Varcelli, that leaving a competent garrison in that citie hee should come with his forces to ioyne with him: who making prouision of boates and barks, purposed for his better securitie, to passe down the river of Po; to the end that being arrived at Aspertin, which is at the mouth of the river, he might saile from thence by sea to Ravenna. But Feraaldus had intelligence heereof, and with the greatest power that hee could make, came likewise with barks to stoppe his passage downe the river: where they came to blowes, and Docrivla by means of the aid which came to him from Ravenna had the victorie, and Feraaldus was overthrowne and fled by water to Clus; which the new Exarch Smaraagdus in the meane time had besieged and battered; so as it was ready to haue yielded when Feraaldus came, who then liutered the citie, by encouraging the besieged.

But as soone as they vnderstood that hee was overthrowne by the enemy and came thither by night, they refused to yeeld, and did so. Smaraagdus entred the citie, where all the Lombards which were found therein, were put to the sword, and in like manner their gouernor Feraaldus; in reuenge of the like cruelties committed by them.

This victorie obtained by Smaraagdus, was so highly esteemed, as those of his partie, reuolting thirte and fourage, and their aduerlaries waxing fearefull, hee recovered some cities and holds, the greater part whereof yielded of themselves. Which the captaines of the Lombards considering (who after the death of Clephus continued as tyrants and would not chuse them any King) they refused to make choice of one whom they all should obey, and vnder whom they might liue, for they were of opinion, that if they continued to diuide, they should be continually diuine and brought to confusion, as they already began. Having refused heereupon, they chose one of King Clephus's sonnes, whose name was Antharis, a young man of great spirit, and who had purchased greater fame in the warres then any other man of his nation; and so was much spoken of both among his friends and enemies. The name of a King, and so valiant, as was Antharis, caused a great alteration in the estate, to whom all the seuerall and gouernours contributed of their treasure, each of them giuing him the one halfe of what he had, for the maintenance of the warres, and his new estate. The first enterprise hee undertooke, was against Phocas, and Docrivla the gouernor thereof, as well for the late dishonour which hee had done them, as for that the citie at that time was of great importance, wherefore hee besieged it both by water vpon the river of Po with barks, and by land with great forces which hee had raised, and forced it in such manner, as notwithstanding that Docrivla had all the time constantly been able to doe, being out of hope to hold the place, hee came to a composition with him, and gaue it vp; and to hee came downe the river to Ravenna, and Antharis made great spoile in the citie, destroying the best part thereof, and rased the walles downe to the earth, so as they were neuer after repaired or made like as in former time they had been.

Antharis having obtained this victorie, refused to goe against Frankoaldus, who held the citie of Com, and other fortresses in the Lake of Com, and had velle gallantly defended

Smaraagdus Exarch
of Italy.

Antharis
King of the Lombards.

defended the same for the space of seuentene yeeres. But in the meane season motions were made of peace or truce, and either partie was glad to treat thereof. SMARAGDV, for that he stood in feare of the King, who was both young and valiant, and also for that he imagined himselfe to haue no sufficient power to make head against him, and the King being but newly come to his gouernment, holding not himselfe thoroughly settled and confirmed, the better to establish himselfe therein, thought it best to conclude a peace, and to bring vnder some, to whom his election was nothing pleasing. All which laid together, gaue occasion that a truce was taken for a certaine time, although the Lombards neuer truly obserued the same. During that time all Italie enjoyed some rest, and SMARAGDV sent to Rome for Prefect or gouernour thereof, a noble Knight borne in Constantinople, whose name was GERMANVS, with whom went S. GREGORIE, and they were received with great ioy and solemnitie: for GREGORIE for his good life and conseruation, was generally beloved and honoured. So as with their coming, and the good hope which was conceiued of their new Exarch, they thought to haue a hand in recovering all that which the Lombards held, and had vsurped; and in the meane time, to enioy the peace in rest and prosperitie. But it followed not according to their expectation: for God sent their perfectiōs, as you shall heare. But vs leave Italie in this truce, and briefly speake of those warres which MAVRICVS made by his Captaines in the East against the Persians, which for numbers of men, battailes and great conflicts, were farre greater then those of Italie: for they were betwene two the most mightie Monarchs which then were in the world, to wit, the King of Persia, and the Romane Emperour.

A truce taken with the Lam-bards.
Germanus go-uerneur of Rome.

Philippius, Generall against the Persians.

A battaile wherein Philip-pius had the victorie.

The shamefull flight of Philip-pius.

Prisoners made Generall against the Persians in place of Philip-pius.

MAVRICVS then sent his Armie, and for Generall a worthie Noble-man called PHILIPPICVS, to whom hee had married his sister. Against whome K. HORMISDA raised greater forces, and made a great man called CARDARIO his Generall. With whom, after some notable skirmishes and encounters, PHILIPPICVS came to a maine battaile, with power against power, which lasted aboute tenne houres, the one charging the other, in such manner that no aduantage could be scene. But in the end PHILIPPICVS and his troups had the victorie, and slew a very great number of the Persians, and took two thousand prisoners, which hee sent to the Emperour to Constantinople: and the rest escaped by flight, and with them their Generall CARDARIO. PHILIPPICVS, hauing obtained this notable victorie, marched forwards with his Armie, and sent a good Commander called HERACLIVS, with some selected troups, with direction to enter as farre as he might into the Persians countrie, he promising to secound him. Notwithstanding that CARDARIO was ouerthrowne, yet was he not discouraged, neither omitted to vse all the meanes and diligence which to a good Generall did belong: and so gathering together such forces as he could, making, shew that hee would reinforce his Armie, with those small troups hee had, passing ouer certaine mountains, in a very darke night he set vpon PHILIPPICVS his Arriereguard, wherein the feare was so great, that PHILIPPICVS, as though he had not beene victorious, shamefully fled all the whole night long, with no small losse and slaughter of his people: in so much that the Persians imagining their flight to haue beene fained (seeing how few they were) dared not to follow the chase, and so rested vntill that the day light freed the one from feare, and shewed the other the aduantage they had lost. But HERACLIVS, whom PHILIPPICVS had sent before, followed his direction with better discretion, and greater diligence: for passing oyer the river Tigris, with the fame of the late victorie, hee took some cities, and did much hurt, and returned towards PHILIPPICVS very rich with the prey and spoiles of the victorie.

This being past, and the Romane Armie being gathered againe together, the Emperour commanded PHILIPPICVS, that leauing the Armie with HERACLIVS, he should make his repair to Constantinople, and PHILIPPICVS obeyed his commandement. In his place was sent a valiant and expert capitaine called BARAS, who being come to the Armie, shewed himselfe so proud and haughtie to the Captaines and men of warre, as they murmured against him; and he was generally so ill intreated by all men, that he was driuen to saue himselfe by flight, hauing received such blowes and knockes with stones, as he was in danger to haue been slaine, and they amongst themselves chose (against his will) GERMANVS for their Generall, who was a man of great account in the Armie. But at that time MAVRICVS was so oppressed with the warres against CAVANVS, and the Auares and against the Slauons in Slauonia, in Misia, and other prouinces (whereof we will speake hereafter) as he could not then punish so great an insolencie: and therefore as soone as hee vnderstood thereof, he held it for most expedient to send backe PHILIPPICVS, for their Gouernor and Generall, and that PRISCVS should Philippius restored to his charge.

should returne. And besides PHILIPPICVS, hee also sent another Noble-man of great estimation, called ARISTOBVLVS, to pacifie the mutinie and rebellion of the Armie, by entreaty, gifts, or otherwise in the best manner he could: which he performed. And so PHILIPPICVS againe vndertook his charge, and returned to warre against MARZAS a new Generall of the Persians, who with a greater Armie then any of those before named, came against him. Which is an argument of the great wealth and power of the Kings of Persia, who being so often ouerthrowne, they still returned with great forces, and that alwaies when they desired peace, the Empire willingly granted it. And in the end the Emperours were well contented to defend their confines against them, and held it for a matter of great consequence.

These two great Captaines and Armies came so neere together, that both parties desired to giue battaile, wherein they fought so obstinately, as it was one of the most cruell battailes in the World: and both the one and other partie fought with such obstinacie and courage, that it lasted the greatest part of the day, but the Persians were ouerthrowne; not for that they were eyther discouraged or ranne away, but for that they were almost all slaine. For in the Annales of Constantinople I finde written, that three thousand of them were taken prisoners, and two thousand escaped by flight, and that all the rest died fighting, and with them their Generall MARZAS: so as their Campe was left to the Romanes, who found no man therein to make resistance. And so they spent one whole yeere in frontier warres, at the end whereof King HORMISDA commanded a very great Army to be leued.

PHILIPPICVS, presuming on his former victories, made no doubt to giue them battaile; and the Persians refused it not, and so they fought neere to the Citie Mariopolis; and therein was PHILIPPICVS and the Romanes ouerthrowne, to their great losse and confusion. For which the Emperour was very sorrie, and provided a new Generall for the East, and sent for PHILIPPICVS to come to Constantinople, with direction to leaue the Armie with HERACLIVS, of whom we made late mention, till that another Generall should come, which was performed. Afterwards ROMANVS was sent, and the King of Persia sent another, whose name was BARAS. These two Generals being arriued with their new charges, either of them sought to winne honour against the other; and in diuers encounters, lost many men, burned Townes, and did the greatest harme euery where they could, vntill at last they drew neere, and fought in arranged battaile, wherein BARAS and the Persians were ouerthrowne, in the fields of Albania in Asia, which is a very great Province in the East, bordering vpon Armenia. HORMISDA was so grieved for this losse, imagining that it happened through the defect of his Generall, as thereby to disgrace him, he sent him a womans Garment, and commanded him presently to leaue his gouernement. Yet notwithstanding, hee had set matters in very good order, and had gathered together his scattered Armie. But he stood in such feare of his King, that the best remedie he could deuise, was to rebell against him; which he might easily effect, for HORMISDA was very cruell, and therefore hated by his subjects. After this (vpon the rebellion of BARAS) VINDOLIS, a man of great power (whose brother HORMISDA kept in prison) conspired against him, with many others, which for his cruelty and couerousnesse extremely hated him: and they took him prisoner, and made his sonne COSROES their king. But his other sonne, with his wife, they put to death, and pluckt out his eyes; and afterwards his owne sonne caused him to be slaine: and so ended the raigne and life of HORMISDA. But the cruelty which the sonne vsed against his father, seemed so horrible and odious, that hee presently fell into as great hatred of all men, as his father had been in his life time. In so much that going to fight with BARAS, who as I said rebelled, the greatest part of the men of warre which he led, forsooke him, and went ouer to BARAS. So as COSROES seeing himselfe abandoned, resolved to sue to his enemies for reliefe, and fled into the territories of the Empire, and put himselfe into the power of PROSPATRICVS, who had the guard of the frontiers; through which he passed, where he was very honourably entertained. Wherof when the Emperour MAVRICVS was giuen to vnderstand, he was very glad, and sent vnto him a very honourable Capitaine, whose name was NARSES, and a Bishop, a man of great authoritie and his kinsman, offering him all fauour and aide for the recouerie of his kingdom, and adopted and took him for his son.

Hormisda king of the Persians
put to death by his son Cosroes.

Cosroes king of the Persians fled
into the Empire.

Baras ouer-throwne in a battail by Cosroes.

NARSES, who went for Generall in this action, putting the same in execution, commanded all the Armies and men of warre which the Empire held in Asia, to be drawne to an head: and so he and COSROES went to seeke BARAS, who with the courage of a valiant Tyrant staid for them, and fighting was ouerthrowne, and by flight escaped into certaine mountains.

After this noble victory, COSROES recovered all his kingdoms, and he and the Emperor continued great friends: and so ceased the wars between the Empire and the Persians, which had continued six yeeres. This happened in the eighty yeere of the reign of the Emperor MAVRICIVS.

After this the Emperor MAVRICE managed these wars in the East, Europe continued not in subordination; for besides the miseries and calamities of Italy (as I will presently relate) the Hungers which dwell in Hungarie and in part of Slavonia, now called Banaria (whom we but now call Auacs) after the name of a King of theirs who was called by that name, then raising over them a King called CAYANVS, who was both proud and very valiant; and therefore with very mightie, they and he concluded amongst themselves to make warre against the Empire: which they followed with such resolution as it caused no small feare: for entering through the upper Missa, which now containeth the two provinces of Serua, and Bassina, he found so small resistance, as he came into Thracia, now called Gracia or Turkey, for that therein standeth the great citie of Constantinople: against whom MAVRICE sent an Armie, and for General thereof a valiant and prudent captain whose name was COMENCIOVS. These two made cruell warres, and after many skirmishes came to a battaile, which did laue, being too long to recite, wherein CAYANVS was overthrowne with great losse of his people, and so was constrained to retire. But within short space after, he returned againe with no lesse power then at the first, to warre in the marches of Slavonia, and MAVRICE sent thither his sonne THEODOSIUS, and his father in law GEMANVS, with other Captaines, who had so good successe, that although they lost in some encounters, yet they not only draue them out of that which they had formerly vltured, but also wholly rooted them out of all Hungarie. But MAVRICE either for feare or retchlesnesse flowred those warres, and losing oportunitie (which is seldom recovered) the inconueniences ensued, which we will describe. For a kinde of people called Slavons, a nation inhabiting farre in the north, which vntill that time had neuer been heard of, sent their Ambassadors to the Hungers Auacs (moued thereto by the newes which they had heard from them) and offered to come to their aid, as in deede they afterwards did, ioynted with them, and did much harme in the lands of the Empire, and our of it, as hereafter we will relate in few words.

Levs now returne to Italy, which wee lost in peace and at truce with the Lombards wherein it happened, that as neither partie concluded the peace for any remission of conscience, or for the feare or love of God or of their neighbours, but for their owne advantage and private interest; and to waite a fitter time and oportunitie for the warres (as for our sinnes it often happeneth) and as it was not pleasing to God, neither made according to his will, so it pleased not him to maintain the same: for he sent his wrath and scourge vpon Italy, and chiefly vpon Rome, as a place which most needed amendment. The first was with raide, which fell in the moneth of September and October, for the space of many daies continually without ceasing, in that sort that the water was so high, as the riues and lakes of Italy outflowed and drowned all infinite number of people and cattell, and the riues Aiber waxed so high, that all the fields which were not hillie and mountainous, were ouerflowed with water, so as all men feared that it would haue produced another generall deluge; particularly in Rome, where the riuer Tiber did swell so much, that in some parts it was high, and in some other it exceeded and ouerflowed the banks of the dike, and did the water vent in such manner into it, that it spoiled and defaced the greatest part of the buildings bee to the river. The flood afterwards ceasing, the fields remained so stinking, for muddie and so soft, that they could not be tilled nor sowne, by reason whereof a generall famine ensued through all Italy. And in like manner through the excessive moisture of the earth and the aire wet so corrupted, as the plague began, which raged in such manner, that many countries were left desolate, and dispeopled; and where they did least, two thirdes of the people perished. But in the citie of Rome (as all writers assent) was the greatest kind of sorrow: for in the beginning it took away Pope IULIUS the second, in whose time he began his will and purpose to be chosen Vicar. GERMANVS who during the whole Reformation had bin daily devout prayers to God, and many lermions and orations to the people, exhorting them to amendment of life, and repentance for their sinnes, to the end that might please his most mercifull Father, withold his punishment from them. And in this extreme he ordained that he should himselfe die in the Church, which he did in this day, and in this place. Pope IULIUS the third, who took away his mercy to look vpon them, and the plague ceased, and the earth began to be more fruitful, and to bring forth plenty, and to bring forth fruit. But yet this plague, which the Lord bestowed on them, auailed not to establish any peace or amity among those which escaped this plague: for, the Lombards, hauing gotten supplies of men of warre, without any respect of the feare or love of God (the time of the truce being expired) renewed the wars with greater furie than at the first. And forasmuch as the Land had been punished with so great calamities, and lay waste and dispeopled, it was an easie matter for them to do great harm among the Imperialists. First, their King ANTHARIS in person went against FRANCILION, who commanded in the City of Como, with two other strong fortresses in the Lake of Como; and besieging him the space of six moneths, being no longer able to defend the City, he gaue it up, and went to Ravenna; that City hauing valiantly defended it self with much honor the space of twenty yeeres.

The taking of this City greatly enriched King ANTHARIS: for, FRANCILION had in that time gathered together and had in it much treasure. Departing from thence with great honour and wealth, he took other places. Whereupon the Emperor MAVRICE, at the instance of Pope GREGORIE, and the Exarch SMARAGDVS (who daily solicited him for aid and reliefe) sent to CHILDEBERT, who at that time reigned King of France, a great summe of money, to the end hee should enter Italy with some great power, in his behalf: and the King of France promised to doo so, and began to put it in execution. Who coming into Italy, the fame of his coming began to work great effect; and some Captains of the Lombards resolutely to him. But CHILDEBERT imagining, that, if the Emperor again recovered Italy wholly to himself, he should hardly liue in safety in France; he therefore, coming to a composition with ANTHARIS, returned into his Country, without intermeddling in other mens quarrels. At his return died ANTHARIS, King of the Lombards: and the principal men of that Nation, falling at variance among themselves about chusing of a new King, at last agreed that hee should bee King whom THEODELINDA (which was the last Kings widow) should take to husband; and she made choice of AGISYLPHVS, Gouernour of Taurin, now called Turin; and so he was made King, who was as valiant a Prince as any his Predecessors had been before him.

At that time the Emperor deposed SMARAGDVS from the government of Italy, and sent thither for Exarch a Knight called ROMANVS (of whom we made mention in the warres of Persia) with some companies of souldiers for the defense of Rome, and to make warre in other places. ROMANVS, coming in the mean time, whilst the new King AGISYLPHVS was busied with some of his Captains, who houlding certain Cities rebelled against him; he provided and furnished, with men and victuals, Padua, Manua, Cremona, and the rest of the Cities which were in greatest danger: and, setting all things there in order, he came to Rome; from whence afterwards, with those forces which he brought, and those also which before his coming were in the City, he departed to recover the Towns and Castles which the Lombards possessed in that Quarter: many of which hee did winne by force, and others voluntarily yielded themselves.

Whilst the Exarch was busie about these things, the Pope sent three very learned men into England, who with their preaching conuerted the King and the Inhabitants thereof to the true faith, which vntill then was not thoroughly received among them. The like care hee took for Italy, and for all the other Provinces: and THEODELINDA (the wife of King AGISYLPHVS) being a deuout Christian, he perswaded her and her husband to cause their people to leaue their idolatrie, which hee obtained: and afterwards hee intreated him to surrender to the Church the goods and reuenues which he withheld from it.

About this time grew great contention between the Bishops of Rome and of Constantinople about the supremacy: for, JOHN Bishop of Constantinople alleged, that to him did appertaine the Papacy, and to be Viuerall Bishop of the Church, seeing that Constantinople was the head of the Empire. Against which, the Bishop of Rome opposed himself with all his power; alleging himself to bee CHRISTVS Vicar, and Head of the Church: so as there passed many things of the one side and the other about this matter. In this mean time died ROMANVS the Exarch, and another was sent in his place, whose name was GALLICIANVS or GALLICANVS, who was a vertuous man and very valiant: and he presently applied himself to redress many things which ROMANVS had peruered and put of order. And although he much desired warre, yet through the counsell of the Pope hee took truce: which being expired, hee carried himself so valiantly in the warres, that hee took the City of Parma by assault from the Lombards, and therein took a daughter of King AGISYLPHVS, whom he had by his first wife; Contention betwixt the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople for the Supremacy.

The Exarch Romanus dying, Gallicianus was sent in his place.

Noricum Banaria.

Warre betweene Cayanus and Commeniolus.

Cayanus & his people drive them out of Hungarie.

The Slavons came to make warre with the Empire.

A wonderfull deluge in Rome and all Italy.

A horrible plague which ruined many countries
and cities.

The Letanie ordained to be said in the Church by Saint Gregorie
the 9th Pope.

and grew to be so strong in field, that AGISVLPHVS durst not giue him battell. Whereupon, seeing himself ouermatcht, he sent to the Slaouons for aid, who were already joyned with the Auares; and GALLICANVS leuying new forces died in Ravenna, and SMARADVS was again sent thither to be Exarch, who came into Italy with so small forces, that his coming did rather encourage, than dismay or daunt, the enemy: which proceeded from this; The Emperour so deadly hated the Popes presumption, that, rather than to endure the same, he was content to lose all Italy.

And so this his dislike was ioyned the trouble which the Slaouons, who came to his enemies aide, did put him to: for CAYANVS the fierce and proud King of the Auares (the Slaouons and their king MVSACVS being come into Germany) ioyned his forces with his enemies, and some Frenchmen came also to them, and entered the bounds of the Empire. The Emperour sent against them one PRISCVS, a capitaine of great account, with a mightie Armie, to stop their passage over the riuer Ister, now called Danubius; who warred so aduisedly and with so great valour and discretion, as most times that he fought with them he obtained the victorie. And one night he gaue the Slaouons a Camizado, and took their King MVSACVS prisoner, and slew a great number of them. There afterwards happened many things in that warre, which would be too long to relate: for CAYANVS King of the Auares, as he had many men, and those very expert and accustomed to the warres, besides the multitude of the Slaouons, neuer ceased to make cruell warre against the Emperour MAVRICVS; yet sometime they tooke truce, which lasted some space: and PRISCVS and he met and spake together concerning an agreement. After all this, CAYANVS with his Auares and Slaouons entered Dalmatia, and did great harme, robbing and spoiling many townes there. But PRISCVS coming to relieue them, he retired to his losse, and altring his course took his way towards Thracia; and marching without stay, came within few daies iourney of Constantinople. And as the report and feare is usually greater then the danger; so hee strake so great a terror into the citizens of Constantinople, as they were of the minde to haue abandoned the citie, and to haue passed ouer that arme of the Sea, to Asia, as the Annales of Constantinople doe testifie. But the Emperour MAVRICVS (as in truth hee was valiant) commanded all the people to be put in Armes, and the gates of the citie to be shut, and order to be taken in all things that were needfull, yfing infinite diligence; and gaue direction for the defence of the countries through which CAYANVS was to passe. But all this needed not, for at that instant there fell so pestilent a mortallitie in CAYANVS his Armie, that in one day seven of his sonnes (for he had many) and a great number of other people died of the plague: wherefore he was constrained to return into his countrie: And the Emperour sent for General another Capitaine, whose name was COMENCIOVS, who ioyning with PRISCVS, obtained certaine victories against CAYANVS. But he was of so haughtie a minde, and therewith so politicke, that notwithstanding that hee was ouerthrowne, yet within very few daies hee euer reinforced his Armie, in such sort that he put his enemies in greater feare, then at the first; and in the end at the request and entreatie of the Lombards which liued in Italy, he resolved to warre in Slauonia, drawing neere vnto Italy: where, although that he found some resistance, yet the Slaouons which came with him sealed vpon a great part of that countrie, and remained there: and in procelle of time it left the name of Myrrion, and after their name vntill this day is called Slauonia; and so from henceforth we will call it. From this nation (as BLONDVS, VOLATERRANVS, and others asseme) the Bohemians and Polonians are descended: for part of them tooke those countries; and vpon sundrie occasions took these names.

As matters stood vpon these rearmes, the Lombards in Italy and their King AGISVLPHVS, knowing how much the Emperour hated the Pope, resolved to besiege Rome; which they did with a very great Armie, and the Pope was therein besieged aboue one whole yeere, and by his industrie only the citie was defended, for from the Emperour came no reliefe at all: whereupon he wrote him certaine letters, which are yet extant, out of which is drawne great part of this historie. But notwithstanding all this, the Emperour MAVRICVS would not relieue him, but rather wish his destruction: but yet both he and the citie escaped, and at the yeeres end AGISVLPHVS raised his siege and departed.

It is written, that vpon a day about noone, in the citie of Constantinople, in the open market place of that citie, there appeared a man to the Emperour in the habit of a Monk, holding a sword in his hand, who speaking with a lowd voice, said, The Emperour MAVRICVS shall die by this sword: and this man presently vanished amongst the people, so as no man could say whence he came, nor who he was. This is written by Pope GRIGORIUS, which you may beleuee if you will.

They

They also say, that in his sleepe he saw a souldier whose name was PHOCAS, who murdered his wife and his children, and afterwards slew him also. With this dreame he was so much troubled, that he presently commanded his sonne in law PHILIPPICVS to be sent for, who was charged by him to haue had a determination to rebell against him; and hee (not without accusation wherewith he had slandered him, asked him whether hee knew any man of account in the Armie called by the name of PHOCAS: whereto he answered, that he knew a Centurion in the Camp of that name, whom hee had a little before made Pouruoier for the Camp. MAVRICVS again demanded, what manner of man he was: Quoth he, He is a cholerick, licentious yong fellow; but therewith fearfull, and a coward. Whereto they say, the Emperour (being much troubled and in despair) replied: If he be a coward, of necessity hee must bee cruell, and desirous to shed blood: and so, shedding many tears, he told PHILIPPICVS what he had dreamt; who was therewith also much troubled. In the mean time there came messengers vnto him, which he had sent to certain religious persons to desire them to pray for him; who in some sort did recomfort him, perswading him to bee of good cheer: for, God would haue mercy on his soule. But yet he neuer ceased to beuail his sinnes, and liued in continuall sorrow and contrition. And PHILIPPICVS perswaded him to vse some great liberality to his Armie and men of warre, thereby to winne their loue, and the better to liue in safety from them. But he followed not his good counsel: and so within fewe daies after, his death was praedicted, in such manner as followeth.

He commanded his brother PETER, whom he had made General of his Armie, against the Slaouons in Slauonia, that to auoide charge and expenses, in any case he should winter in the same prouince, and lodge his Armie in such villages and other places, where he might most annoy the enemy. Whereto notwithstanding that PETER answered to the contrarie, and entreated that hee might not doe so, alleging that the Armie should sustaine intolerable trouble and extremitie in those mountaines; yet he continued so obstinate in his command, as PETER of force must obey, although against his will: and the Armie tooke this in so ill part, that without any respect of dutie and allegiance they mutined, and chusing the aforementioned PHOCAS for General, they marched against PETER, who was lodged about a daies iourney from THEODOSIUS, the Emperours son, and GERMANVS his father-in-law. But I heerein follow the Commentaries of Constantinople, and ZONARAS, which seem to be more conformable to the truth: for, they write, that the whole Armie sent an Ambassage to THEODOSIUS, willing him to come vnto them, and they would make him Emperour; and if he would not that then GERMANVS should come: but, they refusing, or not daring, to accept their offer, the Armie chose the same PHOCAS for Emperour; and he took his way towards Constantinople. Which when the Emperour MAVRICVS vnderstood, calling to him his sonne THEODOSIUS, and GERMANVS his father-in-law, with COMENCIOVS, PHILIPPICVS, and other great Captains, he began to take order for the defence of the City, and to leuie souldiers, and to make preparation for the warres. But, as this reuolt hapned through the permission and ordinance of God: so the people mutined in such manner, that nothing could be done to any purpose; and there were many great tumults in the Citie. And among the people, and the Emperours owne kinned also, some laid the fault of what was befall, vpon others; and some were in hope to be Emperors if MAVRICVS lost the Empire: and others took part with PHOCAS the new Tyrant or Emperour.

Phocas chosen Emperour.

During this confusion and hurly-burly, PHOCAS, as fast as hee could march, came to Constantinople, accompanied with all the men of warre: and MAVRICVS, who (vntill then) had euer bin so mightie against all nations, hauing now no sufficient power to defend himself, fled out of the City, and took shipping in a small Bark, with his wife and children, and passed over the Streight called Saint GEORGE his Chanell, and, entering into the Citie of Calcedonia (which is on the other side) was there overtaken and apprehended by PHOCAS his souldiers, who was already come to Constantinople. And, being brought back again, PHOCAS commanded him to be put to death: but he first made his two sons, three daughters, and his wife the Emperesse, for his greater torment, to be slain in his presence, which he saw and endured with admirable magnanimity: and, as a faithful Christian, recommending himself to God, he called vpon his holy Name, many times repeating these words; Iustus es Domine, & rectum iudicium tuum. And so he patiently suffered death, and had his head stricken off.

The Emperour Maurice fled frō Constantinople

The death of the Emperour Mauricius.

Hee

Mufacius King of the Slaouons taken prisoner by Priscus, General of the Emperours forces.

Cayanus invaded the Kingdom.

A great plague in Cayanus his camp, whereof seven of his sonnes died in one day.

Myrrion called Slauonia.

The origins of the Bohemians and Polonians.

Prodigious vision appeared to the Emperour Maurice, predicting his death.

Heeded in the 63. yeere of his age, and the twentieth of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord (after most writers) 603. Some write that when he fled from Constantinople, he sent his sonne THEODOSIUS to the King of Persia, there to be kept, and that afterwards he was delivered into the power of PHOCAS. And so ended and was extinguished the whole house and lineage of the Emperour MAVRICE. There were also put to death, by PHOCAS his commandement, the Emperours brother, PETRA, and other principall men. In the time of this Emperour there were warres betwene the Kings of Spain, and France, and betwene the Saxons and the Sueuians, betwene the French and the Auares, and some others: which for that they concerne not my historie, I omit. In this time also the Turkes began to be knowne in the world: for it is found written, that they made warres in Asia against the Persians. Then also began the name of the Bulgarians to be knowne in Europe, a fierce people, of whom wee will speake hereafter.

THE LIFE OF PHOCAS, ONELY
OF THAT NAME, AND THREE-SCORE AND THIRD RO-MANE EMPEROVR.
(*)

After the manner as I haue before declared, was the Emperour MAVRICE put to death: who, as he was valiant, wise, and venturous in the wars, if he had bin bountifull and liberal, hee had been accounted for a good Prince, and had longer enjoyed the Empire. For all authors affirme, his couetousnes and sparing to haue bin the cause of his death, I meane of his corporall death: for the waies and iudgements of the Lord are vnsearchable and incomprehensible. And to say the truth, couetousnes is one of the most dangerous and hatefull vices wherewith a Prince can be infected: for besides that it maketh him ill beloued and odious to his subiects, it is the fountaine and roote of greater euils in those which are rich and mightie: for from thence grow violence, wrongs, rapine, briberie, extortion, crueltie, intolerable taxes, and impositions, no reward for seruice, condemning the innocent, abolishing the guiltie for money, coueting other mens goods, without warre, and shamefull peace. Finally, in Kings and Potentates couetousnes is the mother of all euils, and a vice which maketh their raigne and government short and miserable: as may be proued by many examples. And to the contrary, liberalitie hath been the occasion that many (notwithstanding that they were wicked) raigned longer then others. And forasmuch as I haue not time to make any long digression, I conclude that the couetousnes and miserable sparing of the Emperour MAVRICE, made PHOCAS so mightie, as to be able to bereaue him both of his Empire and life. And the same vice was afterwards the cause of his death also: as we will shew you, as soone as we shall haue related what happened in the Empire. When the Emperour MAVRICE was dead, there was none that durst

durst lift vp his hand against PHOCAS, and therefore he was generally obeyed of all men (excepting NARSSES, the generall commander in the East, before named.) This NARSSES when he vnderstood that PHOCAS had caused MAVRICE to be slaine, he with an Armie went into a citie of Arabia, called Edissa, with a resolution to yeeld him no obedience, but with the aide of the Persians to make himselfe strong against him.

But PHOCAS was crowned in Constantinople by the Patriarch thereof with great solemnitie, and great ioy and gladnes of the people, who are euer desirous of innouations: And as they suddenly desire them, so they as suddenly abhor them. And the like happened in Rome vpon the newes of his election: for the Romanes hated MAVRICE, for the enmitie betwene him and the Pope whom they loued. As soone as Pope GREGORIE vnderstood that PHOCAS was made Emperour, he wrote vnto him a notable epistle, which vntill this day is extant; wherein he admonished and counsellth him what he ought to doe, to be a perfect Emperour.

The first thing that PHOCAS did, was to send into all the prouinces and nations of the Empire, priuiledges, exemptions and kind letters, with new garisons and souldiers where need required: all which he did with such expedition and in so good order, that he made himselfe well beloued of his subiects, and respected and feared by strangers: but both in the one and in the other it continued but short space. And to GERMANVS who was Pretor and gouernor in the East, he sent commandement presently to goe and besiege NARSSES who rebelled against him. In the meane season, AGISVLPHVS King of the Lombards (who in the troublesome time wherein PHOCAS was chosen, and before his election, had taken the cities of Cremona, Mantua, and Folturnia, and therein had done irreparable harmes, as well in the walles and buildings of the citie, as among the citizens, the inhabitants, and their goods) for feare of the new Emperour concluded a truce with SMARAGDVS the Exarch, and with Pope GREGORIE, and with all Italy, for one yeere. And from thenceforth to be the better able to liue in security, he fought to match his eldest son ADDAALDVS with the daughter of THEODOBERTVS King of France. And so PHOCAS raigned in great prosperitie the first yeere; vntill hee began to discouer his base condition, and little worth, together with his extreme couetousnes, and negligence in all things; by means whereof he became little regarded and esteemed by all men, whereof ensued warres and troubles. In the second yeere of his raigne died Pope GREGORIE, and SABINIANVS succeeded him, who also tooke truce for another yeere with AGISVLPHVS, which was afterwards prolonged for other three yeeres more, by Ambassadors sent by AGISVLPHVS to the Emperour PHOCAS. And in the second yeere also of the raigne of PHOCAS, began the warre against the Persians, which in all mens iudgement was warre with the Persians.

least to be feared, considering how greatly COSROES King of Persia, stood bound to the Emperour MAVRICE, and to the Empire, for restoring him to his kingdom. The cause of this warre is written so diuersly, that I therefore leaue to set it downe: in the beginning whereof, GERMANVS the Generall in the East, leuied an Armie to make head against him, and they fought a battaile, wherein GERMANVS was ouerthrowne, and the greatest part of the Imperiall Armie slaine: he being wounded escaped by flight, and within eleven daies died thereof. When PHOCAS vnderstood of this losse, he then gaunted the peace, which we spake of, to the Lombards, and procured the like with the Bauares, with the Hunnes, and with the Slauians. With great diligence and little discretion, he sent the greatest part of his power into Syria, for the waies in the East, vnder the conduct of very good Captaines, and commanded NARSSES, and MAGNATES, who were two of them, to make warre vpon NARSSES; who vpon the faith and securitie giuen vnto him yeelded himselfe: but PHOCAS breaking his faith and promise, made him most cruelly to be burnt. His Armie in the East had yet another battaile with COSROES, and was againe overthrowne with great dishonour and confusion. Whilst the Emperours Captaines lost these battailes, there grew very great tumults and factions in Constantinople, and in many other cities in Asia, which rose of very light and frivolous occasions. Which were, that as in auncient time, in Rome, and afterwards in Constantinople, they vsed certaine sports and games of running with chariots, and on horse backe, after a kinde of turneying; as heretofore in the life of DOMICIANVS we haue declared: so now some clothing themselves in greene, and others in gray, the common people which saw the same (as their manner is) affected some the one colour, and some the other; and this so much encreased, that (as in times past there had been great scandales, and murders done vpon the like occasions) so it pleased God to permit, that in the time of PHOCAS, the matter grew to that extremitie, as there were infinite slaughters and murders committed, in Syria, in Egypt, in Gracia, and in many other prouinces:

G g

Phocas violating his faith made Narses to be burnt.

uinces : which the Emperor by his letters and commandements was not able to prevent. For notwithstanding that he was very cruell, and did wrongfully put many to death ; yet was there small account made of him ; for all men knew the basenes of his mind, and his disordinate vices, and couetousnes, and how that he applied himselfe to nothing, but to his pleasure amongst women, and to seeke new meanes to encrease his tributes, and to heape vp money : by reason whereof euery where were tumults, confusions, and riots ; and the princes and nations bordering vpon the Empire knowing this, determined to rise vpon such part thereof as they could. CAYANVS with the Bauarians and Hunnes, coming from Noricum (by them called Bavaria) and from the countreies of Hungarie and Austria ; after they had enlarged their territorie, concluded to make warre vpon the Lombards (which was the onely thing that kept the Empire in peace) and fighting a battaile with a great Armie, and a Captaine of them, the Bauarians obtained the victorie. After which CAYANVS took by force a citie called Forum Iulij, which hee wholly destroyed, and hauing done much harme and taken great spoiles in the province of Yennice, he returned to his kingdome. Then the Slauiens who before had made themselves Lords of a great part of Illyricum, in this time took all Illyricum, and Dalmatia, which now contains all the coast and countrey from Friuli to Durazzo, by them called Slauiens. In this meane time, COSROES King of Persia was not idle, but entred with a mightie power into Mesopotamia, and took it all, and part of Syria, where, in battailes and conflicts, he wholly defeated the legions and Roman Armie. On the other side, his men of warre made themselves Lords of Armenia and Cappadocia, and did much hurt in other prouinces of the Empire. Whilest these things passed in these parts ; In Africa, which of long time (euen since the death of the Emperour Valentinian) had been in peace, and in the seruice and obedience of the Empire ; HERACLIVS whom some call HERACLIVS, who for the Emperour PHOCAS was gouernour thereof, seeing his pusillanimitie and euill gouernment, began to leaue his seruice and to doe what best pleased himselfe, without any respect or regard to his decrees or commandements. And to the end the mischief should be generall, in the citie of Antioch in Soria, the Infidels rose against the Christians, and slew a great number of them, together with the Patriarch of that citie ; vpon whom PHOCAS commanded great punishment to be inflicted. Finally, in all the prouinces there was great disorder and little iustice, and those prouinces which bordered vpon the enemies were spoiled, and a great part of them lost. And the matter came to this issue, that one of these two things of necessitie must ensue, which were, that either the Empire must be rent in sunder, and wholly lost, or else PHOCAS must die. Whereupon the principall Captaines, and his chiefest friends, seeing it expedient for the common good, and the estate of the Empire, conspired against him, and resolved to kill him. Among which was his greatest fauourit PRISCVS, who by letters agreed with HERACLIVS (who gouerned Africa and rebelled, and to whose daughter PRISCVS was married) to kill him, and waite his sonne HERACLIVS which was his wiues brother, Emperour. There were also confederates in this treason (if it may be said to be treason to kill a tyrant and a traitor) PATRICIVS, and other principall men. And as PRISCVS was in great credit with PHOCAS, so he faigned to reduce his father in law HERACLIVS to his seruice ; and vnder this pretext, hee first brought his brother in law HERACLIVS to Constantinople, for a pledge and assurance of his fathers loyalty. This treatie was double ; for his father was presently to come to Constantinople, with the greatest power that hee was able to make, vnder colour to passe into Asia, against the King of Persia ; and according to this rumor hee did so, and came with a very great Armie, and suddenly landed in Thracia, which coast is now called Romania. And his sonne who remained in Constantinople with the fauour and in companie of PRISCVS, and many others, entred the palace and slew PHOCAS ; and then presently arriued his father with his forces, and according to the agreement betwene them, young HERACLIVS was made Emperour, and generally obied. In the manner of PHOCAS his death, authors which write thereof make some difference : but they all concur in this, that hee was slaine through the conspiracie of the Captaines, and great men before named ; in the eight yeere of his iaigne, and of the incarnation of our Sauour CHRIST six hundred and cleuen, without leauing any sonne to succede him in the Empire.

Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Cappadocia taken from the Romans by the Persians.

Had conspired for an Emperour.

Phocas slaine by Heraclius after his being succeeded in the Empire.

THE

THE LIFE OF HERACLIVS, ONLY
OF THAT NAME, AND THREE-SCORE AND FOVRTH ROMANE EMPE ROVR.
()

THE ARGVMENT.

HERACLIVS having slaine the tyrant Phocas, without any contradiction was made Emperour who found the Empire very weak and in great combustion. In the beginning of his gouernment, the citie of Ierusalem was taken by COSROES King of Persia ; and the crosse of Christ which was left there by Helena mother to Constantine the great, was caried away. He obtained victorie against Iohn Campanus a Captaine of his, which rebelled against him, and made himselfe a tyrant ouer part of Italy ; by another of his Captaines whose name was Flutherius, who by reason of this victorie grew so proud, that he also dared to rebel, and to call himselfe King of Italy ; but he was presently slaine by the same Captaine which took his part. And having concluded a peace with the Bauarians, he made his sonne Constantine, Caesar, and his companion into the Empire, and leaving him (for that he was very young) vnder good keeping in Constantinople, he went against COSROES, who had taken from him a great part of the Empire. To which warre he went himselfe in person ; and having given his enemy two great overthrowes, he constrained him to flie. When he had expelled COSROES, and recovered many countreies of the Empire, he made peace with COSROES sonne, who rose against his father, for an iniurie receiued from him ; which peace was a great helpe to the Empire, and very hurtfull to COSROES ; but by meanes thereof, the same breaued the father both of his kingdome and life. In these times began the sect of Mahomet, against which Heraclius in the beginning made no resistance, making no account thereof ; but afterwards he began to feare the same when hee could not suppress it. This Emperour made a great exchange from vertue to vice ; so as when he grew old, he became superstitious, an hereticke, and libidinous, giuing himselfe to pleasure, as a young man, when it had been more requisite and more honorable for him to haue liued grauely, as an old man ; and took to wife a young woman, giuing himselfe more to carnall delight, then for his yeeres, and the dignitie of so mightie an Emperour was fit. But falling into the dropsie, he died suddenly, when he had reigned twentie yeeres.

THE life and conditions of PHOCAS were odious to the world, and his reigne fo vnhappy and infortunate, that the Imperiall scepter and dignitie was likely to haue wholly falne and to haue come to ruine ; so all men reioiced at his death. And forasmuch as HERACLIVS was the actor and executioner thereof, they very peaceably and ioyfully receiued him for Emperour ; who was a man fortunate in the warres, and obtained many noble victories, and possessed the Empire many yeeres, although that in the end many things happened contrarie, for his finnes and little constancie in the Christian faith ; as in his historie we will relate, as briefly as possibly we may. PHOCAS and those of his partie being put to death, HERACLIVS was with great ioy and solemnitie crowned in Constantinople, by the hands of SERGIUS, Patriarch thereof ; his father HERACLIVS being there present, with PRISCVS and other great men, who had bin confederates in the conspiracie against PHOCAS. And vpon the same day hee solemnized his mariage with a great Lady, whose name was EVDOKIA, who afterwards in the second yeere of his reigne died in childbed, of a sonne called CONSTANTINE ; and he married for his second wife wiua nece of his owne called MARTINA, which also bare him a sonne called HERACLIVS.

Gg 2

This

In what place Heraclius found the Empire.

At what time Mahomet began to grow mighty.

This Emperor HERACLIVS found the Empire in such combustion, and so rent in peeces, as it seemed impossible to continue. The affaires of the East were in such case, as wee told you, where COSROES had defeated all the armies, and entering into the Empire, daily tooke townes and forts. In the province of Arabia Petrea, which bordereth vpon Egypt and India, the Sarazins rebelled; with whom he accursed MAHOMET afterwards made himself very mighty. CAYANVS and the Bavarians which inhabited Bavaria, Austria and Hungarie, seeing the Empire so weakened, came into Thracia, and made warres there. In Syricum or Slaunia, the Slaoues were of great power: and in Italy, although there was peace with the Lombards (for they were defeated and weakened by the ouerthrowes which they had receiued from the Bauarians and Slaoues) yet there wanted not combustions and tumults: for PHOCAS before his death had bereaued SMARAGDVS (oftentimes before named) of his Exarchat and gouernment, and had sent thither another Captaine called IOHN; who coming to Raenenna, with his wife and family, and a great number of Iudges and officers for all Italy, PHOCAS was by that time dead; and IOHN being more earnest in demanding tributes, and other exactions then hee ought to haue been, the people were therewith so much incensed as they slew him: and so Italy remained without a gouernour. And at that time the Church of Rome being without a Bishop by the death of Pope BONIFACE, and by reason of discord among the Clergie, that feat being void the space of eight moneths, a Captaine which liued in Naples, called IOHN CAMPISINVS, who gouerned that citie with the territorie thereof, determined to rebell and make himselfe Lord of Pulia, Calabria, Campania, and of a great part of that countrie, which at this day is the kingdom of Naples; imagining that the new Emperour should haue enough to do to defend or to recover the rest, and so he might make himselfe King of Italy.

HERACLIVS coming to the Empire so tome and dismembred; to encounter with so many extremities, in the beginning vsed not such diligence, as was requisite, neither had hee power or means. For as all Authors write he found the Empire so disarmed & vnurnished of men of warre, as there were neither old souldiers, neither experienced legions left, but they were all daime and scattered. Neuertheless he began to make Capitaines, and to leuie men of warre, and sent CRISPVS with such forces as he could get, together with such as his father brought him out of Africa, into the provinces of Asia the lesse (now called Turkie) to guard and defend the same, seeing they were not able to giue battaile to the Persians; and hee caused his father to returne into Africa, which was all that the Empire peaceably enioyed, together with Sicilia and Sardinia; and he himselfe remained in Constantinople, procuring peace with the Bauarians and their King CAYANVS, by all possible means, as well by gifts as entreatie. But these things were so long adooing, that COSROES King of Persia, as master of the field, taking some Cities by surprise, and others by force, came conquering all Syria, and from thence into Palestina, and so to the Citie of Ierusalem; not the old Ierusalem, for that (as is already said) was destroyed and laid waste by TITVS and VESPASIAN, but to that which the Emperour ADRIAN new builded, in the same place, or at least nere vnto it, as already is declared; which then was a great and an excellent City. And entering it by force he vsed great cruelty, and did much harme to the Christians; so as therein (as it is written) were slaine 80000 persons; and taking the wood of the crosse of Christ, which HELEN mother to CONSTANTINE the Great had left there, and carrying it thence with him, he set it with great reuerence vpon the top of his chaire, or royall Throne, made of fine Gold, set with many Jewels and Pearles. He likewise carried with him prisoner ZACHARIAS the Patriarch of Ierusalem, who was an excellent Prelate.

This taking of Ierusalem, some Authors write to haue happened about the end of the raigne of the Emperour PHOCAS: but the most certaine and true opinion is, that it befell in the time of HERACLIVS, wherein I place the same. CRISPVS who was sent by the Emperour, and then was in the province of Cappadocia in Asia the lesse, endeouored to leuie souldiers, and to provide (so much as in him lay) for the defence of those Countreies, against the great power of the Persians: but it auailed not at that time. And for as much as it was bruited that the Persian meant to goe into Egypt, and thence to make a conquest of Africa; HERACLIVS father to the Emperour being then in the City of Carthage, leuying a great number of men of war, departed thence, marching along the Sea coast, to goe into Egypt to make head against the Persians; where we will leaue him, and tell you first what ensued after that IOHN CAMPISINVS rebelled with the City of Naples, and all that Prouince.

The Emperour being much moued with his audacious rebellion, sent a Captaine into Italy, whose whose name was ELEVTHERRIVS, with a good number of souldiers; which captaine was of a great and noble familie, and very wife and expert in the warres. He as soone as he arriued at Raenenna with his fleet, was receiued and obeyed there; and vnderstanding who they were which had conspired in the rebellion and insurrections past, he punished some of them, vsing greater clemencie then seueritie. And therewithall hee speedily assembled such forces as remained in the gouernement of Raenenna; with which, and with those which hee brought with him, he purposed to take his way against CAMPISINVS, who lay in Naples; and by the way went to Rome, where he was well entertained and honoured by DEVS DEDIT, who then was Pope. And marching towards Naples, CAMPISINVS considering that by prolonging the warre he daily lost, and the Emperours partie increased; with the greatest and best power that he was able to make he took the field, and neer to the citie of Naples they two fought a cruel battell, but ELEVTHERRIVS obtained the victorie, although very hardly; for CAMPISINVS fought valiantly, and died fighting.

After this battell, ELEVTHERRIVS with small difficultie recovered all that CAMPISINVS had vsurped, and returned with victorie to Rome; and for his better securitie, and to bring to effect such things as he had protected (which we will presently tell you) he praiched to prolong the peace with AOSVLPVS King of the Lombards, which was concluded for other ten yeers. And he procured and leuied money, wherewith he payed and contented his souldiers and men of warre: for which his doings so valiantly and so speedily accomplished, the Emperour HERACLIVS sent him the authoritie and title of Exarch and Gouernor of all Italy; wherewith he came to Raenenna, which was the seate of the Gouernors, leaving all Italy in peace and in quiet subiection (Lombardy excepted, and the rest which the Lombards possessed) by means whereof he grew so proud and so ambitious, as without the feare of God, or respect to the Emperour, knowing himselfe to be greatly beloued by his souldiers, he rebelled against his soveraigne Lord, and tooke vpon him the title of King of Italy, and presently departed with his Armie from Raenenna towards Rome, meaning to make himselfe Lord of all the countrie. But it pleased God to giue him speedy punishment: for the same Capitaine which advanced him, and vpon whom he had grounded his disloyaltie; the same I say, to shew themselves loyall to the Emperour, within few daies journey from Rome slew him, when he nothing suspected any such matter; and the Armie approoued his death; and they altogether returned to Raenenna, and sent his head to the Emperour to Constantinople; who being aduertised of what had passed, was very well pleased with what they had done. Then he sent for a new Exarch, a Noble Constantinopolitane, called YSANTIVS, who was very well entertained. And at the same time died the valiant AOSVLPVS king of the Lombards, and his son ODOALDVS being a child of tender age, was made their King; and the wife and Christian Queene THEODOLINDA his mother, took vpon her the gouernement, and gouerned that kingdome very wisely and discreetly, and obserued and renewed the peace made with the Italians, and the Imperialists; and so Italy remained for some space in rest. But in the warre against the Persians, matters hapned to the contrary: whereof we will make a briefe relation, and what end it had.

HERACLIVS the Emperours father, who was Gouernor of Africa, marching with great power towards Egypt, to make head against the Persians, being very ioyfull, and of great power, by the way died of an infirmity. By his death all was out of order and came to nothing: for there was not any man amongst them capable of the gouernment, or fit to leade an Army. This hapned in the sixt yeer of the raigne of the Emperour HERACLIVS; who all that time remained in Constantinople giuing himselfe to pleasure and ease. When the King of Persia understood of the death of HERACLIVS the gouernour of Africa; with the greatest haste hee could make, hee sent a very mighty armie into Egypt; and as that kingdome was vnurnished of men of warre, and the Persians became victorious, so in few daies they made themselves absolute Lords thereof: and the same yeere passing further, they conquered Africa euen to the citie of Carthage; for no citie neither people were of power able to make head against them. Which HERACLIVS vnderstanding, hee sent Ambassadors to King COSROES, with milde words entreating him for peace, desiring him to desist from shedding so much blood, and to rest satisfied with what he had done. To this Embassie the Infidell made answer, so haughtily, and with such pride, that among other things he sent him word, that he would grant no peace to HERACLIVS, except he would renounce the Faith of IESVS CHRIST, and adore his Idols. With this answer the Ambassadors returned, and the Persians the yeer following (profecuting their warres) besieged the Citie of Carthage, and tooke it, with the marches thereof,

Eleutherius
sent by the Em-perour against Iohn Campis-inus.

Campisinus described, and slaine by Eleu-therius.

Eleutherius rebelled, and called himselfe king of Italy.

Eleutherius
slaine, and his head sent to the Emperour.

The death of A-githulphus king of the Lombards

The death of Heraclius.

The insolent answer of the king of Persia to the Emperour Hera-clius.

The City of Carthage taken by the Persians.

and leauing gouernours and Garrisons in that country, returned into Asia most richly laden with spoiles.

HERACLIVS having obserued how much of the Empire hee had lost, resolved with himselfe to goe in person to recouer the same, or to lose the rest; whereat the Bauarians and their King CAYANVS, were a great hinderance. But to the end that the reader may the better vnderstand the matter, let him know, that these Bauarians (in former time called Hunnes Auares) of a long time called their Kings CAYANI, as the Egyptians called their Kings PHARAONES, and as many other nations gaue their Kings ordinarie and peculiar names. I say then, that CAYANVS returned with his forces to infest the countrie of Thracia, which till then had free passage. And this was the cause that the Emperor HERACLIVS was detained two or three yeeres, after that which happened in Africa; vntill at length he fought all waies and means to come to a peace with CAYANVS, although to his dishonor & with losse of reputation. Finally, it was concluded and confirmed with great othes and promises: and so leauing all Italie and Gracia in peace, he resolved to march against the Persians, and to that end he named and ordained for CÉSAR and his companion in the Empire, his sonne CONSTANTINVS, to make his abode in the citie of Constantinople. And forasmuch as hee was very yong, hee appointed SBRIGVS, Patriarch of Constantinople, and BONVSVS a wife and noble gentleman, for his gouernours and tutors. Which being ordained, preparing the greatest power and munition that hee was able, with many priers and solemne processions, he departed from Constantinople with great solemnitie, and embarking himselfe with his people, hee passed ouer into those prouinces which were vnder his obedience in Asia, and entertained into his pay many other nations. And forasmuch as his souldiers were but newly raised, hee thought it not fit presently to march vntill that they were better practised and trained. Which being done, calling vpon the Lord for aide, he entred into his enemies countries. This his journey was so much bruited and obserued by all the nations of the world, as there was no man but had an especiall eye thereto.

COSROES K. of Persia, being well informed, how valiant & good a captain HERACLIVS was & how resolute an armie he led, resolved not to giue him battel, but retired himselfe within his countrie, and made all the victuals to bee withdrawn and carried away, and the tressos bee cut downe, and laid athwart the waies where hee supposed the Emperor would passe. And on the other side, hee sent an huge armie of very expert old souldiers; vnder the leading of a capitaine called SARAVAGVS, or SALVARYS (for in these names the authors euer vary) to the end that hee should charge the Emperor; either on the flanke or on the backe, who with great resolution and in good order marched against King COSROES; and by the way recouered and wonne many cities. But holding it for no assured course to leaue so great an armie behinde him, hee tooke another way, and fought out SARAVAGVS; and hauing passed the great mountaine Taurus, the two armies approached the one neere the other, not far from a riuer: before which time there passed many conflicts and other accidents between them, which I cannot possibly set down at large. The conclusion therof was, that they came to blowes: and as the Persians of long time had been victorious, and made full account of the Romans (I alwaies call those Romans which were of the Emperours armie: for although that the seat of the Empire was in Gracia, yet the Emperours euer tooke a glory to bee called Romane Emperours, and their armies, the Romane armies) and as the Imperialists holding themselves for disgraced and dishonest, had a great desire to be reuenged (the presence and great valor of the Emperor being a great helpe thereto) both the one and the other fought with so great courage and obstinacie, as the battaile continued long, and was very cruell. And although that in the beginning it was very doubtfull, yet in the end the Emperor obtained the victorie, and made great slaughter of his enemies. With this victorie the Imperialists were so much incouraged, as they abandoned the feare, which vntill then had possessed them; and the Emperor was wonderfull ioyfull to see himselfe victorious. And forasmuch as winter drew on, he purposed to retire himselfe, being laden with exceeding rich spoiles, and many prisoners, intending to returne the next spring with greater force, which was in the eleuenth yeere of his reigne.

But on the contrarie side, COSROES was very sorrie, and much grieved; and imputing the fault to his General, deposed him from his charge, purposing to haue caused him to be slaine, and made another General, called SAIN, or SATHIN, a very valiant man and of great account: and gathering together the remainder of the last Armie, he commanded him to raise Heracilius made his sonne Constantine, Caesar.

Heracilius in Asia.

A battell betweene the Romans and the Persians, with the success.

one farre greater; and that he should follow the warre with a greater resolution and vehemencie. The Emperour who had not shaken off all care that was needfull, although he would willingly haue accepted of peace, conditionally that he might haue had that restor'd which was taken from him (which he attempted, but could not obtaine) after that he had made his beneuolent praiers to God, courageously returned to the warres. And as this SAIN desired to excell his predecessour SARAVAGVS, and to recouer what he had lost, without delaying of time, he went to meete the Emperour, and desiring to come to a battaile with him, he drew his Armie neere vnto his, which wanted neither force nor courage to fight.

The next day in the morning (seeing themselves so neere together) they began to set their people in order: but their troupes of either side were so great, as they spent almost one whole day. Whereupon they took truce, vntill the next day, to auoide fighting by night: so resolute was either partie, and so they slept in the same place, and in the same order as they were set. The next morning by sunne rising, the one Armie began to moue toward the other; and there began one of the most bloodie and cruell Battailles that had beene scene, which continued most part of the day without any signe of aduantage or victorie of either side, fighting at equall hand: but by that time the Persians had so oppressed the Romanes, as they began to shew their weaknes; and the Emperour was in feare to haue beene ouerthrowne: but it pleased God miraculously to relieue him, for suddenly fell so much raine and haile, with so terrible winde and tempest, beating vpon the backs of the Romanes, and in the faces of the Persians, which did so much trouble them and put them out of order, that in a very short space they were broken and ouerthrowne, and turning their backs ranne away. The Emperour HERACLIVS remained with the victorie, maister of the field, when he had slaine thirtie thousand of his enemies in the battaile; although with no small losse of his owne people; hauing obtained two so great and notable victories against the Infidels. The Emperour sent to make all this knowne in Constantinople, in Italy, and in all the other prouinces of the Empire; for which euery where was made great ioy: and in the meane while hee himselfe was not idle; but reinforcing his Armie, and encouraging his people, he recouered a great part of Syria, and Mesopotamia, which hee had lost; part in his owne person, and part by his Captaines, and hee still followed his victorie, vntill that the great waters, by reason of the winter staid him and forced him to returne, and to winter that yeere in the prouince of Albania. COSROES King of Persia, as he was a mightie prince, and his dominion great, so the losse of these two battailes, was not such as to bereaue him of meanes againe to make head against his enemy: for gathering together his whole forces, he leuied men of warre, and issuing his treasure, raised a greater and a more mightie Armie, then any of the former; and made a prudent and resolute Capitaine called RAZATENS General thereof; who being very valiant, was not afraid to draw neere to the way, where he knew the Emperour was to passe the nex spring.

Finally, after many skirmishes and effusion of much blood, and such like casualties of the warre, HERACLIVS putting his whole trust in God, sought to come to a battaile, which the Persian refused not; so as with equall mindes, and in a manner, with equall force and Armies, two squadrons first began the fight in the morning, and afterwards others, and in the end all, and this battaile continued vntill about sun-set: wherein the Imperialists in power and courage surpassing the Persians, constrained them to turne their backs, and to yeeld themselves for ouerthrowne. And RAZATENS as a good Capitaine, failing in no part of his office, died fighting, for that he would not liue being overcome; after that many thousands of men were slaine and wounded of the one side and the other. In these three great battailes; and in many other of lesse account, it is written, that the Emperor himselfe in person, shewed great valour; especially in this last, where he slew with his owne hand, three men of great esteeme which he encountered in sundrie places of the battaile, besides others which hee slew and wounded of lesse account.

By means of this victorie, HERACLIVS grew so powerfull, and COSROES so weak, and his forces were so much diminished, that daring no longer to defend that which hee had usurped in Armenia, and Mesopotamia, hee abandoned the same; and passing ouer the riuer Tigris fled into Persia: HERACLIVS also passed that riuer, and ouerran the countrie burning and spoiling great cities. In this manner conquering the kingdomes of COSROES, and COSROES not so hardie as to defend the same, but by flight hiding himselfe; for his refuge and defence in his life time he made his second sonne whose name was MHDARSES, against all equitie and reason, equall with himselfe in his kingdom; for hee had an elder sonne, a man of

A truce for one night betweene the Persians and the Romanes.

A miraculous victorie.

The Persians the third time ouerthrowne by the Emperour: and their generall slaine fighting.

Cosroes abandoning what hee had usurped fled into Persia.

Cosroes made his second son equal with him in his kingdom, whereby he lost the same together with his life.

greatest spirit, and of more discretion, called SIROES, and (as it often happeneth to the wicked) by the same means whereby he thought to haue defended his kingdom, he lost it together with his life: for his eldest sonne took this iniurie done to him by his father in so ill part, as he persecuted to bereaue him both of life and kingdom. To which purpose he began by Letters and secret messengers, to treat with the Emperour, entreating his fauour, and to bee at peace with him: in requittall whereof, when he should be established in the kingdom, hee promised to yeeld vnto him what he should require, if it were in his power. In conclusion, briefly to see down the Composition, they agreed vpon these conditions: That hee should resign to the Emperour all those lands and countries which his father and predecessors had vsurped in the provinces of Asia, and all that which they had gotten by conquest in Africa, and all the treasure of his fathers royall house. And that he should resign the two inuincible fortresses, which the Persians held in the principall passages of the river Tigris, with the crosse, and the Patriarch which they brought from Ierusalem, and that hee should bee a perpetuall friend and allie to the Emperour.

This league being concluded, SIROES was so magnanimous, and therewith so well beloved, as within few daies, with the aid and fauour of HERACLIVS, and such forces as hee sent him, he gat both his father and his brother into his power, whom hee caused to be slaine; and thoroughly performed all that which he had agreed vpon with HERACLIVS; and so enjoyed the kingdom in peace, although of lesse power then his father was. And HERACLIVS returned, leaving all the provinces of the Empire restored and furnished, and all the passages of the river Tigris fortified, the most ioyfull and honoured Prince that then liued in the world. Being come to Ierusalem, he sent his Captaines into Africa, which he wholly recovered, and reduced the same to a quiet gouernement. This was in the sixt yeere after that he began the warre in his owne person, and the sixteenth and seventeenth of his reigne; although in these computations there be euermore difference betweene authors. When he came to Ierusalem, hee restored ZACHARIAS the Patriarch thereof, and the crosse which had been foureteen yeeres in the power of COSROES, and came into the citie bearing the same vpon his shoulders, with the greatest ioy, feasting and solemnitie that could be made: and this restitution of the crosse was so highly esteemed, as it was afterwards solemnized euery year vpon the fourteenth day of September, which is called the exaltation of the crosse.

Heracles restored the crosse to Ierusalem, The exaltation of the crosse.

The successe of the false Prophet Mahomet.

In those daies the false Prophet MAHOMET, the deceiver and seducer of the greatest part of the world, with his illusions and tromperies, in the countrey of Arabia drew many to his sect, and grew a mightie tyrant; whom HERACLIVS might then easily haue defeated: but making small account of him, he contented himselfe with the taking of a certaine people from him called Sarazins, which falsely boasted themselves to be descended from SARAH, ABRAHAM's wife; who were also called Scenites, and liued in the fields, as the Arabians doe at this day: and giuing them pay, the Emperour sent them into other provinces, which at that time seemed to haue been a sufficient redress. Having taken order for his affaires in those quarters, he returned to Constantinople, whither hee came with the greatest triumph that could be made. Herein is some difference: for some authors write, that before his going to Ierusalem he returned to Constantinople; but it importeth not whether were the first; but in the end the Emperour came to repossesse himselfe in Constantinople, with very great honour and reputation amongst his subjects, and was by all other Kings and Princes at that time much beloved and feared.

In Italy all was in peace with the Lombards in those daies, ODOALDVS reigning with his mother THEVDOLINDA; and she dying, the subjects making no account of him, for that he was a very childe, denied him their obedience, and chose ARTOLVS, who was of the blood royal; and he maintained the peace with the Empire in as ample manner as did ODOALDVS; and THEVDOLINDA, HERACLIVS hauing so good successe in all things, as aforesaid, prosperitie (as ordinarily it worketh in many men) made him proud and carelesse, forgetting God, and those workes and exercises of pietie whereby he had attained to that prosperitie. For in steede of prayer and contemplation, he gaue himselfe to pleasure, to augurie, soothsaying and diuination, prognosticating things to come, by superstitious and vnlawfull Arts and means; and from one to another fell into heresies: for being seduced by two wicked Prelates, the one called PIERVS, Patriarch of Alexandria, and the other a Bishop called CIATVS, he came to beleue that there was a will onely in Christ, and so consequently hee denied the two natures, diuine and humane. Neither could the admonitions and Letters of Pope HONORIVS auail to dissuade him from that heresie, who banished PIERVS into Africa. It pleased Heracles became an heretic.

pleased God to permit, in his secret & incomprehensible judgement, that MAHOMET began to prosper and preuaile in his proceedings, that HERACLIVS began to stand in fear of him, of whom in former time he made small account: for he had daily news, that he leuied men of warre, which came vnto him as well out of Arabia, as out of Persia; some deluded through his allurements and suggestions, others, to enjoy the great liberty which hee gaue them to rob and steal: for these were the miracles wherewith in the beginning he planted his diuinish sect. And it followed that the Sarazins, which we said HERACLIVS had gotten from him, by reason of the Emperours ill pay and entertainment, mutined, and went to MAHOMET into Arabia. So as he went out of Arabia felix, where he first gathered head; and, making himself Lord of the three Arabia, went into Egypt, and afterwards into Syria, and into Mesopotamia; and had so good successe, that with those Sarazins, and such other forces as he could get, hee resolved to make himself King of Persia. Whereunto, this was a great help, for as much as that Kingdome was much wasted and weakened, as well by ciuill dissension, as through the great slaughter made therein by HERACLIVS; and besides this, the Inhabitants of meer lightnes revolted to MAHOMET.

Mahomet his successe.

There reigned at that time in Persia a great man whose name was HORMISDA, allied to the fore-passed Kings: for, SIROES (who was HERACLIVS's friend) reigned but one year in that Kingdome; and after him his sonne ADHRSR likewise but a yeer. By the death of which two, HORMISDA attained to the Kingdome; but not in peace, nor without great tumults and contradictions.

At that time MAHOMET marched towards Persia with his Sarazins, and much other people; against whom came HORMISDA: and they two fought a very great battell; wherein HORMISDA was ouerthrowne and slaine. Yet some write, that MAHOMET was first ouerthrowne. This onely battell, and the illusion and deceit of his sect and superstitious religion, brought all Asia vnder his obedience, together with all Africa, Babylon, and all the other Provinces subject to the mighty Kings of Persia. And he wholly subuerted that Empire; so as from that time forwards it had not any title of a Kingdome: but all those Nations lost their names, and from thenceforth were called Sarazins and Mahometists, after their false Prophet and Leader; whereas in truth they ought to haue bin called Agarenes, Ismaelites: for, MAHOMET descended from ABRAHAM, by AGAR a bond-woman, and his son ISMAR.

The originall of the Sarazins: obtain successe.

The Emperour, vnderstanding of these victories, applied not himself to resist the course therewith such magnanimity as he ought to haue done, notwithstanding that he knew he returned into Syria and Palestina, with a resolution to take Ierusalem; but hee sent thither onely to fetch from thence the Crosse of CHRIST, and to bring it to Constantinople: from whence afterwards in proceesse of time it was brought to Rome. MAHOMET then came, and took many great Cities in Syria, wherein he found small resistance; and among them, the City of Ierusalem, publishing himself euery where to be the Prophet of God. Yet some write, that Ierusalem was not taken by MAHOMET; but, by his Successors, after his death: but it imports not greatly whether it were taken by him or others.

The death of Mahomet.

Within few daies after these victories, MAHOMET deceased, being of the age of two and forty yeers; but, leauing disciples of his wickednes, his sect and superstition died not, nor took any end; but continueth vntill this day, and will continue vntill it shall please God for his mercies sake to cure this contagion. For, his Successor remained, a great Arabian Captain called CALPHA; and him others succeeded, who conquered Africa, and other Countries; as in the proceesse of this History shall be expressed.

Calipha, Mahomet's successor.

While these things passed in the East; in Italy, notwithstanding that there was peace with the Lombards, as it is often seen that foraine peace breeds ciuill warre; so MAVRICE CARTVLARIVS, who was President of Rome, making small account of the Emperour, or of his Exarch ISANCIVS, rebelling made himself a Tyrant. Against whom, ISANCIVS came from Ravenna, and after many adventures apprehended him, with many other his confederates; and, carrying him to Rome, smote off his head: and shortly after this, ISANCIVS died. And the Emperour HERACLIVS sent a Noble-man, called THEODORE GALLIOPA, to be Gouernor of Italy. But none of all these things could moue the minde of HERACLIVS to leuie any Armie against the Sarazins; he gaue himself so much to his pleasure and licentious living, marrying in his old age with his brothers daughter, who was a yong damself, called MARTINA: and so it pleased God that vpon a time he was taken with the dropisie; whereof hee died suddenly, when he had reigned thirty yeers, in the year of our Lord 641. Others say, that hee died

The death of Heracles.

died of a disease called Priapismus, a strange sickness, and such as with modesty cannot be expressed. He left behinde him two sonnes, and one daughter, which hee had by his first wife. His daughters name was EPIPHANIA: one of his sons was called HERACLIVS; the other, CONSTANTINE, whom he made CÆSAR, when he went to the wars in the East against the Persians. By his second wife he had one sonne, a childe of ten yeeres old, called HERACLIVS also. And so ended this Emperor: of whom it may be said, that two Emperors might well have been made; one very good, and the other passing ill, considering the contrariety in his actions.

At what time the Emperor HERACLIVS died, the Empire of the East was much decayed; for, all the Provinces of Syria, Meſopotamia, Egypt and Arabia, were in the power of the Infidels. In Italy, THEODORE GALLIOPA was Gouverner: and in Lombardie, through the death of ARIOLOVS, ROTARIVS was King. The Slauios possessed Illyricum: and the Hunnes and Bauarians held Hungarie, Baniere, and Austria. In Spain reigned the Gothes: and the French prospered in France; and in Germany sundry other Princes. So as the Empire contained Thracia, the Provinces of Græcia, the Isles of Sicilia and Sardinia, and the greatest part of Italie in Europe; and in Asia, Armenia, Asia the lesse, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Galacia, Bythinia, Cappadocia, and other Provinces, with all Africa: which I haue set down of purpose, to the end the Reader may the better vnderstand what shall be said hereafter.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND FIFT ROMAN

Emperor; And of his Brother HERACLIVS.

()

THE History of the liues of the two sonnes of the Emperor HERACLIVS, PAVLVS DIACONVS and BEDA seem to dissent from other Historiographers; first placing the Empire of HERACLIVS, who was younger than CONSTANTINE, and sonne of his second wife MARTINA; but I follow the opinion of other authors. The Emperor HERACLIVS being dead and buried, there was no open contradiction that might hinder his eldest son, born of his first wife EVDOKIA, who died in childe bed of this CONSTANTINE (which CONSTANTINE had a yong man to his sonne, called CONSTANS) from obtaining the Empire; as well for that he was made CÆSAR in his fathers time, as also for that in right he ought to haue it, being his fathers eldest sonne, and of full age; and also for the hope which they conceived that he would proue a good Prince. He was then presently accepted and crowned with great joy and solemnity; but to the great discontentment and grief of his his mother in law MARTINA; whose wickednes did so shorten the raigne of her sonne in law, as there can be no worthe action written of him, that hee either did, or that passed in his time; sauing that he gaue good signes and shewes of a good Empror, and began to be beloued by his subiectes; which encreased the hatred of that mischieuous woman his stepdame; and he reposing his trust in hir, she gaue him poison in his meate, whereof he died in the fourth moneth of his raigne: and they also say, that it was done by the direction and counsell of PETER the hereticall Patriarch of Constantinople. The Emperor CONSTANTINE being thus wickedly made away; the murderesse MARTINA, with such fauour and aide as she procured, made her sonne HERACLIVS Empror, brother to him whom she had poisoned, being of the age of eleuen yeeres; and she took vpon her the gouernment: but this villany could not long continue, for the Nobility detesting so detestable a fact, rose against MARTINA and her son, when he had reigned scarcely two yeeres: in which time I finde not anything written to haue been done of importance; and therefore I cannot diuine ought, sauing that in this yeere the Sarazins took the city of Cæsaria, which they had besieged the space of seuen yeeres, and therein slew seuen thousand soldiers of the Empire. The Senate and Nobility ioyning with CONSTANS, son of the deceased CONSTANTINE, and Nephew of the Emperor HERACLIVS, made him Empror; apprehending MARTINA and her sonne HERACLIVS: and so ended the vnluckie and vnfortunate raigne of those two brothers, which scarcely merit to be accounted amongst the Emperors. When as the mother and sonne were apprehended, the mother had her tongue cut out, and the sonne his nose cut off, and both were exiled into the prouince of Cappadocia in Asia the lesse. Also PIRHRVS the Patriarch which came from banishment out of Africa, and came to intrude himselfe into these counsels, died likewise, as an hereticall Wolfe clad in shepheards rayment; and in his place was chosen PAVL, who in the end proued like to his predecessor. Which befell in the yeere of our Lord six hundred fortie fower.

The Emperor
Constantine
the third, was murdered by his step-mother Martina.

Heraclius succeeded his brother Constantine in the Empire.

Heraclius
and his mother Martina were thorne out of the Empire, he having first his nose cut off, and she her tongue.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND SIXT

Romane Empror.

()

THE making of CONSTANS Empror (whom some call CONSTANTINE) by the Senate of Constantinople (which we may call Romane;) and the death of his vnkle HERACLIVS, of whom we now left writing, was all at one instant: and the great wickednesse vsed by MARTINA in poisoning his father, made the raigne of the sonne more firme and assured. But CONSTANS proued not such an oncas they hoped, and as indeed was needfull for the present estate of the Empire; for he was infected with the Arrian Heresie: and concerning the affaires of the East, he contented himself to make head against MAHOMET'S successors, by placing garrisons in the passages of Cilicia, to keep them from entering into Asia the lesse; and so they remained Lords of those prouinces which they had gotten in the East. Pope THEODORE vnderstanding that PAVL the new Patriarch of Constantinople held Constans by some called Constantine.

held some erroneous opinions of the Christian faith, wrote vnto him certaine louing monitory Letters, perswading him to amendment, and to conforme himselfe to the truth. But when hee perceiued his labour to be in vaine, he proceeded otherwise against him, and depriving him of his dignitie, he commanded him to be banished; but the new Emperor would not permit it, but rather shewed himselfe to be of the same opinion; which made a generall confusion euery where; for the head being sicke, the rest of the members ill execute their office.

In Constantinople and in Græcia, the catholike Christians were much afflicted with the new heriticks, for that the Emperor took their part; and in Asia, they held warres with the Mahometicall Sarazins. In Italy, although there were peace with the Lombards, through the good government of the Exarch THEODORVS, and the care and endeavour of the Pope, yet the diuall after his accustomed manner fowed tares among the good feede; which was, that by the meanes of some of his disciples, he perswaded ROTHARIVS King of the Lombards to leane to the opinion of his ancestors, which was the Arrian heresie; and the more earnest the catholike Christians were in resisting the same, with so much the greater obstinacie he placed in euery citie an Arrian Bishop, where before had been catholike Bishops. Pope MARTIN who succeeded Pope THEODORVS, against the new heresie held by the Emperor and some prelates in the East, assembled a councell of one hundred and fise Bishops; wherein they which held those opinions, were condemned and proclaimed heretikes, and he deprived the said Patriarch and sundry Bishops of their prelaties and dignities; wherewith the Emperor CONSTANS was highly offended, and did that which hereafter shall be declared. On the other side, the Pope by all meanes sought a reformation in the Lombards, which hee could not effect during the life of ROTHARIVS; for he made warre against the Imperialists, after they had liued many yeeres together in peace: which warre was very resolutely begun with great preparation, by ROTHARIVS of his party; and by the Exarch THEODORVS of the other side. The Exarch comming from Rauenna drew his forces to an head in the citie of Bologna; for now the cities of Italy by reason of their long peace and rest, were growne rich and populous; and ROTHARIVS leiued no lesse an Armeie in the citie of Parma; and the one taking his way against the other, they came to ioyne neere the citie of Modena: where (as SIGEBERTVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS doe report) after some encounters and skirmishes, they fought a very cruell battaile, wherein the Romanes were ouerthrowne, and leauen thousand of them slaine; and the Exarch THEODORVS escaped by flight.

ROTHARIVS hauing obtained this victory, came to the coast of Genoa; and assaulted and tooke many Cities, which vntill then he could not doe, and so marched victorious, vntill that THEODORVS the Exarch gathering together those which were scattered, leiued a new Army: wherewith he entertained the enemy, and victualled his frontier Garisons. The Emperor CONSTANS vnderstanding hereof, tooke no care to relieue his Exarch, but being very much offended with Pope MARTIN, he put THEODORVS out of the government of Italy; and in his place sent another called OLIMPIVS (as very an Hereticke as himselfe) giuing him direction, to seeke to bring all the Bishops in Italy to hold of his opinion; and if that he could not bring it to passe, that then he should vse his best meanes to get the Pope into his hands, or to kill him. With which commission and resolution being arriued in Italy, he departed from Rauenna, and tooke his way towards Rome, vnder colour to goe visit the Pope; accompanied with many Souldiers and men of warre; first procuring an agreement and truce with the Lombards. Being come to Rome he sought how to apprehend the Pope, but being vnable to effect the same, he agreed with a desperate bold Souldier to kill him, which tooke no effect.

During the time that these things passed in Italy, the Infidels (MAHOMETVS successors) were growne so mighty, as they now contented not themselves with Egypt, and those pouldices which they held in the East; but preparing a great Fleet in Alexandria in Egypt, they waied the Ile of Rhodes, and took it, and afterwards other Ilands in those Seas; and from thence came spoiling and robbing through all the Leuant Seas, euen to the Ile of Sicilia, wherein they took some towines vpon the coast, and landing their Armeie, there burnt and spoiled the countie in the maine land: whereof when OLIMPIVS the gouernour or Exarch of Italy was aduertised, within whose government Sicilia was contained; comming first to an agreement with the Pope, he took his way towards Naples; whither he had commanded to be brought, the greatest number of men and ships that could be gotten from all parts of Italy: and finding himselfe sufficiently furnished, he went to seeke his enemies, resolute and in very good order: and they

A councell held in the time of Pope Martin.

Warres betweene the Lombards and Imperialists.

The victorie of the Lombards.

Spoile made by the Sarazins.

vnderstanding of his coming, assembled themselves, with resolution to fight with him; which he refused not: And so, when as the two Nauies came within sight one of the other, they set themselves in order, and each Generall animated and encouraged his people, and the fight began with great furie, and was maintained with such resolution, as many thousands of men of the one and other side were slaine. Notwithstanding, in the end the victorie seemed to encline to the Imperialists; yet before they could obtaine it, they had lost many men and ships, that although the Exarch might haue driuen the enemies out of the land, and haue recovered what was lost; yet he was so beaten and distressed, as it seemed not that he had overcome. And (as Historians affirme) he endured so great toyle, and was so tired in the battaile before and after it, as he fell so extremely sicke, that within few daies he died.

The Emperor CONSTANS vnderstanding of this victorie; Being then in great care and suspense, forgetting to amend his leud life, to leane his heretical opinion, and to giue God thanks for this victorie, he grew very proud, resolving againe to procure the destruction of the Pope; and to that end gaue the charge of the government againe to THEODORVS, from whom he had taken the same. In the end he sent THEODORVS into Italy, with a secret charge, to doe that which he afterwards performed, and I will discouer: and for his comfort and companion therein, another aduenturous fellow whose name was PAVLVS PELLARIVS. In this time died ROTHARIVS King of the Lombards; and another called RODOLPHVS succeeded him; who shortly after falling in loue with a great mans wife, and being taken with her, was slaine by her husband; and ARRIOPERTVS succeeded him. All which obscured the peace with the Empire. And the new Exarch THEODORVS comming into Italy, and with him his friend and companion, was very well entertained afterwards in Rome: for from the first time of his being there, the people were well content with his government. Remaining certaine daies in Rome with his people, and concealing his purpose, he went one day to the palace, as though he had gone to visit the Pope; and seising thereon, apprehended him, and deliuered him to his associate PVLL: who presently departed with him towards Rauenna, and speedily took the Sea and went to Constantinople, where the Emperor held him for certaine daies prisoner, and then banished him to Gheriona in Pontus, which was in the confines of the Empire, where he afterwards died, when he had been Bishop of Rome six yeeres. A little before this, died the king of the Lombards ARRIOPERTVS, who (as I said) succeeded RODOLPHVS.

This ARRIOPERTVS left behinde him two sonnes, which but young, the one called PERTHERIVS, and the other GYNDIBERTVS; betweene which (each desiring to be absolute) there grew dissension and discord: and GYNDIBERTVS which was the younger rose with Adrian; the elder brother which ought to haue been King, remaining in Paulia, then the head of that kingdom. When this came to the knowledge of one GRIMOALDVS, a great Captaine of the Lombards, Duke and Gouernour of Beneuent, and other towines; he leauing his son ROMOALDVS with a good garrison therein, came to the citie of Paulia, which he centred by force, and draue out the young King PERTHERIVS, and took such order in all the rest, as the two bretheren were driuen to abandon their countie; and he remained in their place a mightie King.

The Emperor CONSTANS in Constantinople, surmizing that by meanes of the wars which the Lombards made amongst themselves, he comming with any great power might driue them out of Italy; this his desire he resolved to put in execution, and to that effect made his sonne CONSTANS his companion in the Empire; that he might remaine in Constantinople. And lo preparing a great fleet by Sea, and a great Armeie by land, he came into Italy to the citie of Tarentum; where landing his men, he marched therewith to ioyne with the ordinarie companies which THEODORVS commanded: GRIMOALDVS the tyrant King of the Lombards (more like a wise and proud Prince, then one that was any way fearful or a coward) had by that time leiued all the power that he was able to make, both to defend himself and to offend his enemy. After many adventures in this warre, the Emperor went to besiege ROMOALDVS the sonne of GRIMOALDVS in Beneuent, and did put him and the citie to great distress: shewing himselfe very valiant; he published that he came to restore Italy to her former libertie; and that he would againe make Rome the seate of the Empire; alleging that it was greater reason to honour the mother, then the daughter. Whether this were faine, or in earnest, I know not; but I am sure the Kings sonne being besieged, sent to his father for aide, who (as I said) was not careless thereof, but daily increased his forces, that hee might bee able to fight with the Emperor. But he staying longer then ROMOALDVS would (for so was the son called)

The death of the Exarch Olim-pius.

Theodore sent into Italy.

The death of Rotari, king of the Lombards;
whom Rodol-phus succeeded.

Pope Martin apprehended and sent to Constantinople.

Pope Martin
died in exile.

The death of Arriopertus
king of the Lombards.

Grimoaldus made king of the Lombards.

The Emperor
Constans made his sonne Constantine
his companion
in the Empire.

The Emperor Constans in Italy.

he wrote certain pitiful Letters to his father, by one who was husband to her which had nursed him at her breast: whom the father, meeting vpon the way, sent back again to certifie his sonne of what he had seen, and to tell him that he came to visit him. This man, seeking to gette into the City, was apprehended by the Emperors souldiers: and being brought into his presence, and examined, and his reports found conformable to that whereof he was otherwise aduertised, the Emperor being in great fear, resolved not to abide his coming, desiring first to do some notable exploit, whereby he thought to haue taken the City; but it hapned contrary to his expectation: which I haue thought good to relate for an example to others which are seruants and vassals to Kings and Princes; which was thus:

CONSTANS, promising great matters to his Nurse, requested him to go to the wals; and that, calling the besieged Prince, he should aduise and counsell him to giue vp the City, for that his father was not able to relieue him. And heerewithall he threatned the Nurse, that if hee did not so, hee would presently cause him to be slain. The Nurse, seeing that there was no other way left for him to encourage the Besieged, saining a desire to satisfie the Emperor, promised to perform his command. Whereupon the Emperor, the next night following, commanded him to be brought neer to the wall, with a guard which held him fast bound: and hee, coming thither, called aloud to those within, willing them to call ROMOALDVS to him, for that there was a man which much loued him, desired to speak with him. ROMOALDVS, as soon as he was aduertised heereof, came to the wals, and with a loud voice asked who would speak with him. His Nurse, knowing him well by his speech, and hee him also, answered: It is the Nurse which bringeth you an answer from your father, who willet you to be of good cheer for, this day he arriueth at the River Satrica, and within these three daies will bee heer with an infinite Army. I can say no more: for, I am in the enemies hands, who already begin to murder me: I recommend vnto thee my wife and children.

Having said these words, those which were within the City were therewith greatly encouraged: and those without were so much despised, that they presently slue him, by the Emperors commandement: who, not daring to stay any longer (to his great shame and dishonour) raised his siege from before Beneuent, and took his way with his Army towards Naples. GRIMOALDVS, being comm with a very great Army, sent an excellent Captain cald VITOLIA, with the best and most choice men of the Army to pursue the Emperor: and hee, marching a great pace, ouertook him at the passage of a river called Calora. The Emperor, being already passed with the greatest part of his Army, VITOLIA charged his arrieregard: and there began a fierce battell; wherein the Emperors people (for that they could not be seconded by reason of the river) were ouerthrowne, and the most part of them slain: and so the Emperor was driven to retire to Naples both with losse and dishonour.

Being to depart from Naples to Rome, he commanded a Captain of his whose name was SABVRVS, born in Naples, that he with twenty thousand chosen men should stay behind to guard that City and Prouince: who more hardy than wife (the Emperor being gone) with the Army aforesaid drew foer to the Lombards, that the Kings sonne, ROMOALDVS, desiring his father to giue him leaue, came with his forces to fight with him; in such sort, that with equal desire of both the Captains the two Armies joynd, with Ensignes displayed: and, after great slaughter of men of the one and other side, the Lombards obtained the victory, and following the chace slue SABVRVS the Generall, and many of his men. The Emperor with all his troops was solemnly receiued into Rome, as well by VITILIANVS who then was Pope, as by the Citizens and Inhabitants thereof; but he continued there but twelue daies: and when hee had visited the whole City; not as an Emperor and their Lord, but rather like an enemy, hee commanded to be carried out of the City all the best statues of Marble and Metall, of most excellent and curious workmanship, and much gold and siluer, and other rare things: all which being brought aboard his Ships and Gallies, he commanded them presently to depart; and he himself went from Rome to Naples, without making any prouision against the Lombards: by reason whereof, they became mightier than before.

The Emperor came to Naples, purposing to passe ouer into Sicilia: and, being past with much people, he went to the City of Syracusa, now called Sarragossa, hauing (to no purpose) all his Army together in Arms, as though hee had meant to haue done some great exploit; so as men greatly suspected it, and were of sundry opinions. But he did it to no other end, than, vnder colour to repair the harms which he had receiued, with excessive greedinesse to gather the rents and seruices of all the Prouinces of the Empire; and to impose new taxes and tolls in Africa, in

The loyalty of a Nurse.

The victory of the Lombards.

Italy, in the Isles of Sardinia and Sigilia, and in all the rest of his dominions: which as it usually happeneth vnto all Princes which doe so, without iust cause or reason, he grew to be extremely hated through all the Empire; and was afterwards the cause of his death. He remaining thus in the Ile of Sicilia, continually feasting and banquetting, neuer leaving to require loanes and imposts, and to lay new impositions vpon the people, reasoning and pilling them through out all the land, and in Africa and Italy in like manner; and being hated of all men, the Sicilians adu ventured vpon a day (he being in a bath) to kill him; by the direction and commandement of a Captain of his called MICELENTIUS, or as others write, MEZENCIVS and MAORNICIVS, a bold audacious fellow and well beloued, more for the constitution of his body (which was very comely, tall, and well proportioned) then for his valour, or no billicie.

This happened in the leauen and twentieth yeere of his reignes, and in the yeere of our Lord, six hundred sixtie and eight. CONSTANS left behinde him three sons; CONSTANTINE who remained in Constantinople, for CESAR and gouernor, HERACLIUS and TIBERTVS. About this time in Italy dyed King, GRIMOALDVS, whom we but now said to haue made warres with the Emperor; and he being dead, thither came out of France, whither before hee had fled for refuge, PARTHARIS, of PARTHERITYS King ARRIOPERTVS sonne, whom GRIMOALDVS had throwne out of Paule, and deprived of his estate, as we haue already related.

Constans slain by the Sicilians in a bath.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND SEVENTH ROMANE EMPEVOVR.

(*)

HE Emperour CONSTANS (as I haue sayd) was slaine in Sarragossa in Sicilia: and as soone as he was dead, MEZENCIVS who caused him to be slaine, or (after some) whom he himselfe slue, with the fauour of those which assisted him in that action, tooke vpon him the title of Emperour, and for the present, all the rest of the people of Sicilia approued and confirmed the same, more for the desire of innovations which are euer pleasing, then for any good liking they had to his person. Whereof the Emperors son CONSTANTINE was soone aduertised, who then remained in Constantinople, and held the name of Emperour, and had done so euer since his father departed thence; and was therewith so much perplexed & in such feare, considering the strangenesse of the accident, as he for the time not Mezenicus made Emperour.

only had not the heart to doe ought in reuenge of his fathers death, but was also in feare to haue lost the name of Emperour, which he then held; and therewithall scarcely durst maintaine what he possessed in Grecia. The like in a manner befell THEODORE the Exarch or gouernor of Italy: for notwithstanding that hee had a good troope of souldiers, well trained, and of good experience; yet he durst not seeme to bee greatly grieved for the death of his sovereigne LORDS; neither to attempt ought against MEZENCIVS. The cause was for that all

Hh 2

all the people greatly reioyced at his death; for he was generally hated for his couctousnesse.

In this confusion all things passed for some daies; all men expecting the successe of the new tyrant; not daring to declare themselves either for the one or other partie; for he had with him many good men of warre. But as his entrie was by treason, and grounded vpon an ill foundation; and in him were neither the vertues nor merites requisite in an Emperor, the Captaines and men of warre began to murmur as what hee had done, and to wish his death; which was speedily published, and it gaue all men occasion to take heart, and to seeke reuenge for the treason and murder committed vpon the person of the dead Emperor CONSTANS: The first were the Italians; and so THEODOR the Exarch began to stirre, leuying and mustering forces, therewith to passe into Stilia, as he did; and the companies which were in the prouinces of Africa did the like; whereto the peace with the Sarazins and other nations, was a great helpe, for it seemeth, that CONSTANS being in Stilia so accompanied with men of warre, they durst not make warre against him. These great forces comming into Stilia against M. ZENCIVS, and he being slenderly supported by his owne people, was in short space taken and slaine; and many of his friends which were with him, were taken and caried prisoners to Constantinople, to the young Emperor CONSTANTINE; who presently after this victorie began euery where to be obeyed and held for Emperor, and tooke vpon him the resolution and courage of a Prince. Some also write that he went into Stilia. And notwithstanding that afterwards hee proueda good and virtuous Emperour; yet in his beginning he committed a most cruell fact, which was; to put to death his younger brothers, thereby to liue assured that they should not seeke to deprime him of the Empire; and some also write that he caused the toppes of their noses to be cut off: but the truth is, that he commanded them to be slaine; and so he became Lord of the whole Empire, without any difficultie.

But the Sarazins, Mahometits, and PHADALAS of *SOPHIA*s their King, seeing this combustion, and the fit oportunitie to invade the Empire, by reason of the before recited accidents in Stilia, and also for that it seemed that CONSTANTINE was not yet firmly settled in his throne; they as closely and covertly as might berigged a mightie naue at Alexandria in Egypt; with a resolution to invade Thracia, and Gracia; and if the dissenion happened which they expected, then to take those prouinces: but afterwards as matters proued better in Constantinople, then was hoped for; they altered their determination, and invaded Stilia, which was full of people of men of war: and they came with such force and power, as they entered the citie of Sarragossa, and some other towne; where robbing and spoiling, they continued certaine daies; and it seeming to them an hard matter to hold those places, carrying away with them an infinite number of prisoners and great richesse of gold, siluer, and other iewels; they returned to Alexandria.

In the Constantinopolitane Commentaries I find this warre written more at large; where it is affirmed, that they first made warre on the borders of Thracia and Gracia, the space of many daies, and tooke many places; and that in the end being repelled thence by the Emperor, they went to Stilia, so writeth ZONARAS: but after the first manner, writeth PAVLVS DIACONVS, an Author neere to that time, and afterwards others of lesse antiquity. I sometimes set downe the sundry opinions of Authors (although it shall not beneedfull alwayes to doe so;) to satisfie the curious Readers, that they may not condemne my History, finding therein any thing contrary or differing from that they shall read in some others. But although that I doe not alwayes thus, let them rest assured that I follow an Author, which writeth it as I relate it; for in the diuersity of opinions, I follow that which seemeth to be most true and probable, weighing all coniectures: and when I cannot or desire not to doe so, I briefly set downe both opinions; as now I haue done. That which to mee seemeth to be the most certaine, is, that they first invaded Stilia; and did as I haue related; and afterwards raising greater power through their successe and victory, there ensued that which these Authours set downe, which is, that they a long time made warre on the Coast of Gracia, and the confines of Constantinople; where they tooke many places; out of which by the diligence and valour of the Emperour, they were driuen by force: this warre lasted full sixe yeeres.

All authors affirme that CONSTANTINE herewith not contented, sent a great Armie by land against the Mahometicke Sarazins, into the prouince of Soria, which is the antient Syria, which fought with all their whole power, and the Christians obtained the victorie; and of the infidels were slaine thirty thousand. And they were brought to such distresse, as their

Prince

Prince or King, whose name was MAVIAS, sent to intreate the Emperor for peace, offering very profitable and honourable conditions; and thereby bound himselfe to pay yeerely to the Emperour, a great number of pounds or markes of golde; and for the present, to releafe many thousand prisoners, which he held captiues: whereupon the peace was graunted and confirmed by CONSTANTINE, to ease himselfe of that trouble; that he might apply himselfe to the reformation of some other matters concerning the Christian faith, for hee was concerning what hee ought to beleue, a very good Christian. This was concluded in the tenth yeere of his reigne.

But there presently ensued another trouble and a warre equal to the former; which was, that a certaine people of the prouinces of Scythia (the fontaine of many others before mentioned) called Bulgarians; not those which I heretofore spake of, but others, of the same name and nation, came downe into Thracia, being in number aboute one hundred thousand persons; and they began to make warre in the Empire, with a desire to take some good countree, wherein they might dwell and inhabit, as many other nations before them had done. For the Northern countries are barren and ill inhabited; yet by reason of the cold, men multiplie and encrease in them exceedingly; as we daily see by experience, and PAVLVS DIACONVS noteth the same. The furie wherewith this people came, was so great, as they did infinite harme; and they made themselves Lords of some especiall countries; which being made knowne to the Emperour (in whom there wanted not the courage of a valiant Prince) he raised his forces, and in his owne person went to defend his subiects; and the war for some daies was very sharpe and cruell; and the Bulgarians sought to fight with him in the plaine field: which he (presuming much of his people) as a valiant Prince, refused not; so as they fought with banners displayed, which battaile was exceeding terrible. But it seemeth that through some his ill direction, or the great force of his aduersaries, the Emperour was ouerthrowne, and many of his people slaine, and he himselfe was constrained to vse the common remedy of those which are overcome, which is to flee; by that meane to escape and to saue his life. And as in the battaile he had done what he was able; so afterwards gathering his people together, he retired with great good order and discretion. But it pleased God that at what time, as it seemed, and when it was feared, that the Bulgarians would haue brought the Empire into great distresse, merely of their owne accord they sent to the Emperour, and suing for peace desired him to giue them some place where they might inhabit, and they would become his friends, yea and his subiects; whereto he gaue care (considering his present estate,) with a very good will. And so treating of the matter for a certaine space, the prouince of the lower Asia was assigned vnto them, and was (after their name) called Bulgaria; wherein they haue quietly and peaceably inhabited, vntill that of late yeeres they were subdued and conquered by the Turkes; a new scourge and plague to the Christians, after MAHOMET.

While these things passed in Stilia, in Gracia, and in Asia, which was during the space of tenne yeeres; in Italy although there were peace betweene the Lombards and Italians, yet there failed not other miseries and persecutions: And there happened so great and so many tempests and alterations in the air, as it seemed that the foure elements had conspired against mankind: for the windes were so furious and violent, as they ouerthrew many buildings, and rent vp many trees by the rootes: and the raine likewise was so great and tempestuous, as it destroyed all their tillage, as well for bread-corne as all other kind of heabes and feedes: And therewith fell an infinite number of thunderbolts, and fires from heauen, which slew a great number of people: and the earth with these so great alterations became so corrupt, as there ensued many contagious diseases. Wherefore the people repenting them of their sinnes, made their prayers and supplications to God, that it would please him to cease these so great calamities: but yet the reliques thereof remained a long time after.

At this time died Pope DEODATVS, and by reason of his death the seate was voided foure months: making a new election in Rome, DOCVS onely so called, was chosen Pope, who was held for a Saint, and liued two yeeres and a halfe (as satir PLATINA). In his time THEODOR Archbishop of Ravenna wholly submitted himselfe to the Church of Rome, whereas some of his predecessors, with the fauor of the Exarchs or gouernors had before him denied the same. Others (amongst which is BLONDVS) affirme, that this hapned in the time of his successor AOCTHVS, wholued two yeers & a half: in which time, although but short, he treated with the Emperour concerning a general council to be held, principally against the heresy of the Monothelites, which was disperised ouer all the Churches of Gracia, which confounded the two

Hh 3

Mexenius flaine.

Constantine
made Emperour.

The Sarazins
made warre in Stilia.

Mauis King of the Sarazins
fought with the Emperour Constantine for peace.

Warre betweene the Em-perour and the Bulgarians.

A battaile betweene Constantine and
the Bulgarians, wherein he was ouerthrowne
and put to flight.

The Bulgarians
sue to Constantine for peace.

The prouince of Serua giuen to the Bulga-rians, and therefore called Bulgaria.

Wonderfull alteration of the elements in Italy.

A Council held in Constantinople.

Victory of the Christians against the Saraz-ins.

two Natures in CHRIST, Humane and Diuine; affirming that in him was but a will only. And so for this time the Greeke Church remained vnited with the Latine: but it pleased G.O.D afterwards to suffer it to come (as wee now see) into the power and subiection of Infidels.

In this Councell were many other matters handled concerning the reformation of the Church and the Ceremonies thereof; and this was the sixt of those Councels vvchich for their excellencies were so renowned and famous, and among the rest called Vniuersall. Great was the reputation which the Emperour CONSTANTINE purchased to haue celebrated this Councell in his time, and to haue finished so holy a worke. Within few dayes after, Pope AGATHVS dyed, by whose authority it had been called; and LABO the second borne in Sicillie succeeded him, who was worthily aduanced, being learned, eloquent and of a holy life: he ordained the Paxe to be giuen in the Church, which is obserued in the Church of Rome vntill this day. He being dead, BENEDICT the second succeeded him: with whose election the Emperour was so well pleased, as after he had confirmed the same, he renounced the right and custome which the Emperours held to confirme the election of Popes; to the end that from thenceforth, as soone as by the Clergy they were chosen, they might vse their authority, without any need of the Emperours confirmation, or of their Exarchs or gouernours, as of long time they had vsed.

CONSTANTINE living in this prosperity, had peace with the Sarazins; and the Provinces of Africa, and the Ile of Sicilia were in quiet, and so was Italie: for the Lombards being at variance and dissension among themselves, very firmly maintained the peace with the Empire: and the estates of Gracia with the territorie of Constantinople, were all in very quiet subiection. But this good forme and manner of gouernment, was disturbed by the Emperours death, which shortly after ensued, when hee had reigned seuentene yeeres, and had protected and defended the Empire which he inherited, with iustice and equity, reforming exours in the Christian Religion, as aforelaid. And thus it was, that falling grieuously sicke in Constantinople, and the incurableness of his disease being in short space bruited abroad through the World (as vually it happeneth) in some parts his death vvvas published before that hee was dead: vvhereof GIZET King of the Sarazins, vvhom they called AMVRA-RES, being aduertised, and beleeuing the same to bee true, with all haste leuied a very great Army both by Sea and Land, which hee forth-with sent from Egypt, and conquered all the coast of Africa to Carthage: wherein, by reason of the Emperours death, hee found no sufficient resistance.

Warres made by Gizet King of the Sarazins.

The death of the Emperour Con-
stantine.

The warres of Africa proceeding in this manner, the Emperour dyed before hee was able to provide for the same, as hee would haue done if hee had liued. Hee departed out of this World in theyere of our Lord, fixe hundred fourescore and fixe; his wifes name was ANASTASIA, by whom hee had lawfull Heires; of which IVSTINIAN and IVSTIN succeeded him in the Empire; as presently shall be declared.

THE

THE LIFE OF IVSTINIAN, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND EIGHT ROMANE EMPEVOVR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

His Emperour attained to the dignitie being very young: in the beginning of his raigne he made warres against the Turkes, and constrained them to sue for peace: which for that he maintained not, it so hapned that losing a battaile in the second war, he was driven to sue for peace and returning home with disgrace was depose from his Empire, hauing his nose and his eares cut off: and in his place LEONCIUS, a captaine of his was made Emperour. Afterwards another of his Captaines, whose name was TIBERIUS, rose against LEONCIUS, and depose him from the Empire, and condemned him to perpetual imprisonment, with a determination to haue put him to death with greater torment. Which TIBERIUS, was likewise driven out of the Empire by IULIANIAN who with the aide of his father in law the King of Buanaria, returned and recovered the Empire: vvherein vvhen hee had but little good success, he was compelled to returne home, to his great shame and dishonour. And beginning to stand in feare of one PHILIPPICUS, vvhom TIBERIUS had banished, and seeking meanes to kill him; PHILIPPICUS rebelled against him, and being made Emperour came to a battaile, vvherein both Iulianian and his sonne TIBERIUS miserably ended their tragedies, represented in this scene of the world vvith such varietie of fortune, as neuer any other Emperour was so much tossed and turmoiled as hee was: and hee gouerned the Empire at both times fixe and twentie yeeres.

It is a rule in Rhetorike, obserued by great Orators, in the beginning of what they purpose to treat of, whether in writing, or pleading, to procure the attention, and willing audience of their hearers, or readers: which is principally done when they extol or magnifie that which they haue to say; letting them know that it shall be very pleasing or profitable: for vvith a desire to know some great matter, or moued vvith the greedines of profit, or allured vvith the hope of the delight and contentment which is promised; they attentively heare, or willingly reade what is proposed: yet the author must vvayles be carefull to performe what he doth promise, and that in his speech he come not short of the expectation held of him.

Comming now to write the life of the Emperour IVSTINIAN the second, I come to the Emperour CONSTANTINE the fourth, vvith an imagination to bee found true in vvhat I shall say, and that he vvich shall reade the same shall not be deceived, I entreate the reader to be attentive. And although I tell not vvonders and marvellous things happened in the heavens and on earth: yet truly he vvich vvith attention shall reade the historie of fifteen yeeres succeeding, shall see a pleasant and strange Comedie, vvich Fortune, or (to say better) the world represented in those times. The principall and chiefe parts vvhereof, we may say, vvcre acted in the person

H h 4

A rule in Rhetorike.

B 36

Iustinian his warre.

person of I V S T I N I A N ; who sometimes as an Emperour, and sometimes as a private man, came vpon the stage : I may very well say so, seeing that hee was twice chosen and obeyed, and twice also vterly depriued and bereaued of his Empire : so as it seemed hee went in and out, making a shew vpon the theatre of the world : and with him other two or three Emperors or tyrants, which were in his time : as L E O N C I V S , T I B E R I V S , and P H I L I P P I C V S : which like actors in a tragedy did nothing but put off and on their masks : for sometimes you should see them come in with a nose, and sometimes noselesse : sometimes by force, and sometime by fauour, the one supplanting the other. Finally, I say that in my opinion, this historie seemeth to be like an old viues tale, or a fained fable, only to depaint some strange adventures, or great misfortunes, it being for certaine a most true history : from which may be drawne a notable example of the inconstancie and vncertainty of the estate of this life, and lightly to account thereof ; and to the end that men leaue to toyle and to take such care for the obtaining of riches and soueraignie ; and that they grow not proud when they haue attained the same, neither be greened or dismaied when they lose them, but alwaies account them for doubtfull, without any firme continuance : considering what perill and danger they vndergoe in getting them, and how little assurance they haue to enioy them.

Comming now to our historie, it passed thus : After the death of the Emperour C O N S T A N T I N E , as he held the Empire in good order and government in his life time ; so his sonne I V S T I N I A N after his decess found no difficultie, but was gladly received and obeyed of all men ; and notwithstanding that he was very young, being but sixteene yeeres old, yet he began peaceably to gouerne his Empire ; saying that in Africa in the time of his fathers sickness, and after his decess, the Sarazins became Lords of a great part thereof.

In the beginning of his raigne hee commanded great forces to be leuied, for the defence and recouerie of Africa ; and as to a new Prince, so many and so good men of warre made reparaire vnto him, as the Sarazins stood in feare of him. Wherefore V A L D V L A their King and Captaine which succeeded G I Z T B (the authois differ much in these names) sent to him for peace : and for as much as he offered very large conditions, I V S T I N I A N granted the same for ten yeeres. The first of which was, that he should restore all that which hee held in Africa ; which was the Citie of Carthage, and all that which lieth betwene that and Egypt, neere vnto the Sea side, besides other contributions of money and horses, which were to be paid vnto him yeerely : and this peace being confirmed, there was generally peace through the whole Empire, without any suspicion of warre : yea and some Historians report, that there was an vniuersall peace through all the world : so as neither the Kings of France, Spain, nor England, neither the Princes of Germany, or the Kings of the Bavarians, of Slauonia, of Misia, of Bulgaria, neither the Hunnes which inhabited Hungarie, among themselves had any warres, or were at contention with any others : The like was in the estates and Prouinces of the East. Which peace and concord I V S T I N I A N through pride and euill counsell disturbed, by warring contrary to his promise and agreement made with the Sarazins which hee began very resolutely with great preparation : and after that he had sent L E O N C I V S for his Generall, he went in person and did much harme, and recovered some Countries in Soria, and entred Mesopotamia, where the Sarazins reinforcing their troupes, and repairing their Armies, gathered together an infinite number of them, and came to giue him bataille : which the yong Emperour refused not ; but yet after great slaughter of his people he was overcome, and driuen to flic, and to abandon what he had recovered, being brought to such extremitie, as he was forced to sue and entreat them for peace : which after many treaties and demands was concluded, & the Sarazins for that time remained in quiet. In this time died T H E O D O R Exarch or Gouvernor of Italie, and in his place was sent another prime man called I O H N , and Pope C O N O N afore sayd also dyed : after much controuersie about the election of a new Bishop, for an Archbishop called T H E O D O R E , and another called P A S C A L , sought to haue been Popes, and with money had bribed the Exarch I O H N , to assit them with his voice and fauour ; the matter being likely to haue come to blowes, they all agreed to chuse one whose name was S E R G I V S , borne in the Citie of Antioch in Syria, who was chosen and obeyed for Pope : yet afterwards there were some tumults about that matter, which concern me not.

In those daies died C A M P E R T V S , who then was King of the Lombards, and there succeeded a sonne of his called L I M B E R T V S , of whom we haue not made any mention, for that they liued in peace with the Italians and the Emperours subiects. The Emperour I V S T I N I A N being returned out of Asia or Constantinople, with great losse and disgrace for the warre aforesaid

Iustinian contrary to his league, made warres against the Sarazins, and what ensued.

said ; repairing his losses received, and making new provision with little discretion and worse direction, resolved to begin the war againe : wherein he had no better successe then in the former : And this was against the Bulgarians which inhabited Misia, with whom his father had made a perpetuall league of amity ; and I V S T I N I A N (as a light inconstant young man) breaking the conditions, entred their Country with a great Armie, with such power and fury, as neither the Bulgarians, nor their King durst take the field to giue him bataille, but retired, and abandoning many places, fortified themselves in the strongest ; which so much emboldened the Emperour ; as he prosecuted this warre with lesse heede and circumspection, then so important a case required : which when the Bulgarians perceived, recovering courage, they assembled a multitude of men : & cutting off all victuals from the Emperours Army, & stopping the passages of certaine riuers, they brought him to such extremitie, that although he would retire, he found so great danger and difficultie therein, as he was compelled to sue to them for peace, against whom, of his owne minde, voluntarily and without reason he had made warre ; which they granted, vpon condition that he should restore to them all the prisoner, and the Townes and other things which hee had taken : And that hee should personally sweare, well and faithfully to maintaine the same, as well by himselfe as by all his Princes and chiefe Captaines.

I V S T I N I A N returning from this journey, with no more honour then from the first, caused a new Councell to be assembled in Constantinople, to disannull that which in the former had been determined, concerning certaine points in religion : The Pope being herewith discontented, sent his Legates to hold his place there, and to see what the Councell would treat of : wherein by the Emperours authoritie there were some things handled against the resolution of the last Councell : whereof the Pope being aduertised, he reproved and disannulled what was there concluded ; and confirmed the last Councell, and sent commandement to dissolve the present. Wherewith the Emperour was so highly displeased, as hee presently sent Z A C H A R I A S the Commander General of all his men of warre, to Rome, with commission to apprehend the Pope, and to send him to Constantinople.

Z A C H A R I E being arrived in Italy about this exploit, notwithstanding that he dissembled the matter, yet was it soone discouered, and S E R G I V S had so wonne the hearts of the people, that all the companies which lay in Ravenna, and the marches thereof, and in other parts of Italie, came with all speede to Rome, with intent to haue slaine Z A C H A R I E , and to haue released the Pope, whom Z A C H A R I E had already seized on. When Z A C H A R I E vnderstood with what furie these men of warre came against him, despairing of any other remedie, he yielded himselfe to the Popes mercie, whom he then held prisoner : And the Pope pardoning the offence, protected him, and hid him in his Palace ; then sitting in his Throne, holding a great state, he attended the comming of the Armie which came from Ravenna, together with the Roman people : who very earnestly desiring him to deliuer Z A C H A R I E into their hands, he made an Oration vnto them, perswading them to moderate their displeasure, seeing that he had pardoned the offence : whereto they all consented, and Z A C H A R I E , being brought into his presence, had leaue to depart, although with much shame and disgrace. And the Pope so cunningly handled the matter, that he brought the Emperour into such hatred, and made him so odious to the people, as their whole studie was how to depose him from the Empire : and as they were all willing thereto, the effect easily ensued.

I V S T I N I A N having represented (as I said) the first act of the Tragedie, a great Captaine called L E O N C I V S before mentioned, whom he had of long time held prisoner, resolved to rebell against him : and having secretly conferred of the matter with G A L L I C A N V S the Patriarch of Constantinople, and with his other friends ; vpon a day hee suddenly came from his house, accompanied with many armed-men ; and gathering men together against the Emperour, he went to the Prisons, and set all the prisoners at libertie ; and the people very willingly accompanying him, he went to the Emperours palace, where he easily apprehended him : And proclaiming himselfe Emperour, depriued the other of his Empire ; and he was crowned with great ioy of the people, which euer delighteth in nouelties, but chiefly with the change of Princes, and great Magistrates ; for the present estate doth neuer please them, they euer commend that which is past, and still desire a new.

L E O N C I V S was crowned, and I V S T I N I A N had his eares and his nose cut off, and some say his tongue also, to make him seeme vgly and the more to be abhorred ; and having brought him to this estate, he banished him for euer, to the Citie of Cherson in Pontus, the further-said

Warre made by Constantine
against the Bulgarians.Constantine sued to the Bulgarians for peace.The Pope began to contend with
the Emperour.
Pope Sergius dissolved the Councell assembled by the Em-perour, Constantine.Leoncius rebelled against the Emperour.Leoncius made Emperour.

thermost bounds of the Empire. Which befell him in the tenth year of his reign; and in the yeere of our Lord G O D 696, yet some say more; where let vs leave him for some space, whilst that L E O N C I V S may in the meane time act his part of the Tragedy which we promised.

The great hatred which the people bare against the Emperour I V S T I N I A N, was the chiefe occasion that moued the Tyrant L E O N C I V S to rebell and take vpon him the name and state of Emperour: for I V S T I N I A N was brought into such hatred with the people, that they would haue accepted of any man that had dared to attempt to haue made himselfe Emperour; and much sooner of L E O N C I V S, who was a vallant and expert man of warre, and had held great charges and offices. In the beginning all things succeeded according to his desire; for I V S T I N I A N had heighth the heart nor meanes, during his banishment, to restore himselfe; neither was there found any resistance or contradiction in any other man in the Empire: and so L E O N C I V S began to enioy his Empire in peace. But the Sarazins or Agarenes and H A D I M I L E C H their King, who already had a resolution to subuert and wholly to ruine the Empire, seeing the dissension therein, and not holding the state of L E O N C I V S firme, with a great and mightie Armie from Egypt (as at other times they had done) they intailed the Prouinces of Africa, and took many Cities and strong holds therein: against whom L E O N C I V S, with no small feare and care, sent a singular Capitaine called I O H N, but he gaue him no such Army as he might be able to giue his enemies battaile; by reason whereof, he was constrained by policie and stratagems, to maintain the warres; so as he defended the Countrey for some time, daily soliciting the Emperour, to send him such supple of souldiers, as therewith he might be able to fight with them: and seeing that neither by Letters nor messengers, he could obtaine his suite, vpon a time when he thought his absence might be least prejudiciall; leaving his Army in the best order he could, and a very good Capitaine called T I B E R I V S A S S I M A R V S for commander in his place; he tooke his way towards Constantinople, to conferre with L E O N C I V S about the sending of some better supple for the wates of Africa, and coming suddenly thither, he found not that promise which he expected and was needfull, and therefore was driuen to stay longer then was expedient, for the Emperour busying himselfe about other matters of small moment, tooke least care for those things which were of greatest importance.

The Army in Africa seeing his long absence, began to murmur against their Capitaine, for so leaving them; and likewise against the Emperour L E O N C I V S: and from murmuring in speeches, they became so audacious, as to perswade T I B E R I V S A S S I M A R V S, (who was left for their commander, to make himselfe Emperour; and he was presently created and obeyed by the whole Armie. And as ambition and desire to command is a thing which chiefly inflameth the hearts of men; so T I B E R I V S to his owne ruine, accepted that which they offered him; as hereafter this Historie shall make manifest. But as he was neither carelesse nor a coward, so he speedily, when he had taken vpon him the title of Emperour, resolute to get the possession and gouernement thereof; and preparing with the greatest haste that might be to take the Emperour L E O N C I V S vnprovided, he departed from Africa, abandoning the same to the Infidels, which was the cause that afterwards it was wholly lost: and he with a very good fleet brought his people to the coast of Greece, where, with the aid and fauour of his friends and kined which were on Land, he took harbor, and came to Constantinople, wherein L E O N C I V S had fortified himself, thinking to defend the same: whereupon they came to blowes, without any just cause of either side; for, hee which came to deprime the Tyrant, did it to the end to bee so himself: but in the end he prevailed, and T I B E R I V S entred by force, and became Lord both of the City and of L E O N C I V S, although not without much trouble, and slaughter of many men. And vpon L E O N C I V S he commanded the same punishment to bee inflicted which he had giuen to I V S T I N I A N, which was, To haue his nose and ears cut off; and to be committed to perpetuall imprisonment; with an intent to haue shewed him greater cruelty; L E O N C I V S hauing reigned three yeeres only: which was about the yeere of our Lord six hundred ninety and nine. After this manner L E O N C I V S left the Theatre, and T I B E R I V S played his part, during the time that L E O N C I V S was in prison, and I V S T I N I A N banished; and vntill such time as I V S T I N I A N returned to the stage, which was as soone as T I B E R I V S had acted his part.

In such manner as I haue declared, T I B E R I V S tyrannized the Empire, and as it may be conjectured by Histories, had continued long, if he could haue bene contented, and not haue attempted attempted more than was fit for him to haue done; so as he himself wrought his owne confusion. The first thing he did after that he was Lord and absolute, was, To command many of L E O N C I V S his friends to bee either slain or depouled of their goods; as Fauorites of a Tyrant. And truly he had reason on his side, if he had had authority to haue inflicted such punishment, and had not himself been guilty of the same crime, and been a Traitor and a Tyrant to him to whom he had sworn fidelity, as to his Emperour; and also to the Commander who left him in his place; punishing the treason wherein he himself had been a partaker, and had approved the same. And this his holy zeal extended it self so farre, that a great familiar friend of his whose name was P H I L I P P I C V S, and who had greatly aided him in his enterprize, and to bring him to that estate, only for saying that vpon a night in his sleep he dreamt that an Eagle alighted vpon his head (imagining that to prognosticate him to be an Emperour) he was by his commandement apprehended and banished into an Iland, where hee could haue no conference or society with any body; notwithstanding that hee was a Noble Gentleman, and of high parentage: from whence he afterwards sent him to the City of Chersona, whither the depouled Emperour I V S T I N I A N was also banished. We will tell you hereafter what hapned to this P H I L I P P I C V S: for, he was one of the Actors in this Comedie.

T I B E R I V S, hauing executed these his cruelties, sent his brother H E R A C L I V S with an Armie to aid the Armenians, who in antient time had been subject to the Empire, and now rebelled against the Infidels; where he won a great battell, and slue a great number of them: but it seemeth that he did not long enjoy the victory; for, the Infidels in proceesse of time prevailed, and their Empire greatly encreased. In Italie also there fell discord and dissension between the Lombards and Italians, who had liued together a long time in peace. The cause whereof was, for that T I B E R I V S, through the death or absence of I O H N the Exarch about named, sent into Italie for Exarch or Gouernor, a Chamberlain of his called T H E O P H I L A T V S; where with all Italie was much grieved: for, the greatest part thereof now pretended to bee subject to the Pope; or at least hated the gouernment and Empire of the Greeks. T H E O P H I L A T V S came not to Rauenma as his Predecessors vsed to doo, but landed in Sicilia, from thence to come to Rome: which when it was published, all the companies which lay in Rauenma, and in other places, came to Rome, attending his coming; rather as an enemy, than as their Generall: and so being arriued, if I O H N which at that time was Pope had not protected him, hee had been slain. But through his fauour he had liberty to depart and go to Rauenma, being out of hope to do what he had projected; for, in Rome they would not obey him. Whereupon he procured the Lombards to make war against the Romans, or at least against those Cities which the Romans held neere to Rome; principally Beneuent: whereof was Duke and Gouernor a great man called S I S Y L P H V S, who was therewith much annoyed; but the Pope repaired all his losses with his riches and treasure; and, buying peace, the estate of Italie recovered rest and quiet. But our Lord would not permit T I B E R I V S to rest in peace: for, waxing jealous of the Emperour I V S T I N I A N, which carelesse and noselesse liued an exile in Chersona, or, as some say, understanding that I V S T I N I A N intended to procure aid to recover the Empire, whereof hee was dispossest by the Emperour L E O N C I V S, hee began to practise his death; and to that effect sent some to deal with the Inhabitants of that City.

I V S T I N I A N being aduertised hereof, and standing in great feare of his life, in the best manner he could, took shipping; and sailing ouer the Sea called Euxinum or Ponticum, landed in Europe, and came to the King of the Bauarians, who was a very mighty Prince; by whom he was not only well received, but was also married to his sister or daughter. And he appointed him an house and estate, promising him all aide and fauour to restore him; so as there began to be a great alteration throughout all the Empire, seeing that I V S T I N I A N was now to returne to play his part vpon the Theatre of this world. T I B E R I V S being aduertised hereof, tooke it to heart (as indeede he had reason) and imagining that he should preuaile little by force, he practised to see whether money would take effect, which commonly can doe more then cyther sword or lance; and to that effect dealt with C A Y A N V S (for as I said so the Bauarians called their King) to deliuer I V S T I N I A N into his hands; for whom he would giue him a great sum of money. And this couetous and inconstant King, greedy thereof, agreed with him vpon the summe, and promised to accomplish his desire: and being ready to haue put it in execution, by chance I V S T I N I A N had intelligence thereof; and so alone pursued by him which was either his father in law, or his brother in law, he escaped by flight. About one yeer after that hee had long wandered, he went to the King of Bulgaria, whose name was T H E B E L L I V S; who pitying invade Africa.

The Sarazins

Abimarus created Emper-
our.

The issue of Africa.

Leoncius deposed by Tiberius.

Leoncius had his nose & ears cut off.

Philippicus banished for a dream.

Theophilatus
Exarch of Italy.

Tiberius
sought to put Iustinian to death.

Iustinian fled to the King of the Bauarians, with whom he made alliance.

Tiberius practised with the King of the Bauarians to deli-uer Iustinian into his hands
for money.

Iustinian saved by the King of the Bulgarian,

by whose aide he returned to Constantinople,
and put Leonicus and Tiberius to death.

Iustinian made Tiberius his brother to be hanged.

Iustinian made the Patriarch of Constantinople
his eyes to be put out.

Iustinian returned to his Empire.

pitieyng his calamitie, gaue him great entertainment; and in short space made so great prouision of men and armes, as he took his way with him towards Constantinople, where were many which desired his returne, for the hatred they bare to TIBERIVS. To be briefe, in short time and with little difficultie, although with some effusion of blood, he came to the Imperiall citie, and entering it by force TIBERIVS fled: but being afterwards overtaken and brought backe into his power, he committed him to that prison wherein LEONICVS was, whom hee had deposed and cut off his nose and his eares: and making them both to be first carried through all the publike streetes of the citie, he caused them openly to be slaine, after that TIBERIVS had raigned seauen yeeres. Such are the rewards which the world giueth to those, who to beare sway and to commaund, forget God. And so ended these two mightie Emperors, or more properly, proud tyrants. And IVSTINIAN, not content to execute his wrath vpon those two alone, caused TIBERIVS brother to be hanged; and many of the friends to both of them, to be either spoiled or slaine: the Patriarch GALLICANVS, who conspired with LEONICVS against him, had his eyes plucked out. And they further report of him, that as often as hee would haue wiped his nose (if he had had it) he caused some of those which had been followers of his enemy LEONICVS to be slaine. And so the banished Emperor IVSTINIAN recovered his throne and Empire; and returned againe to the theatre, to act the rest of his tragedie, which was nine yeeres after that hee had been cast out of it, in the yeere of our Saviour IESVS CHRIST 706.

Presently after that IVSTINIAN saw himself restored and settled in his Empire, hauing executed such cruelties, as the like had seldome bin heard of, vpon those he supposed had offended him, he sent great and rich presents to TREBELLIVS King of Bulgaria, who had holpen him to recouer his Empire, with a very solemne and pleasing ambassage: but as it shall hereafter appeare, he continued but a while so gratefull. He also sent for his wife THEODORA, daughter of CAYANVS King of the Bauarians, from whose Court he fled, who lived in a certaine place absent from her father: for as some write, she aduertised her husband of the treason which her father pretended against him. And she being come, he made her to be honoured as Empresse and Augusta: and his young sonne whom he had by her in the time of his exile, he caused to be chosen and called Emperor. Other matters concerning his government and execution of justice, were corrupt and out of order: for as the Princes were wicked, so were the subiects; for such as the head, such are the members: so that so farre as I can coniecture, these were the most miserable and lamentable times, that euer the Christian Common-wealth endured since CHRIST was borne; GOD permitting it for a punishment of the wicked, wherewith the world did then abound; and for the greater reward of those which suffered amongst them: for besides the wars & troubles of the tyrannizing Emperors, there was so little faith and feare of God, that the Church lost then all the prouinces of Africa, wherein, in steede of Christ perfect God and man, MAHOMET is adored and worshipt vnto this day, without recouery. Which to relate in such manner as it passed, I neither haue time, neither find I it distinctly written: but that after that TIBERIVS went thence with the name of Emperor, and deposed LEONICVS from the Empire; the Sarazins seeing the countrie abandoned, came out of Egypt, Arabia, and other Prouinces of the East, and made a conquest thereof; finding so small resistance, that within the space of foure yeeres they became Lords of all the Countreies, from Egypt, vnto the Prouince of Mauritania Tingitania, and to that which now is Cenia, Tangiar and Arzila: wherfore we call those of Mauritania, Mauri or Moorcs and Arabians, for that they came out of Arabia; being 170 yeeres after that Africa was recovered from the Vandales, and had serued and been subject to the Empire. And within ten yeeres after, with the ioy of their victorie (DON RODRIGO then reigning King in Spain) they being ayded by a traiterous Earle called DON IULIAN, and others, they came ouer into Spain, and in three yeeres conquered almost all the countrie, slaying in battaile King RODRIGO, and the most part of the Goths, excepting some few which liued in the Mountaines of Biscay, Galicia and Ouiedo: from whence afterwards (although abandoned by the Christian Kings and Princes) they haue by little and little, not without great trouble and effusion of much blood, recovered their countrie: and finally about 100 yeeres since, the Infidels were driuen out of all Spain by King FERNAND and Queen ISABEL. So as if other Christian kings had done their parts as well as the Kings of Spain, it is to be thought that Christendome had not been so much diminished, but had againe recovered what it then lost, and had been restored to that greatnes wherein it was in the time of some ancient Emperors. But seeing it is the iudgement of God, we will leaue it to him, and re-

The Iustitie conquered Africa.

The conquest of Spain by the Infidels Moors.

turne

turne to our Historie, which is of the Emperors onely. IVSTINIAN being in Constantinople, executing his cruelties against the friends and kinsfolks of TIBERIVS and LEONICVS, it so hapned that the subjects to the King of Bulgaria, which had beene so much his friend, fell at odds with some of the Emperors subjects of Thracia, a prouince of the Empire, wherein standeth Constantinople, about parting their bounds: which when he vnderstood (forgetting the benefits receiued) vpon this small occasion he raised an Armie against TREBELLIVS King of Bulgaria, and entering his Countrie, ruined many places, and committed great spoiles: wherewith the King, being greatly moued, gathered such forces together as he could, and came to fight with the Emperor; and they two fought a cruell battaile, wherein the Emperor was justly ouerthrowne, and fled out of the Countrie of the Bulgarians: and for this warre was ended his dishonor. But as God neuer made any thing without some goodnes; so this Emperor euer respected and reuerenced the Church of Rome and the Pope, namely CONSTANTINE who then was Pope, after the two JOHNS, the sixth and the seventh, which succeeded SERGIVS, who went to Constantinople to see the Emperor, and by the way met with JOHN TOZOCOPUS, who came to be Governor of Italy; and coming to Rome would haue taken vp the Church rents and goods, but he was resisted by the Popes ministers; some of which he slew: wherfore he grew so hatefull, as he was driuen to go to Rauenna; where for the same cause, or the hatred which they bare against the Exarchs and former gouernors, the people vpon a day mutined, and killed him. The Pope was with great honor receiued by the Emperor, and when they had seene one the other, the Emperor prostrated himselfe vpon the Earth, and so much abused himselfe, as to kisse the Popes foote, with wonderfull shew of obedience: for as it may be gathered by this Princes doings, he was both fearfull and reuengefull, which are vices usually going together. Hence it sprang, that in his greatest prosperity, he began to stand in feare of PHILIPPICVS, who liued in exile in Pontus, by the commandement of the tyrant TIBERIVS; and for no other cause, but for saying that he had dreamt of an Eagle. And IVSTINIAN desired also to be reuenged of the City Cherson, alleging for his reason, that the Citizens had abused him when he lay there in the time of his banishment: wherfore he commanded a great Army to be leuiued, and a Navy to be rigged, to go and ruine that City, and to kill PHILIPPICVS, who liued there merrily and well content with his banishment, if they would haue suffered him to haue been at rest. But it pleased God to order matters in such sort, that what IVSTINIAN did to assure himself in the Empire, was the cause of his ruin, and the losse therof: for PHILIPPICVS vnderstanding that he came against him, and acquainting those of Cherson therewith, who also expected their owne destruction, he resolved to take vpon him the name of Emperor, and to die like a souldier fighting. Before which there passed other matters, which I omit: but the conclusion is, that seeing no other remedy, they all consented together, and the Army and Captains, sent by IVSTINIAN against Cherson, forsaking him reuolted to PHILIPPICVS, who by his surname was called BARDANVS. And he seeing himselfe fitted with power for his purpose, instead of being assailed, resolved now to giue the assault; and therefore in great haste, with a very great power, he went towards Constantinople, where IVSTINIAN expected him: for after that he vnderstood what passed, he had raised a new Army, and encamping himselfe about twelue miles from the City, attended the coming of PHILIPPICVS: who as soon as he heard of set himself in order of battell, and IVSTINIAN did helike; and they fought the greatest part of the day very resolutely: but in the end the victory remained with PHILIPPICVS, and IVSTINIAN was ouerthrowne and slaine in the battaile, and together with him his son TIBERTVS, being but a very child, with much people of eyther side. And so ended the cares and Empire of the most unfortunate Prince IVSTINIAN; seeing that in his time were so many disasters and calamities: whose life and acts were such as I haue shewed you. And if the Reader haue attentively obserued what I haue written, I guesse he will not holde me for a lyer, in that which I said in the beginning, that the History of his time, for the variety of changes which then hapned, was as a fained Comedie; or to say more properly, a Tragedy, considering the beginning and end thereof. Hee died in the yeere of our Lord 712 little more or lesse, and in the 27 yeere after he first began to reigne.

Iustinian made warre vpon the King of Bulgaria, and was ouerthrowne in battaile.

Iustinian and his sonne slaine
in a battaile against Philippicus.

THE LIFE OF PHILIPPICVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND NINTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE Emperor IVSTINIAN being ouerthrowne and slaine, PHILIPPICVS called also BARDANVS or BARDANUS, remained Emperor: of whom there is little to be written, for that he enjoyed the Empire so little, and for that the Authors which I follow, make small mention of him. And of that little which we know of him, the first is, that as soone as he came to Constantinople, and was there sworn and crowned, he began to hold certaine doubtfull opinions of the Christian faith, aswell concerning the Diuinity of Christ, as some other matters, contrary to the resolution of the first generall councill, holding with the Monothelites: and hereupon he assembled certain Bishops in Constantinople, banishing CYRVS the Patriarch thereof, and in his Rome placing a Monke called IOHN. And therewith not satisfied, he wrote his Letters and sent an Ambassage to the Pope, requiring him to approue his opinions. Which the Pope not onely refused to doe, but for answer, commanded him vpon great curses and excommunications to renounce the opinions which he held: and in Rome, in the Cloysters, and the Porches of Saint PETER'S Church, he commanded the Conclusions of the first generall Councell to be written, to the end that all men might know and beleue the same. Whereof when the Emperor was aduertised, he presently commaunded that painting and writing to be rased and defaced, and the like to be done to all the crucifixes, images, and pictures of CHRIST, of our Ladie, and of the Saints, which he affirmed were not to be adored, or to be set vp in Churches. But his commandements were little regarded by the Pope, or the Roman people; for by a generall decree they proclaimed him a schismaticke and an Heretick: and the Pope further commanded that in their diuine seruice he should not be prayed for, neither should there be any mention made of his name in any publike act or proclamation; which was executed accordingly: by means whereof he became odious and hatefull to the people of Rome, and generally of all Italy, wherein the Empire and gouernement of the Greekes began to be of small authority; by reason of the great power of the Lombards, and the great command and Authority of the Popes. For as much as the Emperors were contrary to them in some points of Religion, the people abhorred them, and denied to be their subjects: but PHILIPPICVS, notwithstanding the Popes fulminations, would not be diuerted from his determination; wherefore and for some other occasions, certaine principall men secretly conspired against him; the chiefe of which, was one ANTHEMVS; which succeeded in this manner. The Emperor resting himselfe vpon a Whitsonday euen, after certaine disports on horsebacke, vsed in those times, the conspiratours violently rushing into his lodging apprehended him, and carrying him thence to another place plucked out his eyes, and leauing him blind and imprisoned, refusing to kill him, they depriued him of his Empire, when he had reigned but one yeere and a halfe: and they advanced the same ANTHEMVS to the Empire, and gaue him to name, ANASTASIVS. This happened in the yeere of our Lord, seauen hundred and fourteene.

Cyrus Patriarch of Constantinople banished by Philippicus.

Philippicus excommunicated by the Pope.

Philippicus being deposed, had his eyes put out.

THE

THE LIFE OF ANASTASIVS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND TENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

For the malice and libertie to sinne in those times had not taken such roote, ANASTASIVS had bene an excellent Emperor, and had well gouerned the Commonwealth; for he was a vertuous and iust man, and of a deepe vnderstanding and iudgement: But by reason of the former gouernement, the wicked were so accustomed to the libertie of ill dooing, as they could not endure to be ruled by any one that should minister and execute justice. For, as in a body diseased and so full of corrupt Humors, that the naturall vertue is therewith oppressed and overcome, being vnable to resist the humor, no Physicke can preuaile or worke any effect, but is rather loathsome and cast vp againe: euen so it happened to ANASTASIVS; and to THEODOSIVS the third also, who was his successor: for men were then so hardened and nouised in doing ill, and so accustomed to escape without any punishment for the same, as it seemed an hard and intolerable matter for them to endure their good gouernement, for the small time they liued in subiection: as in their places shall appeare.

As soone as ANASTASIVS was Emperor, of two things he tooke especial care; the first and principall was for the Christian faith and religion, wherein some of his predecessors had erred: the other was to take order for the defence of the Empire, which he found ill guarded and out of order.

Touching the first, he sent his Letters and Ambassadours to the Pope, whereby he protested to beleue and to hold that faith which the Church of Rome beleueed: and approuing and ratifying the generall Councils, hee commaunded all his subjects to hold and beleue the same. And as concerning the Empire, knowing that the greatest harme that it receiued was from the Sarazins (MANOMETS Disciples) who then had conquered all Africa; against them only he resolved to employ all his whole force and power, seeing that hee could not obtaine the peace which he had first procured. And thereupon hee speedily leuied Captaines and Souldiers, and made a man of great esteeme (whose name was LABO) General of his Armie for the defence of the frontiers against Soria, for from thence the Infidels invaded Asia the lesse. And for the Seas, he rigged a very great fleet, and therein ship-

Anastadius his chiefest care.

II 2

ped

ped his mightie Army with an intent to sayle into Egypt, and to make a Conquest thereof, attempting first, the Citie of Alexandria. All which being set in order, and sufficient provision made of all things necessarie, the Emperor being very ioyfull, hoping that some great exploit would haue beene done, the fleet departed from Constantinople and sayled to Alexandria, where the fleet with the inhabitants were stricken, was greater than the hurt they received. For the Imperialists, having besieged the Citie, through want of certaine necessities (either in feede or faine) raised their siege, and returned to their shippes, sayled to the Ile of Rhodes, and some say to Phoenicia in Asia the lesse, to take provision of Engines, and other necessities, which they said were needefull for the battering of Alexandria and other Townes. Whereof when the Emperor had intelligence he was greatly displeased, and reprehending his Captaines, sent them new provision of all things necessarie, commanding them presently to returne to the warre which they had already begunne. But in that age military Discipline was as much decayed and corrupted as other Sciences; and as I said in the beginning, The people being accustomed to liue licentiously after their owne fantasie, and being discontented with the gouernement of a good Emperour, the Armie mutined, and agreed among themselves to leaue their enterprise against the Infidels, and to turne head against the Emperour ANASTASIVS. And taking land in Asia the lesse, the greatest and chiefeest part of the Armie marched ouer land: and imagining, that without an head and leader, the Army could hardly be well gouerned, they made choice of one to be their Emperour, whose name was THEODOSIVS, a man of meane parentage, but yet honest and of good behavior, and well knowne to them all, for he had beene treasurer or receiuer of the Exchequer, and of the reuenues of the Empire: Who, for his good conditions, was well beloued of all men, and him they chose and made Emperour againe his will.

In my judgement hee had reason to refuse it: For in truth the estate of the Empire and the faith and obedience borne to the Emperours in those times was such as not onely those which were unworthy ought not to accept of the Empire, but even those also which were capable, and most sufficient and of greatest power, had reason by all waies and means possible to eschue the same.

ANASTASIVS vnderstanding of the Rebellion of his men of warre, and how they had chosen THEODOSIVS for their Emperour, made little account thereof (for hee disdained him for the baseness of his birth, and the small experience he had in the warres) neuertheless he raised a great power, and went into Asia to seeke him: and meeting him neere vnto the Citie of Nicea, the principall Citie in Bythinia, they fought a battaile, wherein through the secret judgement of God, ANASTASIVS was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, when he had reigned one yeere and three moneths onely, yet some say three yeeres: And the new chosen THEODOSIVS obtayned the victory, together with the Empire, and ANASTASIVS being deposed, remained prisoner and in his power, whom he made a priest. Which after the computation of ABAS WESPERGENSIS, and of MATHEV PALMERIVS, was in the yeere of our Lord, seuen hundred and seuentee; PHILIPPVS being yet liuing; whom ANASTASIVS had deprived of the Empire; so as he was his companion both in estate and fortune.

It seemeth that in the time of this ANASTASIVS, the Infidels made an end of the conquest of Spain.

THE

THE LIFE OF THEODOSIVS, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND ELE-VENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THEODOSIVS: seeing himselfe such as hee neuer thought to haue beene (obeyed, and sworn Emperour, without any resistance or contradiction) went to Constantinople: and as he was noble in bountie and goodnesse, so he lost no iote of his good conditions, by being advanced to the greatest and height of the Empire, but rather seemed to haue encreased the same. First he would not suffer ANASTASIVS to be put to death, neither to be any way grieved in his person; but onely to be assured of him, he caused him to be made a priest, and gave him exhibition, wherein he continued vntill the time of the Emperour LEO, when by perswasion of a certaine captain he sought to haue recovered the Empire: which cost him his life, as hereafter we wil recount, if so it shall be expedient. THEODOSIVS hauing seematters in order for the generall, he particularly commanded the images and pictures which PHILIPPVS had caused to bee raised and defaced; to be repaied and new made; and in other matters concerning religion, he commanded his subiects to obserue and hold that which the counsels had decreed, and the Church of Rome maintained, and so made shew of a pleasing Emperour. But fortune neuertheless shewed herselfe his enemy; for LEO whom his predecessour ANASTASIVS had made Generall for the defence of Asia the lesse against the Sarazins, and who yet had not done him any homage; vnder the pretence and colour to restore his master ANASTASIVS, ioyned himself with ARTHASDV another captain, which in the confines of Armenia commanded the ordinarie garrisons of the Empire, and they both with all their whole power came against THEODOSIVS; and coming to Nicomedia they apprehended a son of his which was there, and from thence marching forwards he began to vlturpe the name of Emperour: Against this force and violence wherewith LEO came; THEODOSIVS durst make no resistance; but vpon assurance that hee should not be put to death, or receiue other wrong in his person, he yelded himselfe into his hands, and chose to liue a religious life in a Monasterie, and taking the habit remained therein, before that one yeare was expired, after that (against his will) he had been made Emperour: so as now with him there were three Emperours which liued deposed. The first was PHILIPPVS, whom ANASTASIVS had cast in prison, and had plucked out his eyes, whose end what it was I finde not written: the second was ANASTASIVS, whom (as I said) this THEODOSIVS made to take religious orders and habit: and now the third was the same THEODOSIVS, who yelding himselfe to LEO, made choise rather of a religious life than to stand to his defence. Wherein if voluntarily hee did it, or at least endured it with patience, (as is most likely) seeing that he was made Emperour perforce and against his will, truly he was in the right, and chose the better part and left the worse to LEO, which was the Empire: which he most wickedly gouerned, as hereafter shall appeare. This was in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred and seuentee.

717

Theodosius made Anastasius to become a priest.

Leo enticed himselfe Emperour.

Three Emperours liued at one time deposed.

Theodosius became a monk.

THE LIFE OF LEO, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THRESCORE AND TWELFTH ROMANE EMPEVOVR.

(*)

Hilest that these Emperors of a yeeres standing, as Constables of Countre villages, or (to speake more properly) Tyrants, did strue to subuert one another, they had no care to make head against the Sarazins and Infidels, which daily increased, and grew more mightie, so that Christendome was now despised and oppressed: for besides that which happened in the Empire, which now was of small force in the Kingdomes of France and Germany, were also warres betweene the French and the Burgonians, and likewise betweene the Frizons and the Sueuians, and betweene the Saxons and the Bawarians, and other Nations too long to be recited in this Historie. At which time CHARLES MARTEL in France (through the fame of his noble acts) grew to be very much esteemed, and conquered and subdued some, or the most part of all these said Nations. This CHARLES MARTEL was Pretorian Prefect, or rather High Constable of France, which was the highest dignity in that time next to the King; who by reason of the insufficiency of King CHILDERICVS, who afterwards was deposed, and of his owne great valour (although the other had the name) he had the authority of King. And in Italy also were some innovations, so as the Infidels daily more and more preuailed: and hauing conquered the greater part of all Spain, they extended their power thence into France, and tooke Catalonia, and afterwards Narbon, and besieged Auignon, which was within the bounds of the Gothish kings of Spain. But those Countreies being afterwards recovered by the Kings of France, they continued in their subjection. These heathen Princes also conquered the Isles of Maiorica and Minorica, and other Islands in that Sea, with the Isle of Sardinia. Presently after that THEODOSIUS was deposed from his Empire, and that LEO the third of that name, was receiued and established, being unworthy thereof; ZVLEMON (whom some call after another manner) King and Captaine of the Sarazins, and now Lord of Asia, of Africa, and of Spain, making small account of LEO, or of the decayed and weakened Empire; resolved with himselfe wholly to subuert the same; And to that effect vsed all the means and deuices possible, to leuie men and provide shipping, to goe or send against the great Citie of Constan- tinople, together with all Thracia and Gracia. The provision which he made was so great, that some authors affirme, he had in his fleet three thousand saile of shippes, and an incredible number of men of warre, which he sent vnder the conduct of two Generals, the one called MARGILDVS, and the other SOLEMAN.

These Armies came into Europe, and passed the Streight of Constantinople, without any resistance: for although that the Emperor LEO had intelligence of their comming, yet was hee not able to talfe so great power as might suffice to keepe them from landing. Wherefore hee thought thought it a better course to defend the City; and so suffered himself to be besieged, rather than to abandon it to the enemies, who made themselves Lords both of Sea and Land, and besieged the City round both by Land and by Sea, for the space of three yeeres continually. And notwithstanding that the Besieged valiantly defended it, yet it was thought for certain, that it would haue been lost, if in the Besiegers had been such valour and policie as was to haue been expected in such men; but, through a desire to rob, they dispersed themselves to ouer the land, that they were thereby greatly endamaged, and the City was the lesse distressed, and had the better opportunity to provide such things as were wanting. And particularly some Capitaines with part of this Army, seeing that no man made resistance against them, waied vp & downe the Countrey ouer all Thracia, killing and robbing vntill they came into Bulgaria, which in ancient time was called the lower Misia; for defense whereof, the King of that Countrey sent so good an Army, that he not onely defended his Frontiers, but ouerthrew his enemies, and slue of them (as some Historians haue written) two and thirty thousand. But their power was so great, that all Christendome stood in extreme fear of them, and held the Emperor LEO and all Gracia for lost.

At that time there was so much ambition and so little charity among Christians, that they could not be induced to giue ouer the warres and priuate contentions among themselves: for, in Italy the Lombards enlarged their dominion, and took all such towns as they could get either by force or policy. The Frenchmen and other Princes did the like; and euen their owne Captains and seruants failed them in this extremity: for, SERGIUS, who was Pretor or Gouernour for LEO in Scilia, holding the Emperor for lost, with the consent of some others chose one GABORIE for Emperor; and, making him to change his name, they called him TIBERIVS:
what end he made I will tell you hereafter. Onely the Bulgarians assisted the Empire:
for, in truth they had interest therein, considering the danger that hung ouer their owne heads if the Sarazins preuailed. And the Christians which in Constantinople were besieged, made such prayers and supplications, that it seemed the Lord took compassion of them, and protected them:
for, no humane power was sufficient to haue resisted so great forces. Which, as Historians affirm, was manifestly a diuine miracle, that in so long time as the siege lasted, the whole Empire had not been lost, comparing the garrison which was within to defend the City, with the multitude and power of those which besieged it: to whom, by Gods appointment, befell so many misfortunes and disasters, that without any mans help they were ruined. First, in the time of the siege died their King ZVLEMON, whom they also called AMURATH; and about the choosing of a new King they fell at so great variance and dissension among themselves, that they were disordred, and the Besieged greatly recomfited; vntill at the last AMINTHAS HY-MAR was chosen, who followed the warre more faintly and retchlesly than before: and there afterwards followed such colde weather, such storms, and so many plagues of famine and pestilence among them, that the greatest part of them died, as well by Land as by Sea. Besides this, there followed so many tempests and violent windes vpon the seas, that in the best and safest harbours their ships were ouerfet and cast away; in such sort, that the Infidels were so much diminished and decaid, that the City of Constantinople was not only freed and deliuered from that siege, but also fewe of them escaped with their liues from before it: for, of three thousand saile which they brought thither in the beginning, so fewe returned with their people, that it seems to be a matter incredible: and, besides those that were cast away by foul weather at sea, the Historians write, that very many of their ships were burnt by one mans industry. Finally, all that great multitude and number of men and shipping, which seemed to haue been sufficient to haue ouerun the whole world, and to haue laid the same waste, in little more than two yeeres was lost and consumed: and LEO remained the sole absolute Lord of all that which before he possessed, who shewed not himself so thankfull to God for his so great benefits as he ought to haue done. He had also no lesse good hap against TIBERIVS a Tyrant, which rebelled in Scilia, who in short space was brought to confusion: for, the Emperor LEO sending from Constanti- nople the Captain of his horsemen called PAUL, with the title and authority of Gouernour of Scilia, and with Letters to the Captains and souldiers there; PAUL by a stratagem got into the City of Syracusa, now called Sarragosa: where he shewed his authority to those of the City & of the Army; and they all, knowing that the Emperor whom they held for lost, was aliue and at liberty, obeyed his command; and with such fauour receiued and entertained their new Captain, that they apprehended their new King, and deliuered him into the power of this PAUL, who put him to death: and SERGIUS the Pretor of Scilia, who was the Author and

*Constantinople
besieged by the Sarazins.*

Bulgaria which hath called lower Misia.

C Gregory call and chosen Emperor.

*The death of Zulemon, King
of the Sa. arazins.
Aminthas Hy-
mar chose, king
of the sarazins.*

*Tempest, famine and pestilence, fell in the army
of the Sarazins
by sea and land.*

The original of Charles Martell.

*Zulemon king
of the Sarazins
made warre against the Empire.*

Paulus Gregory to death.

Original of this rebellion, fled into Italy to the Lombards; and so that land remained in peace and obedience to the Emperor.

The Emperor L E o being freed from so great distress and oppression, ought truly to have applied himself to the service of God, and to have rendered thanks for the same, and to have relieved his poore subjects and vassals, of the losses and harmes by them sustained: but hee to the contrarie, vnder colour to recouer the charges which he had been at, laid new impositions and taxes vpon the people, and tooke order that the Churches should haue been rancked, against which Pope G R E O R I E, to the vttermost of his power, opposed himselfe. By reason whereof (dislike growing betweene them) the Emperour fought to haue made away the Pope, or to haue taken him prisoner, and to that end he sent thither for Governour one M A R T I N V S, and afterwards the Exarch P A V L, where there happened many accidents which I omit, vntill that at last the Pope found reliefe where he neuer thought to haue had any, which was in L A V T P R A N D King of the Lombards. After this, the Emperor seeming desirous to bear peace with the Pope, requested him to cause the images to be taken from the Altars, and to be put out of the Churches and temples, in such manner as he had done in Constantinople: where the Pope making a presumptuous answer, with great authoritie sent his Letters and Bulls through all Christendome, excommunicating the Emperour, and commanding the images to be honoured and had in reverence. The pontificall command of this Pope G R E O R I E, was of such authoritie, and the Emperour was thereby brought into such disliking with the people, as most of the cities in Italy, and the men of warre in Raenna tooke part with the Pope against him; and there was so great debate and disension in Raenna, that they slew the Exarch P A V L, and desired the Pope to depose the Emperor L E o, and to chuse another in his place. This disension gave occasion and oportunitie to the Lombards (contrarie to the peace) to take the citie of Bologna, and many other cities and townes in that quarter. Which the Emperor perceiving, he desired and practised the Popes death or imprisonment, and to that end sent a new Exarch or governour into Italy, called E V R I S T I V S; who landing at Naples (to be neerer to Rome) endeouored either by force or policie to execute his commission, writing letters to many his friends in Rome and else-where, to that effect: which put the Pope and his friends in great feare and perplexitie, seeing themselves of the one side oppressed by the Emperor, and on the other standing in feare of the Lombards. Wherefore they fought by all meanes to be at peace with them: which L A V T P R A N D their King in consideration of his owne aduantage and benefite, granted, and came to Rome, hauing occasion to passe by it with an Army against certaine Captaines which rebelled in Spoleto and Beneuent: so as the Emperors practice was the second time made frustrate, but he had his will in throwing downe and burning all the images: and for as much as the Patriarch G E R M A N V S would not consent thereto, he depozed him from his prelacie, and placed another in his roome. Matters standing in this estate, Pope G R E O R I E died, who was the second of that name; and another of the same name borne in Syria, succeeded him, who commanded a generall councill to be assembled in Rome, whither came many Bishops; and therein the vse and veneration of images was againe approoued and ratified, and the Pope proceeded against the Emperor, in such manner, that he was excommunicate and Anathematized by the councill. In that time hapned many terrible earthquakes, whereby many cities in Asia the lesse, and in Gracia, were ruined: and the Sarazins came out of Syria into Asia the lesse, doing much hurt, and tooke certaine cities in Cappadocia. Before this, the Emperor made his eldest sonne being a young man, whose name was C O N S T A N T I N E, C A S A R, and nominating him his successor, married him to the Kings daughter of Bamaria called Y R E N T. This seemeth to haue passed in the seauenteenth yeere of his reigne, all which time with the rest of his Empire, which was in all foure and twentie yeeres, he gouerned with greater rigour then becomed a King or an Emperor: and notwithstanding that he wanted neither valour nor policie to maintaine himselfe in the Empire, yet matters were carried with such violence and contentions, that in his time were great warres. In Italy the Lombards took many cities, and besieged Raenna: and the people within it, once againe slew their Exarch or governour. In Asia the lesse the Infidels entred the countie, and robbing and spoiling the same, carried away an infinite number of captiues, and made conquest of a great part of the countie. And all the provinces thereof, with Gracia, Italy, the Isles of Sicilia and Creta, now called Candia, which were in his subiection, were greatly oppressed with tributes, imposts, and other intolerable exactions; in such manner, that many reioiced at his death: which happened in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundreded and one and fortie, he dying of a Dysenteria; and in his place remained his son C O N

Leo sought to kill or imprison Pope Gregorie.

The Emperor
Leo excommunicated by the Pope.
The Popes fulminations.

The Emperor sought the Popes death.

The Kingdom of Aurica erect.
The Emperor
Leo excommunicated by the council held in Rome.

Leo made his young Constantine Cæsar and his successor in the Empire.

The death of Leo, Emperor of Constantinople.

C O N S T A N T I N E the fift of that name, who was very like to his father. The house and kingdome of France in these daies greatly encreased, through the valour and wisdom of C H A R L S M A R T E L; who conquered and annexed to that Kingdome the Countie of Friesland, Saxony, Austria, Burgundie, and other great estates. The City of Venice was now very great and famous, and began to be gouerned by Dukes.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND THIR- TEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

Constantine, being established in the Empire, made present preparation for the warres against the Infidels in Egypt; but he was molested and hindred by Artaxius a Tyrant, who took Arms against him, and intituled himself Emperour: wherefore he returned, notwithstanding that he was already arrived at Alexandria, and took Constantinople by force, and punished the tyrant, although not with such severity as his offense deserved. At that time, Aistolphus King of the Lombards making warre against Rome, Pope Stephen, seeing to the Emperor for aid, but hee provided no such Army as the importance of the case required, thinking to pacifie Aistolphus by Letters and Ambassages. Whereupon the Pope, seeing the delay and little regard of the Emperour, called the French into Italy to relieve him; and they, coming, twice freed the City of Rome from the hands of the Lombards: wherevnto Constantine (vnderstanding what the Pope had done) was displeased, and sent him an Ambassage promising succour; which came not in time: for the French, being already passed the Alps, had compelled Aistolphus to render the Citie, which Pepin gave to the Church of Rome. A Councell was called in Rome, and the Emperour was condemned for an Heretick about the pulling down of Images: and at that time also ended the Kingdom of the Lombards vnder Delidertus their King. And Constantine, making warre against the Bulgarians, fell sick of a kind of Leprosie, called Elephantia; and, dying, left the Empire to his son Leo, whom he had gouerned the same 35 years.

Notwithstanding that L E o was but a bad Emperour, and therefore ill-beloued; yet, as soon as hee was dead, his sonne was receiued and obeyed, in hope that he would haue proued better than his father, or else for that in his fathers time he was growne so mightie, that they durst not attempt to make choice of any other. But hee proued so good a scholar to his father L E o, that in all things hee excelled and surpassed him much, and liued longer than he; so as these seem not to be the lines of Emperors which we now relate, in comparison of those which are past: but, like as in great vessels wherein wine or some other good liquor hath been kept, as it consumeth, so it becometh of a worse taste, and in the bottom there remain some lecs and dregs; so befall it in the Eastern Empire, wherein had been verie great and mighty Princes, whose beginning was such as you you have seen, and whose end we may say drew neer; seeing that within fewe yeers the title & dignity of the Empire was translated from them to the French and Germans; notwithstanding that in Greece there remained Emperors a long time after.

Pope Zacharie sent his Legate to Constantinople with a letter to be hid and beleued.

Presently after that CONSTANTINE was crowned; to giue some signe of a future good Emperor, hee provided a great Armie and a Nauy, their with to go in person into Egypt; and Pope ZACHARIE, vnderstanding thereof, sent him two Ambassadors to congratulate his coming to the Empire, according to the custome of his Predecessors; dissuading him from his fathers opinions, and exhorting him to beleue as the Church of Rome did: and hee therewith sent him in writing the Articles which he would haue him to beleue.

These Ambassadors staid so long vpon their way, that, when they arrived at Constantinople, the Emperor was already departed with his fleet towards Egypt against the Infidels; thinking to haue surpris'd the City of Alexandria, and afterwards to haue conquered the whole Countrey; for, in that Kingdome, and in other Prouinces, which were but lately lost, liued many Christians, which continued therein a long time; and in some Cities were Bishops, by the permission of the Sarazins.

Arthausius took upon him the name of Emperor.

Within fewe daies after the Emperor was embarked, an eminent man which remained in Constantinople, whose name was ARTHAVSTVS, being assisted by many which took his part, rose with the City, and was called Emperor: whereof CONSTANTINE was speedily advertised, euen at such time as with his fleet hee was comm within sight of Alexandria in Egypt. Having certain notice thereof, without any longer stay he returned towards Constantinople; and ARTHAVSTVS, who was in possession thereof, put himself in Arms, with much people to defend the same. But CONSTANTINE, landing, besieged the City, and, cutting it by force, apprehended the Tyrant, and commanded his eyes to be plucked out, and to be perpetually banished; which in my opinion was too small a punishment for so great a treason: but then was vsed so much disloyalty, that it was not punished accordingly as it deserved. This beeing soon ended (although not without bloudshed) he heard the Popes Ambassage, finding his Ambassadors there in that confusion: which he answered with good words, but without performing what they required; persisting in his opinion concerning the abolishing of Images, and other points which his father held; and therewith hee desired that the Church of Rome should doo the like: which put the Pope into a great agony, as well by reason heerof, as of the tyranny and wars of the Lombards. And the Emperors succours failing, it pleased God to send it from other parts; all which, from the roote and ground, passed in this manner:

Constantine put out Arthausius eye.

At that time the Christian faith and religion flourished in the Kingdome of France, principally among the Princes & great Lords thereof; wherein by the death of CHARLES MARTEL, who as we said was high Constable of that Kingdome, his two sonnes, whereof the one was called CARLOMAN, and the other PEPIN, remaining in their fathers place, came to the government as absolute Lords of the whole Countrey. Which Kingdome was then much greater than now it is (although it be yet very great): for, besides that which the French now hold, they then possessed a great part of Germany; as, Austria, Saxony, Flanders, Burgundie, Suavia, and other Prouinces. The elder of these two brethren (which was CARLOMAN) making no account of the world, wherein he had such part, determined to leaue it, and went to Rome to Pope ZACHARIE, who gaue him Church-orders, and he became a Monk of the Order of S. BENEDICT, wherein he continued and died. His brother PEPIN remained alone in the government of the Kingdom of France, and did many noble feats of Arms, enlarging that kingdome against the enemies thereof; and he gouerned the same so well, that there was no speech or mention made of King CHILDERICK. Wherefore, forasmuch as in truth the King was a man of small discretion, and altogether incapable of the gouernment, Pope ZACHARIE deposed him from the Kingdome, and confirmed and approved the election of King PEPIN, as, THOMAS AQUINAS, ROBERT GAUVIN, and PAVLVS EMBELVS, French Historiographers, write. CHILDERICK became a religious man, and in him ended the line and lineall descent of the Kings of France, extract from the blood of the famous Francos: and the Crown passed to the line of this PEPIN, wherein it continued almost two hundred and forty yeers, vntill such time as there happened another change; as shall bee declared when time and place shall permit. This PEPIN was father to CHARLES the Great, who afterwards was Emperor: wherefore it behoues me heere to make mention of him.

Carloman became a Monk.

Pope Zacharie deposed Childerick King of France from his crown.

The state of France standing in this manner, in Italy died Pope ZACHARIE, and STEPHEN the second of that name succeeded him: in the beginning of whose Papacy, AISTVLPHVS

was

was King of the Lombards; and, as we may say, of all Italy: for, his brother RACHISVS, who was King, became a Monk of the Order of Saint BENEDICT. This new King, seeing the small care the Emperor took for the affairs of Italy, breaking the peace whereto hee himself was sworn, raised a great power (as a man that had sufficient means) and cruelly harried the Land, and then besieged, battered, and took the City of Ravenna, which of long time (excepting Rome) had been the principall City of all Italy, and the seat of the Exarchs or Gouerners: and he also wonne many other Towns, which vntill then had valiantly defended themselves; so as there remained no more but the City of Rome and the Territorie thereof: for, in a manner all Pulia and Calabria were held by them. Which when Pope STEPHEN the Second saw, hee sent to giue the Emperor to vnderstand thereof, plainly manifesting to him, that if hee did not speedily send relief, all Italy would come into the power of the Lombards.

Rachisus, king of the Lombards renounced the kingdom, and became a Monk.

The Emperor in this case made not such prouision of an Army and men of warre as the necessity of the cause required, and sent but onely an Ambassador to the King of the Lombards; and other Ambassadors were sent by the King to the Emperor, and long treaties and many speeches were spent about the matter: but AISTVLPHVS, without respect of any person, sent to the Pope, requiring him to giue vp the City of Rome into his power; if not, that hee would then come and take it by force, and cut off the heads of all such as he should finde therein. The Pope seeing this, after long consideration and consultation had about the matter, with the consent of the whole City, seeing there was no other remedy, resolved to send to PEPIN King of France for relief; which was done with the greatest secrecy that could bee, hee seeking by other means to entertain King AISTVLPHVS with presents & promises. The King of France willingly heard his Ambassage, and promised to doo what he required; and therewith sent to the Pope, counselling him for his more safety to come into France.

King Aistulphus his message to the pope.

In the mean time returned the Ambassadors which were sent to the Emperor to Constantinople, who brought no other relief, but direction for the Pope to go in person to King AISTVLPHVS, and to entreat him for peace. The Pope, having already fully determined of his journey, must of necessity passe through AISTVLPHVS dominions, and therefore resolved to do both; and so departed from Rome, accompanied with the Ambassadors of both the Kings, and of the Emperor, and came to Pavia where the proud King AISTVLPHVS then lay; but could not come to any composition with him: for, he required to haue the dominion and rule of Rome and the rest of Italy, and that they should yearly giue him a certain peece of gold for euery head. And notwithstanding that they treated of peace, yet he daily made preparation for the warres: so as the Pope, in the best manner he could, took his leaue of him, and by long journies came into France, holding his way towards King PEPIN'S Court; who commanded his eldest sonne CHARLES, who afterwards was Emperor, that as soon as he were com into France, he should conduct and accompany him; and he himself afterwards came three miles from Paris, where he then held his Court, to meet him: and, alighting from his horse, he kist the Popes foot, and would ride no more; but led the Popes horse by the bridle. And in this manner, with too great humility, he conducted him to his Palace; where he was magnificently receiued, and royally entertained: and there he confirmed King PEPIN'S election, and so anointed and crowned him King of France.

King PEPIN, after many matters which passed about this business, resolving to relieue the Pope, caused an Armie to be leuiued: but hee first sent Ambassadors to King AISTVLPHVS, to treat with him concerning a settling of peace, offering him reasonable and honourable conditions. Whereto he answered with greater pride than befit him: for, making small account of King PEPIN, hee reposed his chief trust in the multitude of his men. The peace beeing broken, and the warre resolved, PEPIN commanded his troops to march; whose Vauitgard, in passing the Alps, fought with AISTVLPHVS his forces which guarded the passages: which being broken and scattered, the King passed with his whole Armie; and, AISTVLPHVS, staying in the Plains with the rest of his power, and vnable to make head against him, was forced to retire: whom King PEPIN pursued, vntill hee had shut him vp in the City of Pavia, where (being Master of the Field) he besieged him: during which siege, many rapines, robberies and outrages, were committed. Pope STEPHEN seeing what ill was befalling, notwithstanding that hee apparently saw the victory, and that hee himself was the procurer of the war, yet he laboured for peace, and dealt with AISTVLPHVS to that effect, perswading him to resigne what he had taken, and to binde himself by oath to maintain the peace, and to giue hostages and security for the obseruing of the same.

Wars between King Pepin and Aistulphus King of the Lombards.

Peace between Pepin and the Lombards.

AISTVLPHVS being thus besieged, and hearing these newes, in outward shew praised God, faining great humilitie and thankfulness to the Pope; and extolling him, he promised and sware to his most obedient son, and so a peace was concluded: for King PEPIN pretended nothing, but restitution to be made to the Pope, and the quiet of the Church of Rome: and as it seemed that he had effected the same, taking with him fortie men of account, which AISTVLPHVS delivered vnto him for hostages and pledges, for the performance of his promise, he within a certaine prefixed time, raised his siege from before Pania, and returned towards France, leaving a great Noble-man called Vernarius to see the conditions performed: whereof the Pope holding himselfe assured, departed also towards Rome; and AISTVLPHVS accomplishing some matters of small importance, with faire words deferring the principall (which was the rendring of cities and townes) temporized, vntill that King PEPIN was returned into his countrie. Afterwards contrarie to his oth, he would performe nothing of what he had promised, but went to Ravenna, and thither sent for the greatest part of his forces; and continuing his pretended purpose, within a very small time after, took his way towards Rome, where the Pope was; and encamping himselfe before it, held it besieged the space of three moneths, in which time (as all histories beare record) hee did greater harme in the fields and territorie thereof, than had beene done before in three hundred and fortie yeeres, by the Visigothes, the Ostrogothes, the Heruli, the Lombards themselves, or any other nation. In the beginning of this siege, what passed I have not time to set downe; but that the Pope sent his Ambassadors downe the river of Tiber, and thence by sea to king PEPIN into France who was then the Popes only refuge, to entreate him to come to his reliefe; whom they found busie in making preparation for his voyage, notwithstanding that they had not requested him: but with their coming farre greater halte was made. Whereof when AISTVLPHVS had intelligence, he raised his siege from before Rome, and came into Lombardy, with an intent to have stopped king PEPINs descent from the Alpes; where we will leave them for a while, to the end hereafter to make an end of the storie. And let vs now speake of Constantine, of whom this Historie treats, whom we have not without reason forgotten: for in truth it hath bin to give light to the reader, to understand the cause and reason why the Pope transported the Empire into the Westerne parts, and first into the house of France; for which cause it was requisite to declare what is said; and what shall be spoken hereafter: for although it be not directly of the Emperours, yet it is very expedient for the historie, and the cleerenes and order of what we shall write hereafter. I say then that CONSTANTINE was not idle all the while that these things passed in Italy, but attempted to make warre against the Infidels, sometimes in Egypt, and sometimes in Syria, but ever with ill successe.

His Empire was also much distressed and weakened, by reason of a great pestilence, which fell among the inhabitants in those parts, which was so terrible, that it was feared the land would have beene dispeopled; which, as HOO FLORIACENSIS writeth, began in Calabria, and from thence passed into Sicilia, and afterwards into Gracia, and to Constantinople, afflicting those countries. So as it is thought and held for certaine, that if there had not happened to arise new and vnexpected enemies against the Sarazins, the East Empire had beene in great danger to have beene lost. But in the time of this calamitie the Turkes descended, in a most huge multitude, out of Scythia Asiatia, for being in a manner innumerable, and in a cold and barren countrie, moved thereto through the fame of the wealth of Asia, they came into the province of the Alanes, and afterwards into the countries of the Caldi, and from thence descended into Armenia; and lastly into Persia, and so into Asia the lesse, spoiling and subduing those countries: in such sort that the Mahometists could not attempt ought against the Christians, neither were of power sufficiently able to defend themselves, and therefore concluded a peace with them: and so the Turkes remained Lords of a great part of those provinces, and afterwards received the accrued seat of Mahomet, which they found in the countries by them subdued.

The Sarazins being much troubled in this warre, suffered CONSTANTINE to live in peace. But the Turkes did him much harme, for they took from him certaine provinces in Asia the lesse and therein, and in the rest of Asia, continued a long time after, mixed with other nations, having no rule or dominion, but lived obscurely, vntill that about two hundred and fiftie yeeres afterwards, (as when time shall serue we will tell you) one amongst them whose name was OTOMAN, began the dominion and Empire which they hold this day. This nation of the Turkes (setting a part all other opinions) had their originall beginning in Scythia in Asia: Of all the ancient writers, only PLINY in his sixt booke, and POMPONIUS MELA in the end

Rome besieged
by the Lombards.

The origine of the Turkes.

Ottoman King of the Turkes.

of his first booke, make mention of them, and place them amongst the Sarmates in the confines of Scythia, over the Caspian passages in the Hyperborean mountaines; and they say that they lived dispersed in the fields, by that which they could get by hunting; so as they were vnknowne (yet some mention was made of them) vntill this their descent in the time of CONSTANTINE the fift; and so for almost other five hundred yeeres, there was no great account made of them. The opinion of those which say that the Turkes descended from the Troians, is merely false, and shall not neede to be reproued, or impugned, for that it is ridiculous, and not to be regarded: for what is before said is true. But returning to my storie, I say that the affaires of the East remaining in this estate, and the Emperor knowing that AISTVLPHVS King of the Lombards had besieged Rome, and that the Pope had sent to the French King for aide, and that hee made preparation to come to relieue him; being greatly grieved therewith, in great haste he sent two of his fauourites to the Pope, requesting him not to retaine the succours of France, for that hee himselfe would assist him. But thisooke no effect, for as much as they spake too late, and also for that the Pope and state of Rome had no good conceit or hope of him: so as the Emperours Ambassadors staid not in Rome, but went to the French court, where they sought to haue deterred the King, and to haue dissuaded him from going into Italy. But King PEPIN relented not, but rather with a greater and better Armie passed the Alpes; in which passage were many skirmishes, and many men were lost of the one side and the other. But in the end AISTVLPHVS durst not abide the bataille; but setting all matters in the best order that possibly he could, he retired himselfe into the citie of Pania, which was the head and royal seat of that Kingdom, wherein King PEPIN againe besieged him, and he presently began to treat of peace, offering to render whatsoever he had taken. The Emperours Ambassadors solicited, that Ravenna and all that government might be restored to the Emperor, and the rest to the Pope: Wherein King PEPIN answered, that he came to that war, onely for the defence of the Church of Rome, and that all that therein was conquered, should be her inheritance, and no bodies else. Finally, a peace was concluded: and AISTVLPHVS, before the siege was raised, rendered vnto the Pope, Ravenna, and all the cities which in those warres he had taken, in that Exarchate, or out of it; amongst which were Bologna, Mantua, Cesena, Modena, Reggio, Parma, Placentia, Ferraria, Fauencia, and many other cities and townes, whereof King PEPIN made to the Church of Rome a perpetual donation; as a thing by him conquered and gotten.

The Emperours Ambassadors seeing this (being out of hope) returned, and the peace was confirmed. So as the government and dignitie of the Exarches was wholly ended and extinguished in Italy, the which had continued one hundred threecore and fiftie yeeres, and the Popes remained sole Lords of all those countries, and possessed the same together with the citie of Rome, and the rest. King PEPIN being returned into France, King AISTVLPHVS which detened the deliuerie of certaine places, thinking to haue effected some inuolution, was overtaken by death, the manner whereof is written diuersly. And after his dectast one DESIDERIVS, a great man among the Lombards, was chosen for their King, who was Duke of Hetruria, now Tuscany. And notwithstanding that some great men perswaded RACHISIVS, brother to AISTVLPHVS, who of long time had been a Monk, to take vpon him the name and title of King, yet thisooke no effect: and DESIDERIVS, with the fauour of Pope STEPHEN, to whom he promised to be a perpetual friend, remained King, and so the peace was established: Pope STEPHEN applied himselfe to the government of his Church, and the estate thereof. But when he was most busie about those matters, hee was taken with an infirmity; whereof he died, and PAVL the first of that name, a Romaine borne, succeeded him.

In the mean while that K. PEPIN made warres against the Lombards in Italy, the Emperor CONSTANTINE endeavoured to put the Images out of the Churches, and made peace with HADALIA King of the Sarazins, to the end that he should induce the Christians to doe the like, which were in Armenia, Palestina, Soria, and in all the other Provinces in his subiection, which were infinite, and continued in those countries a long time after, and it is sayd that many liue there vntill this day. This Emperor is reported to haue restrained the liberty of the Monks and Prelates very much, without respect to their immunities and priuiledges; amongst which he cut off the head of CONSTANTINE the Patriarch of Constantinople, for opposing himself against him, and therewith suppressed certaine Monasteries.

In this time there grew warre and dissension betwene him and THESSALIVS, King of Bulgaria, who entred Thracia, and did much harme, spoiling and waiking the lands of the Empire; against whom CONSTANTINE leuied an Armie, and fighting with him obtained

King Pepin came the Je-cond time into Italy.

King Pepin his donation to the Church of Rome.

The Exarch abolished in Italy.

The death of King Aistulphus.

The Emperor
made peace with Hadalia King of the Sa-
razins.

Constantine caused the Patriarke of Constantinople to be beheaded.
There was Constantine
The first King

of the Bulgarians and the first thereof.

tained the victory; and THESSALIVS returned by flight, with losse of many of his men: for which disgrace, and for his euill carriage in the battell, his people rose against him, and slue him; and chose another called SABINVS for their King: who, to make the Emperour his friend, consented and agreed with him to deface and calt the Images out of the Churches, wherewith his Subjects were so much discontented, that, if hee had not escaped from them by flight, they had slain him: but he went to the Emperour, and was there protected; and the Bulgarians chose another for their King, whose name was PAGANVS.

At this time, CONSTANTINE made his eldest sonne, called LEO, his companion and succesor in the Empire: this LEO was afterwards absolute Emperour, and the fourth of that name.

The death of King Pepin, Charles, surname the Great, and his brother Carloman, succeeded their father.

Whilest that CONSTANTINE was busied about these matters, Pope PAUL in Italy continued in peace with the Lombards and their King DESIDERIVS, according to the composition made and established by King PEPIN of FRANCE; who within short space after died, having bin one of the most excellent Princes of the world. After the death of PEPIN, CHARLES and CARLOMAN his sonnes succeeded him, which diuided the Kingdome between them, and, by the death of CARLOMAN, it came wholly to CHARLES.

Pope Constantine deposed and made a Monk.

Presently after that King PEPIN was dead, Pope PAUL also died, whose death caused a Schism in the Church of Rome: for, DESIDERIVS King of the Lombards, sending a Captain of his with certain troops of souldiers to Rome, procured his brother CONSTANTINE to be made Pope, who, without regard of the order of election, took possession of the Palace, and held the papall state for the space of one year: and others of a contrary faction and opinion, chose another Pope, whose name was PHILIPPICVS; but, CONSTANTINE being of greater power, PHILIPPICVS was deposed. But, as all was done by force and violence, so by the like force it was determined: for, the people and clergie agreeing together made choice of STEPHEN the Third, who was a Sicilian born, and compelled CONSTANTINE to resigne the Papacy, and put himself into a Cloister.

The Emperour condemned by the Pope and his Council.

The first thing that the new Pope did, was, Again to set vp Images in Churches; and to that effect wrote to the two sons of PEPIN the deceased King of FRANCE, to send to the Emperour some of the Prelates which were in their Kingdome, which then was so great, that it extended itself from the Alps to the Pirenean Mountains, and thence so far as to HUNGARY, and on the other side to the sea: so as these two Brothers were Lords of all that which we now call FRANCE, together with FLANDERS, FRISLAND, BRABAND, and on both sides of the riuer Rhine, of AUSTRIA, BAVARIA, and other Prouinces of GERMANY, besides what rebelled in his time, which was a great part: all which, this CHARLES conquerd and pacified, although not without great traucell, and made himself absolute Lord of the Whole. The Pope by their consent summoned a Councell to be held in Rome, wherein the Emperour CONSTANTINE was again condemned; and all that he and his father had commanded to be done in CONSTANTINOPLE, was reprobred and disannulled: but this took small effect, for he little regarded it.

The death of Pope Stephen.

The Councell being dissolved, DESIDERIVS King of the Lombards sought to haue caused some alteration in Rome and in Italy, by means of one ANFIARATA the Emperours chamberlain, who then was in Rome: wherein although there were no Gouerners for the Empire as in former time (for, it now seemed, that the Popes had the sole gouernment) yet was this ANFIARATA of great authority; who (with the assistance of DESIDERIVS, which sought to procure the Emperour to haue some footing again in Italy, thereby to weaken the power of the Pope, and of the French) apprehended certain Romanes; and committed them vnto prison.

Three years past in these matters; and, Pope STEPHEN dying, ADRIAN the first of those which were so called was chosen: who at his first entrance released those out of prison which were committed in the time of Pope STEPHEN by ANFIARATA. Whereupon King DESIDERIVS, seeing how much the papall power by means of FRANCE increased, sought to haue made a league with him: which the Pope refused, alleging that hee would not beleue him who had no better held his word.

At this time died CARLOMAN King of FRANCE; and his brother, who afterwards for his great acts was called CHARLES the Great, made himself Lord of that Kingdome: and the widow Queen, wife of the deceased King, went with her sons to King DESIDERIVS into Italy; who, being glad of her coming, receiued and entertained her very honourably, thinking to haue raised some trouble & diffension among the French; and to that effect practised with Pope

ADRIAN,

ADRIAN, to make the eldest sonne of King CARLOMAN King of that part of FRANCE which his father enioyed, with intent by that means to haue sed him and King CHARLES, at variance, whom hereafter we will call CHARLES the Great, whereunto the Pope would not be induced, and DESIDERIVS purposing by force to bring it to passe, began to make warre, on euery side. The first was against the Citie of RAUENNA and the marches thereof, and besooke the Citie of FERRARA, RAVENNA, and other Townies: and the Pope by Ambassages and letters entreating him to desist from those warres, he threatened to beseege Rome it selfe, and to take his way thitherward. Whereupon the Pope sent three Bishops to meete him vpon the way; and by them sent him a decree, wherein he charged him not to passe any further, neither to presume to come within the bounds of the territory of Rome, vpon paine to be presently excommunicated. And notwithstanding that DESIDERIVS was a very resolute man, and of an haughty spirit, yet as soone as he had received this decree, without setting one foot further, he returned with his forces to the Citie of PAVIA; but the warres ceased not. For all which the Emperour CONSTANTINE was nothing forie, he so much quied the Popes greatness; and in CONSTANTINOPLE he caused one STEPHEN to be slaine, for defending the ambition of the Romish Prelates. About this time he rigged a very great flecte of about two thousand saile of shippes, to transport his Armie ouer the sea called ADRIATICK, against the King of BULGARIA; which flecte was outbreiue with so great a Tempest, as the greatest part thereof was cast away and sunk.

The Pope knowing that by the Emperour he should not be relieved in his warres against DESIDERIVS, sent to CHARLES the Great for aide, who with very great forcesooke his way towards Italy: but he first required DESIDERIVS by Ambassadors to make satisfaction for the harmes which he had done, and to be at peace with the Church: And seeing that hee would not, he marched forwards with his troups; and DESIDERIVS engrossed his forces to stop his passage: but being vnable to compasse it, he sent the wife and children of CARLOMAN to PERONIA, fortified PAVIA, and suffered himselfe to be there besieged. Wherein hee ill aduised: for by reason thereof the greatest part of his gouernours and Captaines, seeing him thus distressed, losing all courage, sent to yeelde their obedience to the Pope, and desired to be receiued for his friends and vassalles; and giuing vp their holds, many of their people went to Rome, to dwell and abide where the Pope should appoint. CHARLES the Great leauing an vncle of his at the siege of PAVIA, went against PERONIA, which he tooke without any great diffieultie, together with his sister in law, and nephews which were therein; and from thence went to Rome to kisse the Popes foote, and to hold the Feast of Easter, where hee was receiued with all the solemnity that could be deuised.

At this his coming thither he confirmed to the Church and to the Popes of Rome, the donation which his father had made, of RAUENNA, and other lands; and made another of many other places, amongst which is reckoned the Isle of CORSIKA, and all the coast of GENOA, with the Citie of PARMA, ANCONA, VERONA, and many other Townies, which BILLOTHECARIUS fetterd downe, besides Rome and the territorie thereof; which the Popes had already in possession, whether by the pretended donation of CONSTANTINE the Great, or by the donation made by the said King PEPIN, or by common consent or ancient prescription, I know not. So as to the Emperours remained but only that part of Italy, which was called MAGNA GRACIA, which is part of CALABRIA, and of PULIA, and a great part of that which now is the Kingdome of NAPLES. CHARLES the Great hauing been only eight daies in Rome, returned against DESIDERIVS; who, after fixe moneths besieging in PAVIA, yielded vpon Composition, and CHARLES carried him with him, and banished both him and his sonnes into a certaine Iland; and then tooke MILAN, and all the other Citie in LOMBARDY, which is the ancient Gallia Cisalpinna, where he placed Frenchmen for Dukes and Gouernors; and in other Duchies and Citie of that Kingdome, he placed Dukes of the same nation of the Lombards, which became his subjects and did him homage; and so Italy remained in his obedience and subiection, excepting those Prouinces and lands which were left to the Church, and those which the Pope held in former time, but all in peace and quiet. And so ended the Kingdome of the Lombards, which had continued 204. years in Italy.

CHARLES the Great hauing ended these exploits, returned with triumph and victory into his kingdome of FRANCE; and within short space after there befell him a very dangerous war, against certaine nations in GERMANY, which rebelled against him, namely the Saxons and other people in those quarters, which he subdued, although it were long first, and with great traualle; but with great honor and the fame of an excellent captain. But for as much as it is tedious to relate

The coming of Charles the Great into Italy.

Charles took Verona.

Charles his gift to the Church of Rome.

Desiderius King of the Lombards yielded to Charles the Great.

The end of the kingdom of the Lombards.

relate it, and also for that it hapned before that he was Emperour, we will speak no more thereof, to be the better able to relate what happened after he was Emperour, as shall be said hereafter. The Emperour CONSTANTINE, who now had reigned a long time, renewed the war against the King of the Bulgarians: which began between them with great fury and violence, but it lasted not long: for he was taken with a kinde of leprosie called Elephantia, whereof hee afterwards died: but he first concluded a peace with the King of Bulgaria. After which, his infirmity increased in such manner, that he died, leaving his son LEO, whom he had by his first wife YRENE (who already was in possession) for his successor, when he had reigned 35 years, in the year of our Lord 777.

THE LIFE OF LEO, FOVRTH
OF THAT NAME, AND THREE-SCORE AND FOVRTEENTH RO-MAN EMPEROR.

IN the time of the Emperour CONSTANTINE, by his order and commandment, his son LEO was chosen Emperour, and his companion; whom hee had by the Kings daughter of Bulgaria, with whom he was married, whose name was YRENE. And LEO had to wife a woman born in Athens, whose name was also YRENE, which was the fairest woman of her time; and for wisdom and policy, one of the most Noble and excellent Ladies that euer was in the world. Wherefore without any contradiction he was presently held and obeyed as Emperour, in the place of his deceased father. In the beginning of his Empire he made shew to bee very devout and affected to the churches, and to religious persons of whatsoeuer order, seeking to aduance them to dignities. And he likewise made preparation of men and shipping against the Infidels, and went into Asia in person, and invaded the Prouince of Soria; but his journey took small effect: for, within short time after, hee returned, with losse of some of his people, and of his owne reputation.

This Emperour LEO had also other wars with the Infidels, by his Captains; wherein hapned many accidents, but not of any account. In this manner he past the first three yeers of his raigne; and in the fourth with this shew and apparance of a good Prince, he practised with his subjects, to chuse a yong son which he had, called CONSTANTINE (as was his grandfather) Emperour. And in the same yeer also, he, knowing that sundry of his Court were of the Romish Sect concerning the worshipping of Images, he made many of them to be apprehended, and openly disgraced, and depriued and deposed them from their dignities: whereupon he began to be hated, and held for an euill Prince. But by his wiles means, and his owne death which shortly ensued, it was mitigated: for, he died of a carbuncle which arose in his head; without leaving ought done by him worthy of memory, at least that I haue found written.

This

This hapned in the fift yeer of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred fourescore and two. He was much condemned for the taking of a Crowne of Golde, and certaine stones of great price, out of the famous temple of S. Sophia, which by the Emperour MARYICA were offered and dedicated to the Image of our Ladie in Constantinople, which hee tooke from thence, and put vpon his owne head.

In this time in France and Germany flourished CHARLES the Great, of whom (for that he was afterwards Emperour) I haue made this mention, as well in matters of war, as peace; who honoured and fauored valiant and hardie knights, and letters also and learned men: he procured iustice to be maintained in all his dominions, and that his gouernment should be just and vpright. Whereupon he created many Dukes and other dignities, and among them the twelue Peeres of France, which are so famous in all Histories. He also made and ordained the parliament at Paris: afterwards in the yeere 790, in the life time of CONSTANTINE sonne of this LEO, he founded an Vniuersitie in the same Citie, which hath bene famous and excellent; and is yet to vnto this day: and another in the Citie of Pania, which was the cause that both Chiuallrie and learning so much flourished in his time.

In the time of the Emperour LEO, of whom we now leaue to make any more mention, the said CHARLES came into Spain; where he was by treason ouerthrowne at Ronceuaux, and lost the flowre of his nobilitie and Chiuallrie: by means of ALONSO the Second, called the Chaste, aided and assisted by the Moores and Infidels which then liued in Aragon, and in the territorie thereof. In matters which preceded and succeeded this battaile and the causes therof, and which passed therein, there is great difference between the French and Spanish chroniclers, and among themselves of either Nation. Wherefore, and for as much as the acts of CHARLES the Great (before that he was Emperour) concerne not my Historie, I therefore leaue to speake any more thereof. And also for that we know that FLORIAN DE CAMPO hath written thereof at large in his generall Historie of Spain: of whose singular diligence there is no doubt to be made, but that he hath inuolably obserued the truth, without omitting any thing worthy of memory, especially in a matter so famous and memorab; and therefore referring the Reader to him, I will retorne to prosecute my journey.

The battaile of Ronceuaux.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE
THE SIXT OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND FIF-TEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

LEO being dead, his sonne Constantine (notwithstanding that he was but a child) succeeded him, and through the wisdom of his mother, and the oath of the men of warre, was obeyed: This woman was so discrete, that shee ruled the Empire ten yeeres, and was the cause of the Councell assembled about the controuersie for Images, and agreement to be made betweene the Greekes and Latine Churches. But the yong man coming to ripper age, became her of the gouernement; and made her to line apart from him; and became so displeasing, that his owne people conspired against him, although the conspiracy took not the wished effect. But he being still beloued, certaine of the principall men of the Empire incited her to resume the gouernement: and for setting aside the love of a mother towards her sonne, apprehended him, and caused his eyes to be plucked.

Kk 3

pluckt

The death of the Emperour Leo.

plucked out, as he had done by many others. This was the cause that the Eastern Empire was translated into the West; for the Pope seeing the East Empire to decline, and that it was governed by a woman, hee annointed and crowned Charles the Great, Emperour, with whom Yrene sought to have bene married: but itooke no effect, shee being dissuaded by the Princes of Gracia; but she made a firme and assured peace with him, which shee not long enioyed: for iudricie valiant men, which tooke in ill part to be ruled by a woman, conspiring against her, by a wile apprehended, and deposed her from the Empire, giving the charge thereof to a wry Noble man, whose name was Nicephorus,

When as Leo the fourth was dead, his sonne CONSTANTINE being little more then twelve yeeres old, was received for Emperour (notwithstanding his small age); whereunto his mothers wifedome and valour was a great helpe; and also for that the subjects of the Empire were sworne to him in the life time of his father, yet this could not be effected without difficultie; for some principall men disdaining to be commanded by a childe, and a woman, secretly practised to make NICEPHORVS Emperour, who was the young mans vncle, and brother to his father Leo: although that through forgetfulness, no mention was before made of him. But this was not so secretly done, but that YRENE had intelligence thereof, and tooke for good order, that shee apprehended and banished those which were the Authors thereof, and made their hayre to be cut, which then was a great disgrace: yet vpon NICEPHORVS she inflicted no other punishment, but onely made him take a Monasticall habit; and so the Empire remained in peace to her sonne. But notwithstanding that the young man was Emperour, yet his mother commanded all, and (as all Authors write) very vprightly and prudently; for she was a wife and a very excellent woman, and about all was very much deuoted to the Romish religion, whereof this may serue for prooffe; for the seeing the discord betweene the Greekes and Latins about the worshipping of Images, and other points in Religion wherein they disagreed, endeouored very earnestly, that a generall Councell might be called; and her industrie tooke such effect (although somewhat long first) that a councell was assembled in the Citie of Nicene, in the Prouince of Bythinia, where other councells in former time had bene held; in which were three hundred and fiftie Bishops, and therein were handled many matters concerning the estate of the Clergie, and those were condemned for Hereticks, which denied the veneration of Images in the Church. So as during the government of YRENE, the Images and pictures of CHRIST, and our Ladie, and sundrie other Saints in the Easterne Churches were againe set vp; whereat the common people which euer delighted in nouelties, was very joyfull; and so was THEODORVS the Patriarch of Constantinople, which succeeded PAVL, who had fought & much desired the same. And for that he could not obtaine it of the Emperour, LEO, seeing himselfe growne old and sickly, before his death, he left his dignitie and made himselfe a Monk: who going to visite the Empreffe YRENE, she demanded of him the reason of so noble a change; she making an eloquent Oration, he tolde her, that he had left the world, for that hee could not resist the Emperour, and for that hee would not die separated from the Vnion and obedience of the Catholique Romish Church, beseeching her to procure the said Vnion, which could not be but by a generall Councell; for the effecting whereof, she should vse her Authority, & that for his part he would not lye out of the Church, but continue in his Monasterie to doe penance for his finnes, the which hee said was to discharge his Conscience before his death.

It is said, that this THEODORVS was he which principally moued YRENE so earnestly to sollicite the calling of a Councell; the resolution whereof concerning Images, is contained in two verses, which then were made, and at this day are placed in a Church in Venice, which in Latin are thus:

Nam Deus quod Imago docet, sed non Deus ipsa, Hanc uideas, sed mente colas, quod ceruis in ipsa.

Which in effect is as much to say, as, That which this Image doth shew and signifie, is God; but the Image is not so: behold the same, but with the minde recuerence that which thereby is represented.

Having ended a matter of so great importance as that which I recited; in all the rest of the time time of her government, both before and after the Councell which were some yeeres, shee bare herselfe farre more like a politick valiant man, than a delicate and beautifull woman as she was: but her sonne CONSTANTINE, who was now comen to mans estate, and like to his father, disliked his mothers government, and in the end deposed her from the same, and from the Councell also, making her to lye priuately, without any authority, when shee had with great wifedome governed in his name the space often yeeres, and maintained the Empire with iustice, in peace with all the world.

It is written, that in those daies was found in Constantinople, in a very old Sepulchre, a plate or leafe of gold vpon the breast of a corpse, which therein had bene buried: wherein were written these words, CHRIST shall be born of the Virgin MARY: Thou shalt see mee againe at such time as CONSTANTINE and his mother YRENE shall be Emperours. This was held for a great matter, and YRENE and her son made great account of this Table: for, it seemed to be written before the coming of CHRIST.

The Emperour, being now at liberty, began freely to vse those qualities whereto hee was naturally inclined; in such sort, that he became ill beloued, and they againe the second time conspired against him, seeking to make his vncle NICEPHORVS, Emperour. But, as to Princes (whether good or bad) most matters are commonly discovered: so this conspiracy was likewise reuealed; and he, knowing it, commanded some of those which had been practicers therein, to be apprehended, whom hee severely punished; and commanded his vncle NICEPHORVS to be perpetually banished. After this, he put away his wife, who was a very Noble woman called MARY; and, diuorcing himselfe from her, shut her vp in a Nunnerie, and married one of her maids called THEODORA, of whom hee was enamoured; a woman of no desert, but onely that she was fair and very beautifull.

At such time as CONSTANTINE and his mother reigned in the East, CHARLES the Great was King of France; so called for the great exploits which he had performed: yet some are of opinion, that he was so called by reason of the great constitution of his body; for, he was corpulent, very big limed and tall, and had not liued at his ease, but had vndergon great and dangerous wars.

In the beginning of the Emperour CONSTANTINE'S Raig, King CHARLES came in person into Italy to see the Pope, and to pacifie certain combustions raised by some Dukes, who were desirous of innovations: which being quieted, hee had intelligence that the Duke of Bawiera (for, now they were no more called Kings) rebelled against him, with an intent to exempt himselfe from his subjection; and to that end had leuied his forces. Whereupon, CHARLES resolved to go against him in person, and by another way to send his sonne PEPIN vpon the same seruice; and so hee beganne to make cruell waire against him; whereof when the Eastern Emperour CONSTANTINE was aduertised, imagining that CHARLES, beinge busied in those warres, would not be able to prouide for the affairs of Italy, hee sent commandement into those Countries which he held for him, and som new troops which he leuiued for that purpose, that they should make waire against the Pope and King CHARLES; which they presently put in execution: but the Dukes of Beneuent and Spoleto, and of other Cities, made such speedy preparation against them, that they were easily rebelled and ouerthrowne; so as from thenceforth they liued quiet and at peace. And CHARLES had likewise good success in his waire against the Bawarians (although not without effusion of much blood) that hee pacified all that state, and reduced the Prouinces to his seruice.

From thence hee went against the Slavons, which held the Prouinces of Istria and Dalmatia; by them called Slauonia; and in one Summer brought all vnder his dominion. Afterwards, raising a new power, hee resolved to make a conquest of Hungary and Austria, beeing the ancient Pannonia, which the Hunnes Auares, had of long time possessed, as is before said: And notwithstanding that this was a very dangerous warre, and that therein were many great and notable battels (wherein all the Nobility, and the greatest part of the common people of those Countries, died; so as the Land lay in a manner waste and dispeopled), yet in the end, in the eighth yeere after the beginning thereof, he became absolute Lord of all the Country. After these forsaide warres, hee had warres with the King of Denmark; for, the Danes harried the sea-coasts with their fleets; and heerein (as well as in the rest) this glorious Prince had the victory: and hee afterwards made peace with their King, and resolved to make an end of subduing the Saxons; whose warres at times, as they rebelled, continued thirty yeeres; and hee slue of them in one battell thirty thousand: and in another, which hee fought with them afterwards, hee brought them

A plate of gold found vpon the breast of a dead body in Constantinople. A wonders if true.

Charles the Great, whose wife called.

Charles the Great conquest Hungary and Austria. Charles ward against the King of Denmark, and subdued the Saxons.

wholly to obedience, and made them subject to the Empire; and, for his better security, he led the principal of them with him into France. In which conquests which I so briefly haue recited, some battels were fought by himself in person, and some by his son P E R I N : in all which, he won the name and reputation of a most excellent Captain.

These things being past, in the year of our Lord seven hundred ninety & six, Pope A D R I A N died in Rome: through whose death they chose P O P E L E O the third of that name; who presently after his election, sent great Presents and a solemne Ambassage to C H A R L E S the Great. In these times the Emperor C O N S T A N T I N E 's men of war did greatly annoy those of C H A R L E S the Great: for, after that he liued apart from his mother, he became very cruell, and in his government negligent and disorderly: wherefore he grew to be so ill beloved by his Subjects, that some of the chief of them perswaded his mother Y R A N N A to depose him, and resume the government of the Empire into her owne hands; whereto they promised to assist her. The mother, who had a courage more like a reuengefull man, than a delicate woman, preferring the displeasure which she had conceiued, before the loue of a mother to her son, with the aid of those which took her part in that action, vpon a day by a willesified on him, and caused his eyes to be presently plucked out, as hee had done to many others: which was one of the strangest and most cruell and inhumane parts that euer woman plaied in the world. And this being done, all obeyed her: and she alone had the government of the Empire; which yet was very great: for, it contained, in Europe, Thracia, and all the Prouinces of Gracia, the Isles of Sicilia, Candia, and those in the great sea called Archipelagus, and that part of Italie which was called Magna Gracia, and all the Prouinces of Asia the Lesse: all which were governed by this valiant woman, with great policy and authority. Who when she vnderstood of the victories & great power of C H A R L E S the Great, desiring to be at peace with him, and fearing his greatness, she commanded those Cities which she held in Italie, and the Gouerners of them, to hold good correspondence and neighbourhood with those Cities which were vnder the Pope, or King C H A R L E S: and, besides this, she sent her Ambassadors vnto him, excusing herselfe of that which had hapned concerning her son, and made him many great offers. Which, C H A R L E S gladly entertained: for, he was a milde Prince to the meeke, and rough and cruell to the proud and rebellious.

All Italy being in peace vnder the shadow and protection of CHARLES the Great, where now was no memory of the Lombards which were wont to oppose it, the duell, a fower of diffension, acted his part in the City of Rome: which was, that Pope LEO sitting (as they say) in Saint PETER'S Chair, two Priests, Cardinals of great account, called PASCAL & CRYMOR, conspired against him, and held fo strong a hand among their complices, that they vpon a day apprehended him going in Procession; which they did with such an vpure and tumult, that they had almost slain him; and handled him in such manner, that (as most Writers affirm) they put out his eyes, and cut out his tongue, and so they committed him prisoner to a Monastery of Saint ERASMUS; publishing abroad, that they did it for the crimes by him committed, and the errors which he maintained: and being there, as BERTHOBERTVS, and some others affirm, he was miraculously restored to his sight and speech; and a chamberlain of his vied such secret means, or with the permission of his Keepers, that he was hidden in a certain grave or sepulchre, and by night conveyed to the Duke of Spolita, who then was Lieutenant to CHARLES the Great in Italy (which offices then were giuen for euer, or for term of life); by whose aid he went to King CHARLES in Germany, to complain of the violence done vnto him: whither already messengers were sent by the other two, PASCAL and CRYMOR, with informations and accusations against him. But, notwithstanding, the Pope was solemnly entertained & honoured by him: and, remaining there som few daies, the King promised to come in person to Rome; and appointed to many Prelates and religious men to accompany him, as sufficed to bring him thither, and to restore him to his seat and estate, with great processions which were made for him: and the two Priests Cardinals afore said, which were so mightie, absenting themselves, euer gaue out in speeches, that they attended the coming of the King.

King CHARLES the Great, having taken order for the affairs of France and Germany, wherein he was a most mightie prince, determined to come into Italy; and at his coming, by the hand of his son PERDIN, he pacified some tumults there, and cam to the citie of Rome, accompanied with many great Dukes and other princes his subiects; whither repaired out of Italy and from other parts, many Bishops, prelates and other great men; and he was received with such honour

as to him did appertain; where kissing the Popes foote he did him such other superstitious reverence, as the custome was. After this, hauing continued eight daies in Rome, he commanded all the prelates and Princes which then were in the citie to be assembled; and the Pope himself, and all the rest being together, there were some which complained and accused the Pope the Emperor: and so the Emperor began openly to aske euery mans opinion concerning those accusations, wherto all answered, That no man ought to iudge the Head of the Church: which the King obseruing, he forbore to aske any more questions. Then the Pope which hitherto had bene silent, rose from the place where he sat, and went into a pulpit which was there, and with a loud voyce said, That seeing of his life and behauiour, no man would or had authority to make enquire, or to giue sentence, yet the next day (following the custome of his predecessors) he would purge and cleere himselfe, as it behoued: and therewith for that day the Confitorie was dissolued: And vpon the next day, they all being assembled in like manner, he againe went vp into the same place, and taking a booke of the holy Euangelists in his hands, laid with so lowd a voyce as they all might heare him, that he sware by God, and those holic Euangelists, that all that which his aduersaries had laid to his charge, was false and vntue, and that he had neither committed or thought any such matter as they objected; but that they had of malice and enuie slandered him: and that he therefore publicly made this protestation, and confirmed by his oath, seeing that to them all the manner of his life and gouernment was well knowne.

Having ended this his protestation, his oath was allowed, and himselfe commended; and the King commanded his accusers, PASCAL and CAPVVS, to be brought out and apprehended, and would haue condemned them to death: but the Pope was contented to spare their liues, in as they might be committed to prison, and thence condemned to perpetual exile. Eight daies after, the Pope having first considered how much the Greeke Emperors enuied his greatness, together with the small affection they bare to the worshipping of Images, and other points wherein they were opposite, and seperated from the Church of Rome, and how requisite it was to haue an Emperour which might maintain the prouinces of Italy in peace, which vpon euery light occasion were disturbed: but chiefly to shew himselfe gratefull for the benefits which he and the Church of Rome had receiued from him and the house of France, but aboute all for accepting his protestation in his owne defence, for a sufficient prooofe of his honestie, he resolved to make CHARLES the Great Emperour, and to translate the head of the Empire into the West. Wherewith, as most writers affirme, he did not acquaint the King, conceiuing the greatnes of his minde to be such, that he neither had desired it, neither would haue accepted the same. And hauing ruminated herupon, against the day of the natiuitie of CHRISTVS, hee commanded all the Priests Cardinalls, and all the other prelates to come to a Masse, whither CHARLES was also inuited, and came, together with all the other princes, and so about the midst of the Masse, the Pope then laying it, hee turned about from the Altar to the people, and with a loud voice said, That he did then elect, create, and publish CHARLES the great, the most mightie and victorious King of Italy, of the Germanes, and of the French-men, Emperour, and euer AVGVSTVS. Which being done, hee set the Imperiall Crowne vpon his head, and all those which were present consented thereto, with acclamations and applauses, saying, To the most godly, euer AVGVSTVS, great and most victorious Emperour CHARLES, God graunt long life and victorie.

This acclamation being ended, the Pope anointed him, and therewith anointed and intituled his sonne PERVIN with the good liking and consent of his father) King of Italy, which coronations were performed, with such feallings and solemnities, as the discrete Reader may well imagine; vpon the birth day of CHRISTY, which was the five and twentieth of December, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred, foure hundred threecore and eight yeeres from the time that CONSTANTINE the great transferred the Seate of the Empire into Thracia, to the citie of Constantinople, and three hundred and thirtie yeeres from the time that AVGUSTULUS was the last Emperor in Italy. And so CHARLES remained Emperor, and the Empire was transported from the Greekes to the Germanes; for although that CHARLES was King of France, yet his originall, linage, and countrie was in Germanie, and so it appeareth by histories; and notwithstanding that he was King of the French, he was borne in Germanie, and the French-men also had their originall and descent from Germanie; and the kingdom of France extended it selfe so farre in the time of this Emperor, that the most of the prouinces of Germanie were called by the name, and contained within the Kingdom of France; so as there is no reason that any authors should say, that the Empire was first transported to the French, and afterwards in proceefe

Pope Leo his speech in the Consistorie in his own defence,

From where and the that will by so ma and he
of the change of never had

0712

700

Charles the great crowned Emperor and his sonne Pepin
King of Italy by Pope Leo.

The originall of Charles the great.

of

of time to the Germanes; the which is maintained by OTHO FREISENGENSIS, GODERT, MITHREBENSIS, WESPERGENSIS, ABBA, and others, although of lesse authority; yet of no lesse diligence, as PLATINA, MARTIANVS, ROBERTVS, GAGVINO, and most diligently IOHANNES NAGELRAVS; and about all; BEATVS RENANVS, HENRICVS MCVIVS, in his notable bookes of the state of Germanie, and CYSPINIANVS, in the life of the same CHARLES.

Faunters be flowed by Charles the Great upon the citie of Florence.

Nicephorus
made Emperour of Gracia in place of Yrene.

Prince euer a free citie.

Nicephorus
made Emperour of Gracia in place of Yrene.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE GREAT, AND THREESCORE AND SIXTEENTH ROMANE EM- PEROR, & OF NICEPHORVS in Constantinople.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

When as Charles the great was made Emperour, he was of the age of fiftie and eight yeeres; and returning into Germany, he wholly conuerted the Saxons to the Christian faith, and made an accord with Nicephorus Emperour of the Greekes; which afterwards was broken, for that Nicephorus ayded the Venetians, against him and his sonne Pepin; but Charles finally making peace with the Venetians, left them in that liberty, wherein they haue maintained themselves vntill this present, and came to a full peace with Nicephorus. He diuided the Empire betwene his three sonnes, and commanded Pepin to goe to Corsica and Sardinia to defend the same against the Infidels which went thither to inhabit. And vnder the command of Charles his sonne he ouercame many other Nations, Rebels, and Infidels; and became so great as the King of the Malom.

Malometist sought his friendship. Two of his sonnes dyed, to wit, Pepin and Charles, so as his whole hope remained in Lewis, whom he made his successor; And being now very old, departed out of this world, ouercome with a paine in his side, hauing gouerned the Empire fourteene yeeres, and his kingdom, seven and forty.

Onsidering the great paines I haue taken in writing this History (I take God to record) that I stand in more need of some rest, and to be eased of so great a burthen, by abbreviating the Historie, and leauing out as much as may be without confusion, then to redouble my toyle, through the occasions which now present themselves. I say this, for that the Pope in this time had transferred the Empire to CHARLES the Great; and it hath euer since continued in Germany: And in Gracia also remained Princes, which in like manner were called Emperours, and pretended good right; so as we may say that the Empire and the title thereof was diuided, and came to be two Empires and to haue two Emperours. But I finde my selfe in a great confusion, to thinke how this matter may be handled: for, first to write of one, and then to retorne to write of the other, as did BAPTISTA IGNATIUS, in the short epitomie which he wrote of the Emperours; it seemeth to be inconuenient to bring one of them to an end, and then to make the Reader turne backe againe seauen or eight hundred yeeres in the historie. And to write one or two lines of the Empire, and then as many of the other, as did IOHN CYSPINIAN, that liketh me as ill: for it greatly confoundeth the historie, and so in a manner neither the one nor the other can be vnderstood; and to relate all together at large (for the many occasions which are offered, and the diuersitie of the times and places) I see not how it can be. To treat onely of the one (as some haue done) and wholly to leaue out and forget the other, I also hold it for an iniurie and crueltie. To let sink and die in obliuion a matter of so great importance as is the dominion of the Greeke Emperours, which continued so long afterwards; or to leaue the successors of CHARLES the Great, in which at this day the Empire remaineth, were to leaue the right way which leadeth to the place whither I am bound, and to take another whereby I should neuer attaine to my iournies end whither I am to trauaile. Wherefore seeing that I cannot goe both waies, after some considerations, I haue resolved to take for my principall subiect and historie of the Empire, that which the Church of Rome approued and then established, which is that of Italy and Germany, in the person of CHARLES and his successors; recounting their liues and actes with such order as I haue obserued in those which are already past, and by the way of discourse euer to make some mention of the Greeke Emperours, as occasion shall be offered: whereby he that shall reade this historie, may vnderstand the successe of both Empires, vnder the name and title of one only.

Hauing resolved vpon this course, let vs retorne to our CHARLES the Great, whom we lately made Emperour; and to NICEPHORVS who tyrannically vsurped the Empire of Constantinople, by deposing the Emperesse YRENE. I say then that CHARLES was fiftie eight yeeres old, when (as I haue related) he was by Pope LEO the third crowned Emperour in the citie of Rome; and had reigned three and thirtie yeeres the mightie King of France and Germany; all which time he had spent in the warres, against rebels and Infidels (whereof in Germany were many) with great felicitie and victorie, taming and subduing diuers nations and prouinces. CHARLES being come into Germany, wholly subdued the Saxons, and reduced them to the faith, wherein as the other nations of Germany, they euer were inconstant and stubborn. NICEPHORVS who then reigned in Constantinople, knowing his great power; after that he had settled himselfe in his throne, and was well assured of those whom hee had dispossessed, and had most cause to suspect, and had banished YRENE; hee sent Ambassadors of great account to CHARLES the Great, very louingly desiring him to hold him for his brother and friend. The Emperour CHARLES who was a benigne Prince, knowing how mightie the Sarazins were, and the great danger that all Christendome should incur through discord betwene the two Empires, concluded a peace with NICEPHORVS; and with his Ambassadors sent others of his owne, to confirme the same: which was established in the same manner and with the same conditions, as it was made with the Emperesse YRENE; the citie of Venice remaining friend to both parties without any subiection to either. There was also a peace concluded betwene him and GODFREY King of Denmarke, which some call Dacia; whereupon the said GODFREY

800

Charles the great subdued
the Saxons.

Nicephorus
sent an ambassador to Charles
the Great,

PREY departed out of his kingdom, roially accompanied, to see and speake with the Emperor, although that this interview tooke no effect; for his people dissuading him, counsell'd him not to see him: neuertheless the peace was made, and took place.

After this, it followed that for some matters which the Venetians attempted against the Empire of CHARLES, in the behalfe of NICEPHORVS Emperor of Constantinople (yet some affirme that it was through the false information of FORTVNATVS Patriarch of Grado) CHARLES the Great commanded his sonne PERIN King of Italy, to make warres against them: which he began very resolutely, and took the cities and fortresses which they held in the maine land, and besieged the citie of Venice it selfe both by sea and land; to the reliefe whereof the Greeke Emperor NICEPHORVS sent a fleet. Of these warres of Venice ancient authors doe write so diuersly, that a man can hardly say which was the truth: for some say that Venice was wholly taken; and others say that but some Ilands thereof, and that the place which is called Rialto defended it selfe: howsoever it was, the warre continued many daies, and CHARLES granted peace and libertie to the Venetians, to liue after their lawes and customes, for that hee was to renew the peace with the Greeke Emperour, which he had broken by reason of the Venetian warres. Some write that the Emperor received a great affront in these warres: but howsoever, the Venetians wonne much reputation to haue valiantly made head against him.

Charles his and testament.

CHARLES living in this prosperitie, made his will and testament: wherein he diuided his kingdomes betweene three legitimate sonnes which he had, to wit, CHARLES, which was his eldest sonne, PERIN, and LEVVS; wherein hee made his sonne CHARLES King of the greatest and best parts of France and Germany; PERIN he made King of Italy and Banania, and other prouinces; and LEVVS of Prouance, and of that part of France which bordereth vpon Spaine, and other prouinces. Which his testament he sent to be ratified by Pope LEO, and shortly after gaue to his sonnes the names and titles of Kings: but all succeeded after another manner: for God otherwise disposed thereof at his pleasure. This testament I haue seene written by some authors. It afterwards happened that a great fleet of Infidels which inhabited Spaine, with the aide and assistance of the Africans, invaded the Iles of Sardinia and Corsica: for the defence whereof the Emperor CHARLES sent commandment to his sonne PERIN, that he should send thither a Captaine, whose name was BVCARDVS; who tooke so good order, as he drave the Infidels out of those Ilands, and slew five thousand of them in one battaile. And with no lesse good successe, he vndertook another warre with the Dukes of the Bohemians, and of the Polonians, which is part of the ancient Sarmatia, who infected the countries vnder his dominion; against which he sent his sonne CHARLES, with great forces of Burgonians, Saxons and Germans. And the young CHARLES imitating his father, warred valiantly and with discretion: and coming first to a battaile with the Bohemians and LEO their Duke, he ouertane them, and slew LEO; although that therein passed many daies, and there was an intermission in this war: and in the end he had the like successe with the Polacres, so as they all became subiect to his father. For which his victories he was so much feared and renowned through the world, that a great King of the East, and AMYRATH the greatest of all the Mahometites, sent their Ambassadors with rich presents to him, desiring peace and friendship; and the like did all the Kings Christian.

Ambassadors sent to Charles
the Great.

Whilest as these and such like matters happened vnto CHARLES the Great, NICEPHORVS Emperor of Constantinople, shewed himselfe to be very couetous, imposing new taxes and tributes vpon his countries and subiects; hauing euer a desire to disturbe the Empire of CHARLES the Great (which he neuer forbore to doe) endamaging his countries, by robbing and spoiling the same, and secretly fauouring his enemies, whereby he gat little honour, and lesse profit: for this enuie and malice being fixed in his heart, he not only left to make war against the Infidels, as he ought to haue done, but knowing that they would warre with him, he bought his peace of them; and to his great shame and disgrace bound himselfe to pay them yearly, a great summe of money; and for that instant sent them great gifts and presents, hauing his purpose wholly bent against the Christians; which cost him his life, as presently shall be declared.

CHARLES living in this tranquillitie, GODFREY King of Denmarke made warre against him, who was a mightie Prince, and commanded a large dominion; and with great forces came into Friseland and into Saxony, where he did great harm. Against whom the Emperor addressing himselfe (although now old and vnweldie) speedily departed with a great Armie, and by the way newes was brought him, that the said King was dead, and his Armie returned; which was held

The death of the King Denmarke.

held for great newes, considering how great warres were expected. And, vpon the same day, newes came also, how that his son PERIN, who in great prosperitie raigned in Italy, was dead in the City of Milan: for the which he was sorry, and returned to the City of Aken, or Aix; whither Ambassadors came to him from HERMIOVS King of Denmarke, which succeeded GODFREY, humbly desiring peace: the like came from NICEPHORVS, Emperour of Gracie, and the like petition also came from AMBLAT, a King of the Moors, who raigned in a great part of Spaine: to all which, he made gracious answers; and, granting their petitions, gaue hearty thanks to God, for that he was generally so well esteemed. But, after this prosperitie, a great calamity and scourge ensued; which was, that it pleased God to take away his other sonne called CHARLES, who lay on the Borders of Germany, for the defence thereof: so as now his whole hope rested in his third son LEVVS.

The death of Perin, King of Italy.

NICEPHORVS the Emperor of Gracie, being assured of CHARLES the Great, and hauing bought his peace of the Infidels, took his son STAVRATVS for his companion in the Empire: determining to make warre against his neighbours the Bulgarians, whose King was then called CRVVS, with whom he fought some battels; wherein he had the victorie, and slew many of his enemies. By reason of these victories he grew so proud and insolent, that, making small account of his enemies, he managed the warres with little care or discretion: which this CRVVS perceiuing, he raised the greatest and best power that he was able to make, and the most secretly that might be, march by night, and before that it was day, assaulted the Emperors Camp: who being vnable to set his people in order, they were defeated, and the Emperor was there slain; and his son STAVRATVS, being sore wounded, escaped by flight; and so ended the life and Raig of NICEPHORVS. At this ouerthrowe great treasure was lost, and much of the Greek Nobility then perished: which happened in the yeer of our Saviour CHRIST eight hundred and five, he hauing raigned nine yeers. His sonne STAVRATVS, coming to Adrianople, and saluted and sworn Emperor, was so ill inclined, and so insulicent, and therewith (aboue all) so deformed, ill fauoured, and churlish in behauiour, that there was not any man pleased with his succession; so as within four months after hee came to the Empire, hee was dispossessed thereof by his brother-in-law MICHAEL; who, apprehending him, put him into a Monastery: and this MICHAEL, remaining peacefull Emperor, was a vertuous man, and a good Gouerner; but so inclined to peace, that afterwards, through his excessive fear of war, he lost his Empire, as we will shew. Now, as soon as he was chosen Emperour, he with all expedition sent his Ambassadors to the old Emperor CHARLES the Great, desiring friendship and peace with him; which was concluded in such manner as it was with his Predecessor NICEPHORVS. And CHARLES the Great, being now very old, desiring to take order for the estate of the Empire, called a most solemne Parliament in the City of Agnisgran or Aken, where he made his son LEVVS to be intitled CESAR, and his Successor, and his nephew BERNARD, son to PERIN, King of Italy, with the consent of Pope LEO, who vntill then liued. And, this being performed, the rest of his time he spent in alms-giuing, enriching the Churches and Clergie, releuing the poor; and reforming abuses, hee ordained good lawes and statutes. The yeer following, the Infidel-Sarazins of Spaine and Africa, invaded Sardinia and Corsica; wherein they made cruell war, and did the like on the Coast of Italy: but yet (though not without great trouble) they were repelled and scattered by the Emperors Captains, and by his nephew BERNARD King of Italy. It followed, that MICHAEL Emperor of Constantinople, being assailed by CRVVS, King of Bulgaria, against his wil was forced to take the Field, and to fight with him; and in the first battell got the victory: but fighting againe the second time, he was ouerthrowne, and therewith lost both the day, and the courage to rule; so as he voluntarily renounced the Empire: or (as some say) a principall Captain of his, called LEO, rebelling, and he not daring to make head against him, deposed himselfe from the Empire, and went into a Cloister, hauing raigned not fully three yeers. And this LEO, who was son of a Gentleman called PARDVS, was made Emperor: and presently, in the like manner as MICHAEL had done, he sent his Ambassadors to CHARLES the Great, to establish and confirm the peace concluded with his Predecessors; which was performed.

Michael, Em-
perour of Constantinople, deposed himselfe from his Empire.

In the mean time that LEO was chosen and crowned, CRVVS King of Bulgaria, following the victory which he had obtained against the Emperor MICHAEL, marched with his Army the direct way towards Constantinople, whither the Emperor LEO had drawn his forces, and had raised new; and CRVVS came so neer vnto the City, that hee might well see the same. Which disgrace LEO could not with patience endure (being a very valiant man) but

Cronus King of the Bulgarians slain by the Emperor Leo.

The death of Charles the Great.

but took the field with all his forces, in very good order, and made head against his enemy; who with the joy of the late victory attended him: and there was fought betwene them a cruel battaile, which lasted a great part of the day, and many men were slain of either partie. And therein happened a notable accident seldom seen in other encounters, which was, that in the furie of the fight the Emperor and the king chanced to meete; and either knowing his adversary, there charging one the other, the Emperor carried himselfe so well, as he ouerthrew the King dead to the earth; so that within a while after, the Bulgarians began to retire, and presently to runne away, in such manner that LEO had a full compleat and noble victory, together with the spoile of their Campe; and so returned to Constantinople with great joy. The Bulgarians being now contented to defend their owne limits, the Greeke Emperour remained in peace, as CHARLES the Great did in Germany. But as all things in this world have an end; so ended the good fortunes and great power of CHARLES the Great, together with his life: for being then of the age of threescore and eleuen yeeres, he was taken with a paine in his side, whereof within the space of seuen daies he died, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and fourteen, when he had reigned Emperour foueteene yeeres, and seuen and fortieth King of France and of Germany; and of Italy forty two.

During his whole life he had much reuerenced the Church & employed his authoritie to aduance it, and bountifullly imparted his treasure to enrich it: but this great abundance in so plentiful a peace, made Church-men grow dissolute. The Emperor CHARLES being well instructed in religion, knowing how much it did import that learning and good life should shine in those which were to instruct others, he called five Councells in diuers parts of his dominions: at Mentz, at Rhimes, Tours, Chalons and at Arles; and by the aduice of these Assemblies he set downe orders for the reformation of the Church, in a booke intituled, Capitula Caroli Magni; a reuerent testimonie of the singular piety of this great Prince.

This noble Prince was endued with so many excellent vertues, that we reade of very few in antient histories that excelled him, so as iustly he may be compared with any of the most excellent whosoever; for in martiall discipline, in valour, and dexteritie in armes, I know not any that hath exceeded him: he obtained so many victories, fought so many battailes, and subdued so many fierce and warlike nations, before, and after that he was Emperour, as any of the most famous that ever was. He was tall of stature, very well proportioned in all parts, passing strong, of a faire and graue countenance, valiant, mild, pitifull, a lover of iustice, liberall, very affable, pleasant, well read in historie, a great friend to Arts and Sciences, and sufficiently well seene in them, and a man which aboute all honoured and rewarded learned men. He was very charitable and a great almes giuer; and so good an harbourer of strangers, that in Syria, in Africa, in Egypt, and in other provinces of the Infidels, wherein Christians liued, he found meanes to haue hospitals, and almes houses, for such as were poore; and in his kingdomes, and euen in his court, he harboured and relieved strangers and pilgrimes. Concerning his faith and religion, he was very zealous; and the most of the warres which he made, were to enlarge the Christian faith. He superstitiously honoured & obeyed the Church of Rome, and the Pope Bishop thereof, and other Bishops and prelates, and commaunded his subjects to doe the like; whereof besides histories, some chapters in the Decretals, beare record. He was likewise very deuout, and spent great part of the time in prayer, and hearing diuine seruice. In his diet he was very temperate, and a great enemy to all riot and excess; for at his table were neuer serued aboute fower or five dishes, and those of such meate as best pleased his taste; which he vfed to the same end that God created them: which was for his sustenance, and not for a shew and pompe, as nowadaies is vfed; in such sort that themeades which naturally are but to please the taste, or at the most the fauour or smell, they will now haue them to satisfie all the other senses; and likewise finding new inventions, the greatest part of their life is spent at the table; and so they eate of a greater number of exquisite meates, drest in such manner and with such sauces, that it is hard to know what taste they haue, so as they seeme strange and rare: and sometime meate is made of such things that were not created of GOD to such purpose, no more then he made Goats to draw carts, or to till the earth.

Our CHARLES was not as some are at this day; for as he was rich and mightie, so hee was temperate and veruious; and maintained his body with what was needfull and wholesome. His ordinarie exercise was hunting, when hee had leisure, in time of warre; and in time of peace, hee gaue care to such as did reade histories to him; and sometimes hee heard musick, wherewith hee was much delighted, and had good skill therein. He

He was much condemned for hauing many base sonnes and daughters, but this was in the time of his youth; for afterwards it is to be supposed, that he contented himselfe with his wife: and for remedy of this imperfection, although he was three or foure times a widower, yet he euer married againe the daughters of mightie Kings and Princes. Finally, to make an end of that whereof I haue treated at large, he was an excellent Emperour, and feared and loued God, and died as I said, very olde and honourably; in peace with the Kings of Spain, England, Denmarke, Bulgaria, the Greeke Emperour LEO, and with all the Princes of that time. His body was buried in a sumptuous temple, which he caused to be built in the citie of Aquisgrame or Aix.

The authors from whom I haue drawne this relation, and where the Reader may reade the rest, concerning CHARLES the Great, and the other Emperours, and the histories of those times; are those which ordinarily I vse to alleage, since that the most antient authors haue failed; to wit, the Annales of Constantinople in the twentieth third booke, where they make an end, BLENDYUS in his second booke of his Decades, ZONARAS a Greeke author, SIGEBERTVS, and the Abbot WERSPERGENSIS, and MATHEW PALMERIVS, all three in the proesse of their Chronicles; PLATINA in the life of the Popes, CYSYNIAN BATTISTAI, BENNYTANVS DE ROMALDVS, JOHN CARION, JOHN EYKENSIVS, RAPHAEL VOLATERANVS, all these in their Emperours, VINCENTIVS an Historiographer in his Mirror. Besides the which it shall bee necessarie to see, and so may he doe which shall be a curious Reader, the French Historiographers, in matters which concerne the time of CHARLES the Great, which are PAVLVS EMILIVS a singular author, ROBERT GAGVIN, and MARTIN, OTHO FRISINGENSIS in the fifth booke of his histories, wherein he treateth at large of CHARLES the Great, and likewise RICHARD OF Saint Victor, and the Archbishop TURPIN.

Where Charles the Great was buried.

THE LIFE OF LEWES, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, SVR- NAMED PIVS, AND THRESCORE AND SEVENTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR: in whose time LEO and MICHAEL reigned in CONSTANTINOPLE. (*)

THE ARGVMENT.

LEWES being come to the Empire, confirmed the peace with the Emperour of Gracia and made warre in Dacia; from which it was requisite that he should returne in person; for redresse of certaine accidents which happened in Italy; which hee easily pacified by meanes of his Nephew Bernard, then King of Italy. This Emperour renounced all authority to confirme the Popes election. Bernard King of Italy rebelled; but being overcome, hee was led prisoner into France by his Vnkle Lewes, who came to his eldest sonne Lotharius that gouernour. Hee ouercame some Tyrants which rebelled against him; and confirmed to the Church the donation made by his father. There hapned vnto this Emperour one pitifull accident: which was, that his own children rebelled against him, and deposed him from the Empire: but they afterwards repenting, restored him to his estate. In which time befell a verie great disaster and ruine to Rome and Italy; for the Mahometists vnderstanding of the discord betwene Christian Princes, and standing in no feare of Michael the Greeke Emperour, hauing having prepared a good Navy, called Civita Vecchia, and robbing and burning, came to besiege Rome: from whence (so soon as they saw succour come out of Lumbarly) they returned. They also did much harme in Sicilia. After which Leo, Lewes, falling sicke of a grievous infirmite, dyed within fortie dayes; having first set in order the state of the Empire.

Peace between the Emperors Lewes and Leo.

In such manner as I have related in the historie of CHARLES the Great, his sonne LEVVS was by him in his life time nominated, and chosen Emperour. Wherefore when as his father was dead, he was by al men peaceably held and obeyed for such, and proved a vertuous Prince, and for his vertue and goodnesse was called PIVS. The first thing he vnderooke; was to come to the citie of Aken, where he held a generall Diet or Parliament; and took order for all things, concerning the peace, and government of the Empire, and the kingdomes which he inherited; whither came Ambassadors from Leo Emperour of Greece, to ratifie the peace made with his father: for the better assurance whereof, he sent Ambassadors with those which came, to the end that Leo should confirme the same in Constantinople.

He resolved also, as a new Emperour, and greedie of honour, to make warre against the Danes, in the behalfe of EROLDVS, and ANFREDVS, two Kings which were friends and subiect to the Empire, and were depofed from their kingdomes by the sonnes of GODFRAY. For this enterprife he made great preparation, sending for his nephew BERNARD King of Italy, as is before said: and for the better defence of his countries he left his 3 sons, to wit, LOTHARIVS, PEPIN, and LEVVS. LOTHARIVS which was his eldest sonne, he made gouernour of Bavaria, and the marches thereof; and to PEPIN he left the government of Aquitania, and other places thereabout: in the other provinces, hee confirmed the Dukes thereof, and in all he set very good order. Departing with his Armie, and being come into Saxony, the weather grew so cold, as during all that winter he could march no further: so as he was constrained to winter in a citie in Saxony called Parburnia, or Parburnia; for the cold was so extreme, as the seas in all that coast were frozen, and the warre was afterwards made by his Captaines.

LEVVS returned into France, by reason of other accidents which happened: for it fell out that in Rome, some great men seeing Pope Leo old and sickly, conspired against him. Against whom he proceeded, determining to haue done iustice vpon them; for which cause there was a tumult in Rome, and in some part of Italy: whereof when LEVVS was aduertised, he sent commandement to King BERNARD, speedily to go thither, to preuent rebellion in those parts: And BERNARD did so with all possible expedition, and fully pacified all matters in Rome, and in all Italy. Within few daies after, Pope Leo died, having bene Pope one and twenty yeeres: and in his place was chosen STEFHEN the fourth, who presently after his election went into France to the Emperour; and finding him in the Citie of Arles, was honorably receiued, and he with very great ceremonies and solemnities, crowned and anointed LEVVS Emperour, and then returned to Rome.

The coronation and solemnities being ended, there ensued some rebellions in the Dominions of LEVVS; for the Gascons, and other people their neighbours, rebelled; for that LEVVS had taken from them their Duke and Gouernour, called SEGUINVS: for it seemeth that then Dukes were made gouernours of Provinces, and that they for the most part, continued their whole life time in their governments, or at least a very long time; from whence afterwards came the great houses of Germany, and other parts: some by the Emperors gift; and others by force, making themselves tyrants; which in proceesse of time were ratified, and confirmed in their dignities. These aforesaid gouernements were also given with the titles of Earldomes, and Marquesses, as it appeareth by Histories: For, there was given vnto them a marke of land, or land (contained within certaine bounds or markes) to gouerne; so as they deriued their titles in such manner as did the Dukes. At this time another king of certaine Ilands in the North sea, taking part with the King of Denmarke, made warre also against the Emperour LEVVS: vpon these two occasions LEVVS raised new Armies. The matters of Gascony were ended in few daies with little difficultie; but the warres with the Danes were more doubtfully, for in the beginning the Saxons and the Imperialists had ill success: but at last the Emperour provided such Captaines and Souldiers, as they not onely obtained the victorie, but restored red EROLDVS to his kingdom, who liued in subiection to the Empire, hauing bene before deprived.

This happened in the third yeere of the raigne of the Emperour LEVVS: in the beginning of which, newes came that Pope STEFHEN was dead, who had been Pope but seven months, whom PASCAL the first succeeded, and executed his authoritie in the Popedom, without the Emperors confirmation, being thereto urged by both estates of Rome, ecclesiasticall and secular: whereupon he sent to excuse himselfe to the Emperour, for Pope Adrian and the clergie had granted that prehemence to his father CHARLES the Great, and to his successors, which was obserued vntill this time; which authoritie LEVVS renounced, as it appeareth by the chapter Ego Ludouicus in the distinction 63. LEVVS accepted this excuse, and ordained that from thenceforth the Imperiall authoritie should be obserued in this manner, viz. that as soone as the Pope was chosen, he should giue the Emperour to vnderstand thereof, as to a friend deuoted: so that Church; but not that he should stay vntill the Emperour had confirmed his election. Yet notwithstanding the Popes afterwards vied to sue to the Emperors to approue their election, vntill the time of LEVVS nephew to this LEVVS, who voluntarily left this custom: which had continued from the time of ADRIAN the second, as shall be declared in time and place, if our memorie faile vs not.

Whilest these things passed in France, in Germany, and in Italy, Leo (as I haue aboue said) ruling the Empire of Constantinople, and through his victorie obtained against the King of Bulgaria, liuing some space in peace and prosperitie, and highly esteemed; waxed so proud, and therewith so seuer and cruell to his subiects, as he purchased their hatred; whereto this was a furtherance, in that he sought to put downe the images in their Churches, as some of his predecessors had done. And it afterwards happened that one MICHAEL, a man of meane parentage, whom he had aduanced and preferred to great estate, and had placed neere about himselfe, and then held in prison, with a resolution to haue cut off his eares, was of power with the fauour of many men of great reputation which took him out of prison, and assisted him herein, to murder the Emperour Leo, and to seize vpon the Empire; when he had reigned seven yeeres and certayne moneths. He left behinde him foure sonnes, which afterwards had diuers adventures; but none of them obtained the Empire. In this manner MICHAEL gat the Empire of Constantinople, wherein we will leaue him, to make a conclusion of the historie of LEVVS the Emperour of the West. And thus it passed, that hauing vntill then had good successe in his affaires, in the parliament which he lately had commanded to be held in Aken, among other matters, which therein were ordained, one was, that his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS was made his companion in the Empire, and his second sonne PEPIN King of Aquitania, which containeth Languedoc, Gascony, Vienne, and Aniow: and his third sonne LEVVS was made King of Bavaria: and these three brethren presently took vpon them the government of their principalities.

But (as nothing in this world is permanent) after this there befell some troubles and warres between the Emperors and the Danes, who began to rebell: through which occasion, by the counsell and perswasion of certaine wicked persons, whereof some were prelates, his nephew BERNARD, King of the greatest part of Italy, rebelled also, and denied the dutie of superiority, which he owed to his vnckle LEVVS; and leuying an Army, held the Alpes and the passages into Italy, thereby to defend himselfe. Whereof when the Emperour had aduertisement, adiuſing him in the Parliament for an open enemy, he departed towards Italy, and by the way leuied men of warre: whither when he came he was of such power; that BERNARD durst not stand to his defence, but yielded himselfe into the Emperors hands; who after that he had pacified the state of Italy, returned into France, and leading BERNARD with him prisoner would that his doing should be determined by iustice; as if great an offence required; and he was condemned to death, and so was executed: others ascribe, he cast him into prison and put out his eyes. And LEVVS in BERNARD's place made his sonne LOTHARIVS king of Italy, whom before he had made CESAR, and his companion in the Empire: and he departing thitherwards, at his arrivall was there anointed and crowned by Pope PASCAL. After this little dangerous warre, there followed another against the Duke, or Gouernour of little Britanny (a Province of France) who also rebelled, with the people of that Province, intitling himselfe an absolute King; and not subject to the Emperour; and his courage was so great, that he leuied an Armie, and came with him to a battaile, wherein this tyrant whose name was VIRONARCHVS was ouerthrowne, but not without great difficultie and effusion of blood; but

Leo cast the images out of the Churches of the Graeke
Empire.

The Emperour
Leo murdered.

Michael succeeded Leo in the Graeke
Empire.

The Emperour
Lewes made his sonne Lotharius his companion in
the Empire.

Bernard king of Italy rebelled against his vnckle the Em-perour Lewes.

Bernard king of Italy re-belling, was condemned to die, was extended.

the Emperor had the victorie. After which, ensued the death of his wife the Empreſſe called HERNSOAR, for whom he was exceeding ſorrowfull; but yet he ſhortly after married the ſecond time. After this, the Emperor LEVVS liued two or three yeeres in peace; at the end whereof, a Duke, Gouverneur of Hungary, moued with a deſire to raigne, rebelled and began to waite in Austria, which in ancient time was called the vpper Pannonia, and in Dalmatia and Slauonia likewise; againſt whom LEVVS raiſed a great Army, and the tyrant being in ſundry ſkirmiſhes and batailles ouerthrowne, ſubmitted himſelfe, and the Emperour granted him his life; and ſo thoſe Prouinces remained in peace.

After this, certaine Romances came to complain to the Emperor againſt Pope PASCAL, pretending that he had cauled certaine principall men to be ſlaine, for that they were his ſouldiers and deſirous to doe him ſeruite; whereof the Pope excuſed himſelfe by his Ambaſſadors: which the Emperor not only accepted, but much fauored and honored the Papall Sea. And for as much as there aroſe ſundry doubts and queſtions, which of the Townes and Cities of Italy appertained to the Empire, and which to the Pope; the Emperour LEVVS made a new donation to the Church of Rome, ratifying the charters of his father, and grandfather; which RAPHAEL VOLATERRANVS writeth in the third booke of his Geographie, as hauing ſeene the Originall in the Popes library, in the Vaticane; the tenor whereof, as he ſetteth it downe, is as followeth, at whole perill I write the ſame.

In the name of God Almighty, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy-Ghoſt; I LEVVS the Emperor, doe graunt vnto thee PETER the Apoſtle, prince of the Apoſtles, and for thee, to thy Vicar, the Lord PASCAL the higheſt Biſhop, and to his ſucceſſors for euer, the Citie of Rome, with all the iuriſdiction thereof, and lands and marches thereabouts, the confines, cities, ports and places vpon the Tyſtane and Mediterranean Sea, Ciuita, Veſchia, Valneo, Reggio, Viterbo, Sauona, Papalonia, Roſello, Perugia, Manturna, Sutri, Nepe, and towards the countrie called Terra di Lauoro, Amenia, Segusia, Selentinio, Alano, Patrico, Fruſino, with all the lands and places in their ſubiection, and alſo all the gouernement of the City of Ravenna, accordingly as my father the Emperor CHARLES of holy memory, and alſo our grand-father PEPIN, in time paſt granted the ſame to Saint PETER the Apoſtle, that is to ſay, Ravenna, Bonia, Emilia, Eſtorepohis, Eorſi, Euenza, Imola, Bologna, Ferrara, Gomacchio, Adcia, Genua, and in the Marca, Peſero, Bano, Senigaglia, Ancona, Auſimo, Nuſimano, Eſſa, Foſſombrone, Relino, Vrbino, the territory of Valenſe, Cagliſe, Luccoleo, Ogobia, and alſo in Terra di Lauoro, Aſola, Aquino, Arpino, Thiano, Capui, and all the lands therein appertaining to our iuriſdiction, to wit, the dukedomes of Beneuent, Saleruo, and Calabria the ſuperior and inferior, and that of Naples, of Spoleto, Tuderto, Oricacio, Nuinia, and all that iuriſdiction; and alſo the Ilands in the Sea called the inferior, Corſica, Sardegna, and Sicilia. All which lands and Cities, PEPIN our grand-father of holy memory, and afterwards our father CHARLES, by their prerogative in writing, gaue and granted by their Ambaſſadors, ATHERIVS and MAYNADVS Abbots, of their owne franke and free will, ſent to Saint PETER and his ſucceſſors, and we alſo doe grant and allow the ſame. Moreover we will and declare, that the power and authority to chuſe the Pope, is, and ſhall remaine free to the Romane Councell and Colledge, to be made without any ſchiſme or diſcord; and that after that he is choſen and conſecrated, for the preſeruacion of loue and friendſhippe between vs, he ſhall ſend his Ambaſſadors to me, and to my ſucceſſors which ſhall be Kings of France, as the cuſtome was in the time of my great grand-father CHARLES MARTHEL, and PEPIN my grand-father, and of my father CHARLES, and this our will and grace which we doe, we giue in writing, and confirme with an Oath, and ſend the ſame to Pope PASCAL our Lord, ſubſcribed with our owne hand, by THEODOR the Legate of the Holy Church of Rome. Signed, Ego Ludovicus.

This donation was likewiſe attested by the Emperors three ſonnes, tenne Biſhoppes, eight Abbots, ſiftene Earles, one Secretary, a chamber-keeper, and a doore-keeper. The which donation the ſame Author VOLATERRANVS, affirmeth to haue ſeene confirmed by the Emperor OTH the third, in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred ſenenty and two, in the time of Pope IOHN the twelfth.

Of this donation (although not ſo much at large) mention is made in the Decretall, in the chapter Ego Ludovicus, in the diſtinction 63. In which chapter is expreſſed, the city of Rome, with all that Dukedome, which then contained all the lands, townes and cities vpon the ſea ſide, and the Hauons thereto appertaining, with all the other townes and cities of Tſcane; but their names are not ſet down, neither the Ilands about named.

This

This donation being made, the Pope within fewe daies after died, hauing been Pope eight yeeres; and EVONIVS the Second was choſen, after that there had been a ſchiſm, wherein two were choſen, who were perſwaded by muttall conſent to renounce their election, and in their ſteed was choſen EVONIVS, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred, foure and twenty, and in the eleuenth yeere of the Raign of the Emperor LEVVS. At the ſame time the Emperour with three Armies inuaded Britanny in France, which again rebelled, and with the effuſion of much blood ſubdued the ſame. In like manner, the yeer following, hee defended the Kingdom of Hungary againſt the King of Bulgaria, which made warre there, and compelled him to ſue for peace. He alſo ſent an Army to the relief of BERNALDVS Earle of Barcelona, againſt the Infidels of Spain, who made cruell warres vpon him. And ſo the Emperor LEVVS liued euer (although not without ſome troubles) in proſperity and with good ſucceſſe.

In the mean time there were no leſſe wars and troubles in the Eaſt Empire, wherein the Emperour MICHAEL raigned; a wicked and miſbeleeving Prince, who held abſurd and wicked opinions, faſting the Saturday with the Iewes, and denying the reſurreccion of the dead; and it pleaſed God, that the whole time of his Raign was infeſted with warres and troubles, and the Infidels eclipsed both his honour and Empire. Firſt, he had very dangerous wars with a great Lord called THOMAS; who taking part with BO, whom MICHAEL had put to death, being in Aſia he drew together much people, and, with the aid of the Infidels, took many Cities; and, coming into Europe againſt the new Emperour MICHAEL, took many cities in Greece, and beſieged the City of Conſtantinople wherein the Emperor was, and did put him ſo to his ſhifts, that he hardly eſcaped from being either taken or ſlain. But, being thus diſtreſſed and in deſpair, he reſolved to try the laſt and moſt perilous remedy; which was, That he, arming the greateſt number of ſouldiers he could get, ſallied forth, and with ſuch fury aſſailed his aduerſaries vpon the ſudden, that he ſlue a great number of them; in ſuch ſort, that within very fewe daies THOMAS was diuened to raiſe his ſiege, and to retire: And it followed alſo, that his ſleet at ſea was ouerthrowne by the Emperors Nauy; ſo as his power euery where began to decay.

Shortly after this, the King of Bulgaria came with an Armie to aide the Emperor: whom THOMAS reſolved to encounter, before that he ſhould ioyne with him; and comming to a battaile THOMAS was ouerthrowne, and the Bulgarians returned to their countrie, rich, with the ſpoiles of their victorie. Whereupon the Emperour aduentured to take the field; wherein his force ſo much encreaſed, that THOMAS not daring to fight with him, ſuffered himſelfe to be beſieged in Adrianople; where after many chances of warre, he fell into the Emperors hands, by whole commandement he was put to death: and pardoning ſome, and puniſhing others, hee ſubuerted all his enemies, and his people returned to their obedience. Neuertheleſſe, the Infidels in the warres and enterpriſes paſt became ſo hardie, that they euery where inuaded the territories of the Empire, ſpoiling and taking many places: principally there came a great ſleet of them into the Iln of Candia, wherein they made great ſlaughter, and obtained a notable victorie by ſea againſt the Imperialiſts. They likewiſe came into the Ile of Sicilia, and took a great part thereof, as IOHANNES MONACVS, BLONDVS, and SABELLICVS do write.

The Emperor LEVVS was required by Pope GREGORIE the fourth (EVONIVS being dead, after whom VALENTINIAN was choſen, who enioyed the Papacie but ſortie daies, and after his deceaſe this GREGORIE was made Pope) to relieue Sicilia: which LEVVS hauing other occaſions, reſuſed; alleging, that the Emperor MICHAEL ought to defend it, for that Sicilia was of his Empire. By reaſon whereof, the ſtate of the Eaſt Empire at that time endured many calamities, and MICHAEL the Emperor of Conſtantinople liuing in great trouble, continued but a while, as hereafter we will declare. And although that for that time the Ile of Sicilia was relieued by the Venetians, who then were very mighty by ſea; yet that had not ſufficed, if a mightie man called BONIFACE, Earle and Gouverneur of the Ile of Corſica, with the aid of a brother of his, and other great men in Italy, had not leuiſed a good Armie, and ſailing ouer into Africa, made ſo cruell warres in the marches of Carthage, ouerthrowing the Infidels in foure battels, as they were conſtrained to recall their Army from Sicilia (as they did in the time of SCIPIO the Africane, and HANNIBAL of Carthage). By this mean was the Ile of Sicilia freed from the Sarazins: for, conſtrained by this neceſſity, they abandoned what they had gotten, and returned into Africa.

The Emperor LVDOVICVS PIVS liuing in great honour and proſperitie, it pleaſed God to lay ſome affliction vpon him: for his owne ſonnes, vpon whom he had beſtowed kingdomes and prouinces, conſpired againſt him, and began to reſuſe to yeeld any obedience; and leuying

L 14

Thomas reſolued againſt Michael, Emperor of Greece.

The Bulgarians came to aide the Emperor of Conſtantinople.

Thomas rebelled put to death by the commandment of Michael, Emperor of Conſtantinople.

The Emperor Lewes his ſons eſcaped againſt their father.

Lewes pacified the tumults in Hungary.

A new donation to the Church of Rome, made by the Emperor Ludovicus Pius.

souldiers, raised armies against him. The causes moving them thereto, or as they falsely pretended, Historians relate diversly. Some say it was, because he so tenderly loved his young son called CHARLES, whom he had by his second wife, his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS, fearing to be disinherited, sought the ruine of his owne father. Others say it was, for that hee retained into his seruice a valiant Spaniard called BERNARDO DEL CARPIO, nephew to King ALONSO, of whom Spanish Historians write wonders: of whom he made so great account for his valour in the warres, that in all matters of importance he was wholly led by his counsell. Others say, that his wife LVDITH, who was a woman very ill conditioned, only ruled and bare all the sway with him: so as charging him with these defects, and others as untrue and vnjust as these, they opposed themselves against their father. Some great Prelates interposed themselves to pacifie so dishonest a controuersie: and, seeking to reconcile them, this milde Emperor loved his sonnes so tenderly, and was so desirous of peace, that, to grace his sonnes, he repudiated his wife (although much against his will); and, bestowing many great rewards vpon BERNARDO DEL CARPIO, hee discharged him. But the true cause was ambition and arrogance, which increasing in them, this fained agreement endured not long: for, the sonnes, by the consent of certain great men which joynd with them, apprehended their father, and, bereauing him of the robes and ensignes of Emperor and King, and generally of all government & authority, put him into a Monastery: which hee endured with such exceeding great patience, that when (being prisoner) he saw any of them, he neuer vttered any euill speeches; but would them to take heed, that those their priuate friends and fauourites did not one day deceiue them; and to remember what duty and obedience they ought vnto him being their father. Finally, there passed many treaties about this matter; and he liued one whole yeer depofed, and as a prisoner: at the end whereof, his sonnes acknowledging their error (although some write, against the will of his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS) restored him to his former estate, and hee forgave them: and as for the rest of their confederates, hee was content in giuing them a very light punishment.

The Emperor LEBVS being restored, his second son PERIN (whom he had made king of Aquitania) deceased, and left one sonne called after his name. This domestically and ciuill diffension between the Emperor and his sonnes, was very prejudiciall to all Christendome: for, the Sarazins of Africa, being of great power and very mighty, and making small account of MICHAEL the Emperor of Constantinople, seeing the Emperor LEBVS to be prisoner, and Italy abandoned, they with an exceeding great Nauy, and a great number of men of warre, came into Italy, and at their first landing took Civita Vecchia, and dispersing sundry companies of horse and foot into diuerse parts, they spoiled and burnt many Townes in Italie. And, not content therewith, they besieged the City of Rome it self, and battered the same for many daies space, whereby Pope GREGORY the Fourth, and the Inhabitants thereof, were much distressed, and many of them were slain. And although that VINCENTIUS MILVACENSIS, GENARDVS, and some other Historiographers, say, that they entered and took the City, yet it was not so; for, the City defended it self: but they took all the Suburbs called Vatican, and burned the Church of Saint PETER. Which, coming to the knowledge of GYARD, an excellent Captain, Marquess of Lombardy, and Gouerner thereof for the Emperor, being thither moued by Letters from the Pope, and sundry other considerations, hee raised a great power, and took his way towards Rome: which when the Infidels vnderstood, being loaden with the riches and spoils of Italie, they raised their siege; and, doing all the harm they could, went to Civita Vecchia, where they embarked themselves, carrying with them an infinite number of captiues and great wealth, and returned into Africa: and in their way they made what spoile they could in Sicilia.

At such time as Italy endured this calamity, the Emperor MICHAEL died in Constantinople, when hee had reigned nine yeeres; and (as it had not of long time before been seen in that Empire) his sonne THEOPHILVS succeeded him; who although that in conditions hee was a better Emperor than his father, yet was he no better affected to the Pope, nor to the adoring of Images: for which cause hee put many to death. What befell him wee will hereafter briefly declare.

But returning to the affairs of Italy, which was freed from the danger and oppression of the Infidels; Pope GREGORY the Fourth died, hauing been so aboue fifteen yeeres. This Pope instituted the Feast of All Saints, which is celebrated in the Church vnto this day. After the decease of this Pope, a Cardinall called SVVINVS was chosen: and for as much as it was a very vnseemly name, for so high a dignity, by a general consent it was changed; and hee was called SVVINVS the Second. This was the cause why it hath been euer since vntill this day held for a custome, that the new chosen Popes leaue their old names; whereby they were called before, and take the name of some of their predecessors. Within few daies after the death of the Pope, in the same moneth LEBVS the Emperor of Rome and King of France fell sick and died; so as within the space of foure daies died three the most famous heads of the world, viz. two Emperors, MICHAEL and LEBVS, and Pope GREGORY: LEBVS before he died, made his yongest and well-beloued son CHARLES, King and Lord of Austria. And LOTHARY, who was Emperor Elect, remained his heire generall of all the rest, excepting BANARIA, whereof his other sonne LEBVS was King. And so ended the life and Empire of LVDOVICVS PIVS, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and fortie, when he had reigned full twentie fixe yeeres, and had liued sixty foure yeeres. SVVINVS being then Pope in Rome, and THEOPHILVS sonne of MICHAEL, reigning Emperor in Constantinople.

was

Pope SVVINVS died afterwards called Sergius
the French.

The death of the Emperor LEBVS.

THE LIFE OF LOTHARIVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND THREE SCORE AND EIGHTEENTH RO- MAN EMPEROR, AND OF THEOPHILVS, Emperour in Constantinople.

(*)

After the death of LVDOVICVS PIVS, the Western Empire descended to his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS; and ioyntly therewith his father left vnto him those kingdomes, which he and his father CHARLES the Great, possessed in France, in Germany, and in Italy, excepting those Provinces which were giuen to his brothers LEBVS, and CHARLES, which were Bauiere and Austria, with some others thereto adioyning. As soone as the father was dead, these two sonnes, discontent with their portions, determined to take Armes against their elder brother LOTHARIVS; and LOTHARIVS in like manner pretending all to be his, for that he was the first borne, meant therefore to depose them: whereupon there presently beganne betweene them a very cruell warre, eether party being ayded by sundrie Dukes and great personages. Some writers affirme, that these two brethren LOthariVS and LEBVS, who were sonnes of one mother, held together in this warre against CHARLES, who was the Emperours sonne by his second wife. But there is no reason why it should be so: for it seemeth not likely, that CHARLES alone could haue power sufficient to make head against the other two; and also for that LOTHARIVS sought to be Lord of the whole, allowing neither the one nor the other. And it afterwards plainly appeared,

Kingdoms left to Lotharius.

The Emperor
LEBVS depofed, and put into a monastery by his sons.

The Sarazins
came into Italie, and besieged Rome.

The Vatican in Rome taken and sacked by the Sarazins.

The death of Michael, Emperor of Constantinople.

The death of all Saints ordained by Pope Gregory the fourth.

War between Lotharius and his Brethren.

appeared, that L O T H A R Y in the peace which they made, entered not as a partaker, but as a spectator and almost wheredo follow the most common and most likely opinion, which is, that L O T H A R Y was not wanted against the other two. L U I S and C H A R L E S came out of Germany, with a very valiant army, against the Emperor L O T H A R Y; who in like manner outrage France, Germany and Italy, led the greatest and best Army that of long time had been seen for as Authors which write thereof affirm, that since the waies between E C C I and A T T I L A, there had not been drawne together in Europe the like number of good men of war. The hatred and enuie between these brethren was so great, that they could not avoid a battell, which was fought neere to a little Town called Favenna; and as the Captains and souldiers of either party were valiant and expert in Arms, the Fight was the more cruell, and one of the most bloody that hath been seen, and wherein most men were slain, and most blood spilt; and it lasted a great part of the day; the victory euen itselfing it self doubtful, inclining sometimes to one side, and sometimes to the other. untill that towards the evening, the Emperor L O T H A R Y his forces, being vnable to endure the fury of their adversaries, began to faint: wherewith, courage increasing of the one side, and failing on the other, L O T H A R Y and his people were driven to flee, and L U I S and C H A R L E S remained with the victory.

The Nobility of France slain in battell.

All those which write of this conflict, affirm, that therein were slain the greatest part of all the Nobility and flower of the French Nation; and that in number more men died, than in any other that in France hath hapned euer since the battell which was fought between E C C I and A T T I L A, King of the Hunnes, in the fields of Catalonia; as before we have related. L O T H A R Y escaped thence by flight to the City of Aken; and boulding himself to bee there in no safety, he by sundry waies came to France, where hee again gathered head, and leued new forces out of Italy and other parts; and his brethren resolved to pursue him. And notwithstanding that from the Pope came the Archbishop of Ravenna, and many other Prelates voluntarily, to treat of peace between them, yet it auailed not: but L O T H A R Y would the second time try the fortune of the warres, and his brothers fought no lesse; so as they fought; and he was again ouerthrowne, and the Archbishop of Ravenna also with him, who came as an Ambassador of peace, and was that day in L O T H A R Y his Army with three hundred horse, which he brought with him out of Italy and, in despite of himself, was constrained to flee, the greatest part of his people being first slain.

Lotharius
ouertrowne the second time.

After these cruell battells between these brethren (which, as it is to be beleued, God permitted for a punishment, for the contumacie and disobedience which they shewed toward their father) and after they had much diminished their forces, they gaue eare to a peace; and the said Archbishop of Ravenna, and many other Prelates, brought them to an agreement: wherein the Emperor (as a man forced and overcome) lost much. The conditions were, that the kingdoms should be diuided between them: which diuision so much decayed the power of France, that it neuer after recovered that greatness which vntill then it held; the accord was made in this manner: That L U I S should be Lord and King of all that part of the Kingdomes and Prouinces which lie ouer the Rhine, in the East side of France, containing all Germany to wot, Engaria, Bohemia, Moravia, Frisia, Banaria, Saxonia, Suenia, and all the rest, and should be called King of Germany: And that C H A R L E S, the youngest brother, should be called King of France, and should be sole Lord thereof, excepting Galicia Narbonensis, now called Provence: and that those Lands which lie between the Rhine and the Maase (which euer since that time are called Lobharingia or Lorraine) after L O T H A R Y and part of Burgundie, should bee subject to the Emperor L O T H A R Y, together with Lombardy, and all that part of Italy which was in his subjection, with the title and dignity of Emperor.

The diuision of the kingdomes of France, between Lotharius and his brethren.

This peace being made with L O T H A R Y against his will; hee, reinforcing his Troops, took his way towards Italy, and so to Rome: where, after some jealousies between them, Pope SIGISMUND crowned him Emperor; and his Sonne was chosen his Successor. Yet some Writers say, that onely his Sonne was crowned: but this in my opinion seems to be most likely. But hee leaue both the Father and the Sonne (for, in truth, L O T H A R Y was of small power after that he was overcome, and yet liued in greater peace than those times permitted) and we will say something of the Emperor of Constantinople, T H E O P H I L V S, and of the losses which ensued in Christendome by reason of the wars between these three brethren.

Lotharius crowned Emper or by Pope Sergius

The Greek Emperor T H E O P H I L V S differed not from his Predecessors in points of Religion; and, concerning his government, he took very good order, and maintained himself in his estate; yet somewhat noted of cruelty. In the East he had great and cruell wars with the Sarazins, who made incursions into his Dominions in Asia the lesse: in which warre two Captaines did him especial service: the one was called M A N Y L, and the other P H E R V S; the Emperor himselfe in person went to this warre, wherein the victories were variable, sometimes of his side, and sometimes against him. Being in this manner busied, and our Emperour and the house of France (which then was the only defence and refuge of all Christendome) being weakened and diminished, by reason of the said warres, and dissension which hapned, the Moores of Africa with a great Naue came into Italy, and into Sicilia, and landing in many places, tooke sundry Townes. Lastly, a mighty King of Africa, called S A B B A S, with a great flecte of shippes and Gallies entered Italy: And knowing that the Coast neere to Rome was well Garrisoned and fortified, he assailed Otranto; and that place being taken and sackt, he did the like by other Townes on the same Coast: and returning from thence, he sayled into the Adriatique Sea, now called the Gulfe of Venice, and tooke and spoyled many places.

The Emperor of Gracia T H E O P H I L V S seeking to prevent this danger, sent a good Captaine called T H E O D O S, with a great flecte, to which the Venetians ioyned theirs, which they had already rigged for the same purpose, (containing threecore gallies): This Infidell king of the Moores was nothing terrified to come to blowes with T H E O D O S, but they fought a most cruell battaile, wherein the Christians were ouerthrowne, and the Venetian flect fell into the hands of their enemies. But T H E O D O S escaped by flight. The Mahomettians became so haughty by reason of this victory: and it caused so great feare in Italy, that if God had not sent reliefe, the Infidels in short space might haue made themselves Lords thereof: for presently after this ouerthrow, they assaulted Ancona, tooke it, and burnt it, with sundrie other Townes vpon that Coast. And their power was then so great, that neither the Emperor L O T H A R Y, nor the Pope, were able to make head against them, but contented themselves to keepe and defend what they had in possession: Neither was the Emperours brother C H A R L E S King of France, able to see any flecte to Sea, or yeelde any reliefe: for the Normans (a most fierce Nation) made warres vpon him, robbing and harrying his Countries, with whom he fought many battels.

Norfolk-men.

Of these Normanes I finde no antient Authors that make any mention; whereby I conjecture that it was then some new name of the people and Inhabitants of those Countries which rosin that manner: yet S A B B E L I C V S, and N A V C L A R V S, and some others affirme, that they came from Denmarke. When all other succors failed, it pleased God to send a remedy: forthere hapned so great a Tempest vpon the Sea, that the greatest part of King S A B B A S flect was sunk and cast away: and those which escaped, returned into Africa, to mee, and were weather-beaten: and so Italy for that time was relieved, and restored to liberty: but yet afterwards they againe infected it.

A flecte of the Infidels cast away in a tempest

At this time died Pope S E R G I V S, hauing bene Pope little more then three yeers, and then succeeded L O the fourth, in whose time P L A T I N A affirmeth this ship-wrack of the Moores Nauie to haue hapned: but most say as I haue written. In the beginning of Pope L O his papacie, T H E O P H I L V S Emperour of the Greeks died in Constantinople: who before his death feeling himselfe deadly sick, and that he could not escape, and considering also that he should leaue his sonne M I C H A E L very young, and that T H E O D O S the Captaine before named, was rich and very mighty, he resolved with himselfe, first to dispatch him out of the world, to the end that he should not vster the Empire when he was dead: which was a very good resolution, and signe of a good Christian in a man so neere his end. First, hee called him to be deteined in his Palace: and feeling his sickness so to increase vpon him that he could not liue, he made his head to be stricken off, and within few houres after died. After his death, his sonne M I C H A E L was made Emperor, and for as much as he was very young, his Mother T H E O D O R A the Emperesse (as heretofore did Y R E N A Mother of C O N S T A N T I N E) tooke vpon her the government, and ruled the Empire for her sonne M I C H A E L, and not ill, as it is written: but as he increased in yeeres, so there grew in him a desire to gouerne alone, and his Mother became more ambitious: in such manner, that the young man setting all respect apart, compelled his Mother to goe into a cloyster, and so hee remained sole absolute Lord.

The death of the Emperor Theophilus and his good resolution, Michael succeeded his father in the Empire.

Within a little while after, the Emperor L O T H A R Y remaining in Lorraine, and Pope L O in Rome; the Infidels growne proud by reason of their late victories; and coveting the wealth of Italy, repaired vp the remainder of their flecte, and building other vessels, returned to make a conquest thereof, with greater power and resolution then at the first: And after some spoiles

The Moores landed in Asia
with intent to haue taken Rome.

spoils done in some other places they sayled directly to the port of Ofia, where setting their Army on Land, they marched towards Rome, with an intent to haue taken it, and afterwards all the Countrey: which as they hoped, for the poore Inhabitants feared. But it pleased God they were repulsd, and deceiued in their expectation. Neuerthelesse, they came and besieged Rome, and gaue a very great assault vnto it: but it was so well provided and furnished, and those which were therein did so valiantly defend the same, that losing all hope to get it, and vnderstanding that succours were comming, robbing and burning the Vaticane with great cruelty, they raised their siege: first burning and prophaning Saint PETERS Church which was there, and where it standeth at this day. And for as much as the Moores raised their siege from before Rome without taking it, the French writers attribute the honor thereof to CHARLES king of France, who (they say) came to relieue it, and for feare of whom the Moores departed; and leaving their attempt against it, setting their Army in order, they took their way towards Naples, burning and spoyling all as they went.

In the meane while, Pope LEO fallying forth of Rome, with the ayde of the Emperour LOTHARY, and his Sonne, whom in his life time he had made his companion in the Emperie and in the kingdome of Italie, who sent him great supplies; he rayled a sufficient Army, where with he went to seeke his enemies, which laden with great riches and spoils, were come neere to the port of Ofia; where the Pope considering how mighty they were, if they should remain in Italie (as they gaue out they would) and how much the Countrey were ruined, if they should embarke themselves with their prisoners and riches, and the Emperour staying longer then they would he should haue done, he refused to vse the sword: and encouraging his souldiers, hee charged his enemies, and fought with them a sharpe and bloudie battaile, wherein many were slaine of eyther partie. But in the end it pleased God that the Christians had the victory: and a great slaughter was made of their enemies, and a great number of Captiues were released, and all that they had taken, recovered, and the greatest part of those which fled, were ouertaken and carried to Rome in great triumph.

Those which remained in the harbour at Ofia, vnderstanding of this ouerthrow, hoisting their sailes, with all the haste they could, returned into their Countrey: And so was Rome freed from the great calamitie and miserable seruitude which it feared. Great was the ioy which was conceiued through all Christendome for this victorie, and the Pope was highly extolled, who speedily returned to Rome: where with the consent of the Citizens he resold to compass in with a wall, all those Suburbs called Vaticane, wherein are Saint PETERS Church, and the Popes Palace, to he end they should no more endure the like, as they now twice had suffered. To the performance whereof, the Emperour LOTHARY and his brethren LEVVES king of Germany, and CHARLES the Bauld, King of France, sent much of their Treasure: and the worke began with such expedition, that notwithstanding it was very great, and the walles full of Turrets: yet in the space of five yeeres it was perfected and fully ended: and so that part was made a Citie, and called Chitua Leonina, after the name of Pope LEO.

The yeere following the Emperour LOTHARY went to Rome, to see and speake with the Pope, for that he was falsely informed that he purposed to haue reduced the right title of Emperour to Constantinople, whereof the Pope gaue him full satisfaction: and so contented, the Emperour returned into his Countrey. And seeing himselfe now old, and that his Emperie had neuer bene vnfortunate, as well for that he was ouertrowne and dispossest by his brethren, as for other accidents in Italie, imputing it to his sinnes, especially for the disobedience and little regard which he had shewed to his Father; he resolved to put himselfe into a religious house, and to leaue his Emperie to his Sonnes, and putting it in execution, he made a diuision thereof in this manner: to his eldest Sonne LEVVES, he gaue that which he held in Italie, and to the second, whose name was LOTHARYS, he gaue the Prouince of Lorraine, and other Lands, which in the diuision were allotted to him in France, and in Germany, about the river of Rhine; and to CHARLES his third Sonne, he gaue that part of France, which is called Gallia Narbonensis, and now Prouence and Languedoc, which fell to his share in the peace which he made with his brethren when he was by them ouertrowne.

In these estates aswell as in others were afterwards great alterations, which I haue no time to relate: this done, he became a Monke in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord; eight hundred fiftie and six, and so he liued, and within a while died, MICHAS continuing yet Emperour of Constantinople. And shortly after died Pope LEO the fourth, whom succeeded IOHN an English woman, as Historians asseme; who disguising her selfe

The Moores burnt the Vaticane &
Saint Peters Church in Rome

A battell fought betweene Pope Leo and the Infidels.

The victory of Pope Leo.

The Emperour Lotharius diuided his Empire betweene
his three sonnes.

The Emperour
Lotharius renounced his empire and became a Monke.
Pope Leone.

in apparell; and changing her name, being excellently well learned, was chosen Pope, and having two yeeres liued in the Papall dignitie, died suddenly in Partus; and her succeeded BENEDICT the third.

THE LIFE OF LEVVES THE SE- COND OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND NINETEENTH

Romane Emperour.

(*)

WE haue already said, that the Emperour LOTHARYS, voluntarily and of his owne free will, imparted to his eldest sonne LEVVES the name and dignity of Romane Emperour; of whose life, and for some time after, Historians haue written very little; and in that little is a great confusion amongst them: which hath put me to much trouble, for that I haue bene so carefull and haue vsed all diligence to write the truth. The difficultie is, in that this LEVVES and his Vncle king of Germany were both of one name, by reason whereof Authors attribute the acts and doings of the one, to the other, being deceiued therein: and which is worst of all, there are some which of the raigne of this Emperour LEVVES write nothing at all, of which BLONNVS is one, notwithstanding that in all the rest he hath shewed great diligence, ending with his father; so as presently after LOTHARYS, they place CHARLES the Bauld, king of France, whereas to the contrary they should first write the life and raigne of this his sonne LEVVES. But I will follow the most approved Authors, and (in the best manner I shall be able) will bring the truth to light, and will rather choos to say but little, and that certaine, then to please with many forged accidents. In the beginning of the raigne of this LEVVES there happened a very prodigious thing; which was, that in the Citie of Brescia in Lombardy for three daies it rained blood, so fresh and so perfectly as if it had bene of a Bull, or of some other beast lately killed. First of all, this Emperour was very zealous and deuout in Religion; much affected to the Romish Church, and the ministers thereof (for he knew no other) and was very pitiful, milde, sincere, vnspotted, of a good condition, and of his word and promise very iust. After the decease of Pope BENEDICT, NICHOLAS the first being chosen, the Emperour went to Rome, to confirme his election; where the Pope and he conuerled together very louingly. It afterwards followed that a great flecte of the Moores of Africa came into Italy: but the Emperour gathered together so good forces against them, that (with small hurt done) they were repulsd: for which his care and diligence he was highly extolled. And notwithstanding that this Prince was so well inclined yet, ADOLPHVS Duke of Banquent rebelled, with Capua, and some other Citie; and denying to be subject vnto him, held for the Emperour of Constantinople. And whereas Italie in times past had beene subject to those Emperors, they had now lost it, as being vnable to defend the same; yet Italia and Calabria were of long time after vnder their gouernment. Against this Duke, the Emperour LEVVES leued an Armie, and in person went to suppress the rebellion: But ADOLPHVS being vnable to defend himselfe against him, sent to make his excuse; alleaging, that what was done, was against his will, and that he had purposed

It rained blood in Brescia at the time of the Em-perour LEVVES
the Second.

to come to his service and did so; and L E V V E S received and pardoned him: and then went to such places as rebelled; which he easily took, excepting Capua, which stood upon defence; but in the end craving pardon, they yielded. From thence he went to Benevent, where A D V L O R V S received and lodged him, in outward shew, as his soueraigne Lord, and whom he loved; by whose persuasion and counsell (for he seemed to speake from a loyall heart) the Emperour discharged his Armie, and retained few more then the officers of his house: but within few daies after, A D V L O R V S (as a disloyall traitor) sought to put in execution what he had projected: and getting together certaine Armed men, he suddenly trust into the Emperours lodging with intent to haue slaine him; and had done so, but that being perceived, the Emperour and those few which were with him, so valiantly defended themselves, that they gat out of Benevent, and went to Rome; from whence by the Popes counsel, he sent such an Armie, that the Traitor was constrained to forsake the Countrey, and to flee into Sardinia: and so L E V V E S remained in peace, Emperour in Italy.

In the meane season, whilest he was thus busied in Italy; M I C H A E L, reigned in Constantinople; in Greece; and in part of Asia, who deposed his mother from the gouernment: but hee proud carelesse and vicious, and applied himself onely to feasting, sports on horsebacke, and other pastimes, his estate and house being ruled by fauourites; and in the warres which he made in Asia against the Infidels, he was twice shamefully ouerthrowne; yet P E T R O N A S a Captaine of his obtained a noble victorie. In the end, one of his great fauourites, called B A S I L I V S (a man of base linage and condition, whom he had aduanced to great power and dignitie) killed him by treason, and gat the Empire to himselfe; for already in M I C H A E L S daies he was made C A E S A R. This happened in the 13 year of his raigne, and in the year of our Lord, eight hundred seuentie and six. Yet the Empire of M I C H A E L was fortunate in one thing, which was, that the King of Bulgaria, and many other people which beleueed not in I E S U S C H R I S T (at the least in such sort as they ought to haue beleueed in his time were wholly conuerted).

In these daies also France escaped not free from warres, betweene C H A R L E S the Bauld, vncle to this our Emperour L E V V E S, and the Normanes; a most fierce nation: neither was L E V V E S the King of Germany without warres against other nations, which I am not bound to relate, neither such as happened in other Kingdoms, but only such as are for our purpose. I say then, that within certain yeers, L O T H A R I V S King of Lorraine, brother to the Emperour died; and his Vncle C H A R L E S King of France, would haue made seisure on Lorraine, and all the other lands which he held; but the Emperour opposed himselfe, and vsed so good meanes, that he tooke possession of all, as heire to his father: whereupon there arose great wars and controuersie between them, which lasted about fife yeeres. Soone after this, the Emperour being in Milan, was taken with an infirmite, whereof he died: who in my opinion (so farre as I can gather out of Histories, left no sonnes to succede him: wherefore those which say that C H A R L E S and L E V V E S were his sons, are deceived; for they were the sons of his Vncle L E V V E S, King of Germany and Bavaria: the cause of which error was, for that these two Princes were both of one name; but he that diligently readeth the Histories, shall finde that which I say to be true, and the rest false. I do not produce reasons and conjectures to verifie my opinion, which are to no other purpose, but to weary the Reader, and make the History more obscure; I presuppose that I say the truth, and then all is cleere. And to conclude with L E V V E S, of whom I haue said little, and that confusedly (for that I could not cleerly discouer any more) I say that he died in the year of our Lord 878, when he had reigned 21 yeers; yet some say but 19, at which time I O H N was Pope of Rome, and in Constantinople B A S I L I V S was Emperour, who although he entered into the Empire as a Tyrant, yet he was no euill prince.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE SE-COND SVRNAMED THE BAULD, AND FORTYSCORE ROMAN EM-PEROVR; AND OF BASILVS; Emperour of Constantinople:

(*)

THE death of the Emperour L E V V E S was soone knowne and published to the world, as usually is the death of such Kings and Princes as he was: but his Vncles C H A R L E S the Bauld, king of France, and L E V V E S king of Germany, who were his fathers brethren, had soonest intelligence of which were sonnes to the Emperour L V D O V I C V S P I V S, the first of that name: and although they were now old and vnwieldie (for they had bene Kings about thirtie yeeres, yet each of them pretended to be Emperour. C H A R L E S for that hee was King of France seemed to haue the better title, for it was transferred thither in the person of his grandfather: and L E V V E S for that he was his elder brother, conceived as much. But C H A R L E S vsed greater expedition, and made better prouision, by reason of the neereenesse of France to Italy, being thereto ayded by his owne condition; for he was naturally proud and ambitious: so that with greater celerity then any man would haue thought, he had leued a great Armie, and passing the Alpes came into Italy, and took his way directly for Rome; but hee sent his Son L E V V E S another way, to seise vpon that which the Emperour L E V V E S had taken in France, by the death of his brother, which was Austrasia, now called Lorraine. C H A R L E S being come to Rome, where he had already by messages and letters (and as some say by money and bribes) solicited, and gotten the good will of the Romanes, and of Pope I O H N the eight, or ninth, was presently Crowned by him, and held for Emperour, and in the meane time, his brother L E V V E S in Germany failed (not to leuy forces to come against him: with a resolution to deprime him of the Empire, and of his life also if he could. But C H A R L E S hauing settled the affaires of Italy in very good order (ingreat choler against his brother) returned into France, against whom he raised his whole power. They beginning to march, the one against the other; L E V V E S was arrested by death, at Frankford; leaving his Dominions, first, diuided betwene his 3 sons, which were very valiant men, to wit, L E V V E S, C A R L O M A N, and C H A R L E S, of which three names, the ofspring of C H A R L E S the great made great account: which causeth a great confusion and obscuritie in the Historie, if the Reader be not very attentue. The diuision was made in this manner by the mutuall consent of the three brethren; to L E V V E S was given Saxony, Turingia, Frisland, and the Prouinces within

Mm 2

The division of King Lewes his Dominion, between his sons.

within them contained, and that he should be called King of Ostrofrancia, or East France. To CARLOMAN, was allotted Bavaria, Austria, Carinthia, Slavonia, Bohemia, and Moravia, with the title of King of Bavaria. To CHARLES befell Suevia, Francia, and all the rest of Germany, and some Cities in Lorraine, which had been vnder his Vncle LO THARIUS, and hee (as his Father had bene) was called King of Germany. Their Vncle CHARLES the Bauld, Emperor and King of France, being hereof aduertised, making lesse account of the Sonnes, then he had done of the Father, being more proud and ambitious, then hardy and valiant, entred Germany with fifty thousand men, and went as farre as Coleyn; neere wherunto his nephew LEVVS, the new King of East France, stayed for him, with the greatest part of his Fathers Army, assisted by his brothers CARLOMAN, and CHARLES, and other great Dukes and Princes of Germany, first seeking peace: but seeing that the Emperor would not grant the same, he ioyned in battaile with him, which was fought of either side very obstinately. And the Emperor seeing his enemies fight with such resolution, fled from the battaile, and his nephew LEVVS remained with the victorie. In this battell and pursuit, was made great slaughter of the French Nobilitie: And so the Emperor returned into his Countrey, with lesse power, and more dishonour, where he reposed himselfe for a season: his nephewes taking no care further to trouble him.

Baldwin Earle of Flanders, fell in loue with the daughter of Charles the Bauld.

The Originally
of the Earldome of Flanders.

After this, it hapned that one BALEVIN, then Gouvernor or keeper of that Countrey, which now is called the Earldome of Flanders, (and was lately so populous and so well inhabited, and then for the most part was nothing but wood and Forrest, with some few little villages) fell in loue with one of the Emperors daughters; and her father being absent in the wars, he found means to conuey her out of the Palace, and so hid himselfe with her in those woods: against whom the Emperor meaning to haue proceeded with all rigour, at the entreaty of many religious persons and of estate, was perswaded to marry him to her; and doing so, gaue him that countrey, with the title of Earle of Flanders: and this BALEVIN proued to be so excellent a man, and vied such industrie, that he replenished the Countrey with Inhabitants, which so manured the Land, that within few yeeres it did abound with people and all other things necessary: And his Sonne ARNVLPHVS, and his successors, vsing the like diligence, it came to be one of the most flourishing countries of the world; of such power is diligence and human industry: this was the beginning of that estate.

The Moores
came into Italy
and besieged the City of Capua.

The Emperour CHARLES being thus in his Kingdome of France, in the meane time while that he warred with his nephewes, the Moores of Africa, who had a taste of the wealth of Italy, came with a great Army, and made great spoils in the Marches of Capua, and besieged that Citie: Whereupon Pope IOHN sent to request the Emperour, to come to protect the Lands of the Church, which hee performed with the greatest speede hee could make, for he was very politique, and cunning in the luying of men of warre; but before his going into Italy, (to satisfie his wiues humour) hee made her brother BOSON, who was also his neere kinsman, King of Prouence. Comming to Rome, the Infidels leauing that coast, tooke another way, which was into Sicilia, which yet was vnder the Empire of Constantinople, wherof BASILIUS was Emperour, of whom we will presently make mention.

The death of
the Emperour
Charles the 2.
poisoned by his Physician which was a Jew.

Indolentius Bailiue, and why so called.

When LEVVS, CHARLES, and CARLOMAN, knew their Vncle was in Italy, they vniued their forces, with a resolution to goe against him, in reuenge of former injuries. Whereof as soone as the Emperour had intelligence, hee departed from Rome with his forces, to make head against them: But it pleased God to saue him that labour; which was, that comming to Manoa with his Armie, being now old and decrepit, an infirmity tooke him, wherof he feared not that he should haue died. But a few called ZEDCHIAS (which was his Physician) poisoned him, and so he presently died: and his affaires remained confused, and out of order, leauing for his heire in his kingdome, his Sonne called LEVDIOCV BASILVS, and other three which he had, who also had ill successe: which appertained not to my Historie. They called this his sonne BALEVS, for that so in Latine they call him which stutcereth, and cannot pronounce certain letters, but haue that defect in their speech. At this time in the Empire of Constantinople, reigned BASILIUS before named, who (as I haue said) proued no ill Gouvernor, for hee releas'd many of the tributes and other exactions, which his predecessors had formerly imposed vpon the people: and hee defended the Empire with great valour and much discretion, although that in some things hee had ill successe.

First,

First, against certaine gr^{at} troupes of Infidels, which came from Alexandria in Egypt, into the Ile of Candia, and had taken many places there, he rigged a Nauic, and sailed thither in person, where he fought, and was ouercome, to the great damage of the Christians: and (by great hap) escap'g he returned by flight to Constantinople, but not daunted, neither discouraged, and prepared a new flecte: and to try his fortune with a new Capitaine, he sent therewith his wiues Father, whose name was CHRISTOPHER, a man very valiant, and of great experience; who had so good hap, that obtaining the victorie, he cleared that Iland. After this, hee waged other wars in Asia, by his Capitaines, against the Infidels, Turkes and Persians: wherein for the most part he had good successe, and lastly, against the Africans, which for feare of CHARLES the Bauld (as was aboue said) leauing Italy, went into Slavonia, or Dalmatia, and had taken some Townes of BASILIUS his Empire, he sent thither his Army and Nauy; and with the aide of the Venetians, drave them out of those Countreies, and recovered what they had taken. And so he reigned with greater honour, and to the better liking and contentment of his Subjects, then many of his Predecessors. At which time the Emperour CHARLES the Bauld died in Manoa, when he had reigned little more then two yeeres, IOHN the ninth being then Pope. Some Authors say that he reigned a longer time; but the truth is as I haue set downe.

The death of Charles the Bauld.

THE LIFE OF LEVVS THE THIRD, SURNAMED BALBVS, AND FOVRESORE AND ONE ROMANE EMPEROR, TOGETHER WITH the life of BASILIUS Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE.

(*)

In the time of CHARLES the Bauld there were warres and troubles for the Empire; there were no lesse after his decease; as the Reader may well obserue by the proceesse of this historie; wherein, although it seeme that I vse breuitie, for that I waste lesse paper in one then in another, yet is it not so; for I seeke (as much as I may) to make an euen diuision of this booke between the Emperours, whose liues I write. But forasmuch as these Princes of whom I doe now treat, liued but a short time in the Empire, (to obserue an equalitie, and due proportion, as farre as possibly may be) I hold it reason, that the memorie of them be brieue, according to the time of their reigne, and to the end that wee may haue space to write of matters neerer to our time. The Emperour CHARLES being deceased in Manoa, as is aforesaid, his nephew CHARLES King of Germany, with his breithren, which already had entred Italy against him, stayed with their Army: for the enemy being dead, the warre was ended. His Sonne LEVVS, who liued in France being aduertised of the death of his Father; and how that his Cousins had laid downe their armes: first he endeouored to settle himselfe in his Fathers Kingdom, and he also sent to entreat Pope IOHN to aide him and to stand his friend in attaining to the Imperiall dignitie.

M m 3

In

Leues made king of France.

The Pope apprehended.

The first Bishop of Flanders.

The Moores invade Italy.

The Empire divided.

The death of
the Emperor
Lodowick Babius king of France.

Charles the simple posthu-mum.

In the first he found some difficultie, being contradicted by his mother in law the Emperesse, who was counselled and assisted by her brother Boson king of Provence: but the matter was carried so cunningly, that within few daies he was held and obeyed for King. Now concerning the Empire, he found great difficultie; for CHARLES surnamed the Fat, being king of Germany, besides that he already had some Townes in Italy, had also the good-will of many of the principall men in Rome; so as notwithstanding that Pope IOHN would have had LEUVES king of France to have beene chosen Emperour, yet he could not effect it: For, they not only denied to accept him, but were so audacious as to lay hands vpon the Pope, to the end that he should not doe it. But he stayed not long in prison, for some of his seruants, either by force or policie, released him, and he in great haste went into France, where he was honorably entertained by the King. Being there (of his owne authority) he intituled LEUVES Emperour; and giving him the Imperiall ensignes, crowned him with great solemnity: and after this, remained one yeere in France; where he called a Councell, and made certaine orders concerning the state of the Church, and created a Bishop for the Countie of Flanders, where there neuer had beene any before, being but lately inhabited. In which time the warres and troubles between the new Emperour, and his cosin germane CHARLES: King of Germany ceased not; who was also so called by the will of the Romanes, who were the occasion of a worse inconuenience: for the Moores of Africa (seeing Italy abandoned by the Pope, and that the defence came slow and slenderly) prepared a great Naue, and did much harme there: whereof Pope IOHN being aduertised, with the aide of CHARLES the Fat, King of Germany, who was also called Emperour, came into Italy; at whose comming the Infidels retired, and the countrie was freed from the great danger wherein it was: The Pope seeing how much Rome and all Italy had been better relieved by CHARLES, then by LEUVES, and how much CHARLES was more fauoured by the principall Barons in Italy; and to the end to come to agreement with the said Barons, altring his minde, he approued and confirmed the nomination and election made of CHARLES King of Germany who for his corpulence was surnamed the Fat; and so he anointed and crowned him Emperour; dissannulling the coronation of LVDOVICVS BABVS King of France; for which cause it was thought that great warres and troubles would haue ensued: but by the intercession of certaine great personages, a peace was concluded betweene the two Emperors in this manner: That they both should hold the name and title of Emperors, and that the countrie of Lorraine (about which was wont to be great contention) should be equally diuided between them, and that for the Empire no warre should be made; but that in all parts peace should be entertained betweene the lands and subiects of the one and of the other partie; and that in Italy (vntill that an equall partition were made) each of them should hold such lands and townes as he then had in possession: and if that the Infidels invaded the dominion of either of them, the other was bound to aide him with his forces.

This peace being concluded (although doubtfull and fained) the Emperour LEUVES died in France, whereof he was King, having reigned not fully two yeeres, in all which time he neuer came to Rome, neither into Italy. But for as much as Pope IOHN crowned him in France, and afterwards in Rome dissannulled his election and coronation, some Historiographers leaue him out of the catalogue of Emperors. He left when he died two bastard sonnes behind him, the one called CARLOMAN, and the other LEUVES, and his wife great with a sonne, whereof the was afterwards deliuered; which sonne being posthumus (for so doe they call him which is born after his fathers decease) hee left for his heir of the kingdoms of France; wherein grew great discord, warres and miserie about the gouernment and the kingdom; and in the one and other were great alterations and changes, too long to be related: for the bastard sonnes pretended title and right to the Crowne, and so did Boson King of Provence. Others would haue the child (wherewith the Emperesse was great at the death of the Emperour, who was afterwards called CHARLES the Simple) to be King. The gouernours also tooke vpon them the name of Kings; sometimes one was a King, and sometime another, and each of them made himselfe Lord of what he could get. In these troubles the kingdom endured great calamitie. This Emperour LEUVES died in the yeere of our Lord, eight hundred and fourescore, according to the computation which I hold for most certaine.

THE

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE THIRD, SVRNAMED THE FAT,

AND FOVRESORE AND SECOND RO-MANE EMPEVOVR; AND OF BA-

SILIVS and LEO, at that time Empevors of Constantinople.

Recently vpon the decease of LEUVES the Emperour and King of France, the king of Germany, CHARLES the Fat, without any contradiction enioyed the Empire; for in the others life time he had in a manner robbed him of that Majesty, which (as the Reader may well consider) was at that time but only in name; for the authority of CHARLES the Great and his successors, consisted more in letters, and in the Kingdomes which they wonne and possessed (which were the Dominions of Germany and Italy) then in any part of the Empire; whereof there remained Italy onely, and therein the Pope held the greatest part; and the Greeke Empire had euer some share: And that likewise which the Emperours held in Italy, was recovered by the said

CHARLES, and by his father; yet the name of Emperour was in the highest degree defired, and the authority and Majesty thereof was very great, and so continueth vntill this day. CHARLES the Fat remaining then sole Emperour in peace, as his vertues deserved, leauing Italy in good order, went into Germany, to take possession of his brother LEUVES his Kingdomes; who also at that time died without heires, whose dominion contained Friseland, Saxony, Lorraine, and other provinces; and he had so good hap, that within short space after, his other brother died also without sonnes or issue: which provinces were afterwards diuided into sundrie houses and states (in proceesse of time) by the gifts of the Emperors, and through sundry other accidents, as it plainly appeareth. I say then that he remained Lord of all Germany, and King of Italy.

The next yeere after this, died BASILIVS Emperour of Constantinople of a very extraordinary death: for riding on hunting (as his custome was) hee was slaine by a Stagge. BASILIVS in his life time had chosen and nominated his eldest sonne LEO for CÆSAR, after the death of his other eldest sonne CONSTANTINVS: wherefore when as the father was dead, his sonne LEO was crowned and obeyed for Emperour; and was called the Philosopher, for that he was much inclined to learning: BASILIVS left also another sonne, called ALEXANDER. The Emperour CHARLES hauing good successe in his affaires; and knowing what warres and factions were in France; vnder colour to warre against the Normans which harried the Countrie, he fought (as many others did, and had done) to make himselfe King thereof. Leuying then a mighty Army of Germanes and Italians, he entred France, and

Basilius Emperor of Constantinople, slaine by a Stagge, and his sonne Leo, succeeded him
in the Empire.

Mm 4

Went

went to the City of Paris, which the Normans held besieged: and, hauing taken all the Countrey, and put the Normans to rout, he was called King of France; the young King CHARLES the Simple, or BONVS King of Provence, hauing no sufficient power to make head against him.

In this warre were many great fights; which, because the Authors handle the same so confusedly, I passe ouer in silence. And the Emperors party became so mighty, that he not onely enjoyed the title and name of King, but the Kingdome it self also: and to the end, that hee might the better draw the Normans to his seruice, he treated with them (after hee had ouerthrowne them) of peace, and gaue their King to wife a kinswoman of his, which was a Dukes daughter; and assigned to him that part of France which lieth beyond the river Sein, bordering vpon the English Sea, which after them is at this day called Normandy, and is a very good Countrey and well inhabited. Yet some Historians say, that the Emperor CHARLES did not this, but that CHARLES the Simple afterwards did it when hee came to bee King of France, who at that time was but an Infant, and vnder the gouernment of BVDON: but in my opinion that was too long a time, for they afterwards had warres with him. But howsoeuer it was, the Emperor CHARLES the Fat was Lord of the greatest and best part of France, and was called king thereof, being before that time King of Germany, and Emperor of Italy: and, seeing all things there in good order, he retired himself into Germanie, where being arrived, as the state of his dominion and Empire was grounded vpon but weak foundations, so it suddenly fell from the height of that Throne. Some alledge the cause thereof to be, for that he became foolish, proud, and vnfit to gouern: others say, that a disease took him which bereaued him of his senses; which cometh all to one in effect.

To conclude, the Princes, Dukes and Gouerners of the Prouinces of Germany and France, seeing his great insufficiency and vnaptnes to gouern, resolved to depriue him of his Empire and Kingdomes: and for as much as he had neuer a sonne (being, as they write of him, vnapt by nature for generation) by common consent they nominated and chose a great and valiant Personage, called ARNOLPH, who was by CHARLES aduanced to the Duchies of Bavaria and Carinthia, and (as some write) was but of mean parentage, and no way allied to CHARLES: and so they account CHARLES the Fat to be the last of the linage and blood of CHARLES the Great. But after some, which is the most common opinion, ARNOLPH was nephew to CHARLES the Fat, bastard or naturall sonne to CARLOMAN King of Bauiere; which seemeth most likely to be true, seeing that hee without any gainsayng attained both to the Kingdome and Empire, and was not onely intituled Emperour, but also King of Germany: but in France, after ARNOLPH's first fury, they made OTHO or EVDRES (who was CHARLES the Simple's Tutor) King of France; whom CHARLES the Simple afterwards succeeded. After this, many great matters ensued, which appertain not to my History. And so CHARLES the Fat lost both his Empire and vnderstanding, when he had reigned nine yeers, in the yeer of our Lord eight hundred fourscore and nine; and liued afterwards about one yeer, in great penury and misery.

It is written, that this poor Prince found himself at one Instant depriued of all meanes, and forsaken of all the world, degraded both of Realm and Empire; hauing so ill provided for his affairs in the time of prosperity, that he found himself naked without a house where to shroud himself from the shipwrack of his disgrace, driuen out of his Palace, and retired into a poor village of Suabe, where he liued some daies in extreme want, without any meane or relief; in the end died, not lamented or pitied of any man, in an vnknowne corner, yet noted to be the Theatre where was acted such an extraordinary Tragedie, That one of the greatest Monarchs of the world is dead, without house, without bread, without honour, without pity, and without memory, but to obserue so miserable an end.

In Constantinople yet reigned LEO, not so ill as some others: for, notwithstanding that hee was somewhat cruell, yet he was a louer of iustice and equity, and very zealous, and built some stately Temples. He warred with the Bulgares, and ouercame them, and was ouercome by them; whose death and actions we will declare heerafter: for, he reigned 25 yeers.

The coming of the Normans into Normandy.

Charles the Fat deposed from the Empire, and Arnolph chose him in his place.

THE LIFE OF ARNOLPH, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THE FOVRESORE AND FOVRTH ROMANE EMPEROR, AND OF LEO,

Alexander and Constantine, Emperors of GRAECIA.

(*)

It is already mentioned in what maner ARNOLPH attained to the Empire, who is numbred among the good Emperors: for, he was wise and vpright in his gouernment, and had both valour and courage to defend and protect the Empire; yet in his time were great warres. As soon as he was Roman Emperour and King of Germany, he had a desire to make himself King of France also; and hee fought some battels with the Normans: who, vnderstanding that CHARLES was depriued & dead, rebelled, and made warres in France, wherein he had the victory: but, constrained through some innouations in Germanie, hee returned thither, and abandoned France; which I omit as a matter impertinent. Being come into Germany, his first businesse was with a certain people in the Prouince of Moravia, called Magarens, which warred in all parts of Germanie; and committed such spoils, and put him in so great fear, that he fought to pacifie them rather by policy than by Arms: and to the end they should liue in peace and quiet, he agreed to giue them that countrey to inhabit; so as to them was assigned the Prouince of Moravia, with part of Bohemia, where it bordereth vpon Hungary, Poland and Silesia. Yet, neuer helasse, this continued but a small time: for, this people, waxing proud of their agreement, with greater presumption invaded the countrey: against whom ARNOLPH leuied an Army of valiant men at Arms, brought out of Hungary; with which, and his other ordinary forces, he ouerthrew the Morauians in a notable battell, and cutting the greatest part of them in pieces, the rest fled and abandoned the countrey: but, it being freed from the Subdued, was much more oppressed by the victorious Hungares, who, mutinying for want of their pay, sacked the Cities and Towns of Germany; and, crossing ouer the Countrey, without any resistance came into Friseland, and thence into Gallia Belgica; part whereof at this day is the Earldome of Flanders. These Hungares, as some affirm, were of the same Countrey of Hungarie; and VICENTIVS in his Mirror, and MARTIN affirm, that they came out of Scythia into that Prouince: but whence-soeuer they came, it imports not much; it sufficeth they all agree, that ARNOLPHVS was much troubled with them, and that they burnt and spoiled a great part of Germany: and ARNOLPH did all that was possible, and at length constrained them to return into Hungary, from whence (as long as he liued) they neuer durst come thither again.

THE

Whilſt

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Germany, Italy eſcaped not free from warres and combuſtions; whereof, the Emperors long abſence was the occaſion: for, he had neuer been there, but went thither being called by Pope FORMOVS, who was choſen after the death of STEPHEN before mentioned. This FORMOVS was choſen againſt the will of the greateſt part of the people of Rome, which fauoured a Cardinall called SERGIUS, to whom they had given their voices: wherefore the Pope, houlding himſelf greatly injured, went to the Emperor, and was the cauſe of his coming into Italy, of whom before that we enter into any diſcourſe, it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſpeak (after our accuſtomed manner) of the Emperor of Conſtantinople, in the liſe of LEO the Fiſt, who (as wee ſaid) at that time held that Empire, wherein ordinarily enſued great accidents: for, the Emperor was euer at contention and variance (in Europe) with the Bulgarians, the Hungars, the Ruſſians, and other Nations; and in Aſia with the Armenians, the Perſians, and other Infidels. But I deſire to be held excuſed in that I write not that Hiſtory at large, ſeeing I am bound to write but of the Emperors of the Weſt onely, who are held for the right Emperors; and of the others to make but a brief relation.

LEO, hauing ended his warre with the Bulgarians, reſolued to warre in Aſia againſt the Infidels, and did ſo; wherein al though that many loſſes hapned to either party, yet in the end his Armie (being led by a good General) obtained a very notable victory; whereby his name came to be very famous and renowned: ſo as in theſe actions, and others which I write not, five and twenty yeers of his Empire were ſpent: in the end whereof, he died of the Colick. And after his death his brother ALEXANDER was choſen Emperor, notwithstanding that hee left a ſonne called CONSTANTINE: but, for as much as he was of more yeers and better beloued, the brother had the Empire, and held it thirteen or fourteen monthes: during which time he did nothing that was good; and for abuſing the Ambaſſadors of SIMON King of Bulgaria, warre was made againſt him. He beſtowed offices and dignities vpon ignoble and baſe perſonages, and in the end was taken with a flux of blood at the noſe, which neuer left him vntill he left the Empire: and CONSTANTINE, ſonne to his brother LEO, had the Empire ſo whom we will ſpeak hereafter: for, this hapned in the time of ARNOLPH, Emperor of the Weſt, whoſe liſe we now write, which ended (as I ſaid) coming into Italy, in fauour of Pope FORMOVS, and to recover ſuch Cities as were therein vſurped by certain Dukes and Earles; between whom and them enſued many battels; and in all Italy were factions and diſſenſions, eſpecially between GUIDO Duke of Spoleto, and BERENGARIUS Duke of Friuli, who were made Dukes by the old Emperor CHARLES; being men of the greateſt account in all the Countrey, he thinking by this means to defend the Countrey againſt the Lombards and French, and to hold the ſame in ſubjection, hauing ſuch mighty Commanders. But theſe men made themſelues Lords of all they could, and either of them was a great enemy to the other, and fought a great battell; wherein GUIDO was ouerthrowne, and BERENGARIUS had the victory: who, vnderſtanding of the Emperor ARNOLPH's coming, fought to make a league with him, and offered him his ſeruiſe; more to ſeeke his enemies ruine, than for any ſeruiſe he meant to doo to the Emperor.

ARNOLPH, being come into Italy with a great Army, fought means to make himſelf Lord of the Countrey, aſſiſted by BERENGARIUS, whoſe Dukedome of Friuli was in his way: he took many places which GUIDO had vſurped, and went to Bergamo; into the caſtle whereof, a certain Earle (one of thoſe which conſpired againſt Pope FORMOVS) was entred: who, together with others of that City, was there beſieged by the Emperor; who, taking it by force, cauſed him to be hanged. And ſo he puniſhed and did iuſtice vpon many others, and redreſſed many injuries and wrongs done in Italy. Afterwards hee went with his Army towards Rome, where the Pope attended his coming: but his aduerſaries were of ſuch power, that whether the Pope would or not, they put the City in Arms, and (ſhutting their ports) would not receiue the Emperor; whereupon hee beſieged it, which cauſed great tumults and mutinies therein: but in the end the Popes authority, and the fear of the Emperors power, ſo much prevailed, that he was receiued; wherein, by his direction, great puniſhment was inflicted vpon ſuch as could be taken; and the Pope crowned him Emperor with great honour and ſolemnity; and, within ſewe daies after, hee departed, with an intent to ruine GUIDO Duke of Spoleto, who was of great power, and thought as well as BERENGARIUS, to haue been King of Italy. Hauing taken ſome Townes, he beſieged his wife in a certain City: the Ducheſſe praſtred with one of the Emperors fauourites to giue the Emperor a certain drink, which ſhee made him beleeue would make him milde and courteous: but as ſoon as he had taken it, he fell into a deep ſleep, Leo, Emperor of Conſtantinople, died of the Colick, and Alexander ſucceeded him.

Alexander, Emperor of Conſtantinople, died bleeding at the noſe.

Arnolph crowned Emperor in Rome, by the Pope.

ſleepe, which held him ſo long, that they thought he would neuer haue awaked againe; for he ſlept three daies and three nights, and no man could make him to moue; but in the end hee awoke, and found himſelfe ſo ill, that contenting himſelfe to ſettle the affaires of Italy in the beſt order that he could, he return'd into Germany, hoping in his native countrey to recover his health. At what time as the Emperor ARNOLPH departed Italy, Pope FORMOVS died, and after him BONIFACE the ſixt was choſen, who was Pope but twentie ſix daies; and then ſucceeded STEPHEN the ſixt, who was ſo great an enemy to FORMOVS and to his actions, that when he was Pope, he ſought to diſannull matters done by him; which was an ill example, and whereof afterwards many euils enſued: for ſome Popes did the like by their predeceſſors, againſt whom they had conceived diſpleaſure.

The ſucceeding Pope contented the predeceſſors diſpleaſure.

This being done, Pope STEPHEN dyed in the third year of his papacie, and him ſucceeded ROMANVS, a Spaniard borne, who was Pope but three monthes. And after him came THEODORE the ſecond, who held the chaire but twentie daies, in which time his chiefſt care was to confirme the doings of FORMOVS, which STEPHEN had diſannulled; and after his death JOHN the tenth was choſen. While theſe Popes ran in ſuch haſte to death one after another, the Emperor ARNOLPH with his Army went into Germany, and out liued them all, and raigned in proſperitie, nothing befalling him worthe memorie; but in the end he was aſſailed with a kinde of ſickneſſe, which proued the worſt diſeaſe that could be imagined, and this was an infinit number of lice; wherewith he was ſo tormented and eaten, that he could not be cured thereof, but dyed: this happened in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred and one, and in the twelfth yeere of his raign. ARNOLPH at his death left behind him three children which he had by his two wiues; by his firſt wife, he had ARNOLPH, whom in his liſe time he made Duke of Bantere, and BERNARD Earle of a certaine province: and by his ſecond wife he had LEVVS, who afterwards was Emperor; he had another baſe ſonne called ZENBALDVS, whom in his liſe time he made Duke of Lorraine; and one daughter called BERTA, married to the Duke of Cleue.

The miſerable death of the Emperor Arnolph.

In the time that ARNOLPH raigne, began the Dukes of Normandie; for the King or capitaine of the Normans married the daughter of CHARLES the Simple, king of France, and making himſelfe to be Chriſtend, was called ROBERT, whoſe ſonne was the firſt Duke of Normandie. There were alſo Dukes in Burgundie of the houſe of France, which a long time after were called Kings: and in Saxony alſo, and in other parts, as hath been obſerued, and hereafter ſhall appear in this hiſtorie: for the Kings and Emperours of thoſe times did vie to gouerne their cities and provinces by perpetuall Dukes, ſo as at that time were very great Earles and Dukes, and the Emperours gouerned Milan by an Earle, who was called Earle of Milan; the like they did by other provinces: whereof it afterwards enſued, that their eſtates became perpetuall, they holding the ſame by inheritance.

At this time the principall Earles of Caſtile, through the many murders and injuries committed by DON HORDONIO in that countrey; choſe among themſelues two to be iudges betweene them, and to determine their differences and warres; which were HERNANDO HERNANDEZ RASTRA, and LAEN CALVO: after this followed DON ALONSO, the Sonne of DON FRYELA, who became a Monke. And the ſame yeare that the Emperor ARNOLPH dyed, DON RAMIRUS raigne: this DON RAMIRUS performed great matters againſt the Moores. In France raigne CHARLES the Simple. There were then Kings in England, in Denmarke, in Moravia, in Proouence, in Bulgaria; and in Polonia were Dukes, and ſo were ſtill vntill the time of the Emperor OTHO.

In Conſtantinople (as is aboueſaid) CONSTANTINE the ſonne of LEO, and nephew to the Emperor ALEXANDER, was Emperor, and raigne along time; for he was Emperor thirtie ſix yeeres: whereof ſiftene were in the company of the tyrant ROMANVS. In the beginning of his raigne (for that he was a child) hee was gouerned by certaine Princes, and by his mother ZOE, and had ſome warres with the King of the Bulgarians, which he ended with happy ſucceſſe: PHOCAS being General of his Army, who was of greateſt account in his Court. Afterwards, through treacherie, his ſouldiers abandoned him, and the Bulgarians became Lords and maſters of the field, ſo as he was conſtrained to buy his peace of them for readie money. After this, in diſpote of himſelfe and of his mother, ſome which of a pettie Prince, was come to be of great power, was made CESAR and his companion in the Empire, and had the ſuperioritie the other ſiftene yeeres that he liued, notwithstanding that they both had the title of Emperours: as we will tell you hereafter.

THE LIFE OF LEVVES THE FOURTH OF THIS NAME, AND THREESCORE AND FOURTH ROMAN EMperor; And of CONSTANTINE the Second, Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE; And of the Tyrants in ITALIE.

After the death of the Emperor ARNOLPH, there was great confusion in the Empire: the Italians and Romans desiring to make one Emperor that should bee to their liking; and the Germans desiring to do the like, they fell at such variance, that the one party held one for Emperor, and the other part another; so as rightly there was not any. And some Historiographers account none, from these Emperours of which we now write, till the time of OTTO the Second, which was for the space of threescore yeeres, little more or lesse before that none of them were crowned by any Pope. Moreover the History is written so confusedly and abruptly, that it can hardly be explained. The worst of all is, that those times were most unhappy through want and defect of Emperours: for, thereof infinite waies ensued; vices, infolencies and rapines abounded, little justice was executed, learning decayed, vertue was nought seen; charity languished, and the Infidels in many places had the upper hand; vntill it pleased his diuine Majesty to bring matters to a better estate. I say then, that the German Princes chose, for their King and Roman Emperour, LEVVES the sonne of the Emperor ARNOLPH; but he could not as soon as he desired, come into Italy; without which they neuer held themselves for Emperours; holding Italy for the seat and originall of the Empire: for, the Hungars in those daies were the most feared and redoubted Nation in the world; and which did greatest harm in Germany and in Italy; for, being freed from the feare of ARNOLPH, they brake the peace made with him; and made warre vpon the new Emperor LEVVES in Italy, whereof, the chiefest Princes and of greatest power were the aboue named BERENGARVS, Duke of Friuli; and GUYSSA Duke of Spoleto; who, of Dukes and Governours, became Tyrant-Lords, each of them pretending to be Emperour; but BERENGARVS, being of great power in Lombardy, put his desires in practice, and vsurped the whole Countrey; and any place else that hee could get, in despite of the Emperor, saying, that Italy was the true seat of the Roman Empire; and that Germany might rather be said to be the patrimony of CHARLES the Great his Successour, than the Empire. But LEVVES; for that he was the sonne of an Emperour, and descended from CHARLES the Great who restored the Empire, pretended that Germany ought to chuse the Emperour.

Matters standing in this manner, the Hungars sallied out of their Countrey, and beganne to rob and spoile the Countiees of Austria and Bawaria, vying in them extreme cruelty with fire and sword. LEVVES, being a courageous young man; was highly displeased with this their presumption; and gathering together such troops of souldiers as hee was able, with the aid of his bre-

brethren went against them, and met to the river Lien they met; where LEVVES greatly desired to come to blowes with them: which the Hungars and Morauians perceiving, laid a stratagem for him; for, offering to giue him battell, they retired, till they had drawne him within the danger of an ambush which they had laid in a wood; and there they maintained the Fight to their great aduantage, in regard of the place: but the Fight was so well performed by the Emperours people, that if the Hungars had not beene rescued by their ambush, hee had that day obtained a notable victory. But when the aduantage was discouered, and that so great a number of men on euery side came rushing out of the wood vpon such a sudden, with so great force vnc-expected, the Imperialists began to retire, and afterwards to flee; in such manner, that the victory manifestly appeared on the Hungars side, and the Emperour was driuen to saue himself by flight: after which they did much harm throughout all Germany, the Emperour not being able to resist or make head against them; but was constrained to withdraw himself into the countrey, and secretly to giue great summes of money to the Captains and principall men of the Hungars, to the end they should treat of a peace; and he openly gaue great pay to their men of warre, and promised to allow them yearly provision for their houses: by these means he freed his countrey from that misery for that time; but the peace continued not long.

After this exploit; the Emperour, vnderstanding that his base brother ZENNEBALDVS gouerned the Countrey of Lorraine cruelly, and as a Tyrant, hee deprived him of that Kingdom, and seized it into his owne hands, and took LVTOWARDA, the daughter of OTTO Duke of Saxony, to wife; which Prouince was then subject to the Empire. In those daies France escaped not free from wars and troubles. The Emperour, thinking hee had settled all matters in peace with the Hungars, saw himself in a new perplexity: for, they not content with the promised pay (which was very duly paid them) a great Armie of them againe inuaded Germany; and the Emperour in person went against them, and fought with them twice in the Prouince of Bawaria; and both times had the victorie, although with great losse of men, and with no small difficultie and danger: but not knowing how to execute his victorie, or to follow his good fortune, giuing too much eare to some mens counsell, the Hungars fledde into their countrey, who (in most mens opinions) might haue been wholly ruined and defeated: where they reinforced and refreshed their troupes, and did greater harme in the Empire, then at the first, and were so expert in the warres, and so greatly feared, that crossing through Germany, sack and burning many towns, amongst which the cite of Basle was one, they passed into Lorraine, which then contained the estates of Flanders, Brabant, Gelders, Cleue, Treuer, and many other prouinces; in which they executed great cruelty: and with the like furie they returned the same way they went, burning and spoyleing what before had escaped; and so they retired themselves into their countrey, laden with riches and spoyle; but fewer in number then they came from thence. This people at that time was growne so proud, and of so great power, that all Nations bordering vpon them stood in feare of them, and did as the rest did: for after the same manner as they had entred Bawaria, they afterwards inuaded Bulgaria, and the Emperours countiees of Gracia, sack and burning his Cities; and constrained the Emperour CONSTANTINE to giue them pay, and ordinary tribute, to be at peace with them; and the Emperour LEVVES was driuen to doe the like, to allure Germany, from this raging fire.

Historiographers write, that in those daies there were great wars in France and Italy between BERENGARVS and other Princes, and the like in other parts; and that Princes vsed fraud and treachery one against another: so as a man can write nothing that is good of those times; so much did malice, ambition, pride and cruelty abound.

It afterwards followed, that the Hungars, moued with the fame of the wealth and abundance of all things in Italy, and through the ciuill dissension which was therein (the ordinarie gates by which destruction entred into any Kingdomes) and for that LEVVES withstood them mightily in Germany, they resolved to sack and make a conquest of Italy: for which attempt they leuied greater forces than at any time before they had done. The fame hereof put all Italy into such a feare, that they chose BERENGARVS for their Captain and defender, who was called Emperour; but till this time was not held for such. BERENGARVS then with great diligence and expedition leuied many souldiers both of foot and horse; and, at their coming into Italy, oppos'd himself against the Hungars; and coming to blowes, fought a battell with them some Authors say two; wherein being ouerthrowne he fled, and lost therein the greatest part of his Army, and retired himself into the estate of Milan, wherein consisted his greatest strength. The Hungars after this victory were Masters of the Field, and spoiled all the Countrey, taking

A battell between the Leves and the Hungars.

The Hungars in-uaded Italie.

Benengarius bought his peace of the Hungars.

The Hungars came the second time into Italie.

and ransacking many Cities, and in lesse than one year ouerranne all the Land : in which time these Barbarians, moud with the bruit of the riches of the City of Venice, made Barks, Brigandines, and other vessels, therewith to haue attempted it ; and so they assailed the City, and took some of those Ilands : but their coming was before-hand suspected, and therefore provided for, so as although they took some part thereof, yet the Venetians so fortified the rest with strong chains, and some places with wals, that, after some conflicts by sea and by land, they despairing to be able to take the City, returned to Padua, where they had left the remainder of their Cavalierie and their luggage. BERENGARIUS, seeing by force hee could not deliuer Italie from the Hungars, put that remedy in practice which LEVVES had vsed in Germany ; which was, to treat of peace by way of money : whereto the Hungars gaue ear, and it was concluded ; and he gaue them a huge summe of gold and silver, which by the industry of BERENGARIUS was collected from all parts of Italie : wherewith, and with the rest which they had stolne, they departed rich and victorious ; which had so good a taste, that it made them come thither again.

The coming of the Hungars into Italy, was in the time of Pope SERGIUS the Third : for, BARNEDICT the fourth being dead, of whom it was said that he was a good Bishop (which ought not to be accounted for a small matter, considering how few were so in those times) LEO the Fifth succeeded, who enjoyed that dignity but forty daies, for, a great Cardinall called CHRISTOPHER, took him prisoner ; who within few daies died in prison, and CHRISTOPHER remained Pope tyrannously, and within 7 months (for, violence cannot last) was deprived, and put into a Monastery : and then was SERGIUS the Third chosen, in whose time hapned this calamity through the Hungars. But, returning to our History, I say that the Hungars being retired into their Country, Italie was not therefore free from troubles : for, the Moors of Africa infested the same with their fleets ; and for all this, the ciuill factions & discord ceased not betwixt the Princes : for, EDWARD, Marquess of Tulcane, who vsurped that Country, being of great power, rebelled against BERENGARIUS ; and the Popes authority and power was not such as it had been, neither were they of such force by reason of their insufficiency and little worth, and through the want of the accustomed succours from France, which they had in the time of the successors of CHARLES the Great : which considered, LEVVES was of opinion, that Italy might easily be subdued, & that he might bereaue BERENGARIUS both of the name & dignity of Emperor, which he vsurped. Whereupon with a great Armie hee came into Italia : against whom came BERENGARIUS with a good number of men of warre ; and they two fought a battell, wherein BERENGARIUS was overthrowne, with little bloodshed, by reason of the small resistance made by his people ; and LEVVES went to the City of Verona, neer to which the battell was fought, and lay there like a Conqueror, and as one that stood in fear of no man, and therefore careless : whereupon BERENGARIUS, albeit he was ouercom, practised with some within the City, and some also of the Emperors owne people, to let him into the City ; so as he entred it by night, and took LEVVES prisoner. Others say, that LEVVES had not the victory, but that he withdrew himself into the City for fear ; and so in the manner (as I said) he fell into BERENGARIUS power. But howsoever it was, BERENGARIUS had him prisoner, and put out his eyes, and so within fewe daies through grief and sorrow he died ; and BERENGARIUS remained sole Lord of the Empire of Italy.

The difference betweene authors about the taking of the Emper-Lewes, and his death.

In this manner ended LEVVES his Empire, which he held with so much trouble when hee had raign'd Emperor full eleven yeers ; and died in the year of our Lord nine hundred & twelue, after the Abbot WISPERGENS his computation, which I follow : other Authors (of no small authority) as, BLONDS and CYSPIAN, recount this after another manner ; saying, that this Emperor LEVVES neuer came into Italie, neither was overthrowne by BERENGARIUS ; but that in the end he died of his naturall death in Germany, and that that LEVVES was overthrowne and taken in Verona, was LEVVES the son of BOLON King of Prudence, which came into Italy against BERENGARIUS, proclaiming himselfe Emperor ; and that BERENGARIUS released him on his oath that he would come no more thither : which oath he afterwards brake. But in that manner as I haue declared it is written by PLATINUS, HENRICVS MYCIVS, NAVCLERVS, IOHANNES VVICVS, SAINT ANTHONY, VOLATERANVS, and some others. In this time liued Pope SERGIUS the Third, and in Constantinople CONSTANTINE, and ROMANVS the tyrant, who raign'd in despite of him. LEVVES left not any son to succeed him. There befell also in his time great wars & combusions among the Princes of Germany ; which was tyrannized sometime by one, and sometime by another, whereby his Empire was weakened, and came to be of lesse power. This was the last Em-

Emperor of the line of CHARLES the Great, yet in the Kingdom of France the succession continued, although within a while after it ended also, and passed to another line, which lasteth vntill this day. And in Spain then flourish'd the Flowr of chivalrie against the Infidels, conquering their Countries, and Kings which raign'd therein ; the Earle FERNANDO GONSALES.

In Hungarie, TASSON first took vpon him the authority of a King : which Countrey in former time was gouerned by Dukes and sundry other Magistrates, from the time of ATTILA, King of the Hunnes. This TASSON was grandfather to STEPHEN who was canonized for a Saint, and the first confirmed King by the authority of the Emperour FREDERICK.

THE LIFE OF CONRADE, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRESORE AND FIFT ROMAN EMperor ; And of those which in his time took the name of Emperors in ITALIE ; And of Constantine the Emperor of Constantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

Lewes being dead, there arose a contention between the French and the Germans, about the Empire : for, either of these two Nations pretended to haue a iust title to chuse an Emperor, by reason of their ancient authority and custome. But in the end the Germans, preuailling, would haue chosen Otho Duke of Saxony ; who, for that he was already old, and unfit to gouern the Empire so much troubled, refused the charge, and counselled them to chuse Conrade Duke of Franconia : who, by the consent of the Germans, and of a good part of the French, being made Emperor, was cruel vsed by the counsel of the old Duke Otho : and he dying, left a sonne called Henry, whom Conrade suspected, and feared, an occasion of warre, he bent his force against him, notwithstanding that his father made such account of him, that he preferred him to the Empire ; and onely seeking means to bring him to destruction, took no care how matters went in Italie, which was extremely troubled. Conrades brother, fighting a battell with Henrie, was by him overthrowne : whereupon Conrade, seeing the losse and the dishonour, reinforced his Armie to be reuenged, and sending Ambassadors to Henry to submit and yeeld himself, they were not heard, neither could they come to any composition of peace. Whilst he was thus in this action, Conrade fell very sick ; and, knowing his end to be neere, more regarding the good of the Empire, than his owne private passion, he chose his enemy Henry for his successor, and commanded his brother to yeeld him obedience ; which was a very heroicall deed, and befitting a Christian.

He time of the Emperor LEVVES was troublefome and tempestuous, and his death caused no calm, but brought greater storms in all estates ; for in his time the Imperiall power was diuided into two heads, in Italy, and in Germany, which were, LEVVES and BERENGARIUS : and LEVVES being dead, one alone pretended not, but many, to succeede him both in name and in the dignity of the Empire : France would haue nominated an Emperor, alleging that fish that the line of CHARLES the Great was extinct in Germany, and that in France the same remained, and that Germany was conquered by the same CHARLES; in right therefore the title of the Empire appertained to his successors, and so it ought to returne to the Crowne of France; for CHARLES the Great had it not with the Empire as he had Italy, but it was given to him being King of France, and by that title his successors held the same.

Contention between the Germans, Frenchmen and Italians, about the throne of the Emperor.

The Princes of Germany denied this, fearing to return vnder the subjection of the French, and stood vpon the possession and authority to chuse the Emperor, alleging for their reason, that the Empire was transported to the Germanes in the person of CHARLES the Great, and that Germany was the Empire, and not the Kingdome of France, and that they were in possession thereof. The Italians said, that Italy was the ancient true seat of the Empire, and that they gave it to CHARLES, and had authority to give it vnto any other: and so they called and held BERENGARIUS for Emperor, notwithstanding his competitors. In France, LEUVES, the son of BOSON King of France challenged the Empire, for that he descended from CHARLES the Great. But the Germanes, who seemed to haue the best right and chiefest authority, and haue so continued (having not any that might succede LEUVES, for he had no sonnes) chose OTHON Duke of Saxony for Emperor, a man of great wisdom and valour: but he would not accept of that Empire which others so much desired; for, as he was now old, so hee knew that the affairs of the Empire stood in such estate, that they needed a man of greater power, and of longer life than himselfe. The Lords Name bee blessed, that in time of so great ambition, one man was found that refused to be an Emperor.

OTHON, Duke of Saxony, chosen Emperor, refused the Empire.

OTHON then answered those which had chosen him Emperor, that he had neither such health nor strength as to be able to govern the Empire, and therefore would not undertake a burthen which he was not able to bear: but he would assist them with his best counsell, concluding that in his opinion CONRADE Duke of Franconia was worthe to be chosen, in whom all the qualities and vertuous conditions did concur, that might seeme requisite in an Emperor: And so by common consent of the Germanes, and part of the French, CONRADE was chosen and obeyed for Emperor, who (as some write) descended from CHARLES the Great. And he presently began to gouerne the Empire, and in all things followed the counsell and aduice of OTHON, by whose means he obtained it: and so the first year he liued and ruled very happily. But the great Dukes and Princes of Germany waxing enuious, and desirous to raige, ARNOLD Duke of Baviera rebelled against him, and went into Hungary, and induced the Hungars and their King to warre vpon the new Emperor; whereupon, in the second year of his Raige, a sharp and cruell warre began: but, as he was very valiant and expert in Arms, so he drew his forces to an head, and came to a battell with the Hungars, and overthrew them, and constrained them to flee into their Countrey; and so freed Germany from that perill. And although afterwards it was sometimes molested, yet by his diligence and courage it was euer defended: and so he maintained the same in peace as long as Duke OTHON liued, vpon whose counsell he chiefly relied, but neuer durst come to make war in Italy.

After the death of OTHON, who left one sonne behinde him called HENRY, who was a very gallant yong man, and of great power, CONRADE began to suspect him; which was the occasion of the troubles which I will relate. BERENGARIUS being held in Italy for Emperor, besides CONRADE who with better title was Emperor in Germany; LEUVES, the son of BOSON King of France, determined to come into Italy to deprive BERENGARIUS of that Empire, who held it, not without great vexation and trouble, as well with the Princes of Italy (whereof some rebelled against him) as with the Infidels and Hungars which infested the same. And (as I said before) some Authors write, that this LEUVES came the first time to the same purpose, and was ouerthrowne by BERENGARIUS, and this (as I beleue) was the first; and if it were the second, he came being called by some of BERENGARIUS enemies. And notwithstanding that in the beginning of the wars he had good success, yet in the end hee was ouerthrowne, and constrained to flee. Thus much shall suffice for him, the matter being so doubtfull. Yet heere is some diversity among Authors; whereof some say, At that time reigned in Italy BERENGARIUS the Second, with the title of Emperor; as his father had done, who was son of the other BERENGARIUS before named, others attribute it to the father alone: but to the end we may the better vnderstand the matter, we yeeld that this was the second BERENGARIUS, for that we shall hereafter haue occasion to treat of another, which shall be the third.

May then, that at what time CONRADE was Emperor in Germany, and BERENGARIUS in in Italy, poor Italy (besides domestick & ciuil wars) was afflicted with other far more gricuous & pitifull. This was, for that the Towns which the Greek Empire held in Calabria and Pulia, together with the partialities and factions which were in them, were not in subjection: whereupon CONSTANTINE, who at that time reigned in Constantinople, or (as others say) ROMANUS the Tyrant, which with him gouerned the Empire for a time, procured the ayde of the Moores in Africa, and of the Arabians, of which a great number came into Italy, giuing it out, that they came to helpe the Greekes to recouer their right; vnder colour whereof, they became Lords of all Pulia, Calabria, and the rest which containeth now the kingdome of Naples; and they drew so neere to Rome, that they fought to haue taken the same, without regard of the Emperor of Constantinople, vnder whose name they first came into Italy. The cause of all which miseries, were the warres and troubles betweene the Christians: for CONRADE Emperour of Germany was busied in making warre against HENRY Duke of Saxony, the son of OTHON: BERENGARIUS was perplexed with the wars against LEUVES, the son of BOSON King of France, and others which for breuie I ouerpasse: and another occasion was, the small authority and little worth of the Popes of Rome. But Pope JOHN the eleuenth, whom some call the tenth, seeing this great necessitie, sent to ALBERICVS Marquess of Tuscany, or (as some Authors say) to his brother, which was the greatest Lord in all Italy (BERENGARIUS expected) with whose father BERENGARIUS had warre and controuersie; who promised him succour; and gathering all his forces together, with the aide of many others which followed him in that enterprise, he went to Rome, wherein the Pope had already leuied an indifferent good Armie, which he joynd with ALBERICVS his forces; and so he marched against his enemies: some write that the Pope in person went to this warre, which had such happy success, that besides many encounters, ALBERICVS fought one battaile against the whole power of the Moores; wherein, notwithstanding that it was very sharpe and doubtfull, yet in the end he gat the victorie, after which he was so absolutely master of the field, that he found not any one to make head against him, and so in short time recouered all that the Moores held in Italy, excepting some little, and certaine fortresses next to Mount Garganus in Pulia; whither the remainder of those Moores retired themselves: whom for that he then forbore wholly to ruinate (an error for want of foresight) it was the occasion of many calamities which ensued.

ALBERICVS hauing obtained so noble a victorie, and leauing it in such estate, as it seemed an easie matter for any other to haue effected the rest; he returned to Rome, where he was receiued with great pompe and triumph: but within few daies there arose discord and controuersie betweene him and the Pope; each of them attributing to himselfe the honour of that journey: whereupon ALBERICVS went discontented out of the Citie; whereof afterwards ensued great warres and mischiefes: and he was so ouercom with rage and desire to be reuenged, that as loone as he came into his countrie, he began to practise against the Pope, and to moue the Hungars to warre in Italy, promising them his aide and assistance; thinking it a small matter for him to haue made himselfe Lord of Rome. The Hungars came into Italy, and it pleased God that the greatest harme they did there, was in the said Marquess ALBERICVS owne countreies, and amongst his subjects. In the meane time that Italy was thus oppressed, the Emperour CONRADE (whose life we now write) fought the ruine of HENRY Duke of Saxony, who was the sonne of that OTHON by whose direction and counsell hee was chosen and made Emperour, and was by him gouerned in the beginning of his raigne, as heretofore hath bene shewed.

The principall cause hereof, was the feare and ielousie which he conceived of him: for this HENRY was a yong man of very great courage and valour, and aboue measure desirous of rule; and in the warres of Hungary had done great seruice to this Emperour CONRADE, and to his predecessor LEUVES, against ARNOLD Duke of Baviera, which fled into Hungary, as we haue said: by reason whereof, HENRY was generally so much beloued and esteemed, that CONRADE stood in feare to be dispossest by him of his Empire, and that he would haue rebelled against him, and therefore he resolved (if he might) to make him away: first practising his death by fraud and cunning; and that taking no effect, he resolved not to dissemble any longer; but sent his brother BERARD with an Army to destroy his countrie, and if he might to bearene him of his life: for which fact he became infamous, and all his actions were attributed to incomparable ingratitude: but his passion was such as he neuertheless continued his intended course. But HENRY gouerned himselfe so discretely, and had already leuied such an Army.

The coming of the Moores into Italy.

of Saxons, which were his subiects and friends, that he met with EBERARD in the field, and gaue him battaile; wherein his people behaued themselves so valiantly, that the Emperors brother was ouerthrowne, with the losse of the greatest part of his Army, and himself escaped by flight. CONRAD being aduertised hereof (in extreme choler) raised the greatest power he could make, and called all the Princes against HENRY, first sending Ambassadors vnto him, to perswade him to yeeld to his mercie, and not to perseuere in his contumacie; who concluded nothing: but returning, they reported that in their presence one of Duke HENRYS captaines, whose name was DREMA, said, that the Duke had no reason to come to any agreement, for he knew that thirtie legions of souldiers were coming to his aide. These words strake such a feare into the Emperors Army, that without any battaile, or sight of any enemy, the greatest part thereof disbanded; whereupon hee was driven to retire, with a determination to returne with greater force. But God, in whose hand are the hearts of Princes, in very short time altdred his purposes; for CONRAD was assailed with an extreme sicknes, whereof he afterwards died. And knowing that his end drew neere, he in great haste sent for the Princes of the Empire, the principall of which at that time were BYCARD Duke of Swabia, SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine, and his brother EBERARD, whom he had made King of Franconia, and many others, excepting ARNOLD Duke of Baniere, who remained in Hungrie, and HENRY Duke of Saxony which rebelled. These Princes being in this manner assembled, the Emperor, as a wise man and a good Christian, hauing more regard to the good government of the Empire, than to his owne choler or private passion (which is an extraordinary example) made vnto them a very set speech; wherein in conclusion he exhorted and counselled them, that after his deceale (which, so farre as he could comprehend, would be shortly) they should chuse the same HENRY Duke of Saxony (who then was in his disgrace) for Emperor: for, notwithstanding that he had a brother whom he loued very well, and was worthy of great estate, yet henceforth he chose HENRY, as onely worthy to be an Emperor, and his successor; for, as he very well knew, he was an excellent man, and endued with vertue, and with all the conditions which were requisite in a good Prince; and that he pardoned and restored him to his grace and fauour, and that this was his last will, counsell and resolution. The Noble minde and counsell of the Emperor was generally commended; only his brother EBERARD shewed himselfe grieved and discontented: but CONRAD perswaded him to patience, and recommended to them all, peace and concord. Then he made the Sword, the Scepter, the Robe, and the other Imperial ensignes to be brought before him; and by the consent of all the Princes, he appointed and charged his brother to carrie the same to HENRY, and in his name to make his peace and friendship with him, and to yeeld him obedience as to his soueraigne Lord: which he performed, and continued in HENRYS good grace and loue so long as hee held the Empire; which truly was a most noble part of both these brethren: of the Emperor, in making choise of his enemy for his successor: and of his brother, in voluntarily obeying him which was chosen. This his good resolution being concluded, and put in execution, within few daies after CONRAD departed out of this life, leaving neither sonne nor daughter; when he had reigned only seven yeeres or somewhat lesse, in the year of our Lord, 920; CONSTANTINE yet holding the Empire of Constantinople. In Italy reigned BERENGARIUS with the title of Emperor, notwithstanding that he held no part thereof, but Lombardy onely, and some cities neere thereunto adjoining, and those not without wars and troubles, with LEUVES son to the King of Provence. The state of Italy being such as I said, the Hungars invaded it, being cald thither by ALBERICVS Marquess of Tuscanie, and ruined the cuntry: and on the other side the Moores of Africa salying out of such places as they held in Pulia, troubled the state of the Church of Rome, and the frontiers thereof. And betwixt ALBERICVS and the Romans was war and discord.

The hearts of Kings are in the hands of God.

Conrad chose his cousin Henry for his successor in the Empire.

The death of the Emperour Con-
rade.

Forasmuch as in the life of this Emperour CONRAD, mention was made of ARNOLD Duke of Baniere, and for that heretofore this province hath been treated of, as of a kingdome, and so it is said, that LEUVES King of Germany, in the diuision made betweene his three sonnes, made CARLOMAN King of Baniere, and now we call ARNOLD, Duke thereof, which seemeth to be a contradiction: let the Reader therefore know, that in this province (as in all others) there haue been great alterations: the last was, that after the said CHARLES, the Emperor ARNOLPH succeeded in the state of Baniere, and after ARNOLPH the Emperour LEUVES, who dying without issue, made this ARNOLD Duke of Baniere: and afterwards in proceesse of time, in this Kingdome happened many alterations and changes, and in the end ioynd with the state of the Countie Palatine of Rhine: and afterwards it was againe diuided, and so through sundrie accidents; it came to that estate wherein it is at this day.

THE

THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND THE FOVRESORE AND SIXT RO-MANE EMPEROR, AND OF CON-STANTINE Emperour of Gracia: And of those which in his time were called Emperours.

THE ARGUMENT.

Henry being chosen Emperour, first he applied himselfe to pacifie the troubles of Germany, which were very tumultuous; but above all, to assure the high-waies from theues, growne by reason of the warres; and to maintaine iustice. There arose against him one Arnold, who lived in Hungary as a banished man; and each of them having lined a great Army, and being in a manner ready to haue come to the shock, Henry called Arnold to a parley, and knew so well how to perswade him, that he overcame him with words, which peradventure he should not haue done by Armes; and Arnold became his obedient subiect. He took truce with the Hungars, and subdued the Slavonians: but the time of the truce being expired betwixt him and the Hungars, and new occasion of warre arising, they came in the end to fight, where the Emperour obtained so great a victory, that all the Princes of Christendome sent to reioyce with him for the same. This good Emperour had set his minde upon the affaires of Italy, and purposed to haue freed the Church from Hugh, and other Tyrants: but God, who had otherwise determined, when he was providing for his Iourney, visited him with a mortall infirmity; and he knowing his life to be nere to an end, ordained, by the consent of all the Princes, his eldest sonne Otho for his successor, having reigned sevenne yeeres, and lived fixtie.

to punish the wicked; chiefly those which robbed by the high waies side, to the end that men might passe in safety, which by reason of the warres had done much harme.

N 4

He

HE election which the Emperour CONRAD before his deceale made of HENRY Duke of Saxony, naming him Emperour and his successor, is to be thought to haue beene done by Gods inspiration; for he proued a good Prince, and worthy the Imperiall maiesty. As soone then as CONRAD was deceased, all the States receiued him for their Emperour, and did him homage, calling him HENRY AVCEPS, that is to say, the Faulconer, for that he tooke great pleasure in Hawking; and when the newes was brought him that hee was chosen Emperour, he was found busie in that exercise, which he vied at times of pleasure for his recreation, without omitting any care for his businesse. Hethen taking vpon him the government of the Empire, applied himselfe to doe iustice, with a desire feuerly

The Emperour
Henry called Henricus Auctop.

He gaue himselfe also to pacifie all discord and dissension, and to establish peace and concord betwene the Princes, who for matters past were at variance amongst themselves: for all which he provided a good remedie, employing his wit, authoritie and power; and being obeyed by all men, excepting BYCARD Duke of Saueia, who with the fauour of France (for that he was sonne in law to the Duke of Burgundy) attempted some innouations: against whom the Emperour raised forces, but the matter was pacified, and the Duke acknowledged the Emperour for his Lord and Superior. Besides this, it happened (which some report before this time) that ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, which (as we said) for feare of CONRAD, liued as an exile in Hungary, returned to his Countrie, and gathering together a great number of Hungars, was so hardy as to call himselfe Emperour, and to deny his obedience to the Emperour HENRY; which he vnderstanding, leuying his old subjects of Saxony, and others of the Empire, went with a mighty Army against ARNOLD, who likewise marched towards him; and as a good Christian, being much grieved for the troubles which were likely to haue ensued, forbore not to procure ARNOLD to giue ouer his attempt: and it pleased God that his good desire tooke effect in this manner:

Both the Armies being in a readinesse to fight, notwithstanding it was apparant that the Emperour had the greater number, and better and more choise men; yet he sent ARNOLD word by a Trumpet, that he, vpon sufficient securitie, should come and speake with him; which ARNOLD performed: where the Emperour, among many graue, good, and discrete speeches, spake vnto him in these words:

Take heede ARNOLD, and consider that what thou doest, is to oppose thy selfe against Gods ordinance, who is the giuer of kingdomes and worldly power: Thou maist know that I was chosen of him by the mouth of my predecessor CONRAD, before his death; and that to this election haue consented all the estates of Germany, and thou only seekest to resist the will of God, and the generall consent of all men. I say vnto thee, take heede what thou doest, and I aduise thee to come to my obedience, and I will vse thee as my sonne or my brother: and if thou wilt not doe this, I take God for iudge betwene thee and me. And one thing I will sweare and assure thee, that if it had pleased his diuine Maiestie that thou haddest been chosen Emperour as I am, I would haue been an obedient subject, and haue serued thee faithfully: wherefore I pray thee, that sith I am so, thou wilt do the like by mee. Thou mayest see that I intreat thee for peace, at such time as my party hath the aduantage; in the warres: I consider well what thou doest, for I will not faile in any thing, that I haue promised. These and such like speeches were of such force, and so much moued ARNOLD, that he presently submitted himselfe and his countrey vnto the Emperour HENRY, and from thenceforth was euer most obedient vnto him, without any remembrance of matters past. There happened likewise discord betweene HENRY and the house and kingdom of France, about the soueraignty of the prouince and Duchie of Lorraine; neuertheless comming to a peace and agreement, matters passed prosperously, and he continued Lord thereof. And so Germany (by meanes of his good government) took a taste of the fruites which Iustice and the tranquillity of peace bring forth. But in Italy notwithstanding that BRENGARIVS was called Emperour, the want of such a Prince as HENRY wrought the contrary: it shall not be amisse therefore to speake of what followed, while that HENRY was busied about these matters.

It is already said, how that betwene Pope IOHN and the Romanes of the one side, and ALBERTVS Marquesse of Tuscane of the other, were great warres, after the victory obtained against the Infidels; and how that ALBERTVS had induced the Hungars to come into Italy against the citie of Rome, and that the greatest harme they did, was in his owne countrey, God permitting it as a punishment for his wickednesse; yet they did great spoiles in the Church lands. The Hungars hauing in this manner robbed the countrey, BRENGARIVS who was called Emperour, came to a composition with them; which was, that they should depart out of Italy, in consideration of a great summe of money which was giuen them. And Pope IOHN and the Romanes (in reuenge of the iniurie received from ALBERTVS) leuiued an Army, which was broken and ouerthrowne by the Hungars, the Duke of Spoleto being Generall of that Army; and ALBERTVS was besieged in a towne of his called Ortano, and was therein taken and slaine.

At the same time the Infidels which remained in Palsia leuying new forces and supplies renewed the warres, which was not foreseen in time by reason of the domestick discord, and they took many castles and cities, while the Pope applied himselfe to be reuenged of ALBERTVS;

ALBERTVS;

RICVS, and their power so much increased that the people voluntarily yielded themselves, by reason of the small reliefe which they had from the Emperour of Constantinople, in whose dominion the greatest part of those countreys was, or from BRENGARIVS for from the Pope, vntill that feare seized Rome: wherein making certaine Earle called GUIDO their General, they leuiued a good Army, and it pleased God to giue him the victory, and he made the Mooirs to retire themselves into those holds which they held before the bringing in of this second war, and for the citie was freed from that feare. But this braue and glorious exploit Earle GUIDO afterwards blemished with the foulest fact that can be spoken; and such a one as my members tremble to heare it, and my hand to write it. For this Earle GUIDO afterwards coming to Rome, with a resolution to make himselfe Lord thereof, he seized on the Pope and slaw him, and made another Pope, but his purpose tooke no effect: for he whom he made Pope was presently deposed, and LEO the sixt chosen; who was Pope but threen months; and him succeeded STEPHEN the tenth.

Whilest these matters passed in Rome and the marches thereof, BRENGARIVS the Emperour (whom we may call Italian) liued not free from troubles; for through the instigation of certaine Italian Lords, RODOLPH Duke of Burgundy with a great Army came into Italy with the title of Emperour, where he found so many friends (especially in Lombardy) that in very short space hee dispossessed BRENGARIVS, and was made Emperour and King of Italy; and BRENGARIVS fled into Hungary, thinking there to haue found reliefe: where, as saith BLEDONDS and some others, he died; and that BRENGARIVS the nephew of the first BRENGARIVS, was he which came afterwards, as shall be specified. Some write that he died in Italy, slaine by the treason of Count FLAMBERT, who was his gossip: But howeuer, he died deprived of his dignity; and he of whom we are to treat, was nephew to the first BRENGARIVS, the sonne of his daughter, and of a Marquesse, which was his sonne in Law. I write thus much for that there is a great confusion amongst Authors about these BRENGARIVS tyrant Emperours, for that they all were of one name. RODOLPH remaining with the victory in Italy was called Emperour, and held his Empire there the space of three yeeres in prosperity: In which time the Emperour HENRY in Germany ouerthrew and repelled the Hungars, which after their departure out of Italy went into Germany, wherein they did much harme: But (as I say) the Emperour put them to rout, and chased them thence, and taking their Generall prisoner, constrained them to sue to him, and to make peace for ten yeeres; hee restoring to them their Generall without ransom, yet they offered a great summe of money for him. RODOLPHVS hauing reigned three yeeres in Italy, the Hungars whose ordinary qualitie was to spoile their neighbours and other Prouinces, solicited therto by BRENGARIVS the nephew, vnder the conduct of a great man called FLALDVS, came into Italy, and encamped before Pauid, which they besieged; for reliefe whereof RODOLPHVS made so small prouision, that the inhabitants of the countrey discontented with his government, conspired against him, and slew his father-in-law BYCARD Duke of Saxony, who came to see Adrian; and then they called and solicited HUGH Duke of Arles, a French-man, to come to their defence, promising to receiue him for their King and Lord, and to make him Emperour; which he accepted, notwithstanding his neere relation in blood to RODOLPH: and he came with so many good men of warre, and with such fauour of the Italians, that none of his enemies durst encounter him: and RODOLPH leauing Italy, returned into Burgundie, where he afterwards had such successe, that he was for a space King of France; and HUGH continued in Italy, and subdued a greater part therof than any of the other tyrants had done, banishing such as he suspected, and rewarding his friends: he procured peace and friendship with the Emperour HENRY; which he granted, thereby to settle peace in Germany with the Hungars, and with other nations and Princes. And he afterwards preuailed against ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere: So that HUGH was a greater Lord and of greater power then any of long time had been in Italy; where leauing him vntill his turne, we will returne to our Emperour HENRY.

HENRY hauing ouerthrowne the Hungars, and made peace with them for nine or ten yeeres, as an ambitious Prince, and desirous to enlarge his Empire, after that he had taken care for the establishment of peace and iustice; and for the good government thereof, hee leuiued an Armie, and sent the same into the countreys of Slanonia and Dalmatia, from which he had been annoyed and endangered; and ouerthrowing the inhabitants thereof in battaile, he took many townes in those Prouinces, and doing therein great harme; victorious and laden with spoiles, he joyfully returned into Germany. The next yeere after this victorie (which was the tenth yeere of his reigne)

Speeched
by Henry to Arnold,

Arnold submitted himselfe
to Henry.

Pope Iohn the twelfth takes prisoner, and slaine by the Earle Guido.

Rodolph deposed Berenga-rius.

The death of Berengarius.

Rodolph Duke of Burgundy Emperour in Italy.

The coming of the Hungars into Italy.

The coming of Hugh Duke of Orleans into Italy.

Henry brought the Bohemians into subjection.

raigne) he marched, with his power, against the Bohemians and WENCESLAWS their Duke, for that many of them held not the true faith, and also for that they refused to be subject to the Empire, and against him had assisted the Hungars: Wherein hee shewed such valour, that overthrowing the Duke, he tooke Prague, which is the chiefe Citie thereof, and brought that kingdome into such subjection, as was the rest of Germany, and so it continued all this Dukes life time.

This warre being thus happily ended, another followed, which was against the Danes, who with a mightie Naue came into Friseland, and into Saxony, and tooke certaine Townes there, but he made them to flie out of all that countrie, to their great losse: and hee also overthrow those of Norway, which then were called Abroditi. HENRY hauing obtained so great and so many victories, the time of the peace with the Hungars being expired, they presently sent their Ambassadors to him, to require certain pay granted to their Ancestors, at what time as peace was made with them; whereto HENRY gaue no good answer; for hee accounted it a matter vnworthy the Majestie of an Emperour, to pay tribute for peace: wherewith the Hungars were so much incensed, that with their Duke or Capitaine (for at that time they had not the dignitie of a King) they issued out of their confines with the most flourishing Army that euer they had, and beganne to warre with greater fury and cruelty, then euer they had done at any time before, and neuer stayed vntill they came into Saxony, and into other places which were the Emperours. HENRY vs. Parimony, where they did much harme, and shewed great cruelty; which was done so suddenly, that HENRY in the beginning could not prevent it: But in short space he leuied a great Army, and notwithstanding that he was extremely sick, yet neither the Princes, nor his Physicians could stay him, but that he would goe with his Army, and encounter the Hungars (being so weake that he could hardly sit his Horse) hee offered them battaile, which they refused not, where the Emperour, although with a weake and low voice, made a speech to his souldiers, which did so much encourage them, that they presently charged with such force, and the Hungars (being a most valiant Nation) fought with such eagernesse and fury, that it was one of the most bloody and cruell battels of the world: But in the end the valiant courage of the Emperour HENRY so much prevailed, that he obtained the victory, and slew an infinite number of the Hungars, and many of them were likewise slaine vpon the way as they fled; and those which suruiued, fled scattered into their countrie; from whence they neuer after returned as long as the Emperour HENRY liued. He was to great reputation and glory by this victory, that all the Princes Christian, sent their Ambassadors to him, to congratulate, and to desire his friendship; But with the greatest instance came Ambassadors from HONG, who in Italie was called Emperour. HENRY was likewise called by his subjects, semper Augustus, Pater Patria, and other ancient names and titles of honour; and he as a good Christian gaue thanks to God; and the tribute which at other times he had payed to the Hungars, he made to be distributed among the poore, and so did other good deedes, and ruled the Empire in such manner that Germany enjoyed both peace and justice, which are two blessings which make mighty and rich kingdomes.

Italy in the meane time endured warre and miserie; for the Empire of HONG which last raigned, being troyemouled with warre and discord, was neither fime nor good, but Tyrannicall and violent: by reason whereof the Infidels which in Pulia held certaine Townes and fortresses, made ordinary incursions vpon their neighbours. And at that time a mighty Naue of Moores came out of Africa, vpon the coast of Genoa and of Tuscany, and taking land did great harme, spoiling many places, amongst which they besieged the Citie of Genoa: and the multitude and force of the Infidels was so great, that notwithstanding that the besieged fought very valiantly, yet they entred it by force; all the Genowais comming first to the fight in defence of their Citie.

After that the Infidels had entred it, they put all those to the sword which were able to beare Armes; and spoiling and sacking it, left nothing therein that was worth the carriage; and all boyes, women and children they tooke prisoners, and carried aboard their shippes and galleies, which they led away with them; and so left Genoa desolate and without any inhabitants: yet some prisoners were loone released, and some were taken in their flectes at Sea, and elsewhere, which reinhabited the Citie: neuertheless it was long before it could recouer it selfe of this calamitie: And some write that the Infidels horse troups were taken vpon the way, and that the prisoners were not carried into Africa.

The Emperour vnderstanding hercof, and being well informed of the state of Italy, and that setting

The Emperour
Henry his vi-tory against the Hungars.

Genoa besieged and taken by the Moores.

setting aside that which the Church held by so many titles and donations, all the remainder of that Westerne Empire, excepting some Townes in Pulia, was held by the Greekes, he therefore resolved to goe thither in person with a mighty Army, to free Italy from the yoke of HONG, and of other Tyrants; and to reforme and reduce the same to such order as it ought to hold, and as he had established in Germany. And beginning to make preparation for his journey, and hauing mustered vp his men of war, it pleased God to dispose thereof after another manner, for he was taken with a most deadly infirmity; and knowing that his end drew neer, vying such diligence as a good Christian ought to doe, he gaue order that all the Princes (if possibly it might be) might be assembled, with whose good will and consent he ordained his son OTHO (whom he had by his wife MARY) Emperour and his successor: and his sicknesse increasing, within few daies after he yielded his soule to God, being of the age of threescore yeers, in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord 937. He left two other sons beside OTHO: the one was called, by his name, HENRY, who was afterwards Duke of Baviere (for ARNOLDS sonnes were deprived of that estate) he being married to his daughter IVDITH; and one other sonne called BRUNVS, who was Archbishoppe of Colen; and he had one daughter whose name was GERTRUGA, who was married to a Duke; and another called ADALCIDA, which was married in Africa to Count Paris; and another called MARY which was a Nunne.

In Constantinople ended the Empire of CONSTANTINE, when he had raigned eight and thirtie yeers, in company with the Tyrant ROMANVS; and part (as I said) alone; in which time he had great conflicts in the Easterne parts, with the Infidels in Asia, and with the Bulgarians in Europe; amongst which he wonne one battaile by Sea against the king of Russia, wherein were aboute a thousand saile of shippes, which came to the coast of Constantinople, by the Sea called Euxinum; and other great accidents hapned too long to relate: At the end whereof he died, leauing his Empire to his son, which after his Grandfathers name was called ROMANVS; for CONSTANTINE had to wife the daughter of the other ROMANVS which was the Tyrant, of whom I haue already made mention.

This CONSTANTINE was a good Prince, very deuout, and excellently well learned in Humanitie.

The death of the Emperour
Henry.

The death of Constantine Emperour of Constantinople.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSORE & SEVENTH ROMANE

Emperour. And of ROMANVS, and the rest which were Emperours in Grecia.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

Tho succeeding in the Empire, was much troubled; for not only the Princes of Germany, but also his owne brethren and kinsmen made warre against him, and fought bloody battailes with him: of which, after long troubles he had honourable victories: He also freed his brother in law LEUES king of France from certaine Dukes which oppressed him. Hee was by the Pope called into Italie against Berengarius; and comming with a great Armie, forced him to flye. Afterwards his sonne, and one Conrade his sonne in law, whom he had left for the defence of Italie, rebelling against him, and in the end the sonne comming to a battaile with the father (a thing more befesening Turkes and Infidels then Christians) was the loser, and his fathers prisoner; who seeing with how great humilitie, and with how many teares he sued for his life and pardon, he restored him as length to his grace: and and be afterwards became most obedient. After this warre there grew a greater, made by the Hungars and Saxons, which the Emperor happily ended. He againe came into Italy, by reason of Berengarius, who tyrannized the same, and forced him to flee, and coming to Rome he was crowned Emperor by Pope John. Many other rebellions ensued by the Popes and the Romans against the Emperours, whilest he warred against Berengarius and his sonne: of which, being fortunate successe he returned into Germany, and ordained his sonne Otho his successor, where being old, and usued in vertuous exercises, he yielded his soule to God.

937

This Otho is called the first, for that he is first of the German Emperours called by that name.

Being come to write the life of Otho the first of that name of the German Emperours, of whom I am now to treat, it fareth with me, in my opinion, as with one which hath wandered, and is now againe returned into his right way. I make this comparison, for that there are some which account not those amongst the Emperours, which I have placed after ARNOLPH, the sonne of CARLOMAN, vntill this OTHO; of whom I say, that after the death of his father, he found no contradiction in attaining to the name and dignitie of Emperour of Germany; for his father HENRY before his death had nominated him for his successor. Truly this OTHO was very well worthy of the Empire: for he was a Prince of an excellent wit, and of a wonderfull great and noble minde; and his great valour and vertues of a good Prince: yet there were many great insurrections and rebellions against him; and he was a Prince which had greater warres then any other then liuing, for the space of thirtie and odder yeeres that he held the Empire, in which time he passed many adventures, and obtained great victories: and notwithstanding that he vnderwent sundrie daungers and hazards, yet he euer shewed himselfe milde, and pitifull to the vanquished; which (in my opinion) in the end made his Empire more stable and firme, then all the victories which he obtained. As soone as his father was dead, he was in the citie of Aken, or Aquigran chosen Emperour, and anointed and crowned by OLDBRICVS Archbishop of Mentz, all the Princes of Germany (which could come) being there present; and the rest which could not, wrote their Letters, and sent their Ambassadors, acknowledging their obedience: And so his beginning was very peaceable and highly esteemed, and he shewed himselfe iust, and valiant, and gouerned the estate with wisdom and clemencie. It happened presently after this, that BOISLAYS, brother to the Duke of Bohemia (which at that time had not the title of King) by treason slew his brother WENCESLAYS (for so was he called) to the end to haue the Soueraigntie; and rebelled against the Emperour: whereof when OTHO was advertised, moued with the hatred and vileness of the fact (for WENCESLAYS was iust and faithfull Prince, and his father HENRY had receiued him for his seruice and his subject, after that (as wee haue heretofore said) he had subdued him, hee resolved to send a good Army, vnder the leading of a valiant Capitaine: whom the tyrant Duke attended in the field, and therewith fought a terrible battaille, and was ouerthrowne with so great losse of his people, that the Imperiall Generall assuring himselfe of the victorie, was lesse careful and circumspect, then he ought to haue been; but BOISLAYS within few daies reinforcing his Armie, gathered courage from the others neglect, and charging him suddenly in disorder and vnawares, ouerthrew him, and slew the greatest part of his people: wherewith OTHO was highly displeased, and sending thither a new supply he sufficiently reinforced his Army: But BOISLAYS was grown so haughty, and had such reliefe from the Hungars, that the warres grew to be doubtfull, and of long continuance, and in the meane time others happened; but OTHO's courage and resolution was so great, that he neuer forgot to provide for this warre, during the furie of all the other, as we will declare: yet it lasted fourteene yeeres, before he could obtaine any complete victory; and then BOISLAYS yielded as you shall heare.

The Emperour proceeding in this warre of Bohemia; in the greatest heate thereof, there began ciuill and domestical combussions and Insurrections, which resolu'd into a very cruell warre, the beginning whereof was this. EBERARD (which (as I remember) was brother to the Emperour CONRAD, and carried the Imperiall ensignes to the Emperour HENRY, father of this OTHO, being a great Lord, rich and mighty, did an iniury to an Earle, a man of lesse account then himselfe, and burned a towne of his; which for that the new Emperour would not suffer suffer to escape free, he condemned him in a sum of money, and to be imprisoned and banished: which sentence highly displeased EBERARD, expecting opportunitie to shew his discontent.

